16. Whether thou beleuest that oblations & pilgrimages, may be deuoutly and meritoriously done to the sepulchres and reliques of sayntes?*

17. Whether the fast in Lent and other appoynted by the Canon lawe,* and receiued in common vsage of Christian people (vnlesse necessitye otherwise requireth) are to be obserued?

18. Whether it be laudable and profitable,* that worshipful images be set in churches for the remembraunce of Christ and his sayntes?

19. Whether thou beleuest that prayers of men liuing, doe profit soules departed and being in Purgatory?*

20. Whether men may merite and deserue both by their fastinges and also by their other deedes of deuotion?

21. Whether thou doest beleue, that men prohibited of Bishops to preach, as suspect of heresy,* ought to cease from preaching and teaching, vntill they haue purged thēselues of suspition before an higher iudge?

23. Whether thou beleuest that it is lawfull for all Priestes freely to preach the word of God or no?

23. Whether thou beleuest that it is lawfull for lay men of both kindes, that is to wit,* both men and women to sacrifice and preach the word of God?

24. Whether excommunication denounced by the Pope agaynst all hereticks, do oblige and bind them before God?*

25. Whether euery priest is bound to say dayly his mattins and euensong, according as it is ordeined by the church or whether he may leaue them vnsaid without offēce or deadly sinne?

26. Whether thou beleuest that y^e heds or rulers, by necessity of saluation, are boūd to geue vnto the people,* holy scri'pture in theyr mother language?

27. Whether is it lawful for the rulers for some cause, vpō theyr reasonable aduisement, to ordeine that the scripture should not be deliuered vnto the people in the vulgar language?

28. Whether thou beleuest that consecrations, hallowings and blessings vsed in the Church are to be prayed?

29. Whether thou beleuest that the pope may make lawes, and statutes,* to bind all christen men to the obseruance of the same, vnder payne of deadly sinne, so that such lawes & statutes be not contrary to the law of God?

30 Whether thou beleuest, that the pope and other prelates & theyr deputies in spirituall things, haue power to excōmunicate Priestes, and lay people that are inobedient and sturdy from entring into the church, and to suspend or let them from ministration of the sacramentes of the same?

31. Whether fayth only without good workes,* may suffice vnto a man fallen into sinne after his baptisme for his saluation Page 1102 and iustifying?*

32. Whether a Priest marying a wife, and that without the dispensation of the Pope, and begetting also childrē of her without slaunder geuing, do sinne deadly?

33. Item, whether a latin priest after he hath taken the order of priesthood, being sore troubled and styrrd with pricking of lust and lechery, and therefore marying a wife for remedy of the same, do sinne deadly?

34. Item, whether thou didst euer pray for Iohn Wickliffe,* Iohn Hus▪ or Hierome of Prage cōdemned of heresy in the Coūsell of Constance, or for any of them sith they died, or whether thou hast done opely or secretly any deedes of charity for them, affirming them to be in blesse & saued?

35. Item, whether thou hast recounted them or any of thē to be saints, and worshipped them as sayntes?

*36. Item, whether thou doest beleue, holde and affirme, that euery generall Coūsell, and the Coūcell of Constance also, do represent the vniuersall congregation or church?

37. Item, whether thou doest beleue that the same things which the Counsel of Constance (representing the vniuersall church) hath approued,* & doth approue for the maintenance of fayth, and soules health, that the same is to be approued and holden of all christians?

38. Whether the condēnations of Iohn Wickliffe, I. Hus and Hierome of Prage, done vpon theyr persons, bookes, and documents by the whole general coūsell of Constance were duely and rightly done, and so for such, of euery catholick person, they are to be holden?

*39. Whether thou beleuest that Ioh. Wickliffe of Englād Iohn Hus of Boheme, and Hierome of Prage, were hereticks and for hereticks to be named, and theyr bookes and doctrines to haue bene and now be peruerse, for the which books and pertinacy of theyr persons, they are condemned by the holy counsell of Constance for heretickes?

40. Item, whether thou beleue or affirme, that it is not lawfull in any case to sweare?

41. Whether thou beleue that it is lawfull at the commaūdemēt of a iudge,* to make an othe to say the truth, or any other othe in case cōuenient, and that also for purgation of infamy?
42. Item, whether a christian person despising the receipte of the sacramentes of confirmation,* extreme vnction, or solemnising of matrimony, do sinne deadly?
43. Itē, whether thou beleuee, that S. Peter as Christes vicar,* haue power vpon earth to bind and lose?
44. Item, whether the Pope ordinarily chosen for a time his proper name being exprest, be the successor of S. Peter?
45. Item, whether thou hast euer promised at any tyme by an othe,* or made any confederacy or league with any person or persons, that you woulde alwayes hold & defēd certein conclusions or articles, seming to you and your accōplices, right and cōsonant vnto the fayth, and that you certefye vs touching the order and tenor of the sayd opinions and conclusions, and of the names and surnames of them that were your adherentes, & promised to be adherent vnto you in this behalfe?

¶The aunswere of Iohn Lambert to the first Article.

VNto your first demaund wherin you do aske, whether I was suspect or infamed of heresy.* I answere that I am not certayne what all persons at all seasōs haue demed or suspected of me, peraduenture some better, some worse, like as y^e opiniō of the people was neuer one, but thought diuersly of all the famous prophets,* & of the Apostles, yea and of Christ himselfe: as appereth in S. Iohn, how, whē he came into Ierusalem in the feast called Scenopegia, anon there arose vpon him a great noyse, some saying that he was a very good man, other sayd nay, & called him a seducer, because he led the people frō the right waies of Moses law, into error. Seing therfore that all men coulde not say wel by Christ, which is the author of verity and truth, yea the very truth it selfe, and likewise of his best seruāts: what should I need to regard, if at some time, some person for a like cause should suspect of me amisse, and euill report of me. Seing moreouer it is sayd in the Gospell. Vae vobis, cum laudauerint vos omnes homines. &c. Woe be to you when all men speak well of you:* for so did theyr fathers to the false prophets. If therfore at any season such infamy was put vpon me, I am glad that I haue so litle regarded the same, that now I haue forgottē it. And though I did remember any such, yet were I more then twice a foole to shew you thereof: for it is written in your owne law: Nemo tenetur prodere seipsum.* No man is bound to bewray himselfe. But this I ensure you, I was neuer so charged with suspition or infamy of this crime, that I was therefore at any tyme, conuented and reprobued afore any iudge afore that I was troubled for these causes, for which I was at the first put into your handes: and of them seing you could not prooue me faulty, I wonder why you would neuer yet pronōūce me quite and innocent, according as I haue euen lowely desired of you, and required full instantly the same. But letting those passe, you haue imagined new matters to charge me with, wherein I thinke certaynely, that you coulde no more haue proued me culpable, thē you did in the first that is, to wytt, no whit culpable in neither, had it not bene, that by long imprisonment you enforced me to tell what I thought in them, which I haue and will freely do: and that indifferently considered, I suppose shall not deserue anye sore punishment, vnlesse you will beare the truth, wherevnto I hope it shall not disagree.

¶To your second demaund,* where you do inquire whether euer I had any of Luthers bookes, and namely sith they wer cōdemned, and how long I kept them and whether euer I haue spent any study in thē? I say that in deade I haue had of them, and that both before they were condēned & also sith, but I neither will ne can tell you, how long I kept them:* but truth it is that I haue studied vpon th• and I thanke God that euer I so did: For by them hath god shewed vnto mee, and also to an huge multitude of other, such light, as the deceiueable darcknes of them (I beseech God amend it) that name themselues (but amisse) to be the holy Church, cannot abide. And that appeareth euidently, for they dare not stand to any triall. He coueteth aboue all things, as all his aduersaries do well know, y^t all his writings & the writinges of all his aduersaries myght be translated into al languages, to the intent that al people might see & know, what is saide of euery part, wherby mē should the better iudge what the trueth is. And in this me thinketh he requireth nothing but equity, for y^e law would haue no body condemned, me yet iustified, vntill his cause were both heard and knowne.

But the contrary part, I meane our ouer riche prelacy which is so drowned in voluptuous liuing that they can not attend to studye Gods Scripture ne preach the same,* which should be the principall part of theyr office,* abhorre this fashion (albeit it is right indifferēt and full of equity) no lesse thē they do abhor death. And no maruell for doubt lesse if it so could be obtained, that the writinges of all parties might be openly seene and confere, we shoulde soone see theyr sleightly dealing and facing doctrine,* with all other cloked abusion, lightly ouerthrowne: As appeareth well in Almayne, for there be y^e bookes of euery party sene openly and translated in the vulgar language, that al people may see and read vpon them: and so vpon the sight of the books, they lightly folow the true light of Gods word refusing the horror of darcknes and false doctrine, whereby before, they haue beene seduced from the right teaching and way shewed in the Bible. And this is done, not of an hundreth ne of a thousand, but generally of whole Cities & countreies, both high and low, few or none except.

But our Prelates seeing thys, and that there dealinge should, if this light were set vp,* soone be detecte and discouered, haue sent out commaūdements, that if any persons shall aduenture to keepe any such bookes, they shalbe, in so doing, excommunicate from God, and al his Saintes, and cursed as blacke as pitch, whether the bookes be in Latin, English, French, Dutch, or any other tongue: as in deede men seing the fruite contained in them haue set them foorth in all languages. But this ought not Christē men to think any newelty, for so did theyr forefathers the Prelates in Christes time, and after to the Apostles, yea and if it were well tried I thinke it should be soone founde out, that they haue so dealt euer since, vnto this daye.* For when Christ went about preaching, the Scribes and Pharise is whiche were Bishops then & Prelates gaue a generall cōmaūdement, that whosoeuer confessed him to be Christ, should be cursed and put out of the Synagogue, y^t we call the church, and so they were. Looke in the Actes of the Apostles, and you shall finde howe they were in like maner serued: yea looke in the olde Testament and you shall finde (as I remember) how they procured of one that was a temporall ruler at that season, to haue the prophecy of Ieremy (for he of all other is most vehement agaynst the dissimulation of priestes) to be burned: why then should we eschew them or theyr workes, vnles we knew a better cause why,* whom our prelates reiect and cast away, seing they render no rea|sonable cause of theyr enterprise? but presuming of theyr power, without any due authority, that I can finde, graūted vnto them so to do, will, because they so commaund, so haue all done, according to the tyrannicall saying (as I trow) of Sardanapalus: Sic volo, sic iubeo, sit pro ratione vo|luntas: That is to say: So will I, so doe I commaund: and that my will for reason stand.

But I would to God y^t such knew what spirit they haue Page 1103 in thē.* For if they had in deed, the spirit which they claime & pretend to haue, I meane y^e spirit of Christ, I dare say, it should soone alter them from such hautie language & doting, and cause them to turne a new leafe: for that spirite is ful of softnes and lenitie, lowlines and humilitie, patience and temperancie, voyde of all wilfulnes & tiranny, yea, it should cause them not to preuent,* but easily to followe the counsaile and doctrine of Christes Apostles, & holy saintes that be their interpretours.* As S. Paul which writing vnto the Thessalonians, would them all, to proue al things, and to retaine or hold that only, which is good, in refraining frō all that hath semblance of euil. And Saint Iohn would haue Christian people,*to try the spirite of them that shoulde speake whether they were of God or no. Also he writing in another Epistle vnto a noble woman and vnto her children, sayth, If any person shall come vnto you, bringing with them the doctrine that is not of Christ, receiue hym not into your house, ne make him any cheare. So that in this he would haue women to knowe the doctrine of Christ, and to loue that, refusing to giue credence vnto forraine teaching, not sauouring the same.

In the 1. Epistle also to the Corinthians, S. Paule writing in general to all the inhabitants of that city, saith: Brethren,be you not children in wit and vnderstanding, but as concerning maliciousnes, be you children. In wit I would haue you perfite: and why? Uerily for none other cause, but that we should (as he writeth vnto the Hebrues) haue discretion to iudge the good from ill, and the ill from the good, and so to be like men differing from beasts: according to y^e saying of the prophet: See that ye be not like vnto an horse or a mule which lacke vnderstanding. And we should pray with him in another Psalme: O Lord teach me the way that I should walke in,*for I lift vp my soule vnto thee.

Saint Chrysostome according vnto this, in a certaine of hys Commentaries vpon Mathew,* the booke is called Opus imperfectum, writeth after this fashion, so neare as my remembrance doth serue, and certaine I am that I shall not misreport him, and that I will be tried when soeuer it shall please you to bring the booke. The priestes that were Pharises in the time (sayth he) of Christe, made an ordinance, that who so euer shoulde knowledge Iesus to be Christe should be accursed and excommunicate. If then the Pharises or Priestes that now do occupy their rowmes should make a like ordinance, because they would not haue Christes doctrine to be professed for hindring of their lucre, should we therefore giue in all poyntes credence vnto them, and leaue of to seeke after the knowledge of Christes doctrine? Nay truely. Why (quoth he) shal we not be excused herein by ignoraunce,*leeing we be forefended by the rulers to haue knowledge? He aunswereth no verily: for if (saith he) when thou desirest to buy cloth, thou wilt not be content to see one merchaunts ware, but go from the first to the second, from the second to the third and so further, to knowe where is the best cloth and best cheape: thou vsing such careful diligence for a temporal profite art well worthy great reproche, that wilt be more remisse and negligent for thy soule health. Seeke therefore about from one Doctor or teacher vnto an other, that thou mayest know who doth most duely and truely teache Christ, and him follow, accord•ng to the saying of the Apostle: Prooue all and holde the good:*and as it is sayde in the Gospell, that thou maist know: Qui funt probati nummularij, & qui non. That is to wit,*know who be true or lawful chaungers or coyners,*and who be not.

He also addeth another similitude or parable. When thou goest (quoth he) a iourney, not knowing perfetly the way, thou wilt, lest thou should fayle of the right way, enquire of one man and after of an other, and if thou shouldest chaunce to go somewhat wyde, yet thou wilt not so leaue of the iourney vndone, but make inquisition againe to come where thou wouldest rest: So likewise (sayth he) ought wee to seeke about intentiue for the wealth of our soule: Qui sunt probi clauigeri, & qui non, that is to saye, who are the right key bearers and who not: meaning thereby the key bearers, Christes apostles, and bearers of his testimony or message. Which saying, although it were written of no autentically authour (howbeit it is written euen of him whome I shewed you in the sayde worke) but vttered of one that were in little estimation, euery indifferent person hauing wit and reason, would assent (I doubt not) that it is full true.

The same author also, in an Epistle which you shall find in a work called Psegmata Chrysostomi,* sheweth (as I remember) how certain men deemed ill of him, for because he did study Origenes workes, which afore was condemned for an heretick:* but he maketh an Apologie to the same shewing that Christian men ought not to be reprehended for so doing. In whiche Apologie he bringeth▪ for his defence,* the saying of Paul aboue rehearsed, Proue all thinges &c. Likewise did S. Hierome, I wote not well in what place of his works, but you shall find it in a treatise called vnio dissidentium where he entreateth De mādatīs hominū. When it was objected agiynst him that he retained by him the workes of Eusebius & of Origine, studying vpon thē he bringeth for him that it was so lawfull, the sayde place of the Apostle, making therewith an aunswere worthy to be greatly noted.

The same is also reported in the booke called Ecclesiastica historia, or els Historia Tripartita. I wote not now precisely whether. So that these and other moe authorities of the scripture, and semblable ensamples of holy interpretours shall proue, that I and other may safely (no good law inhibiting, vnles constitutions Pharisical) read and search the woorkes, not onely of Luther, but also of all other, be they neuer so ill or good: namely seeing I am a Priest, whō the bish. of Norwich ought not to haue admitted into orders, vnles he had seene me to haue had iudgement to discern good from ill, neither ought any of you to geue orders to any such, in whom you do not finde like habilitie for to iudge the light from darckenes, and the trueth from falshood: and therefore if for this you would punish me, I cannot see but you shall condemne your selues, iudgyng rather of sensuall pleasure then of equitie, which in men of your order, were a great shame and much vncomely.

¶Unto your third demaund, wherto you do aske, whether I was constitute a Priest, and in what dioces,* and of what Bishop: I say that I was made Priest in Norwich and of the Bishops Suffragan of the same Dioces. ¶Unto the fourth, wherein you do demaund, whether it be lawfull for a Priest to marry a wife, & whether a Priest in some case be bound by the law of God to mary a wife:* I say that it is lawfull, yea, and necessary for all men y^t haue not geuen to them of God, the gifte of chastitie, to marry a wife, and that sheweth both Christ and S. Paule. In y^e 19. of Mathew Christ speaking vnto the Phariseis that came for to attempt him, in the conclusion, sayth in this wise: Whosoever, shall forsake hys wife except it be for fornication, & marieth an other, committeth adultery, and whosoever maryeth her so forsaken, committeth adultery.*

With that speaketh his disciples: If thus the case stand betwixt a man and hys wife: it shall be hurtful and not expedient to contract matrimony. He made aunswere: Euery man cannot away with that saying, but they vnto whome it is geuen of God: Meaning that euery man coulde not abide single or vnmaryed,* but such vnto whome was was geuē of God a special grace so to continue. And if with your better aduise I might be somewhat herein bolde, I woulde suppose that where as he doth say: Non omnes sunt capaces huius dicti (Euery man cānot away with that saying) thys worde Non omnes, ought to be here taken as it is in many other places of Scripture, as where in y^e psalme it is sayd: Non iustificabitur in conspectu tuo omnis viuens. It is meant that no person liuing shalbe iustified afore God. And in the Epistle to the Galathians, and to the Romanes where it is sayd: Ex operibus, legis non instificabitur omnis caro. (By the works of the law, no flesh shalbe iustified in his sight) it is meant therby nulla caro, so that non omnis, after y^e rule of equipollence, should be taken forasmuch as nullus: and then then the sence should be thus, Nulli sunt capaces huius dicti nisi hi quibus datum sit.* No man can be capax of thys saying, or can so passe theyr life without mariage, except those whiche haue it geuē them by a singular grace of God to liue chafte.

Then he proceeded further saying, There be gelded men that so were borne from the mothers wombe, and there be some gelded men, that haue bene so made by men,* and there be gelded men that haue so made themselues, for loue of the kingdome of heauen. In conclusion he saith: who that receiueth this saying, thinking that it should be vnexpedient for him to mary, and that he may liue chaste thorowe y^e gift geuen him of God, let him take it, and so liue. So he leaueth singlenes of lyfe to all mens election,* without anye compelling them thereto.

Hereunto assenteth S. Paule, when that by many reasons he had perswaded the Corinthians to single life. Finally, he concludeth thus: This (quoth he) say I vnto you willing y^e which shuld be for your profite: but not to bring you in bondage. And a little afore: I would (quoth he) that all men were euen as my selfe am. But euery one hath a seuerall gift of God one one wise, an other otherwise, shew'ing thereby, that vnto some it is geuen of God to liue continēt, and to other for to engender & procreate children, and therefore his will cannot come to effect. Whiche thinge you may easily perceauē in this: that after he had shewed forth hys good wishe and desire, saying: Velim omnes homines.* &c. I would that all men were euen as I am: hee putteth a coniunctiō aduersatiue, that declareth an obstacle or stop saying: Sed vnusquisque proprium donum habet. &c. But euery man hath hys proper gift of God.

Page 1104 Upon this he procedeth further, wherby you may apertly see, y^t he would haue al men (none except) to mary wāting the gift of continencie. This (quod he) I say to the vnmarried and widowes:* expedient it were for them to remaine as I do: but if they cannot liue continent, let thē contract mariage, for better it is to mary then to burne. This prooueth well that all priestes wanting continencie of heart, had neede to mary for to auoyd burning lust, vnles they be in obedient to the mind of Christ, that spake in Paule, in obseruing the traditions of men.

In the beginning also of the same Chapter also he saith: It is good that a man should not deale with a woman. Notwithstanding for auoyding fornication (quod he) let euery man haue his wife, and euery woman haue her husband. He sayth here: Quisque & quaeque euery man and euery woman. And not quidam,* nec quaedam, some man nor some womā: He excepteth neither priest ne nunne, but euery one both man & woman is bound for auoyding of burning and fornication to mary, not hauing the gift giuen of chastitie.

The same also confirmeth your own law▪ dist. 29. where it is written thus: Si quis discernit presbyterum coniugatum, tanquam occasione nuptiarum, quòd offerre non debeat, anathema sit. If any man do holde that a priest being married, in that respect y^t he is married, ought not to minister in his function: be he accursed. And in the 31. dist. Si quis vituperat nuptias, & dormientem cum viro suo fidelem, ac religiosam detestatur, aut culpabilem aestimat, velut quae regnum Dei introire non possit, anathema sit. If any man shal find fault w^t matrimony; and detest a faithfull and deuout woman lying with her husband, and thinke her culpable, as one that could not therefore, enter into the kingdome of God: be he accursed. And euery where else, such like are to be seene.

Moreouer, in historia tripartita, it is written, that a noble Martyr of Christ called Paphnutius,* in Nicene Councell, when all other bishops were purposed to haue enacted there that priestes should liue vnmarried,* this holy man resisted thē so mightily both with reasons, and also with authority of scripture, that then their purpose altered, & their first deuise could not passe. And one authoritie I remēber was this, which he borrowed of Paul in the second Epistle to Timoth. Your deuise (quod he) may haue a semblāce of holines: but in deed it shall be the destruction and vndoing of the same.

Moreouer, in one of the principall histories of Fraunce called,Les illustrations de gaulles. Whosoeuer please may there read it as it standeth, within 6. leaues afore the end of the same: how the author with deepe sorrow lamenteth the ordinance that decreed first, priests to liue vnmarried shewⁱng, & that amply, the miseries that haue ensued in France, therby imputing it vnto Calixt the pope: of whom he maketh a doleful mention in Meter, wherof the first I yet remember, And it is thus: O sancte Calixte, totus mundus odit te. &c. O holy Calixte, al the world hateth thee. Which followeth in writing to all that lust to behold therin. But what nede I to make longer treatise hereof, for so much as you do dayly both heare and see, what soule abomination ariseth in euery corner, of this pitious law made of men y^t would presume to be wiser then God, thinking (as we euer do) that eyther he would not, or els for lack of wisdom he could not shew vs a sufficient law or way, to direct our lyfe and conuersation, to come to the ioy and resting place of him promised, and so of vs longed and looked for. Wherby we both be farre vnreasonable in so deeming of him after our vnwise wit, and he much dishonoured. The which I beseech him to helpe, Amen.

¶Unto the v. where ye do aske, whether I beleuee that whatsoeuer it done of man, whether it be good or ill, commeth of necessity: that is (as you construe) to wit, whether man hath free will, so that he may deserue ioy or paine? I say (as I sayd at the beginning) that vnto the first parte of your riddle, I neyther can, ne wil giue any diffinitue answer, forsomuch as it surmounteth my capacitie, trusting that God shall sende hereafter, other that shall be of better learning and wit then I, for to endite it. As cōcerning the second part, wheras you do interpret, that is to say, whether man haue free will or no, so that he may deserue ioy or payne: as for our deseruing specially of ioy, I thinke it very slender or none, euen when we do the very commandementes and law of God, and that am I taught by our sauour, in s. Luke where he sayth thus: Which of you (quod he) hauing a seruaunt that hath eared your land, or fed your beastes, wil say vnto him, when he commeth home out of the field, go thy way quickly, & sit down to thy meat: and rather will not say vnto him, make ready my supper, seruing me therat vntill I haue made an end thereof, and afterwarde take thy selfe meate and drinke. Thinke you that he is bound to thanke his seruaunt which thus shall doe his commaundement? I trowe (sayth he) nay. Euen so you (sayth he) when you haue done all thinges to you commaunded, say yet you be vnprofitable seruaunts, & haue done that which you were bound to do.

In which words you may clearly see, that he would not haue vs greatly esteeme our merites, when we haue done that is commaunded by God,* but rather reckoning our selues to be but seruants vnprofitable to God, for so much as he hath no neede of our wel doing, for his own aduancement, but onely that he loueth to see vs doe well for our owne behoufe: and moreouer, that when we haue done his bidding, we ought not so to magnify, neither our selfe: ne our owne free will, but laud him with a meeke heart, thorowe whose benefite we haue done (if at any time we doe it) his lyking and pleasure: not regarding our merite, but his grace and benefite. Wherby onely is done all that in any wise is to him acceptable. And thus if we ought not to attend our merites in doing the commandement of God,* much lesse should we looke for merite, for obseruing of our owne inuentions, or traditions of men, vnto which there is no benefite in all Scripture which Paul calleth y^e word of truth and of faith, promised.

But here may be objected against me, that the rewarde is promised in many places to them that do obserue y^e preceptes of God. That I affirm to be very sooth. Notwithstanding such reward shall neuer be atteyned of vs, except by the grace and benefite of him, which worketh all things in all creatures. And this affirmeth well S. Augustine, S. Ambrose, Fulgentius, with other, as you may see euery where in their workes,* and specially in the treatise called Vnio dissidentium, wherein he entreateth de gratia & meritis And of S. Augustine I remember ij. or iij. right notable sentences concerning the same.* One is in the 9. booke of hys Confessions, in this fourme: Vae etiam laudabili vitae hominum, si remota misericordia discutias eam. Quia verè non exquiris delicta vehementer fiducialiter speramus aliquem locum apud te inuenire indulgentiae. Quisquis autem tibi enumerat vera merita sua, quid tibi enumerat nisi munera tua? O si cognoscerent se omnes, & qui gloriatur in Domino gloriaretur: Woe be to the life of men, be they neuer so holy, it thou shalt examine them, setting thy mercy aside. Because thou doest not exactly examine the faultes of men, therefore we haue a vehement hope and trust to find some place of mercy with thee. And whosoeuer recounteth vnto thee his merites, what other thing doth he recount, but thy benefits? O would God all men would see and knowe themselues and that he which glorieth, would glorie in the Lord. Againe, in the first booke he sayth thus vnto God: Nunquid inops es & gaudes lucris? Nunquid auarus & vsuras exigis? Superogatur tibi vt debeas? & quis habet quicquam non tuū? *Reddis debita nulli debens, donas debita nihil perdens. Doth any man giue that he oweth not vnto thee, that thou shouldest be in his debte? and hath any man ought that is not thine? Thou rendrest debt, and yet owest to no man. Thou forgiuest debte, and yet lovest nothing. And therefore his vsuall prayer was this: Domine da quod iubes, & iube quod vis. Lord giue that thou commaundest, and commaund what thou wilt.

Also in the booke called, Manuale Augustini, or De contemplatione Christi, he sayth in this wise: Tota spes mea est in morte Domini. Mors eius meritum meum, refugium meum, salus vita, & resurrectio mea. Meritum meum miseratio Domini. Non sum meriti inops quamdiu ille miserationum Dominus non defuerit. Et si misericordiae Domini multae, multus ego sum in meritis. All my hope is in the Lordes death. His death is my merite, my refuge, my health and my resurrection. My merites is the mercy of the Lord. I am not without merit, so long as the Lord of mercie shal continue. And if y^e mercies of the Lorde be great and riche, then am I also great and rich in merites.

And to conclude, they be Christes owne merites and good works (as sayth S. Ambrose wel nigh euery where) that he worketh in vs, which he doth reward and crowne,* and not ours, if one should loke narrowly vpon the thing, & speak properly. Howbeit, they yet neuerthesse are ours by him, for so much as his mercifull bountie imputeth hys goods to be ours. So that in this, I wot not how other do meane, which lust to sel their merits vnto their neighbors that happely haue skarce enough for themselues: but I do wholly deme & beleue, according as the scripture with these holy doctors, and such other, do teach, wishing that men euer for good doing should not so much (as the cōmon people doth) regard their merite or reward,* for that is not the thing that engendreth the loue of god in vs, but rather maketh men to honour God in a seruile fashion, & for the loue of themselues in doing workes for loue of rewarde, or for dread of payne, more then because it so pleaseth God, & lyketh him: whereas if we regarded first (yea & altogether) that it is our duety to do wel (which is the keping of his cōmandements) & that so we should content his pleasure, Page 1105 reward should vndoubtedly ensue good deedes,* although we minded no whit the same, as heat followeth euermore y^e fire vnseparate therefrom. And thus we shuld serue god with hartie loue as children, and not for meed or dread, as vnlouing thraldes and seruauntes.

Concerning free will, I meane altogether, as doth S. Augustine, that of our selfe we haue no libertie ne habilitie to doe the will of God, but are subiect vnto sinne & thralds of the lame, conclusi sub peccatum, & vaenundati sub eodem: Shut vp and sold vnder sinne, as witnesseth both Esay & also Paule, but by the grace of God, wee are rid and set at libertie, according to the portion that euery man hath takē of the same, some more some lesse.

¶Whereas in your sixt demaund, you do enquire whether the sacrament of the aulter be a sacrament necessarye vnto saluation,* and whether after the consecration of the bread & wine done by the priest,* as by the minister of God there is the very body and bloud of Christ in likenes of bread & wine: I neither can ne wil answere one worde, otherwise thē I haue told sith I was first deliuered into your hands Neither woulde I haue aunswered one whit thereunto, knowing so much at the first as I now doe, till you hadde brought foorth some that would haue accused me to haue trespassed in the same, which I am certayn you can not do, bringing any that is honest and credible.

¶As concerning the other vi. sacramentes, I make you that same answere that I haue done vnto the sacramēt of the aulter, and none other. That is, I will say nothing vn'till some men appeare to accuse mee in the same, vnlesse I know a more reasonable cause then I haue yet heard, why I so ought to do. But as touching y^e forme and fashion, I shall answere willingly so farre forth as my rudenes will serue. I hold well that such as be duely elect Ministers in the Church ought to baptise, except necessitie require otherwise and that the forme vsed in the Church, is in mine opinion not vncommendable. Neuertheles it should edifie muche more, if it were vttered in the vulgar language, and cause people in the Baptisme of children, more effectuously to thank God for hys institution and high benefite thereby represented.

In like condition do I also deeme of ministration in all the other,* that it should be expedient to haue thē ministred openly in y^e vulgar lāguage, for the edifying of y^e people. As concerning the forme vsed in matrimony, I lyke it right wel, and thinke it commendable, sauing in all cōtreyes lightly Iudas hath set in his foote ouer farre, and taketh in hand to sell his maister, accompanied with Symon Magus: saying what will you geue me if I deliuer vnto you Christ? This is the saying of all them that require,* without any lawfull authoritie, in some places .xii. pence, in some vi, pence, in some more, in some lesse, but in euery place lightly some mony: when a couple shoulde be maryed: and this they cal the churches right. Moreouer, y^t they will not suffer mariage to be solemnised at al times of the yeare, I thinke it standeth not with Christes rule, but rather is agaynst the same: and that they will not suffer the danes vpon all holydayes to be proclaymed vnlesse a dispensation for money be purchased therefore. All this God forbiddeth. Finally, like as no mony ought to be geuen for this: no more shoulde anye be taken for anye other. But y^e contrary is seene, whiche is great pitty, yea euen at the receiuing of the sacrament of the aulter, priestes euery where vse to clayme somewhat; and in some part of the West cōūtre, no lesse then 2. pence of euery pole.

¶As touching priesthood in the primitiue church, whē vertue bare (as auncient Doctors do de••e, and scripture in mine opinion recordeth the same) most rouse, there were no mo officers in the Churches of God, thē byshops and Deacons, that is to saye, ministers▪ as witnesseth beside scripture full apertly, Hierome in his Commentaries vpon the Epistles of Paule, whereas hee sayth, that those whome we call priestes were all one, and none other but Bishyps, and the bishops none other but priestes, mē ancient both in age and learning, so neare as could be chosen neyther were they institute and chosen as they be nowe a dayes, with small regard of a Bishop
 〈◇〉 his Officer onely apposing them if they can construe a Collect, but they were chosen not onely of the B. but also to the consent of y^e people amōg whō they shuld haue their liuing, as sheweth S. Cyprian: and the people (as he sayth) ought to haue power to chuse priestes y^t be men of good learning, of good & honest report, but (alack for pity) 〈◇〉 elections are now banished, and new fashiōs brought all which if we should confer w^t the forme of the election shewed of Christ by hys apostle Paule, we should finde no smale diuersitie, but all turned vp side downe. To cōclude, I say, y^e order or state of priests & deacons was ordayned by God, but Subdeacōs & comu•ers otherwise called Ex 〈...〉 Accolitae, which We call Benet and Collect,* were institute by the inuentiō of men. And this you may finde in the law, Dist. 21. and other places, where is written Subdiaconatus tempore Apostolorum non fuit sacer. Subdeaconship in the time of the Apostles was no holy order.

¶As touching eare confession, I say, that the common fashion now vsed was neuer ordeined by Christes law, that is written in the Bible: neither can you proue by any authority of the same, that we ought to confesse all our offences particularly, with the circumstances of all & of euery such, to any man. Agayne,* for the maintenaunce of this which I haue sayd, you shal know that Chrisostome standeth stifly with me in his Commentaries vpon the Epistle to the Hebrues.* In an homely also that he maketh vppon the Psalme Miserere. And moreouer in a Sermon that he maketh, De poenitentia: beside many other treatises, wherein he cōtinueth euer one, testifying in semblable wise,

In like maner doth one of your principall Doctours.* writing vpon your Canon lawe, named Panormitanus, testifie that it is made by the lawe of man, and not of God, in cap. Omnis vtrius{que} sexus. In the booke also called historia tripartita, you shal finde how it was first institute (as I remember) and after vndone againe, because of an huge vilany committed with a woman by a Minister of the Church thorow confession.

Also it is mentioned in the ende of first Distinct De poenitentia, how the Greek Church,* whome I thinke you do not note to be heretickes, will not yet hetherto allowe it. There are also many reasons brought forth, both to proue that cōfession made to a priest, should not be necessary, & also that confession made vnto God should suffice, cōcluding in this wise: Quibus autoritatibus▪ &c. I coulde bringe forth other that be yet liuing men, of surmounting and excellent literature, which exactly by many and mighty, both authorities and reasons, do shewe and confirme this my saying to be iust: but I keepe silence and will not name them, least, I should bring them in hatred. Notwithstanding, I neuer sayd, ne will say, but that men feeling them selues agreed in conscience with some great tentatiō, had neede to go vnto such, whom they know and trust to be of stedfast credence, and to haue good skill in the law of God, opening their grief vnto them, to the entēt they may know through counsell, some ease and remedy thereof.

But in this I meane not that they ought to goe vnto their Curate or to any other Priest,* whose credence they deeme not all trusty, or their Councell not sage, but to any other, whatsoever he be, whom they know moste sufficient in properties aboue shewed, when their Curate doth lacke them. And this thing is the moste behouable, when men needing counsell, be so voide of knowledge in Christes lawe, that they cannot finde therein remedie themselues. For the doctrine of Christe, if it were well known, containeth remedies for all infirmities and maladies of the minde, so that men by spirituall knowledge might ease themselues.

To the other part of your question, where ye do aske whether a Priest in cases vnto him limited,* may loose a sinner confessed and contrite for his sinne, inioyning hym holosome penance? I say that onely Christ looseth a sinner which is contrite, by his worde and promise, and the priest doth nothing but shew and declare the worde: Neyther doth declaration or ministry of the priest any whit auaille for to lose any person, vnlesse he that should be losed, geue credence vnto the word ministred and shewed by the priest Which word or promise of Christ is called the word of reconciliation or attonment making betwixt God and man. And this testifieth S. Paul in the 2. to the Cor. where he sayth in this wise:*God hath reconciled vs vnto him thorough Iesus Christ. See how it is God that looseth vs from sinne, which is to make recōciliation or atonemēt betwixt vs and him, and that thorow Christ, whom he caused to dye for the same purpose.And he (quoth S. Paul) hath ordayned vs Ministers of the said atonement. See howe Christes Apostles called not themselues the authors of binding and losing, but Ministers: for he (that is to wit, God) recōciled the world vnto him for giuing their sinnes. Where you may know what reconciling is. And hath committed (saith Paul) Vnto vs to be messengers of the same worde or tidings of atonement or reconciling.

Also that the power wherby men are losed from sinne, is not the priests power you may know by the vulgar saying, which is right true: yea and with leasure,* I doubt not but y^t I can shewe the same in the Decrees which is thus: Solus Deus remittit peccata. Only God forgiueth and pardoneth vs of our sinnes: And this was preached at Pauls Crosse the sonday next after the Epiphany last, the Byshop of London sitting by:* the Preacher speaking after this forme, treating of this text: Ecce agnus Dei qui tollit Page 1106 peccata mundi: Behold the lamb of God which taketh away the sinnes of the worlde. In that said the preacher, testimony is geuen of Christ to be a Lamb, it is shewed y^t he was an innocent man. But in y^t it is sayde, that he taketh away the sinne of the world, is shewed that he was God, alleaging there for the confirmation of this part of his purpose, the vulgare saying aboute sayde by me: Solus Deus remittit peccata. And the same proposition, or an other equal with the same, vseth Chrysostome in an Homely that is made vpon this text of Mathe. Vocabitur nomen eius Iesus. &c. His name shalbe called Iesus: for he shall saue his people from their sinnes. Also Saint Chrysostome in opere imperfecto, vpon this texte, Vae vobis Scribae & Pharisei, qui clauditis reg^{um} coelorum, &c. Woe be vnto you Scribes and Phariseis, because yee shutte vppe the kingdome of heauen before men, &c. As nere as my remembrance doth serue me: or els in some other place, but in the same booke (as I suppose) he affirmeth that the keies of heauen are the worde & doctrine of God. This witnesseth moreouer S. Gregory (I trow) in his booke called Pastoralia, or els it is in an Epistle that he writeth, ad Episcopum Constantinopolitanum, in these wordes: Clauis appertionis est sermo correctoris, qui increpando, culpam detegit, quam saepe nescit qui perpetravit. The key of loosing is the word of the corrector who rebuking doth disclose the fault, whiche many times he knoweth not that committeth the same.

Saint Ambrose agreeing to the same, sayeth: Verbum Dei dimittit peccata. The worde of God forgiueth sinne, But shal we then say, that Gods ministers do not binde & lose? I say no, not as the authors of so doing but they doe lose and bind in like maner, as it is said of Paul in the Act. of y^e Apostles, where our Sauour spake vnto him in this maner: I shal (sayde our Sauour) deliuer thee from the people and nations, vnto whom I send thee, that thou shouldest open their eyes, that they may be conuerted from darkenes to light. Here Paule is sayd to open the eyes of mens hartes. Albeit to speake properly, it is God that so doth: And therfore Dauid prayeth vnto him: Reuela oculos meos: Open mine eyes O Lorde. And in like maner it is spoken of Iohn Baptist in the 1. of Luke: that he shoulde goe before Christ in the spirite and power of Helias, and turne the hartes of the fathers to their children, and the vnbeleeuers to the wisdome of the rightwise. Albeit to turne mens harts, and to worke in them belongeth vnto God. But so vse we to speake Metonymicè: As if your lordship had defined me to be excommunicate, and thereupon should sende a commaundement to the person of Knoll to declare the same▪ the people would say that the person of Knoll proclaiming your commandement had accursed me: but yet doth he not properly curse me, but you rather, whē he in pronouncing the same, doth your act and commaundement, rather then his owne.

Touching cases limited to Priestes and Ministers, for losing from sin, or binding in the same. I do know no such thinges shewed in Scripture, which is the perfect way of our life. Neither can any man (I suppose) shew by authoritie therof, that one should haue more or lesse limited him, thē an other. And if you can or will thereby teache it me, I shall thank you for your doing, & pray god to acquit you Concerning enioyning of penance, I knowe of none y^t men need to admitte, nor you to put or enioyn the same except it be renouation of liuing, in casting apart old vyce, & taking them vnto newe vertue: whiche euery true pennytent entendeth, or ought to entend verily by the grace & assistance of our sauour Christ, to shew and performe. ¶ Unto the xj. I say, that grace is giuen vnto them, that duely receiue the Sacramentes of Christe and his church but whether by them or no, that I cannot define: for God sendeth his grace where he pleaseth, either with them, or without them, and when he pleaseth: so that it is at his arbitrement, how, and when. Moreouer, many a leud persō receiue the sacraments,* that are destitute of grace, to their confusion. So that I cannot affirme, that y^e Sacramentes giue grace: Yet in due receipt of the Sacramentes, I suppose and thinke, that God geueth vnto them grace that so taketh thē,* as he doth vnto al good, euen without thē also. ¶Wheras in your xij. article you do aske, whether al thinges necessary vnto saluation, are put in holy Scripture, & whether things only there put, be sufficiēt, & whether some things vpō necessitie of salutiō, are to be beleued & obserued, which are not expressed in scripture: this is y^e questiō, as great learned mē haue shewed me, whom I do cōūt my frēds, sith y^e time I appeared at your lordships assignment before maister Doctor Lesse, & maister Melling, w^t other in your chappell of Lambeth,* when these questions were fyrst propounded: this (I say) is the question, whiche (as they told me) is the head and whole content of all other objected agaynst me. Yea this is both the helme and sterne of al together, and that which they contended right sore to impugne: but loue of the trueth (wherewith in this point I reckoned me well fenced) would not suffer me to apply and yeld to their will, thinking quòd sanctum est veritatem praeferre amicitiae,* that the truth ought to be preferred before all friendship and amitie: And also, Si dextra manus scandalizet, deberet praescindi & abijci. if the right hand offend, it ought to be cut off and cast away.

But touching an aunswere vnto this question, I suppose verily, that if I had Saint Cyrils workes by me,* I should not nede to shew any other answer in this, then he hath shewed afore time, writing vpon this saying of S. Iohn: Sunt, & alia multa quae fecit Iesus,there are many things moe which Iesus did. Notwithstanding, for so much as euery man at all seasons, cannot haue what he would, and therfore must make other shift: such as he may I say (as I suppose) the first part of your questiō to be very true, and therefore to be affirmed: that is to wit, that al thinges needefull for mans saluation, be mencioned and shewed in holy scripture, and that the thinges onely there put, be sufficient for the regiment of spirituall liuing & mans soule health. And in this shal you finde both the auncient Doctors standing with me: and moreouer, the suffrage of holy writte, whose authoritie is of most soueraigne and vnfallible stedfastnes.

Looke what Saint Hierome sayeth vpon this verse:Dominus narrabit in scripturis populorum: The Lorde shall rehearse it, when he writeth vp the people. Saint Ambrose also in a treatise, De Paradiso, doth shew likewyse, where he bringeth this text of Paule written in the 2. to the Corinth. I am afraid leaste it may by some meane be brought to passe, that as the Serpent deceiued Eue thorow wilines, so your mindes may be corrupt from the simple veritie that is in Christ. And also in his Commentaries vpon the epistle to the Coloss. vpon this text. In Christ Iesus is all treasure of wisdom, and in other diuers places of the same worke.

S. Chrysostome also in his Commentaries vpon Paul declaring this saying: Omnis scriptura diuinitus inspirata. &c. The whole Scripture giuen by inspiration of GOD. &c. And in his Booke called Opus imperfectum, I wote not precisely vpon what text, but there you shal finde, that he would haue a true preacher of gods law, not swaruing therefro, neither vpon the right hand, neither vpon y^e left. but keeping thereafter, according to the teaching of Salomō: for he that should therunto adde or withdraw, should enterprise, as sayeth Chrysostome, to be wiser then God. These or els such like wordes doth he say. I will be deemed by the booke brought forth, because my remembraunce cannot retayne perfectly all such thinges.

S. Cyprian mainteineth well the same in an Epistle that •e writeth ad Ceciliū fratrem.* Which I woulde to God were in English, that al men might learn the deuout goodnes in it contained. In the same he teacheth clearely, how we ought to heare Christ onely and his learning, not regarding ne attending to the traditions of men: lyke as he doth also in many other places. And this agreeth well with Scripture, which is called the word of Saluation:* the administration of righteousnes, the word of truth, yea and the truth it selfe: the rod of direction: our spirituall food: the spirituall sword that we ought to fight with against all temptations and assaultes of our ghostly enemies, the seede of God, the kingdome of heauen & keyes of the same: the power of God: the light of the worlde, which who so followeth, shal not be ouercome with darknes: the law of God: his wisdom, and Testament. Of which wordes and such like,* euery one will giue mat•er of substantial argument, that we following the same doctrine onely, shall haue sufficient safe conduct to come vnto the inheritaunce promised, albeit none other wayes or meanes were annexed with the same. And certaine I am that in this blessed doctrine of Christ is taught,* howe we ought to do truth and mercy, which is all that we neede to do, as testifieth the Psalme, in these wordes: Vniuersae viae domini misericordia & veritas. &c. All the wayes of the Lorde are mercie and truth. And againe, the Prophet willing vs to do as he did, sayth in this maner: Adhaesi testimonijs tuis domine, noli me confundere. I haue cleaued to thy testimonies O Lord, confound me not. In lyke maner the sayd whole Psalme warneth vs.* Yea all the Scripture biddeth vs sticke fast to the steady and true worde of God: saying that he is verax, & viae eius veritas: omnis autem homo vanitas & mendax: For he is true and all his wayes are trueth: but all men are vaine and lyers. For that is the sure foundation which cannot fayle them that grounde therevppon as reporteth Christ: Euery one (sayth he) that heareth my words, & doth them, is like to a wise man that buildeth vppon a sure foundation. And there ought to be none other foundation to christen men but only the vndoubted truth of Iesus, Page 1107 to build our faith vpon, and direct our liuing thereafter, as sheweth s. Paul saying: Fundamentū aliud nemo, &c. Other foundation can no man lay, then that which is laid which is Iesus Christ. And likewise in the Epistle, vnto the Ephesians,* where he sayth: I am non estis hospites & aduenae sed conciuēs sanctorum, & domestici dei. &c. Nowe ye are no more strangers and forreiners, but Citizens with the Saints and of the houshold of God.

And in the same epistle S. Paul dilating of Christes benificence, sheweth, how that he ordained in the Church diuers officers, to the edifying of Christen people, that he calleth Christes body, vntill all we may come vnto the vnitie of faith, which cōmeth by following of one doctrine whiche is Christes, wherby wee may growe to bee perfect men, and that we should not be here like to children caried about with euery winde of doctrine by deceipte and wilines of men that study to deceiue vs.

In like forme doeth he warne vs in the Epistle to the Hebrues, that we should not be caried about as the wind with diuers and straunge doctrines, but continue in that which euer continueth like and all one, agreeable for all men in all partes, and that at all times: not being chaungeable as mens constitutions be, whereof looke what one doth counsaile or ordaine to be of effecte, another annulleth the same, according as mens mindes doe alway alter and are full vnsteddy. Neither doe such pertaine vnto all men, for the Greekes with other (whome the Pope, ne none of his people wil yet deny to be of Christes Church) will in no condition admitte such, neither for men to liue after them, nor to beleue them as pertaining to theyr faith: But they allowe well the doctrine that perseuereth euer one,* and is immutable, as sheweth Saint Paule saying: Iesus Christ yesterday, and to day is all one: and so euer shal be. He is white breade without any sower leuen of Pharisaical traditions: veritie without guile, light without any darkenes: the very straight way that hath neither hooke, ne croke. From this ought we not to turne neither vpon one hand, ne other, vnlesse we will go from him that is our felicitie and anker of safetie.

But what should I more entreate of this, excepte I would recite all scripture, which in euery parte is full of admonitions, exhorting and warning vs to cleaue fast vnto this way, which is the doctrine of the Gospel? which God I beseech him graunt vs all, both to knowe and loue taking heede that in no wise wee be seduced therefro, by lawes & doctrines of men. Looke also in the ij. chap. to the Colossians, and in the epistle of Timothe and Titus. So that I conclude, in holy scripture to be conteined sufficiently enough of doctrine,* for the regiment and saluation of our soules. And this because learned men do call the head Article laid against me: I would that all men should well note it, and record my saying therin hereafter, whatsoever shall be tide of me, for the truth is so in deed, that hereupon hangeth the summe of all. Therefore, I shall recite it once againe.* I say that in holy Scripture, the doctrine there only contained, is sufficient for the saluation of christen mens soules God giue vs grace we may know it, to builde our faith stedfastly vpon the same in working thereafter.

As touching the latter parte of your question, I saye that there are many thinges both to be obserued and to be beleueed, that are not expressed in scripture: as the Ciuill lawes of princes and comminalties ordeined for ciuill regiment of the body, and all other, so that they be not hurtefull to faith or charity, but helpful to the same, I reckon that we ought to kepe them, not only for feare of punishment, but also for conscience sake, although such ordinances be not expresly and particularly in scripture expressed, for they are generally therin conteined and spoken of, Moreouer, if you meane by this word expressed, that which in scripture is clearely shewed out, & appeareth euidently to euery reader or hearer y^t hath but a mean vnderstanding, so do I affirme y^t there are some thinges which a man ought to beleuee, although they be not of him erpressely vnderstand: As I haue euer beleueed that the virgine Mary was and is a perpetuall virgine, and that the same might be gathered by the scripture. But if by this word expressed you meane comprehended, or centeined, (as me thinke the minde of him that wrote the demaunde should be) so that he meaneth by this question, thus: whether any thing ought to be obserued and beleueed, whiche is not contained in Scripture and that vpon necessity of saluation) then I say, that there is nothing neither to bee obserued ne to be beleueed vpō necessitie of saluation, which is not conteined in Scripture, and mentioned in the same either generally or specially. Yet do I not deny but other thinges are to be beleueed as I beleueed that Doct. Warham was Byshop of Caunterbury, ere euer I saw * your Lordship? and I beleue that I knew verily who was my father & mother, albeit I had none intelligence when they begot me, and such like: and yet in such pointes, although man haue not a stedy beleefe, he may be saued.

¶To the xiiij. where ye do aske whether I beleuee y^t purgatory is,* and whether that soules departed be there in tormented & purged? I say that there is a Purgatory in this world, & that doth the scripture, and also the holy doctors call the fire of tribulatiō, through which al Christians shal passe, as testifieth Saint Paul in the second chapter of the ij. Epistle to Timoth. Whose testimony is full notable and true, albeit that fewe do know it, and fewer peraduenture will beleuee it. Marke you the wordes (good people) and know that they be his, and not mine. They be thus: *All that will godly liue in Iesu Christe, shall suffer persecution. In this Purgatory doe I nowe reckon my selfe to stande: God send me well to perseuer vnto his honour. Of this speaketh also S. Peter in these wordes which pertaine to the instruction of all Christen people: *Virtute Dei custodimini per fidem ad salutem, quae in hoc parata est vt patefiat in tempore supremo: in quo exultaris nunc, ad breue tempus, afflicti in varijs experimentis si opus sit, quo exploratio fidei vestrae multo preciosior auro quod perit, & tamen per ignem probatur, reperiatur in gloriam & honorem. Ye (quoth he) are preserued thorowe the power of God by faith vnto saluation, which is prepared to be reuealed in the last time wherein yee nowe reioyce, though for a season (if neede require) ye are sundry waies afflicted and tormented that the triall of your faith, being much more precious then gold that pearisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be founde vnto laude, glorie, and honour at the appearing of Iesu Christe. &c. Other Purgatory knowe I none, that you can prooue by Scripture, vnlesse it be by one place of the same, whyche well examined, I trowe, shall make but li•t•e against me, for the maintenaunce of any other then I haue shewed.

But whatsoever be brought against me, I truste that holye Doctours shall by their interpretation, sustayne the parte the which I do take vpon me, making aunswere for me sufficient, so that you shal say, it is no new thing which I haue or shall speake: Yet that you shoulde see euen nowe somewhat wrytten of auncient Doctours concerning the same, I shall shewe you what I haue read in S. Augustine: first in a sermon that he maketh De Ebrietate, in this wise, saying: Nemo se decipiat fratres: duo enim loca sunt, & tertius non est visus. Qui cum Christo regnare non meruit, *cum Diabolo absque vlla dubitatione peribit. That is to say: Brethren let no man deceiue himselfe, for there be two places, and the third is not knowne. * He that with Christ hath not deserued to reigne, shall without doubt perishe wyth the deuill. In an other also that he maketh, De vanitate huius seculi, it is sayd thus: Scitote vos, quòd cum anima à corpore auellitur statim in paradiso pro meritis bonis collocatur, aut certè pro peccatis, in inferni tartara praecipitatur. Eligite mo'do quod vultis, aut perpetualiter gaudere cum Sanctis, *aut sine fine cruciari cum impijs. Whiche is thus to say: Knowe you that when the soule is departed from the body, * it is incontinent, for his good deedes, put in paradise, or els thrown hedlong into the dungeō of hell, for his sinnes. Choose you nowe what ye list, and purpose while you be here in this life, either to ioy perpetually with Saints, or els to be tormented without end among wicked sinners. Thus sayeth holy Augustine.

To make an end, I hope surely y^t by the ayde of our sauour, I shall come to heauen and reigne with Christ, ere that I shall feele any purgatory, beside that I haue & shall susteine in this life. And he that beleueth not stedfastly any other to be, shall yet be saued as well (and God woteth whether better or no, but I thinke no whit lesse) as suche as teache the people or suffer them to be taught, that in going from this statio to that, from one altar to an other they shall cause soules to be deliuered: * yea and as well such as say that a man being buried in a gray Friers frocke, shall so haue remission of the the third part of his sinnes, as is graunted in a Bull vnto the sayd Religion: and such like. For as S. Augustine shall make with me in his book called Enchiridion, after he hath confuted the opiniō of some that in the church of Christ, liuing in mischiefe vngraciously, taking therof no repentaunce, did yet falsly deeme that they shoulde be saued through the clensing of purgatorye: where hee concludeth thus: Suche a thing after this life to be (sayth he) is not incredible, but whether it be so or no, a doubt may be therof moued or a question demanded. The same wordes doth he agayn recite in a booke called, Quaestiones ad dulcium, or dulcitiū I wotte not whether he is called, and there he intreateth the same more copiously: and would I might see the place once agayne.

To this agreeth S. Paule writing thus to the Cor. Omnes nos manifestari oportet coram tribunali Christi, vt reportet quisque eapuae fiunt per corpus, iuxta id quod fecit, siue Page 1108 bonum siue malum. For we must al appeare before the iudge'ment seat of Christ, that euery man may receiue the things which are done in his body according to that he hath done, whether it be good or euill. And againe where he writeth vnto the Hebrues, I trow it be said in this wise. Memores sitis victorum tanquam vna cum illis vincti: *eorum qui affliguntur veluti ipsi quoque versantes in corpore: Remember thē that are in bondes, euen as though ye were bound with them: be mindfull of them which are in affliction, as if ye were also afflicted in the body.

To the 14. where you aske whether holy Martyrs, Apostles,  and Confessours departed from this worlde, ought to be honoured, called vpon, and praied vnto? I answere as touching the honouring of them, with the very wordes of S. Augustine in his booke, De Vera religione, in his last leafe,  where he saith thus: Non sit nobis religio cultus hominum mortuorum, Quia si piē vixerunt, non sic habentur vt tales quaerant honores, sed illum à nobis coli volunt, quo illumināte laetantur *meriti sui nos esse consortes: honorandi sunt ergo propter imitationem, non adorandi propter religionem. Si autem malē vixerunt ubicunque sunt, non sunt colendi. Agayne, a litle after the same, he saith: Nam idipsum actum est temporali dispensatione ad salutem nostram, vt naturam humanam, ipsa Dei virtus & Dei sapientia incommutabilis & consubstantialis patri & coaeternus, suscipere dignaretur, per quam nos doceret id esse homini colendum, quod ab omni creatura intellectuali & rationali colendum est: Hoc est, ipsos optimos angelos, & excellentissima Dei ministeria velle credamus, vt vnum cum ipsis colamus Deum, cuius contemplatione beati sunt: neque enim & nos videndo angelum beati sumus, sed videndo veritatem, qua ipso setiam diligimus Angelos, & his congratulamur.

Nec inuidemus {quod} ea paratiores, vel nullis molestijs interpediētibus perfruūtur, sed magis eos diligimus, quoniā & nos tale ali quid sperare a cōmuni domino iussi sum{us}. Quare honoramus eos charitate, non seruitute: nec eis templa construimus. Nolunt enim se sic honorari a nobis, *quia nos ipsi cū boni sumus, templa sūmi Dei esse nouerunt. Rectē ita{que} scribitur hominē ab Angelo prohibitum ne se adoraret, sed vnum Deum, sub quo ille esset & conseruus. Thus saith S. Augustine, handling the same matter a litle after more at large.

The content of this vnto you I expound that knowe no Latine, for I couet that all persons shoulde knowe both my thought in this, and all maner of doing, to the intent that of all persons I would haue true report and testimony, what soeuer shal betide me. Saint Augustine in these wordes would haue,  that we should worshippe no men departed, be they neuer so good and holy, for they seeke no such honour, but would haue vs to worshippe God alone: no nor yet no Aungell, ne honour the same, but onely the imitation of them, following their good actes in our liuing, as they followed our moste mercifull God whiles they were aliue, not building Churches in the name or honour of them, for they woulde haue no suche honour done vnto them: it is to them no pleasure, but contrariwise. No, the Aungels will not that we shoulde builde any Churches in reuerence of them, but woulde, that with them wee shoulde honour the originall marke, and performer of all. They refuse all honour, sauing that whiche is called honor charitatis, which is nothing els, but to be loued. Thus sayth Saint Augustine. Whiche loue we shall testify in following their good actes, by helping the poore or helpelesse with almes and mercy, and dealing truely in worde and deede, according to our state and calling, both towardes God and man. Which is no light matter to them that do consider the thing well. But whosoeuer shall truely and duely follow that trade, shall feele it (I dare say) as the burden of Christes Crosse was vnto him right weyghty and grieuous: when he bare it to Caluarie: sauing that we neede not to feare for he hath promised to bee with vs in tribulation, to ridde vs from the same, For the Prophete Dauid sayth: Cum ceciderit iustus non collidetur,*quia Dominus supponit manum suam. That is to witte when a iust person beginneth to fall, hee shall not be borne flatte downe to be broken, for the Lord shall put his hand vnder him, to reare him vp againe. And in the Gospell he biddeth: Venite ad me omnes qui laboratis & onerati estis & ego reficiam vos. That is to say, Come you vnto me all that do trauaile and are sore charged, and I shall comfort or refresh you. Take my yoke vpon you, learning of mee, that am softe and meeke minded,*and you shall finde ease thereby in your soules, for my yoke is easy, and my burden light. See you here, how he is euer ready to supporte them, that for truth shall sustein the chargable and sore vexations put vpon them of the world, which cannot endure the trueth to preuayle, and the vntruth to be disclosed.

As touching inuocation: that is to witte, calling, vpon them we haue in Scripture,* how we should call vpon almighty God in all necessities or tribulations. As in the Psalmes euery where: as in this: Call vpon me in time of your tribulation, and I shal deliuer you. Marke howe he sayeth, here call vpon me,* appointing neyther S. Thomas ne maister Iohn Shorne Also in an other place? The Lorde is nigh vnto them thar call vpon hym, that call vpon him truely, and with that he sheweth who calleth truely vpon him. saying thus: He shall do the will or desire of them that reuerenceth him, and shall heare graciously their prayer, and make them safe, for the Lord loueth al that loueth him, and all sinners shall be destroyed.

And thus vsed y^e holy prophets, Patriarks, Apostles, & other good faithfull people in olde time, in al tribulation & anguish, to resort vnto the head fountain, which is of grace infinite, as is shewed in other places in this wise:*In my trouble I called vpon the Lord (saith Dauid) and he hearde me gratioously, when I was troubled, I cried vnto the Lorde and he mercifully heard me. Also I lift mine eyes vp vnto the mountaines but from whence shall helpe come vnto me, Myne helpe (quoth he) shall come from the Lorde that made both heauen and earth. I reade the first of these verses in forme of interrogation, folowing saint Augustine which (as I remember) interpreteth it in this wise. If I recite not authorities in all places in the moste perfite forme, I would pray you somewhat to pardon me, for you know y^t I lacke books, and haue not them lying by me. Notwithstanding I am certain I shal not decline much from him. The hylles toward the which Dauid did lift vp his eyes were Saintes and holy men, of whom when he could not haue his minde satisfied, he turned another way, saying: from whence shall help come vnto me? Anone he remembring himselfe better, sued vnto God himselfe, of whom incontinent he obtained the accomplishment of his wish and so witnessed the same for our instruction saying:*Myne helpe is of the Lord, or commeth from the Lorde, which made heauen and earth. This interpretation (as neare as I remember) is after the minde of Saint Augustine: and I suppose verely, that it is not contrary vnto the mind of God ne disagreeing with the sequele of Scripture.

Also in this wise it is reported in the new Testament by authoritie reduced out of the olde, where it is written:*Euery one that calleth vpon the name of the Lord shal be saued. And marke howe, cum*energia, it is said: vpon the name of the Lord, without any sending vs, either to S.

Christopher (though he be paynted neuer so stout) either to S. Patrickes purgatory in Ireland or to S. Iames in Galicia, in the yeare of grace, or yet to anye other saint or place: but would vs, y^t we shuld call vpō almighty God, and vpon his name, for the loue that hee beareth to Christ, and is alway our Aduocate before our father: to purchase mercy for our sinnes: *and not for our sinnes onely quoth S. Iohn. (who is y^e writer of this saying and testimony) but also for the sinnes of all the world. S. Augustine vppon the same noteth, that S. Iohn in that place, sayth: we haue an Aduocate, and that Christ is Aduocate for him, like as he is for all other, to purchase mercy for him, like as hee doth for all other that shall be sauēd: and that Sainct Iohn will not be knowne for our aduocate, but that Christ shoulde be taken for Aduocate of all.

S. Bede (as I remember) vppon the same, maketh as much for this purpose, as doth S. Augustine, or well more so that by course of scripture, we are taught to resort for all ayde and reliefe (as I haue sayd) vnto the head spring and fountayne of all comfort and mercye, *as S. Paule calleth him, the father of mercies and of all comforte, which is readye to comforte vs in all tribulation: which (as the psalme reporteth) healeth all our infirmities, and taketh mercy vppon al our iniquities. For he is sweete (as is sayd in an other place) and gentle, and many mercies are layd vp for all those that call vpō him. Yet he sheweth vs no where (I trow) of benefites that we shall purchase by praying vnto saintes departed, and if any person can or will vouchsafe to teach me that, by some authoritie of Scripture, I woulde thinke my selfe hyghly beholding to him, what soeuer hee were, eyther great or small, young or olde: but I weene it cannot be.

I haue made truely long search, yet could I neuer find any such substantiall teaching. Howbeit, I offer my selfe euer to learne, and know that my rude witte, foolish youth vnexpert experience, and feeble discretion, had need of good instruction, as much as any other. Howbeit, I see (thāked be god) that sometime he sheweth some sparcke of light and wisdomē to children, hiding the same from other that are reputed of higher prudence: so that the world thereby many times is brought into admiration, seeing suche factes done of God before theyr face, and laugh thereat sometime with indignation, as the Phariseis did at the blinde man whom Christ had restored to sight, where they said to him Page 1109Thou caitife was borne blinde for thy sinnes, *and wilt thou teach vs, that are a great multitude of high officers of the temple, and Doctours to teach the law? As who would say, it becommeth ther full••ll. Yet we ought not to maruell greatly at suche doing, for so much as S. Paule. 1. Corinthians. 1. sheweth of like practise done in his time, and that he writeth for the instruction of all ages after ensuing, so that it perteyneth (like as all the holy Scripture doth) as well to our tyme, as it did to that it was first written in. *The doctrine of Christes crosse, that is to wit, of the new testament, is to them that perish folly, (sayth he) but to vs that obtayne thereby saluation (incaning thereby, to such as beleue) it is the might or power of God for it is written (sayth he) by the Prophet Esay: that God aforetime sayd he woulde destroy the wisdomē of the wise, and the vnderstanding or learning of the learned woulde he throw away and despise.

This prophecy alleged, Paule thought to be authority sufficient to dissuade the Corinthians from the foolish affiaunce, vayneglory or opinion that they had in men, whom they peradventure euer highly esteemed for their offices, or solemne titles. So that he proceedeth foorth in the same: where are ye now (quoth he) the worldly wise, the scribes that is to say, *Doctors and such other like officers. Hath not god shewed the wisdomē of the world to be foolish & vnsauery? for after that by the wisdomē of God (which is shewed in Scripture I suppose) the world hath not studied to knowe God,by wisdomē, it hath pleased God now to saue them that beleue: thorow the foolishnes of preaching. He calleth the word of God foolish preaching, not because it was foolish, for afore he called it godly wisdomē, but he spake after the opinion of thē that set litle or nought therby, esteming it as Esops Cock did the precious stone, and as swine do pearles.

After long proces in the same matter, he cōcludeth thus Brethrē (sayth he) you see your calling, how that not many wise men after the flesh, are called to the beliefe of the Gospel, nor many mighty men, ne many of noble parentage: but those that be• fooles after the estimation of the world, hath God chosen to cōfound the wise. &c.

Therefore, I say (as I sayd afore) that thanks bee to God, albeit I am (as I shewed before) voyd of such great prudency that other be well endued with, yet I see partly how theyr great reasons be not very substantiall, wherby they contend by the treaty of reason, when authority fayleth thē, to shew, that we ought to pray to Sayntes departed, for to be Mediators for vs to Christ. And amōg other, this is one, that they leaue much vpon bringing it forth so vsually that common people, well nigh altogether harpe vpon the same: Some fauoring, it other contrariwise esteming it of no value.

The reason is this: If whē one shuld desire to come to y^t speach of our soueraigne to obtaine some bowne of hym,* neede it were first to purchase the fauour of his Chamberlaines or some like officers to bring him to the kinges presence, for els he may watch long in vayne, vntill he be full a colde, ere that he shall speake with his grace and muche lesse is hee like to obtaine his petition. In likewise it fareth (as they say) betwixt God and vs: of whom if we should purchase any benefite, we must first break vnto the Sayntes departed making them our frēdes to go betwext God and vs, as Mediatours, and Intercessors. But such (with theyr leaue I would speake it) I thinke are deceyued,* in that they resemble God and the king together. For though the king be a full gracious Prince (as I heare by common reporte he is) yet he is not in graciousnesse to be conferred with God: and though he were as gracious as might be, yet hath he not the knowledge that is in God, for God knewe of all thinges before the beginning of the world: and is euery where, to see, not onely our outwarde dealing, but also all secret thoughtes of all mens hartes, so that he needeth no Mediatours to enforme him of our desires, as the king doth neede: And he is so full of infinite mercy, that I may as lightly or as soone obtēin of him that is for my behoofe, as I shoulde wyne by praying holy Sayntes to be intercessors to him for me.

Therefore I passing such apparant reasons, take me to the ensample of antiquity.* I meane of the Patriarckes, Prophets, and the Apostles, and authority of Scripture▪ which teach that we need not so to feare, but may boldly resort vnto Christ hymselfe and his holy Father, for so much as he biddeth vs in these wordes and other lyke, so for to do▪ saying: Come vnto me all ye that trauell, are vexed, and sore charged,and I will refresh and ease you. Marke how he biddeth vs to resort vnto hymselfe and that without feare. For he and his father which are all one, geueth aboūdantly of all gooddnes, vnto all men, and vphrayde no body for theyr vnworthinesse. But if we entend to obteyne of hym, we must all doubtfulnes (as I sayd afore) put a part, with a sure confidence of his mercy, aske of him that we woulde haue. So y^e I leaue vnto other, what they lust to doe, praying Iesu, that we al may lust for that, that is most pleasing to him.

But I thinke, concerning my selfe, that according to Christes owne cōmaundemēt, I may without any doubt casting, resort in all encombraunces, to seeke ease thereof, euen vnto himselfe, and to his blessed father. Therefore he biddeth vs when we should pray, to say after this fashion: Our father which ar• in heauen &c. For there is no creature ne creatures, that euer were or be, that hath more, nor so much, neither of might,* wherby commeth hability to geue helpe: ne of mercy and tendernes, which should make them willing in proportion agreable with hability: ne of knowledge, that should teach to minister both the other, as is our Lord God: which not onely is almighty, all mercifull: and all wise: but also infinite in all these glorious properties,* so that vndoubtedly he can, will, & best knoweth how to relieue and succour vs in all necessity & anguish: vnto whom be honor without end for euer. Amen.

One thing yet I will shewe you in thys case, of whych thing I was once aduertised by a great learned man, who (as I suppose) is nowe liuing, I will not name hym, least I should perhaps cause any displeasure to be conceyued against him thorough my relation. The thing was this:* I will (quoth he) pray vnto Saintes, but that shall be, when I thinke that God, either can not,* or will not geue me my petition. But that (as I shewed in the conuocation house) shall neuer be, I hope. And therfore it is to me needlesse to seeke any further about, standing in such trust and belief•, as I hope I haue found vpon Gods sure promise.

¶To the 15. Article, where you doe demaund whether the Saints in heauen, as Mediatours, pray for vs? I say,* that I beleue Saintes in heauen do pray for vs, for I suppose they know that all mē generally liuing vpō earth, be wrapped in manifolde miseries, like as they also were, theyr soules being imprisoned within theyr bodyes beyng mortall. Albeit I thinke they know not what particular miseries men vpō earth be entangled and clogged with,* as sheweth Augustine, or els some other (as I thinke rather) vnder his name in a certayne worke, saying in this wyse: Ibi sunt spiritus defunctorum, vbi non vident quaecunque aguntur aut eueniunt in ista vita hominum. Quomodo ergo vidēt tumulos suos aut corpora sua, vtrū abiecta iaceāt, an sepulta? Quomodo intersunt miseriae viuorum,* cum vel sua ipsi mala patiantur si talia merita contraxerūt, vel in pace requiescant, vbi mala nulla nec patiando nec compatiendo sustineant, liberati ab omnibus malis quae patiando & compatiendo cum hic viuerent, sustinebant. The summe hereof is, that soules departed, fele nor know of no particular miseries sustained of men liuing in this world, wherby they should neede to take eyther pacience, or els compassiō after theyr decease. Yet forsomuch as they know in generall, that all men liuing are cladde with fraylety, & theyr charity is not minished after they be hence departed, but increased, therfore I beleue verely that they do pray for vs as petitioners, but not as mediators, so far forth as I can see.* For scripture vsseth to speake but of one Mediatour, which I thinke, signifieth a maker of peace or atonemēt betwixt God the father and man. Record I take of Paul, which. 1. Tim. 2. sayth: Vnus est deus, vnus est & mediator dei & hominum, homo Christus Iesus, qui dedit semetipsū redemptionem pro omnibus. Erasmus translateth it, conciliator dei hominum. That is to say. There is one God and Mediatout or peace maker betwixt God and man,* the man called Christ Iesus, which gaue himselfe for the redemption of all.

Thus (I say) I beleue Sayntes in heauen do pray for vs, as petitioners, but not as Mediators. Yea, all they, I weene, do pray & long that the day of iudgement may soone come, according to the saying of Paule:*Solicita creaturae expectatio reuelationem filiorum dei expectat. The feruēt desire of the creature waiteth whē the sonnes of God shalbe reueled. And agayne: Omnis creatura congemiscit, & nobiscum parturit vs{que} ad hoc tempus. Euery creature groneth with vs and trauelleth in payne together vnto this present. Which shalbe for the accomplishmet of glory both to them and to all other elect of god to be his children and coinheritors with Christ.

¶In the xvj. Article where you demaund whether I beleue that oblations and pilgrimages may be deuoutly & meritoriously done to the Sepulchres and Reliques of Sayntes? I say, that what they may be, I can not perfectly tell: For God can so worke, that vnto those, whome he hath chosē to be inheritors with him, all things shal turne to a good conclusion, as sayth Saynt Paule to the Romanes in this wise: Vnto those that loue God, all thinges shall well succede and woorke together for their furtheraunce in goodnesse. Of whom it is written in the Psalme: Blessed is that nation that hath the Lord for their god, the people whom he hath chosen to be his inheritors: Yea theyr euil dedes shall not hurt them, but come wel to passe for the increase of vertue. Page 1110 For as it is sayd in the Gospell: Cui minus remittitur minus diligit. To whom lesse is forgeuen, he loueth lesse. And agayne, it hurted not Onesimus, that he ran away from his mayster Philemon, but God wrought, that by occasion therof, he me•te with Paule, which conuerted him to the fayth of the Gospell, who before was without beliefe. Therefore, whether they may be done meritoriously or no, I will not define: God wotteth. But this I say, that God did neuer institute any such thing in the new testament, which is the verity and rule of all Christen people to folow and beleue. Yea that onely is of perfect surety, and none other, but as it is agreable and hath ground of the same. And like as we haue no certayne doctrine institute of Christ, ne his disciples, teaching vs thus for to do: no more is there any merite appoynted of him therefore, as I shewed afore where I tolde my minde of our merites.

Moreouer, where ye put Piè, which I call deuoutly: very true deuotion (that is called in Latine Pietas) is that, which hath annexed therewith diuine promises for thys present life to come: as witnesseth Paule. 1. Tim. 4. which is nothing els but the obseruation of Christes law, that in the Psalme for the purenesse thereof, is called argentum igne examinatum, purgatum septuplum: Siluer fined often and many times thorow fire. It hath no chaffe in it, as hath mennes traditions, but is pure and cleane wheate, as sheweth Jeremy writing in this wise. Quid paleis ad triticum? Propter hoc ego ad Prophetas, dicit dominus, qui furantur verba mea vnusquisque a proximo suo, & seducunt populum meum in mendacijs suis & in erroribus suis. What is the chaffe to the wheate? Therefore beholde, I will come agaynst the Prophets, sayth the Lord that steale my word euery one from his neighbour, and deceiue my people in theyr lies and in theyr errors. And this deuotion is that which S. Iames calleth the pure Religion of Christ, saying: Pure and immaculate religion afore God the father is, to visite fatherlesse children and widdowes in theyr vexation. Whereby he meaneth all needy people that are succourlesse and helpelesse, without counsell and other aimes, according to our hability, whensoever we see them in need or distresse.

The other part of this Religion shewed by S. Iames is, That a man should keepe himselfe cleane from the world: and that doe they, which be not affectionate so vnto any thing therin, but that they haue the thinges of the world, or occupy the same by true dealing, so that they can finde in theyr hart to depart from them when God shal please, or charity so requireth.

Thus doing we shall follow the exhortation of blessed Paule, which writing to the Corinth. sayth thus: Brethren the time is short, this remayneth, that they whiche haue wiues should be as they had them not: & those that weepe, should be as they wept not: and those that buy, as if they were without possession: and they that occupy this world, as though they occupied it not: for the fashiō of this world passeth away. And this meaneth none other thing, but that we should not loue ne dread any worldly thing, passing measure or inordinatly, but God aboue all thinges, and all other thinges in him, or for him: & he that thus doth,* fulfilleth the commaundement of Christ, spoken to the rich man in the Gospell, where he sayth: Goe and sell all that euer thou hast,*and come folow me. For he hath sold away al that euer he hath, that surely entendeth for the loue of Christ, to helpe the poore with all that he may. Voluntas reputatur pro facto: The will is accepted for the deed, as is sayd commonly. And this saying both of Iames, and also of the Euangelist, I think verely belongeth to al christen men that they should performe it, none except, neyther lay man, ne women (as we vse to say) but to them as well as to any whom we call religious.

As cōcerning y^e reliques & tombes of saints, I haue said vnto your Lordship afore, what I do thinke of the milke of our Lady,* y^e bloud which they say, is at Hailes, Norwich & other places, w^t such other: wherof (I trust) you doe know what ought to be done. And I besech god you may do ther in as your office doth require, so shewing example vnto other prelates, to follow your Lordship in good doing, as is comely for a primate to do, remembring alway, as Paule sayth: the time is short, and therefore it were good to set to hand in time.

Finally, holy Moyses, when he died, would be so buried that no man should know which was his graue, as it is witnessed in the booke of Deuteronomy:* & that (as the expositors testify) was because y^e Iewes which were prone to new fāgled worshipping, should not fall into Idolatry, worshipping him as God, for the great and manifold myracles that were wrought by him while he was aliue.

*To conclude, I say it is no poynt of my belief, to think that oblations and pilgrimages at saintes graues and reliques, are meritorious works, ne yet that there is any deuotiō in so doing: That is godly which is institute by scrip|ture. If you thinke contrary, I would desire to know for mine instruction, what part of scripture should make therfore, agaynst me.

¶In the xvij. where you doe aske, whether the fast of lent, and other appoynted by the common law,* and receaued in common vsage of Christen people (vnlesse necessity otherwise requireth) are to be obserued. I saye that in mine opinion they are to be obserued, and fastyng discretly done is commendable, for so shall a man auoyde slouth & be the more ready to serue God and also his neighbours: & therby tame the rebelliō of carnal concupiscence, according to the saying of the Poet:*Sine cerere & baccho friget venus Without wine & good fare, lust waxeth colde. And as saynt Hierome: Venter mero estuans spumat in libidinem: The body enflamed with wine, bursteth out into lust.

Yet shall not the breaking of these feastes make a man to do deadly sinne,* except in his minde be some other malicious affection therwith annexed, as rashnes of minde, despite, or such like, for so much as no positieue law of man, made without foundation of scripture, may binde any person: so that in breaking of such,* he shall therfore sinne deadly. And of this sort made by man, is the fast of lent and other dayes ordeined in your lawes without authoritey of scripture, which willeth vs to fast perpetually, eating and drinking, but when neede requireth (not for any voluptuousnes, as many that recounteth themselues great fasters, I feare haue done) yea and that sparely, forseeing alwaye that our Romackes be neuer cloied with dronkenhippe or surfeiting, as is commaunded by our Sauior in Luke: but contrariwise,* after the fashion rather of a certayne Prince that is mentioned (I trow) in Valerius Maximus, that neuer rose from his meales meat, with a full stomacke, but rather somewhat empty, or hungry: which, as the story testifieth, caused him to liue so wonderfull a long season, that a m•n could vnneth thinke it possible for ones life, to be so prolou'ged, had not such a notable author reported it.

And (to tell the trueth) I suppose the prelates shoulde better haue perswaded the people to pure fasting, by instāt preaching of the word of God, and fatherly exhortations,* then by ordeining of so sore a multitude of lawes and constitutions: For the nature of man is well described of Horace saying: Nitimur in vetitum sēper, cupimus{que} negata. Looke what is forbid that we most desire, and alwayes couet the things that be denied vs. And in an other prouerbe: Funis plus aequo tēsus rumpitur. The rope by ouermuch straining bursteth a sonder. According to this, sayd a good olde father in Cambridge, I remēber his saying well yet: He was an old Doct. of diuinity, Whē a Legate came into England at a time, & he with certayne Bishops, had ordeined that the dedication of al churches through England (as I remember) should be kept holy & solemnized vpon one day,* and priestes should haue their gownes made close before, with such other like ordinances: he resisted, not condescēding to haue thē put in executiō, whē his Diocesane required him,* declaring howe this multitude of lawes pleased him not: For we had enough & abundantly afore, adding this reason: Adam being in Paradise had but one law to obserue,* and yet he brake it: what other thing then shall this multitude do (quoth he) but multiply transgression? For when a Fagot is bound ouer strait the bond must breake.

God therfore I besech him, send vs of the sweet dew of his heauenly doctrine,* to moysten and supple the earthlye groūd of our hartes, that we may grow like fashioned vnto him, putting apart our old Adam, with all his dissimulation and paynted shew, that is much caused by humaine lawes and constitutions, and do vpon Christ, that is y^e very truth and the way directing men to the same. Amen.

¶Unto the xviiij. where you aske,* whether it be laudable and profitable, that worshipfull Images be set in churches for the remembraunce of Christ and his sayntes? I say,* that I know of no images that ought to be worshipped, specially made by the hand of men: for the Psal. sayth: Confusion or shame be vpon them that worshippe or make obeysance vnto carued Images, & that glory in theyr pictures. Moreouer S. Augustine in his book de vera religione, sayth thus: Let vs not haue deuotion in worshipping the workes of men: or els thus,* let vs not be bound to worship the workes of men, for the workemen are more excellent then the thinges which they make: whom notw^tstanding we ought not to worship: The latin is thus: Non sit nobis religio humanorum operum cultus,* meliores enim sunt ipsi artifices qui ta'lia fabricantur, quos tamen colere non debemus.

Lactātius also maketh strongly with the same. I can not without the booke recite his saying, for he teacheth largely of the same matter. Origē also contra Celsum (I trow) will likewise testify, where (as I remember) he concludeth, saying, that he would haue no Goldsmithes ne Grauers in a Communalty, for they do but litle profite or none thereto.

Page 1111*And S. Gregory that was chiefe, either inuentor that Images should be set in churches, or els maintainer therof, woulde not, as I haue read (I trow it is in an Epistle which he writeth ad Seruum) haue them worshipped.

And as concerning the exciting of mens memory, I would suppose, that it Christes doctrine were so shewed and opened, that people might clearly vnderstand it (and that is the principall office of prelates and curates to do, by diligent teaching thereof) I thinke veryly we should haue litle need of any other Images, then that should by wholsome doctrine be shewed vnto vs by word of mouth & writing: Quoniam nihil tam efficax ad comenefaciendum discipulos, quam viuā vox. Nothing is so effectuell to excite the remembraunce of disciples, as the liuely voyce of good teachers: as it is testified both by common report, and also by the sentence of learned men.

So that I suppose, if this liuely doctrine of God had afore time bene apertly & diligently opened vnto the people, as curates ought to haue done, we should haue suche profite thereby, that we should not need to contend for setting vp or taking downe of other dumme stockes & lifeles stones,* carued or made by men. And if prelates would begin to set vp Christes word, which alas for pity, is not looked vpon, but rather troden downe & despised, so that many are not ashamed to say, I will haue no more learning in Christes law, then my predecessors, for they that magnifye it, must be sore punished, and taken for hereticks, with such other greeuous wordes) if this doctrine were yet set vp in Churches (I say) and truely opened, that all men myght haue theyr iudgement therby reformed and made cleare, I thinke we shoulde not greatly neede the profite that commeth by Images made of men, to excite our remembraunce to liue Christerily.

For that word which came from the brest of Christ him selfe, and was writtē of other, that wrote and spake by the suggestion of his spirite the holy ghost,* sheweth full perfectly his blessed will, which is the true and certayne Image of his mind and deuise. If this therfore were diligently inculcate, I thinke we should be transformed anewe, according to the minde of Paule, which writing to the Colossians,* sayth thus: See that you lye not one to an other, after that now you haue put of the olde man with his woorkes, and haue put vpon you the new man, which is transformed and renouate after the knowledge and image of him that made vs. Yea, thus should we all be docti à Deo▪ taught of God, as is sayde in Iohn and all should know God both small and great,* according to the promise recited in the Hebrues: yea thus should we be restored to goodnesse,* that we should haue the Image of God, •arned in our hartes full expressly. For euery man is transformed into the fashion of vertuous thinges that he is accustomed to read and heare.* And therfore it were a greate grace, if we might haue the worde of God diligently and often spoken and song vnto vs in such wise; that the people might vnderstand it. Yea, then should it come to passe, that craftes mē should sing spirituall psalmes sitting at theyr worke, and the husbandman at his plough, as wisheth S. Hierome.

Yea this holy Image of Christ, I meane his blessed doctrine, doth appoynt vs also to cōsider the works made by the hand of God,* such as no man can make like, wherby as sayth S. Paule writing to the Romanes: The inuisi, ble power and diuinity of God is knowne and sene by the creation o• the world, of such as will consider his workes, that are therin by him made.* Looke in the Psalmes: Laudate Dominum de Coelis: Coeli enarrant. &c. Prayse ye the Lord, from heauē. The heauens declare the glory of God,* with other. And these two Images, Gods workes, and his doctrine hath, ere any Images made by men were set vppe in Churches well and sufficiently instructed the primitiue church,* and should yet instruct vs well,* if they were well considered: so that we shoulde not neede so sore to contend for setting vp of other made by men. Wherby I haue perceiued much harme to arise, and no great profite: nor the scripture maketh not for them, but rather contrary. As concerning which matter I woulde your Lordshyppe woulde please to reade the Epistle of Baruche once agayne, writing of the same matter.

Unto the xix. where you aske, whether I beleue that prayers of men liuing do profite soules departed, & beyng in Purgatory?* I made answeare in the xiiij. article.

Unto the xx. where you doe aske, whether men merite and deserue both by theyr fasting and also by other deedes of deuotion?* I haue shewed what I do think therof, in the fift demaund.

In the xxi. where you do aske, whether I do beleue that men prohibited of bishops to preach,* as suspect of heresy, ought to cease from preaching & teaching, vntill they haue purged themselues of suspition, afore an higher Iudge? I say, that men may be wrongfully suspected of heresy,* either because they neuer thought to beleue such errors, as men by false suspition do deeme them to fauor: or els when men as well of high estate, as of low, by sinister iudgemēt may thinke that to be error, which is the very truth. And of this speaketh Esay:*Wo be to them (quoth he) that calleth the light darckenes, and the darckenes light: the truth falsehood, and falsehood truth: as the Byshops and the Priestes, with theyr Oratour Tertullus, called Paule, saying thus before a Iudge called Felix, vnto whose Court they brought hym to be condemned to death: We haue (quoth they) gottē here a pestilent felow,a sower of sedition or discord among all the Iewes of the worlde, and bringer vp of the Secte of the Nazarens, which was also minded to haue polluted our temple. &c. This is to call by peruerse iudgement, trueth falsehoode. And thus did theyr predecessours speake of the Prophets, yea and of Christ himselfe, calling him a seducer and preacher of heresy: which is written for our instruction. And men thus being suspected (as I woulde none were) ought in no wise therefore to cease neither from preaching, ne teaching.

Ensample of this we haue in the Actes of the apostles, where is shewed, that whē Peter & Iohn had done a myracle vpon a man that had bene lame frō his natiuity (whō by the power of Christ they healed,* & caused to go where he pleased) the people hearing of this, came running about Peter & Iohn. Peter seeing this, did exhort the people in a sermon, that they should not thinke him & his felow S. Iohn, to haue done this wōderfull thing by their own power or holynes, but by the vertue of Christ, whom they & theyr head rulers had slayne.

While they were thus speaking with the people, there came vpō them the priestes & officers of the temple accompanied with the Saduces, being sore displeased that they should enterprise to teach the people, and preace that men should arise from death by the name of Christ, whom they had caused to be crucified, and therewith they layd handes vpon them, and put them in warde vntill next day. The next day they sent for the Apostles before them, demaunding by what power and in whose name they did this myracle? Peter made aunswere,*If you (quoth he) that are head rulers ouer the people, lust by examination to knowe by what meanes we did it, we woulde you should all know, that we did it through the name of Christ Iesu of Nazareth, whom you did crucify: but God did cause him to arise agayne. In the vertue of hys name doth this man that afore was lame, now stand before you here both whole and found. For Christ is that high corner stone, whō you cast away, which should haue builded the peoples fayth vpon him, neither is there any saluation without him.

These great men, seing that Peter spake so freely, and that he with his felow Iohn, were simple men, without any pompous apparel, or great garde of seruaunts, being like ideots, and men vnlearned wondred therat. At the last they did commaunde them to depart out of theyr Councell house, whiles they should cōmon more largely of y^e matter.* Afterward they called y^e Apostles afore them agayde, commaunding them that they should no more preach ne teache in the name of Iesus. But the Apostles aunswered, saying: I beseeche you iudge better: ought we to obey you more then God, or no? For certaynely we must needes testify of those thinges which we haue both heard and seene. Then the head Priestes threatning them sore, did geue them strait charge,* not to breake theyr precept, and so did let them goe, not knowing any cause why they might punish them: for they feared lest the people would haue taken part with the Apostles, for the people gaue glory to God for the myracle shewed by them.

Notwithstāding al these great threats Peter wrought miracles still amongst the people,* doing thē to know that glory therfore ought to be geuē to Iesus, by whose power and name they were done. Wherwith the harts of the people melted for ioy: so that they folowed after the Apostles, whyther soeuer they went.

The primate of the priestes hearing of this, and all that were about him, repleate with indignation, layd handes vpon the Apostles, putting them in the common Prison. But the Aungell of God in the night opened the Prison dores, and brought them out, saying:*Goe you into the Temple, and stand there preaching vnto the people all the wordes of life. That is to say, Christes doctrine: and so they did earely in the morning. Then came foorth the chiefe Priest, and they whom he vsed to haue about him, and called a Councell, in which were all the Priestes of Israel, or auncientes of Israel. So they sent vnto the prison house for to haue the apostles brought forth before them. When theyr seruaunts came to the prison house, & found the apostles gone thence, they returned to theyr maisters, saying: we found the prison fast shut round about in euery part, & Page 1112 the keepers watching at the dores without, full diligently. But when we had opened the prison, we could find no body within.

Then as the high priestes & officers of the temple heard this they were in a great perplexity, doubting what wold therof come.* Then came one vnto them & shewed thē, saying: Behold, the men that ye put in prison, are standing in the temple preaching vnto the people. Then wēt they thither, and brought the apostles with thē, without any violence: but they were afraid lest the people would haue beaten them downe with stones.

Then they caused the apostles to be brought into their Councell house, the high priest beginning his proposition agaynst the apostles in this forme: Haue we not straitly commaunded you (sayd he) that you should not preach in the name of Christ? And see, you haue filled all Hierusalem with your doctrine. Will you bring this mans blood vpō vs,* that we should vnrighteously haue caused him to suffer death? Then aunswered Peter and the other Apostles, saying: We ought to obey God more then any man. The God of our fathers hath raysted Iesu from death, whom you did slay, hanging him vpon a tree. Him notwithstanding hath GOD raysted, and by his power aduaunced to be our king and Sauour: by whom shalbe geuen to all Israel, that will take repentaunce, forgeuenes of sinne.

These great rulers hearing this, their harts were therwith clouen a sunder, and they couſelled together for to slay the apostles. But one good man amōg theyr multitude aduised them otherwise, whose aduise they did approue. Thē they called the apostles againe afore them, causing them to be scourged, & charged them no more to preach in the name of Iesu, and so did let them depart.

Then went they away out of the Councell, reioycing that God had made thē worthy to suffer such rebukes for his name sake.* But yet they neuer ceased to teach & preach of Iesus Christ, euery day in the temple, and in all houses that they came into. This is written in the 4.5. and 6. of the Actes of the apostles, & for our instruction, doubt you not: for such practise is shewed in all ages. So that hereby you may see,* when men be wrongfully suspect or infamed of he'resy, and so prohibited by Bishops for to preach the worde of God,* that they ought for no mans commaundement to leaue or stop, though they do neuer purge themselues afore them, for such will admitte no iust purgation many times, but iudge in theyr own causes, and that as they lust, which me thinketh, is not all comely. Therefore in the old law the priestes and other Iudges do sit together, hearing of matters that were in controuersy.

Yet this I thinke reasonable, that a man iustly and not causelesse suspect,* and namely if he be so found faultye of heresy, ought to cease from preaching, after he is inhibited, vntill he haue made his purgation before some Iudge. But in my rude opinion, it were necessary and conuenient that our heades should not be ouer ready of suspition,* and so inhibiting men approued, from preaching, specially in this Session, when the people doth suspect them to doe it more for loue of themselues, and mainteining of their priuate lucre, or honor, then to do it for loue of God, and main'tenance of his honor.

In the xxij. where you demaund, whether I beleue that it is lawfull for all Pristes freely to preache the woorde of God or no,* and that in all places, at all seasons & to al persons to whom they shall please, although they be not sent? I say, that priestes are called in Scripture by two distinct wordes, that is to wit, Praesbiteri & Sacerdotes. The fyrst is to say, auncient men, Seniors, or elders: and by that word or vocable,* are the seculer iudges or such like head officers, sometime also signified, as we reade in Daniel, that they were called, which defamed and wrongfully accused Susanna: that this is seldome, and nothing so customably, as those to be called Praesbiteri, which are set to be Prelates in the Church to guide the same by the word of God and his blessed doctrine,* that is, the roode of direction, and the foundation of Christes fayth. And Priestes thus called Praesbiteri, in the Primitiue Church (what time were but few traditions and ordinaunces to let vs from the strayt trade or institution made by Christ and his Apostles) were the very same and none other, but Bishops, as I shewed you in the first part of mine aunswere, by authoritye of Saynt Hierome.

Paul also recordeth the same right euidently in the first to Titus, in this fourme: I left thee Titus (quoth blessed Paule) behinde me in Crete, that thou shouldest set in a due order, such thinges as lacke or be not els perfectly framed, and that thou shouldest set priestes in euery towne,like as I did appoynt thee, if any be without reproche, or blamelesse, the husbände of one wife, hauing faythfull children, not geuen to ryote, or that be not vnruely, for so ought a Bishop to be. &c. These are not my words, but S. Paules, in the Epistle to Titus. Where you may see, that a priest called Praesbiter, shuld be the same that we call a byshop, whom he requireth a litle after, to be able by wholesome doctrine of Gods Scripture,* to exhort the good to follow the same doctrine, & if any shall speake agaynst it, to reprove them thereby. And marke you how he would haue a bishop (otherwise called an auncient man, or a priest) to make exhortation by holy scripture, & thereby to reprove them that shall speake agaynst the trueth, & not to condemne them by might or authority onely, or els by traditions of men made in generall Councels. And as many as are in this wise Priestes whiche are called commonlye Praesbiteri, otherwise Bishops) such as in the church are set to take cure of soule, and to be spirituall pastors, ought to preach freely the word of God in all places and times conuenient, and to whom soeuer it shall please thē, if they suppose and see that theyr preaching should edify and profite.

And where as you adde this particule: Though they were not sent: I say, that all suche are chosen to be preachers, and therefore sent: for of this speaketh S. Gregorye in his Pastorals, in this wise:Praedicationis quippe officium suscipit, quisquis ad sacerdotium accedit. Whosoeuer taketh priesthood vpon him, taketh also vpon him the office of preaching. Yea your lawe reporteth in like maner, Distinct. 43. where it is thus sayd: A Priest ought to be honest, that he may shew honesty both in wordes and conditions. Wherefore it is sayd in the Canticles: The Cheekes of the spouse, that is to wit, of preachers, are to be compared to a Turtle doue.

Where is moreouer added: He must also haue the gift of teaching because (as sayth S. Hierome) innocent cōuersation, without speach or preaching, how much it is auaylable by example geuing, so much doth it hurt agayn by silēce keping: for wolues must be driuē away by barking of dogs & by the shepheards staffe, which as y^e glose sheweth) signifieth preaching & sharpe words of the priest. And this I vnderstād of such as should be priestes elect both by god and men, in Gods church, whose office is to preach.

And though many of them which now doe minister in the church, and are elect by bishops, otherwise thē after the maner of Christes institution, and the forme of the primitiue Church, neither do, ne can preach:* yet ought not the multitude of such to be layd for an authority agaynst me, or other that are compelled to shew the truth and right ordinance of the apostles, that was vsed afore time in the Primitiue church: God bring it in agayn. Neither ought we for the negligence of bishops, which haue chosen such an ignorant multitude (wherby the principal duty of priestes is growen out of knowledge) when we do shew you therof, to be so enforced by a booke othe, and therefore noted as heretickes, imprisoned, and burned.*

Other be called priestes in the new Testament by thys word, Sacerdotes, that is to say (I thinke) sacrificers. And thus as Christ was called Rex & Sacerdos, Kyng & Prieste, so be all true Christen men in the newe Testament (as is testified. Apocal. 1.) by Christ, made Kinges and Priestes. The wordes in the Apocal. be thus:To Iesu Christ whyche hath loued vs, and washed vs from our sinnes through his bloud, and made vs kinges and priestes vnto God euen his father, vnto him be glory and rule for euer and euer. Amen. Thus sayth S. Iohn, speaking of all Christen people. In like maner is it sayde. 1. Peter. 2. where he writeth vnto all Christen men: You (quoth he) be a chosen generation, a regall priest hood, an holy people.* S. Bede expounding the same (as my remembraunce doth serue) shall testify playnely with me. And S. Augustine I wot well, in diuers places recordeth, that all Christen men be so called, Regale Lacerdotium. And likewise doth Faber in his Commentaries vpon the same place. Whosoeuer looketh vpon the treatise called Vnio dissidentium, shall finde a multitude of auncient Fathers sayinges declaring the same.

But this may yet seme a strange thing & a new, that al persons should be called priests, & that in scripture, which can not lye. Truth it is in deede, it may seeme straunge to diuers, as it did to me, and many other,* when we read it first, because we neuer read ne heard of the same before: and so did Christes doctrine and his apostles seeme new to his audience, when he himselfe preached.

Albeit he yet proued his doing and sayinges by authority of the law and Prophetes, as is shewed in the first to the Romanes where Paule reporteth.*That he was chosen a part to be a minister of the Gospell that was promised before by the Prophettes. And our Sauour testifieth the same in Saynt Iohn, saying to the Iewes:*Thinke you not (quoth he) that I shall accuse you before my Father? There is one to accuse you, which is Moyses, in whome ye doe trust. But if you beleued Moyses, you should certaynely beleue me, for he writeth of me. &c. Likewise a litle aboue, he biddeth thē search Page 1113 the Scriptures, for they make report of him.

But although these sayinges doe seeme newe for lacke that we haue not had olde familiarity with Scripture, and vsage in reading the same, (God amend and help it, when it shall please him) yet truely so standeth it written, as I haue sayd, and so is interpreted by the Doctors aboue named, and so was it preached of a certayne Doctour also of Diuinity in London, the second day of Aduent last past, in this sentence. I wote not whether these were the selfe wordes or no. The church (quoth the doctor) is nothing els but the congregatiō of faythfull people:* and you all (quoth he to the people) are of the church, as well as I, or any other, if you be of God. And likewise we & all men are priestes, but yet are not all alike ordeyned Ministers (sayd he) for to consecrate the body of Christ in the Church.* Thus sayd the preacher: whom when I see oportunitie, I dare be bolde to name. And these I say ought not all to preach openly in generall conuentions or assembles, neither canne they, but they rather should come to learne: yet priuatelye are they bound for instructions of theyr seruantes, children,* kinsfolke, and such like, to speak that should be for the destruction of vice, and encrease or vpholding of vertue, whensoever time and place so behoueth, as sheweth Saint Paul, saying in this wise: You that are fathers, prouoke not your children to wrath or anger, but bring them vp in the doctrine and discipline of the Lord.

In the xxiiij. where you doe aske, whether I beleue that it is lawefull for lay people of both kindes,* that is to wit, both men and women, to sacrifice and preach the word of God, I say that it is not meet for none, in mine opinion to preach openly the word of God,* except they be chosen & elect to the same, either by God, or solemnly by men, or els by both, and therefore S. Paule calleth him selfe in all his Epistles, an Apostle of God, that is to wit, a messenger of God. And to the Galathians he writeth thus: Paule an Apo|stle, not sent by men, nor by man, but by Iesus Christ. Also to the Romanes: How shall men preach truely (quoth he) excepte they be sent.

Notwithstanding, I say this, both by supportation of Gods law,* and also of lawes written in the Decrees, that in time of great necessity, laye people may preach, and that of both kindes, both men and women, as you may see in the Epistle to the Corinthians, where as he sayth: That it is a shame for a woman to speake in a multitude or congregation. Yet in an other place he sayth: That euery woman praying or prophecying, hauing nothing vpon her head, doth dishonor her head.

To this accordeth the prophesye of Ioel recited Act. 2. where in the person of God is sayd thus: I shall poure out of my spirit vpon all flesh, & both your sonnes and your daughters shall prophecy. Thus did Anna the Prophetesse daughter of Phanuel, geue prayse vnto Christ in the Temple, & spake of him to all men of Hierusalem, that looked after the redētion of Israel.

This also doth yet speake vnto vs in Scripture, the virgine Mary, by the song which she made, that is dayly recited in the Church, called Magnificat. Yea Stephen also being no Priest, but a Deacon, made a wonderful good sermon. Actes. 7. This also willeth your Decrees, Dist. 9. de Conse. where is thus sayde: A woman although shee is learned & holy, may not presume to teach men in the congregation, ne baptise, except necessity requireth. So that where need is, I shall adde this, but not without the mind of him that wrote the Lawe: like as a woman maye baptise, so may she teach the woord of God, or preach, as is declared more playnely. Cap. 16. quest. 1. & in Glosa. 11. Cap adijcimus dist. 18. And I beseeche God, that for lacke of true and well learned Officers, suche necessity doe not come now vpon vs, that such shal need to take vpon them to preach.

There is a learned man, which in a Dialogue that he maketh betwixt a rude Abbot & a Gentlewoman, hauing skill in learning, iesteth, but with prety earnest (as his maner is) and geueth a watch worde touching somewhat my purpose. It is in the end of the Dialogue. The gentlewoman aunswering the Abbot, for that he had partly checked her, because she was quicke in vtterance of learning: Syr (quoth she) if you continue therin so dull as you haue done and dayly do, the world perceiuing it (as they begin fast to grow quicke in sight) it is to be feared, least they will sette you beside the saddle, and put vs in your roomes.

As concerning sacrifice doing (so I doe vnderstand by the word which you do vse, Libare, not knowyng els what it should meane) I say, that it is lawfull for all men and women to doe sacrifice, of what sort soeuer they be: but I meane not by sacrifice doing, to say Masse, as priestes vsed to do, thereunto appoynted: but like as Christen people be Sacerdotes, that is to say, Sacrificers, as is shewed before, so ought they to offer, and do offer spirituall Sacrifices, as writeth S. Paule to the Romanes, saying: I beseeche you brethren, for the loue of Gods mercy, that you will geue your body a liuing sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, being a reasonable worshipping. In that he sayth our body should be a sacrifice, he would haue it slayne▪ for that was the maner, that all beastes that were wont to be sacrificed shoulde be first slayne. But he ioyneth therewith, Liuing, saying: Geue your body to be a liuing sacrifice. So that he would we shold continue to liue in this body to Gods pleasure, but fleeing the ciuill lustes and appetites therof, and so shall our worshipping be reasonable, if we doe not geue vnto our reason ouer much of the bridle, whereby it may runne at ryot, folowing fleshly concupiscence, and wicked vanitie or arrogancy: as whē men will take in hand to deuise, by their owne wit, a more godly way of liuing, then is institute by Christ (whiche is the wisdom of his heavenly Father) sayinge that his is not sufficient enough for vs to follow. Of whome it is sayd by the Prophet Esaye in these wordes: This people approche neare vnto me, and honoureth me with their lippes, but theyr hart is farre from me: but they do worship me in vayn, teaching doctrines that are lawes or preceptes of men.

Then Paul proceedeth, shewing of this Christian sacrifice, saying: And apply not your selues vnto the fashion of this world, but be you transformed by renouation of your mind,*that you may know what is the will of God, what is good acceptable, and rightfull afore him. See how he would haue vs do this sacrifice, and mortify our lusts, in refusing the corru•t fashion and behavior of the world, altering our minds by a new way, by knowing the will of God, and following after the same.

An other maner of Sacrifice whiche he requireth, is, that we shoulde alwaye offer vnto God the Sacrifice of prayse, that is to wit, the fruite of our lippes,* that Osee calleth, Vitulos Labiorum, geuing laude vnto his name: and that we should not forget to doe good, and to be beneficiall to our neighbours, For in such sacrifice (sayth he) GOD hath delight.

Thus I say, that by playne suffrage of your law in the Decrees, and also of Scripture, lay persons in necessity, & in time of need, may lawfully preach or shew the worde of God, and also do sacrifice, but I thinke, except great neede require, they ought not so to do.

Thus haue you herein my minde, which if it be not firme and substantiall, I will yet reforme it when any better is shewed, as I will also do in all other thinges: for I am not in this yet fully certified. Albeit me thinke the decrees do passe euidently with me.

In the xxiiij. where you doe aske, whether excommunication denounced by the Pope agaynst all heretickes, do oblige and binde them before God? I say,* that it byndeth them afore God, if it be lawfully denounced, that is, if they be in very deed, as they be named, & if he denounceth them so to be, not of his owne proper head or affection onely:* but with the consent of other gathered with him in Christes name, for the behoofe of Christes Church: For so vsed S. Paule, when he did excommunicate the man of Corinth,* which had full horribly defiled his mother in law, as appeareth. 1. Cor. 5.

And the same forme declareth the Gospel. Mathew. 18. in these wordes: If thy brother hath trespas•ed agaynst thee, go and reprove him betwixt thee and him alone. If he wil heare thee,*thou hast so wonne thy brother. If he will not heare thee, take one or two with thee, that in the report of two or three,*euery thing may be assured. If he will not heare them, shew it vnto the cōgregation. If he will not follow the minde of the congregation, let him be vnto thee as a paynime or a notable sinner. For verily I say vnto you, whatsoever you shall binde vpon earth, shalbe boūd in heauen. So that such excommunication ought to be done (as me thinketh) by the congregation assembled together with theyr pastor, whose aduise they ought principally to esteeme and folow, if it be vertuous and godly.

And thus is it conuenient to be done: For the Pope is made of fleshe as well as other men, and therefore he may sometime iudge awry, cursing the blessed,* and blessing the cursed? and likewise may other Prelates iudging the Christen to be hereticks, and heretickes Christen. Of whō it is also written in the prophecy of Ezechiel:Mortificabant animas, quae non moriuntur, & viuificabant animas, quae non viuunt: They slewe the soules of them that should not dye, and gaue lyfe to the soules that should not liue. As did the Phariseis when they did cast Christ out of the Uineyard, which signifieth the Church. Marke. 11.* And as our Sauour prophesied in the xix. of Iohn, saying vnto his Disciples: There shalbe (quoth he) some that shall excommunicate you, yea, and the time shall come, that who so euer shall slay you: shall thinke to doe honour to GOD, and this shall they doe vnto Page 1114 you, because they do neither know my father nor me. These wordes be written in the Gospell of Iohn 19. Wherby you see, that for lacke o^r knowledge of God, which is taught and s^howne by the light of scripture, Christ prophesyed how lewd men should lewdly excommunicate the good, yea & slea his true seruants, thinking through such factes to please god, and to do him good seruice.

Wherfore sēd O Lord I beseech thee, the knowledge of thee,* to be dilated vpon earth, which Osee bewayleth sore, seing it absent, wherby mens iudgement may be rectified, and so to do accordingly to the leading of the same.

In the 25. where you aske, whether euery Priest is bound to say dayly his Mattins & Euēsong, according as it is ordeined by the church,* or whether he may leaue them vnsayd, without offence or deadly sinne? I say, that prayer in scripture is much commended, and many great and vnmeasurable benefites are shewed to ensue thereupon, that men should the more lustily geue themselues therto. With prayer doth S Paul bid vs to fight, in diuers places, cōtinuing in the same agaynst our ghostly enemies. A figure of this is read in Exodus, when the Israelites fought in batta^{le} agaynst a nation of Infidels:* I trow theyr Captayne was called Amalecke. Moyses stood vpon a mountayne,* to behold what should be the conclusion, and lifting vp his handes, prayed that it might well succeed with the Israelites, but in long holding them vp, at last his feruour began to grow cold and faint, & his handes sagged downward, and euer as his handes grew heauy (which signifieth, that his affection in praying abated & waxed colde) the Infidels preuayled: but as he kept them heaued vpwārd (wherby was meant intentiue prayer of a deuout mynde) he purchased victorie to the Israelites. Aaron and Hur, which indited the lawe to the people, and were thereof the interpreters, stood with Moses, which alway, as they dyd see his armes to faynt, did vphold them, so that finally the victory came vnto Israel.

By Moses is signified, as sheweth great Clerkes, deuotion.* By Aaron and Hur, the knowledge of Gods doctrine. Which two thinges▪ (deuotion I meane & knowledge) all men had need to haue presently with thē: for deuotion doth eleuate the mind to God: but knowledge doth susteine or vphold the same, that it may with courage continue not falling down, but so alway doth incense and kindle it, that it mounteth vp into the presence of our heauenly father, where they sauour together farre more sweetely then any fumigation either of Iuniper, Incense, or what soeuer els, be they neuer so pleasaunt, doth sauour in any mans nose.

Therefore S. Paule seing howe necessary the knotte of these two, deuotion & knowlege of Gods will was, which is shewed in scripture (as teacheth saynt Cyprian in these wordes: The will of God, sayth he, is that whiche Christe both taught and wrought) Paul, I say, seing this, wished to be excommunicate and separate from God, for to haue the Iewes to come to the knowledge of Christes Church,* which is the onely right waye to saluation, for whome he prayed right studiously, as appeareth a litle after, in the 10. chap. to the Romanes saying: I beare them recorde, that they haue a zeale & deuotion to God, but not according to the knowledge of Christes doctrine.*&c. Where you may clearelye see how the Iewes (as S. Paule which is no lyer, recordeth here) had a zeal & deuotion to God, but they lacked knowledge therewith. Moses was amongst them, but Aaron was away: whose absence payned Paul so sore, that he rauished with exceeding charity, wished no small harme vnto himself, vpon condition that the multitude of thē might be holpen, and haue better iudgement: euen to be separated from God.

It must nedes be thē greatly hurtfull, albeit men haue deuotion to be without the knowledge of God & his law,* signified by Aaron.

S. Paule also before y^t he came to knowledge had such like deuotion himselfe, as he reporteth. Actes. 26. in these wordes: *All the Iewes (quoth he) haue knowne my liuing, that I haue led sith I entred into mans age (which time as I remēber, is accounted from the xvj. or xvij. yeare of a mans life, in Latine he calleth it, adolescentia) which from the beginning thereof, was (sayth he) at Ierusalem among mine owne nation, that did know me afore also from the beginning, if they would say trueth, that I liued after the most straitest order or sect of our religion,*being a Pharisy. And I (quoth Paul a litle after) thought to doe many thinges in fighting agaynst the name of Iesus Christ, yea and did also being at Ierusalem, and I thrust many Sayntes or holy men into prison, hauing power geuen me therto of the high Priestes, and when they shoulde be put to death I gaue sentence: and I (quoth he) was commonlye in all Sinagogues punishing them, and compelling them to blaspheme (as menne are fayne now a daies, when the Bishops make them to abiure: and to deny the trueth of the Gospell) yea more ouer did I (quoth Paule) rage agaynst them, pursuing after them into straunge landes.

See what zeale Paul had to God, afore he was instructed in the doctrine of Christ. He thought to haue pleased god highly in persecuting his seruants, of whom one was S. Steuen. He was then sore blinded through ignorance,* and wanted the assistance of Aaron. But anone, as Christ which is the true Aaron, had appeared to him, asking hym and saying in a lamentable fourme: O Saule, Saule, why doest thou persecute me,* in troubling and striking my seruauntes the members of mine owne body, of whom it is sayd, He that smiteth you, shall smite the tender ball of mine eie: * His hart fell (I dare say) so low as his body, that is, euen downe to the earth, repenting himselfe full sore, being redye to amend, and follow after a new way, as appeareth by hys aunswere, where he sayth: O Lorde what wilt thou haue me to doe? As though one woulde say: Nowe I see all that I thought to haue done afore of good intention, and good purpose or deuotion, hath deceiued me. I finde it otherwise. That which I esteemed good, in very deede is; and was nought.

Teach me therefore good Lord (quoth he) a better way, & amend my iudgement, that mine owne will or intentiō forsakē, I may now follow thine, to please thee, & to do thy will. And so he came to Ananias, by the assignement of Christ, the thick filthines of his olde wayward iudgement, fell away, as appeareth by the drosse or rubbish that came from his eyes, euen like scales, as the Scripture maketh relation, and he put vpon him a new iudgement, which is directed after the strait rule of the Gospell.* Whereby you may see that mens deuotion may oft beguile and seduce thē except knowledge do assist the same, for to susteine & direct it: which knitte together, shall much strengthen men in all trouble and temptations.

So that it is much expedient for all mē as nigh as they may, to haue prayer annexed with knowledge: * & that sheweth full notably Erasmus, in the second passage of Enchiridiō, where he testifieth but of easye liking, that he hath in saying of Mattins,* yea rather contrariwise he sheweth disliking, and so he doth also in his exposition of the fyrst Psalme: Beatus vir, where the text maketh agreeably for the same, it is written in this wise: Blessed is the man that hath not gone after the counsell of the wicked, and hath not stande in the way of sinners, ne sit in the chayre of pestilence,*but hath hys will in the law of God, and shall muse or be occupied in it both day and night.

See howe the Prophete (whiche I doubt not but hee knew as perfectly that will and pleasure of God, as euer did any pope or generall coūsell, or whatsoeuer they were beside, that ordeined long seruice to be sayd of Priestes) testifieth them to be blessed, that study and are exercised in the law of God both day and night, that is to wit, alwayes.* A great promise put of God to such blessed exercise, which we may call right deuotion, or true godlines. For Paule defining godlynnes, sayth thus: Pietas ad omnia vtilis est, vt quae promissiones habeat praesentis vitae & futurae.* That is to wit, Godlynnes is profitable vnto all things,*for that hath annexed thereto, promises of this life present, & of the life to come.

But no such promise is made of God, I am certayne, to them that say dayly mattins. Neither are we certayne by the word of God, that we shal therefore be blessed of him, no more then we are certayne,* that for saying ouer the xv. Oos, euery day once through an whole yeare, we shall apertly see our Lady to ayd vs afore our death, as it is testified in the Scripture of the Primer,* but not by Scripture of the Bible: or that we shall haue a like benefite for saying of her Psalter vpon the ten beades that commeth from the crossed friers, or vpon the fiue beades halowed at y^e Charter house, or fasting our Ladyes fast, as men call it: ne for fasting on the wednesday,* as is shewed by a booke that is allowed to be printed and read of all men that lusteth, for it is neither the new Testament ne the olde.

They are condemned, you wote wel, & I perhaps shal haue a litle lesse fauor because I tell y^e trueth freely, for such thinges are called offense. But would God, that all persons so thinking,* would remember what aunswere Christ made vnto his disciples in the 15. of Math. whē they came vnto him, and warned him to beware saying: You knowe that the Phariseis are offended, hearing such wordes spoken. I will leaue out Christes aunswere, least I should be thought ouer free and plain in taryng or vttering of abusions, and speake no further.

A like demaund with aunswere thereto annexed,* shall you finde in the 11. of Luke, where Christ would not refrayne to speake any deale more easily. Therefore I beseech them that deeme me (God wotteth whether▪ righteously or no) sclaunderously to reuise the sayde places, and Page 1115 thē counsel me to do that shalbe most expedient to folow if their charitie will so require. Yet would I that all people should knowe, that I do not reprove that saying of the xv. Oos, which (so farre •orth as my remembrance doth serue) is a very good praier,* or such like prayers: ne would I that any person shuld think me to disalow any discret fastings, for such, not only present with you, but euen from hence ab|sent, haue I commended in earnest speaking, and so entēd to do by the assistaunce of Gods grace. Neuertheles such vain promises I do abhorre, as be with thē annexed, with the vpholders of the same. For such doe cause vaine confidence in the people, withdrawing and seducing them from the right beleife of the Gospel, (which Christen men ought onely to build their faith vpon) vnto new inuentions of vanitie. S. Paul calleth such, old womens tales, where he writeth vnto Timothe, bidding him to beware of them, & to throw them away.

The Prophete Dauid likewise doth accord therunto, saying: Beatus vir cuius est nomē Domini spes eius & non respexit in vanitates & insanias falsas:^{}Blessed (quoth he) is the mⁿ that hath in the name of God his affiaunce or hope, and hath not looked backe to vanities and false dotages or madnesse. And this I say againe, that the Mattens saying, hath no more promise of God made to the sayers,^{} then hath the other aboue named, for they were institute by the fantasie or mind of men, and not by y^e rule of scripture. Neither do I thinke the priestes which wil truly follow the rule of God, written in the Bible, ought so to be charged or encombred with saying of them, that they thereby should be hindered from y^e study of that, which to know belongeth principally both to their owne soules saluation, and also to the discharge of their dutie, and which God most highly of Priestes doeth require, (I meane the study of his Gospel) whereby they them selues should be spiritually nourished, and thereafter should fede Christes flock, the congregation of his people, according to the saying of our Sauour in Iohn. I (quoth he) am the doore,^{*}whosoever shall come in by me, shal both come in, and goe out, and finde good pasture or feeding. That is to saye, who soever shall enter to be a pastour or Minister in Christes church or congregation by Christ, shal both enter into contemplation of Gods glory declared abundantly in scripture, and after go forth and shew that same abroade to other for their wealth and edifying.

To this accordeth that is written in Luke, whereas our Sauour speaketh to all his Church signified in the person of Saint Peter. Peter (quoth he) I haue prayed that thy faith should not fayle, and thou being conuerted, goe then about to confirme thy brethren So that he would haue Peter stablished first in faith of his sure doctrine,^{} and then to go forth, as he did, to teache other to be grounded in the same likewise. And thus ought all priests to be called Presbyteri, which will be ministers in the Church, for so biddeth S. Peter in his first Epistle, in the last chapter, saying thus: I beseech the Priestes (quoth he) that are among you, I my selfe being a priest, and a witnes bearer of Christes afflictions, and also a partaker of the glory which shalbe reuealed, see that you with all diligence doe feede the flock of Christ taking care of the same,^{}not as enforced thereto, but willingly: not desiring filthy lucre, but with a louing minde: neither as men exercising dominion ouer the children or inheritours of God, but so that you be paternes, or ensample giuers to the flocke. See, how he requireth of priestes that they should spend all their diligence to feede Christes flocke, and to shew good ensample of liuing, making no mention of long Mattens saying, which then were not mentioned nor spoken of.

According to this, it is written in your Decrees after this fourme: ignorance, sayth the Lawe (marke it well I beseeche you al) is the mother of all errors.^{} Which ought to be eschewed especially of Priests, that among the people of God haue taken vpon thē the office of preaching: priests are commaunded to reade holy Scriptures, as sayth Paul the Apostle to Timothe: Giue heede to reading, exhortation,^{}and teaching, and continue alwayes in the same. Let priests therefore knowe holy Scripture, and let all their labour be in preaching and teaching, and let them edifie all men both in knowledge of fayth, and in discipline of good workes.^{} These be the wordes of the lawe in the Decrees Dist. 38. Where you see howe the Lawe lamenteth ignorance in al persons, for it is the original of al errors. God send vs therefore the knowledge of his true gospel.^{} It biddeth that ignorance should be vtterly eschewed, and principally of priestes, whose labour and diligence shoulde be bestowed al in reading of scripture, & preaching the same, bringing in for the same purpose, the saying of the Apostle, which willeth in like manner.

Moreouer it requireth that priests should giue al their study to edifie other in faith and vertuous liuing.* Whereof I do gather both by the saying of the Prophet, that willeth vs to be studyous in the Law of God day and night, and by the saying of the Apostle, whiche woulde haue Timothe to be occupied euer in reading and teaching, and by the report of your owne Lawe, which saith likewise, that a priest ought to bestow al his labor in reading & preaching. So that a priest set thus truely to studye, that hee may stablishe himselfe in the fayth of Christes doctrine, intending after to helpe other with true preaching o• the same, or doing other like deedes of charity, assigned in the law of god, shall not offend deadly, if so spending his time, he omitteth to say Mattens, which is an ordinaunce of men.

Neuertheles concerning the huge multitude of such as be now made priestes by negligent admission of Bishops, and their own presumption,* that labour to be made priests before they be any Clerkes, and ere euer they knowe what is the very office of a priest, do not feare to take vpon them, if they may attayne therto, to be a curate, they recke not of how many, so they may get a good lumpe of mony, neuer minding after that the study of Scripture, a•ter they are come to Dominus vobiscum: for such I doe think long mattens to be needfull, to restrayne them from other enormities that they should else runne in. Of whiche you may be weary to see the experience thereof dayly arising. Yea and if such woulde be content to admit it, I woulde euery one mattens were as long to them as fiue, except they could be stow theyr time better.

In the 26. where you doe aske, whether I beleeeue that the heades or rulers by necessity of saluation are bounde to geue vnto the people,* holy scripture in their mother language? I say, y^t I think they are bound to see that the people may truely know holy Scripture, & I do not knowe, how that may be done so well,* as by geuing it to them truly translated in the mother tongue, that they may haue it by thē at al times to passe y^e time godly, when soeuer they haue leysure thereto, like as they haue in Fraunce vnder y^e French kings priuelege,* & also with the priuiledge of the Emperour, and so do I knowe that they haue had it these 50. yeres and 4. in Fraunce at the least, and it was translated at the request of a king called I trowe, Lewes, as appeareth by the priueledge put in the beginning of the book.

In like manner haue they it in Flanders, printed with y^e priueledge of the Emperour. In almayne also and Italy & I suppose through all nations of Christendōe. Likewise hath it bene in England,* as you may finde in the Englishe story called Polychronicon. There it is shewed, how whē y^e Saxons did inhabite the land, the K. at that tyme, which was a Saxon, did himselfe translate the Psalter into the language that then was generally vsed. Yea I haue seene a booke at Crowland Abbey, whiche is kept there for a relique, the booke is called S. Guthlakes Psalter, and I ween verily it is a copy of the same, that the king did translate, for it is neither English, Latine, Greeke, Hebrue, nor Dutch, but somewhat sounding to our English, and as I haue perceiued sith the time I was last there, being at Ant'werpe, the Saxon tongue doth sound likewise after ours, and it is to ours partly agreable. In the same story of Polychronicon is also shewed,* howe that S. Bede did translate the Gospell of Iohn into Englishe, and the author of the same booke promised that he would translate into English all the Bible, yea and perhaps hee did so, but (I wot not howe it commeth to passe) all suche thinges be kept away. They may not come to light, for there are some walking priuily in darckenes, that will not haue theyr doyngs knowen. It is no lye that is spoken in the Gospel of Iohn Omnis qui male agit, odit lucem: All that doth noughtily,* hateth the light, and will not haue theyr doynges knowne. And therefore they keepe downe the light strongly: for that opened and generally knowne,* all wrongfull conueyance should anone be disclosed and reprooued, yea and all men shuld see anone, whether those that hold agaynst vnrighteousnes, being therfore sometime horribly infamed & sclandered, named heretickes and schismatickes, were in deede as they be called or no.

Yea, moreouer I did once see a booke of the new Testament,* whiche was not vnwritten by my estimation thys C. yeares, and in my minde, right well translated after the example of that which is read in the church in Latine. But he that shewed it me, sayd, he durst not be knowne to haue it by him, for manye had bene punished aforetime, for keeping of such, and were conuict therefore of heresie.

Moreouer I was at Paules Crosse, when the newe Testamēt imprinted of late beyond the sea,* was first forefended, & truely my hart lamented greatly, to heare a great man preaching agaynst it, whiche shewed foorth certayne thinges that he noted for hideous errors to be in it, that I yea, and not I, but likewise did many other thinke verily to be none. But (alacke for pittie) malice can not say well. God helpe vs all and amend it.

Page 1116So that to conclude, I thinke verily it were profitable and expedient, that the holy Scripture were deliuered by authority of the head rulers, vnto the people truly trāslated in the vulgar tongue, in like maner as it is in all other countries. And whereas you adde, whether they be bound by necessitie of saluation, to deliuer it to y^e people? I wil not so narrowly touch that point now, but I say, that they are bound by right & equity, to cause it to be deliuered vnto the people in the vulgar tongue, for their edifying & consolation, which the people by Gods grace, should therof gather, that now it is like they want, & are destitute of.

In the .xxvij. where you doe demaunde, whether it be lawful for the rulers, for some cause, vpon their reasonable aduisement,* to ordein that y^e Scripture should not be deliuered vnto y^e people, in the vulgar language? al men may here see, that whosoever deuised these questions, thought not contrary (whatsoever they will yet say) but that it is good for the people to haue the Scripture in the vulgare tongue,* & that they thought, that I so saying could not be wel reproued, and therefore are laid out al these additions, as it were to snare and trappe me in: whether the heades be bound, and that by necessity of saluation, to deliuer it to the people: and whether for opportunitie of time, they may ordeyne to restraine it for some cause, and by some reasonable aduisement of them taken. Sed frustra iacitur rete ante oculos pennatorum:.*But without cause you spread the nette before the eyes of the byrdes or foules. I shewe you plainly, that notwithstanding all these thinges, in mine opinion, it was not well done to inhibite it, and woorse, that the Bishoppes haue not sith amended it, if so be they could, that the people might haue it to vse & occupie vertuously.

And here I will adde one reason. The Scripture is the spiritual foode and sustenance of mans soule. This is shewed to be true in many places of Scripture: like as other corporal meat is the foode of the body.* Then it he be an vnkinde father that keepeth bodily meate awaye the space of a weke or a moneth frō his children, it should seme that our bishops be no gentle pastors or fathers, that kepe away the foode of mens soules frō them (specially when other do offer the same) both mōthes, yeres, & ages. Neyther do I see any oportunitie of time, or reasonable aduisement, that should cause it to be withdrawn & taken away, but the contrary rather: for it is reson cōuenient & needfull for men to eate their meate euer whē they are right hūgry, & blessed are they that hūger & thirst after the word of god, which teacheth to know him, and to do his pleasure at all times: * for that we doe craue euey day in our Pater noster saying: Giue vs Lord our heauenly bread.

In the .xxviiiij. where you doe aske, whether I beleeeue that consecratiōs, halowings, & blessings vsed in y^e church are to be prayسد? * I say that I know not of al, & therfore I wil not dispraise thē, neither can I therfore ouer much speake of them al, seeing I know them not: such as are the halowing of belles, the halowing of pilgrims, when they should go to Rome, the halowing of beades, and such like. But those which I am aduised of and do remember, * be in myne opinion, good: such as is this. When the prieste hath consecrated holy bread, he saith: Lord blesse this creature of bread, as thou did blesse the fiue loaves in desart, that all persons tasting therof may receiue health, &c. whiche I would euey man might say in English, * when he shuld go to meate, I like it so well.

Also this is a right good one, that is sayd ouer him that shal read the Gospell: The Lord be in your hart & in your mind and mouth, * to pronounce and shew forth his blessed gospel. Which is also spoken ouer a preacher taking benediction, when he shall go into a pulpite. Al such good thinges I like very well, and thinke them commendable, wyshing therfore y^t al people might know what they meane, that they with reioice of hart might pray ioyfully with vs, and delight in al goodnes: which should be, if they were vttered in English, according to the minde of Saint Paule 1. Cor. 9. where he wisheth, rather to speake fiue woordes in the Church hartily with vnderstanding, whereby other might haue instruction, * then tenne thousand wordes in a tongue vnknown. Yea, to say truth, and truth it is in deede, that I shall say: a good thing, the further and the more largely or apertly it is knowen, the further the vertue thereof spreadeth, and rooteth in mens hearts and remembraunce. God send therefore the blinde to see, and the ignoraunt to haue knowledge of all good thinges.

Thus I conclude that consecrations, halowings, and blessings vsed in the Churche (so farre foorth as I remember and knowe) be commendable. Of other I can giue no sentence wishing euen as I trust men shall once see it come to passe, that all good thinges may be song and spoken in our vulgar tongue.

In the xxix. where you do aske, whether I beleeeue that the Pope may make lawes and statutes to binde all Christen men to the obseruance of the same, * vnder the payne of deadly sinne, so that such lawes and statutes be not cōtrary to the law of God? I say, * that if it be true that is written in the Decrees, that is to wit: Lawes be neuer confirmed vntill they be approued by common maners of thē that shal vse them: then can not the Popes lawes bind all Christen men: for the Greekes, and the Bohemes will (as you do know ful wel) neuer admit them, but do refuse thē vtterly, so that I do not finde, that his lawes may bind all Christen men.

Finally, I can not see, that he hath authority to make lawes, binding men to the obseruance of them vnder pain of deadly sinne, more then hath the king or the Emperour: and to say soth, I say (as I haue said afore) I thinke verily that the Churche was more full of vertue before the Decrees or Decretals were made (which is not very long agoe, but in the time of Constantine, if it be true that is reported in the Decrees Dist. 15. ca Canones generalium,) then it hath bene sith: God repayre it, and restore it again to the auncient puritie and perfection.

In the xxx. where you do aske, whether I beleuee that the Pope and other prelats and their deputies in spiritual thinges, haue power to excommunicate Priestes, and laye people that are inobedient and sturdy, from entring into y^e church, and to suspend or let them from ministration of the Sacramentes of the same? I thinke, that the Pope and other prelates haue power to excommunicate both priests and lay men, such as be rebellious against the ordinance of God, and disobedient to his law, for such are sundred from God, afore the prelates do giue sentence, by reason of their sinne and contumacie, according as it is said in Esay by almighty God: *Your sinnes (quoth he) do make diuision betwixt you and me. And the Prelates by right iudgement, should pronounce of sinners as they do find them, and that is, to pronounce such to be excommunicat of God, and vnworthy to minister any Sacramentes, or to be conuersant with Christen folke, that will not amende. * For thus biddeth Paul. 1. Corinth. 5. If any amongst you called a brother, shall be a whoremonger, or a couetous person, or a worshipper of images or Idolles, or a rayler, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, see that with such you eate no meate. Such ought to bee put out of the Church, and not be suffered to come within it.

I am not certaine that Prelats haue any such power, * And though they had, I doubt whether charitie shoulde permit them to shew it forth and execute it without singular discretion. For in Churches ought the word of God to be declared and preached, through the whiche the sturdy comming thither and hearing it, might soone be smitten with compunction and repentance, and thervpon come to amendement. This confirmeth well a lawe made in the Councel of Carthage, which is this: A Bishop ought to prohibite no person to come into the Church, and to heare the word of God, whether he be Gentile or Iewe, or heretike, vntil the masse time of them that are called Catechumini de Conse. distinct. 1.

Moreouer, where you speake of Prelates Deputies, I thinke suche be but little behoueable to Christes flocke. It were necessary and right, * that as the Prelates themselues wil haue the reuenues, tythes, & oblations of their benefices, they them selues should labour and teache diligently the word of God therefore, and not to shift the labor from one vnto an other, til all be leaft (pitie it is) vndone. Such doth S. Iohn call, Fures & latrones: Theeues and murtherers, although they make neuer so goodly a worldly shew outward, and beare a stout porte.

This I saye that the Pope and other prelates haue power to excommunicate rebels against Gods ordinance, and to suspend them frō receiuing or ministring the sacrament, but I am not sure, that they haue power to forefend them from out of Churches, especially when Gods word is there preached, vnles the sinners be so sore desperat, that they scorne the same. And I would, that euery Prelate receauing his liuing of benefices, * should him selfe worke in the same, specially in true preaching of Christes doctrine, without winding his owne necke out of the yoke, & charging therwith, other called deputies or Uicars, Curates, and suce lyke. For God would haue euery man to get his liuing by sweate of his owne face, that is to say, by his labour, according to his estate and calling. And like as euery workeman is worthy his meate: so contrariwise they that labour not, vnlesse they be let by impotencie, are worthy to haue no meate, and much lesse to take of those, to whom they do no seruice .50. or 40. pounce a yeare, for wayting after none other thing, then the Moone shining in the water. The Canon law maketh clearely with the same.

Looke in the Decrees, Cap. 21. quest. 2. Capitulo precipimus, and you Page 1117 shall finde plainly, as I say.

¶In the xxxj. where you aske, whether faith only with out good workes, may suffice vnto a man fallen into sinne after his Baptisme,* for his saluation and iustifying? I say, that it is the vsage of Scripture to say, that faith onely doeth iustifie and worke saluation, afore a man do any other good works, and that is shewed by many authorities both of scripture, & also of many holy Fathers, in a treatise called Vnio dissidentium, which I would to Christ, as it is in French, and other languages, we had it truly translated in English.* And truely I do thinke in this matter (like as is here shewed by many authorities of holy fathers) that a mā fallē into sinne after Baptisme, shalbe sauēd through faith, and haue forgiuenes by Christs passion, although he doth no more good deeds thereafter: as when a mā hauing short lyfe, lacketh leasure to exercise other deeds of mercy. Notwithstanding, true fayth is of such vertue and nature, that when oportunitie commeth, it can not but work plenteously deeds of charity, which are a testimony and witnes bearers of a mans true faith. This declareth S. Augustine vpon Iohn. I trowe it is where he expoundth this text: Si diligitis me,*precepta mea seruare: If you loue me keepe my commaundementes.. Whereas within a little after he speaketh in this wise, Opera bona non faciunt iustum, sed iustificatus facit bona opera. That is to say, good workes make not a iust or righteous man, but a man once iustified, doth good workes.

¶In the xxxij. where you aske, whether a Priest marying a wife, & that without the dispensation of the Pope, & begetting also children of her without slaunder giuing,* do sinne deadly? I say, that he doth not so much offende, as those, which in Wales (as I haue heard say) and also in many partes beyōd the Sea, or rather in all places, do giue openly dispensations for money, to Priestes to take concubines: neither doth he offende so much, as the purchasers of such dispensations: for they on euery hand, do clearly cōmit fornication and aduoutry, vtterly forefended by Gods law, and the Priest, of whom speaketh your demaund, offendeth but mans law, if he do that. For in the Decrees it is written, I weene it be in a glose, and certainly I wote not whether it be in the text or no,* I can lightly turn to it hauing a booke. The sentence is thus: Presbyter fornicans est plus puniendus quàm vxorem ducens. That is to say, a priest doing fornicatiō, ought to be punished more, thē one which hath married a wife. Finally I thinke such a priest as before is named in your demaunde, sinneth not deadly.

¶In the xxxiiij, where you aske, whether a Latin Priest, after he hath taken the order of Priesthode, being sore and oft troubled and stirred with prickings of lust or lechery, & therefore marying a wife for a remedy of the same, do sinne deadly? I say, that a Latin Priest, and a Greeke Priest is al one before God, if they folow both one rule of Christ, left to vs in holy Scripture: neither doth Christ put any such difference: but the one hath by that rule the same libertye, y^t an other, and no more nor lesse, for there is the same God i• Greece,* that is here: & hath left one way for vs to liue after, both here and there. And therefore, I can not see by his law, but that a Latin Priest may mary, as wel as they do. And if the Greeks should not folow Christes law in beleuing the same, and liuing thereafter, you would call them heretickes. But that will not the Pope haue done. Wherefore seeing they do let Priests mary, affirming it may so be done by the law of God, and yet are not reputed heretiks: why should other mē that say the same, be called heretiks: or be therefore burned? Therefore, folowing the law of God I make the same answere of a Latin Priest, that I made before of all Priestes, that a Priest not hauing the gift of chastity, is bound to mary, for auoyding fornication. ¶In the xxxiiij. where you do aske, whether euer I praied for Iohn wickleffe,* Iohn Hus. and for Hierome of Prage condemned of heresie in the Councell of Constance, or for any one of them, sith they died, and whether I haue openly or secretly done any deedes of charitie for them, affirming them to be in blisse and saued? I say, that I neuer prayed for any of them, so farre foorth as I can remember. And though I had, it foloweth not, that in so doing I shoulde be an hereticke.* For you note well, that there is a mightie great countrie called Boheme, which yet do follow (as mē say) that same doctrine which Iohn Hus and Hierome of Prage taught their Auncetors, whom (as I trowe) neyther the Pope nor you do recount heretikes and infidels.

¶In the 35. where you aske, whether I haue recounted and sayd them or any of them to be Saintes, and worshipped them as Saintes? I say, that in such secre•e and hidde thinges,* which I doe not perfectly knowe, I followe the Councel of Paul, which biddeth that we should not iudge ouer soone, but to abide (vnlesse the thinges, whiche we should passe vpon, be the more euident) vntill the cōming of the Lord which shall illumine and shewe foorth clearely thinges, that now lye hid in darcknes. Therefore hetherto haue I neither iudged with them, ne agaynst them, but haue resigned suche sentence to the knowledge and determination of God, whose iudgement I wotte is infallible.

And where as you say, they were condemned of heresie in the Councel of Constance, if so the counsell did right, God shall allow it (I doubt not) and that shall suffice to haue commendation of him: So that it is not neede to aske of me, whether the acts of the same are cōmendable or no? Neither cā I geue any direct answer therto: for I do not verily know thē. And though I did, yet am not I verily perswaded, that I because the Councell hath condemned them, must therefore beleue them to be damned: for a Coūcell (as I weene) may sometime slip beside the right truth but what that Councell did in condemning them,* I can not precisely say: God worteth. Yea and that one singular person may iudge more rightly, then a great multitude assembled in a Counsel, appeareth both by Gods law, and by the law of man. Experience hereof may you see by the Councell that is spoken of in the 11. of Iohn, where is shewed, that after our sauour had restored Lazarus to life the bishops and Phariseis then were gathered in a Coūcell saying: what shall we doe? Truth it is, that this man Iesus doth many miracles, and if wee suffer him thus all the world will beleue him, whereupon the Romaines will come, and put vs out of Ierusalē our dwelling place,* and destroy our nation. At which time Cayphas did arise, shewing forth his sentence, which the whole Councell did admitte.

In likewise is shewed Actes. v. where in a Councell of the Bishops and Priestes assembled to know what punishment should be done vnto Christes Apostles,* for because they preached in the name of Christ, contrary to the precept of them (for they before had commaūded the Apostles no more to speake in Christes name) there among a shrewde multitude of them, gathered together, did arise a certaine wise man, called Gamaliel (a pitifull thyng verely to see but one good man in such a great Conuocation or Coūcell of Priests, y^t shuld be y^e lightes of vertue to all the people) which Gamaliel was a Doctour of the law, & had in good reputation among y^e people:* much like he was (as seemed to me) to Doct. Collet sometye Deane of Paules in London) while hee lyued. I may come no neare for to name some other of our tyme, least I should bee thought offensiue. This Gamaliell did byd the Apostles go aside, for a while, out of the Councell or conuocation house, & so he spake vnto the other Priestes or Bishops in the Councell thus: You men (quoth he) of Israell, take heede to your selues what you shall do vpon these men the Apostles.*For afore this tyme haue risen one called Teudas, and after him an other named Iudas of Galilee, which haue turned the people after them: and in conclusion they perished, and all they that followed after them vanished away. And now (quoth he) I say vnto you, refrayne from hurtyng these men, the Apostles, and let them alone, or suffer thē. For if this enterprise and worke that they haue made, be of men, vndoubtedly it shall perishe, & be fordone: but if (quoth he) it be of God, you cā not fordoe it. And this I tell you (sayd Gamaliell) least you should be founde to striue and fight agaynst God.

Unto this sentence of Gamaliel did all the other of the conuocation or Parliament agree, and so they called in the Apostles of Christ afore them, causing them to be scourged and charging them, no more after to preache of Christes name, and so did let them depart. This was vndoubtedly done in the tyme of our Sauour and of his Apostles,* and caused to be written for our comfort and learnyng: For the holy Ghost knew afore, that like practise should come in y^e latter tyme of the world, which we are in. Whereby you may clearly see, that Coūcels do not alway discern with Christ, but sometyme they may do agaynst him. And therefore sayd Dauid: Non sedi cum cōcilio vanitatis,* & cum iniquē agentibus non introibo. Odiui Ecclesiam malignantium, & cum impijs nō sedebo: sed lauabo inter innocentes manus meas. &c.*I did not (quoth Dauid) sitte with the assembly or Coūcell of vayne doers, or lyers, and I will not go in amōgest them that worke iniquitie: for I hate the conuocation of thē, that are malicious, or maligners, and amōgest the wicked will not I sit: But I will wash my handes among innocentes &c.

Also, in an other Psalme he writeth thus: Dominus dissipat concilia gentium, reprobat concilia populorum, & concilia Principum: Cōcilium autem Domini, in aeternum manet. &c. The Lord (quoth he) doth destroy or annihilate the Coūcell of the Gentiles,he reproueth the Councils of the people and of rulers. But the Council or deuise of the Lord endureth euer, & the purpose of his minde abideth into the world of worldes. For that purpose doth S. Peter in the Actes of the Apostles alledge this verse out of the Psalme: Quare Page 1118 fre muerunt gentes, &c. Why did the Gentiles rage, and the people imagine vayne thinges, &c. Like vnto this is written Esay. 1. Also you may see in the Councils of the Pharises aboue shewed, that one singular persō may sometime perceiue a thing more then a generality or a multitude: for only Gamaliel did see better what was behouable,* thē could all the other there congregate.

Agreeable vnto this wee finde in the Decrees Dist. 31. where it is written, that the Councell of Nice, willing to correct or amende the life of men of the Church, ordeined lawes called Canons or rules. And as they treated vpon such ordinaunces, some thought it erpedient to bring in a law, that Byshops, Priestes, Deacons, and Subdeacons should not ly with their wiues, whom they had married afore they were consecrate into the order. With that arose Paphnutius a Confessor of Christ,* and gaynsayde it, testifying that marriage was an honorable thing: saying also, that it is chastitie for a man to lye with his owne proper wife. And so he perswaded the council, that they should cōstitute no such lawe,* affirming, that it was a sore matter, that they were minded to do, which should be, either to the priests, or els to their wiues, an occasion of fornicatiō: and this was Paphnutius reason. The wordes of the Canon proceede thus.

This declared Paphnutius, he neuer being married, nor hauing experience of Mariage, & y^e Councell commended his sentence, making no statute in this matter, but put it to euery mans free wil and libertie, without any enforcemēt or necessitie. These wordes stand (as I haue recited them vnto you) written in the Decrees, albeit they are somewhat otherwise rehearsed In historia tripartita, as I haue shewed before in the fourth Article. Upon, this, that Paphnutius did thus resiste and preuaile against all the other Councel, doth the Glose note in the same law: * that one singular per'son may gaynesay or speake against an vniuersal generaltie, hauing a reasonable cause on his side. Suffrage also of the same haue we in Abbot Panormitane, where he sayth thus: I wold (quoth he) rather beleue one lay person, bringing for him authoritie of scripture, thē an vniuersal Coūcell that ordeineth or defineth a thing, without scripture.

Finally I say, that I neuer recounted them neither Saintes, ne deuils, but resigned the iudgement thereof to God, neither haue I in earnest reported thē the one, or the other. Neither haue done vnto them particular worship so farre forth, as I can remember,

*¶In the xxxvj. where you do aske, whether I beleue hold, and affirme that euery generall Councel, & the Coūcel of Constaūce also do represent the vniuersal congregation or Church? I say y^t what such Councils doe represent, * I cannot certainly rel, and therfore beleue neither yea, nor nay, neither can I thefore make any affirmation pro, & contra, with this demaund, or against it: and no maruell. For I know of no Scripture to certifie me of the same, ne yet any sufficient reason. And me thinketh this (vnder correction I speake) y^e Councils might represent (albeit I know not whether they do or no) the vniuersal church, not being yet the same, as I wot wel they neither are ne were: For the Church I do take for to be al those, that God hath chosen or predestinate to be inheritours of eternall blisse & saluation, * whether they be temporall, or spirituall, king, or subiect, Bishop, or Deacon, father or child, Grecian or Romaine. * And this Church spreadeth through the vniuersall world, whereas any do cal for help truly vpon the name of Christ: and there do they euer most grow & assemble commonly, where as his blessed word is purely & openly preached, & declared, for that is the reliefe of mans soule, wherunto all men louing their soules health, lust to resort & seek (as all thinges do naturally seeke after that, which should nourish and prolong their life) for in it is shewed, that righ'teousnes, which whosoever doth thirst after, and is an hun'gred for, shal come in the kingdom of heauen. Of this may wel the Prouerbe in the Gospel (although it be applied to the iudgement of God, * when he shal appeare in y^e generall, dome) be verified where soeuer is a dead carion, thether will soone be assembled Egles. That is to wit, wheresoeuer is declared by the course of Scripture, the benefites and commodities graunted to vs by Christs death, thether wil mē seke and flye, to know how they may enioy & attain them, which I beseech him to graunt vs. Amen.

¶In the xxxvij. where you do aske, whether I beleue that the same thing, * which the Councell of Constance representing the vniuersal Church hath approued and doeth approue for the maintenance of faith and soules health, is to be approued, * and holden of all Christen people: and that which the same Councell hath condemned and doth condemne, to be contrary to faith and good maners, ought of y^e same christen people to be beleued and affirmed for a thing condemned? I say, that whatsoeuer the same Councell, or any other haue aproved, being approbation or allowance worthy, is of al Christen people to be likewise approued, holden, & allowed. And again, whatsoeuer the same or any other hath condemned, being reprove & condēnation worthy, for because it is hurtful to faith, or good liuing, I say, the same ought of al Christē people to be condemned & reprobued. But this surmounteth my knowledge, to discerne, in what wise their iudgement passed: whether with right, or vnright, for because I neuer looked vpon their Acts, nei|ther do I greatly coue• for to do: wherefore I referre the determinatiō to them, y^t haue better aduised their doings, and thereby haue some more skill in them, then I.

In the xxxviii. you demaund, whether the condemnations of Iohn Wickleffe, Iohn Hus,* and of Hierome of Prage, done vpon their persons, bookes, and documentes, by the holy generall Councel of Constance, were duly and rightfully done, and so for such, of euery Catholike person, whether they are to be holden and surely to be affirmed? I aunswer, that it passeth my knowledge, and I can not tel: thinking surely, y^t though I am ignoraunt of the same, so y^t I cannot discusse the thing determinately, yet my Christendom shalbe therefore neuerthelesse, and that I and all Christen men may well suspend our sentence being thereof ignorant, affirming neither the one, ne the other, neither yea, nor nay.

In the xxxix. you ask whether I beleue hold, & affirm that Iohn Wickleffe of England, Iohn Hus of Boheme,* and Hierome of Prage, were heretickes, and for hereticks to be named, and their books and doctrines to haue ben & now be peruerse, for the which books & pertinacie of their persons, they are condemned by the holy Councel of Constance for heretikes? I say, that I know not determinately whether they be heretikes or no, ne whether their books be erroneous or no, ne whether they ought to be called heretickes or no.

¶In the xl. where you aske, whether I beleue and affirme, that it is not lawful in any case, to sweare? I say,* y^t I neither so do beleue, ne affirme, ne neuer did.

¶In the xli. where you aske, whether I beleue, that it is lawful at the commandement of a iudge, to make an oth to say the truth, or any other othe in a case conuenient, and that also for purgation of infamy,* I answere that I neuer saide the contrary: but that I thinke and haue thought it lawful to giue an oth afore a iudge, to say the truth, if the iudge so require, and that by request lawful and conueniēt. As when a thing is in controuersie betwixt two persons, and therupon they sue vnto a iudge for sentence, when the iudge can none otherwise boulte out the truth, he may require an oth. As when the two women, which contended before Salomon, to auoyde the cryme of murther, which the one had comitted in oppressing her child to death, and would haue put the same vpon the other,* if Salomon could not by his wisdome otherwise haue inuestigated the truth, he might (I suppose) for to come by the more certaine information of the thing, haue caused one of them or both, seing it expedient for him, to sweare, wherein the women had bene bound to obey him. But Iudges haue neede to be spare in requiring of othes: For in custorable or oft Iuries, creepeth in alway betwixt times some periury, as sheweth Chrisostome in wordes semblable to these, and thinges precious, through oft haunt or occupying, loseth their estimation. And so reuerent othes vnaduisedly required for euery trifle vsually, do cause men to regard little for making of them, yea, and I feare, to breake them.

Therefore in Almaine, they haue made of late (as I haue hard say by credible persōs▪ which haue come from thence) many notable ordinances for the cōmon wealth within a while, & amongst other this is one: If a man be set for to enter plea against another in any town, the Peeres therof afore whom al actions are vsed to be debated, hearing such a plea entred, shal cal the parties priuately together, before they come into any open Court. And the matter examined, they shal exhort them to let the plea ceasse without further processe, shewing them y^e great damage both godly and worldly, comming of waging the law, and the great cast and commoditie, that is in agreement and concord.* Which exhortation they vse to shew with so great grauity, and fatherly loue (such wonders are wrought where the Gospell hath free passage that very few will commence plea.* And though any plea be commēced, through such sage admonition it falleth lightly to sequestration and arbitrement of neighbours, who do set the suters at vnitie, ere the matter do come to discussion in open Court.

Notwithstanding if some be so weiwardly minded (as in a multitude al are not one mans children, & therefore vnlike of intent) that they will needes proceede and follow y^e law, they shal be heard to speak their matters in opē court, and taught as the matter is most like to succede, counsailed Page 1119 with new exhortation to stoppe their processe. If they will not be perswaded, & then the Iudges seeing the matter so ambiguous y^t they cannot giue perfect sentence therin,* except by vertue of an othe made by one of the parties, they be first better certified. Then wil they shew the same before the suters, declaring what a chargeful thing it is to giue a solēne oth for loue of winning some worldly profit: & how (vnlesse such as shal make it, ne y^e better ware to eschew the same) they shal (beside an euil ensāple giuing to a multitude) work thēselues happily shame or dishonesty.

Upon this, they shal giue respite vntil a certaine day appointed. So that in the meane while the suters may take deliberation thereof, what is best to be done. If after this, they wil not thus rest, at the day appointed, shal they come forth into a common place, and the great Bel of the Citie caused to be rōg, whereby the people shalbe warned, what they are about to do: and the people assembled, the Iudges shal in full chargeable & lamentable wise, charge the parties, vnder vertue of their othe, to make true relation of y^e shalbe demaunded. So y^t by reason of soberly & fatherly exhortations made of the Iudges or Peeres of the Towne, and perswasion of neighbours, and for auoyding of Gods displeasure,* and shame of men there is litle sute in courts: & if at any time, any be made, they be lightly stopped. So that Iurie and swearing is well excluded and neede not much to be required.

This haue I shewed because it pitieth me to heare and see the contrary vsed in some of our nation,* & such also as name themselues spiritual men, and should be head Ministers of the Church, who incōtinent as any man commeth before them, anone they cal for a book, and do mone him to sweare, without any longer respite, yea & they wil charge him by vertue of the contentes in the Euangely, to make true relation of all that they shall demaunde him, he not knowing what they will demaunde, neither whether it be lawfull to shew them the truth of their demaundes or no? For such things there be that are not lawful to be shewed. As if I were accused of fornication, & none could be found in me, or if they shold require me to sweare to bewray any other that I haue known to offend in that vice,* I suppose it were expedient to holde me stil, & not to folow their wil, for it should be contrary to charitie, if I should so assent to bewray them, that I neede not, and to whom perhappes, though I haue known them to offend, yet trusting of their amendment, I haue promised afore to keepe their fault secret without any disclosing of the same. Yea, moreouer, if suche Iudges sometime not knowing by anye due prooffe that such as haue to do afore them,* are culpable wil enforce them by an othe, to detecte themselues in opening before them their harts: in this so doing, I can not see that men neede to condescende in their requestes. For it is in the law (but I wotte not certainly the place) thus.* Nemo tenetur prodere semetipsum, that is to say: No man is bound to bewray himselfe. Also in another place of y^e law it is written: Cogitationis poenam nemo patiatur: No man should suffer punishment of men for his thought. To this agreeth the common Prouerbe, that is thus: Cogitationes liberae sunt à vectigalibus.* That is to say, thoughtes be free and neede to pay no tole. So that to conclude, I thinke it lawfull, at the commandement of a Iudge, to make an othe, to say the truth, specially if a Iudge requireth an othe duely, and in lawful wise, or to make an oth in any other case conueniēt, and that also for purgation of infamie,* when any infamie is lawfully layd against a man.

¶In the xliij. where you aske, whether a Christen person despising the receite of the Sacramentes of confirmation, extreame vnction, or solemnising of Matrimony, do sinne deadly? I say like of the recite of them, as I haue sayd before of the selfe thinges and none otherwise.

¶In the xliij. where you aske, whether I beleue, that S. Peter was Christes Uicare, hauing power vpon earth to binde & lose? I say, that I do not perceiue clearely what you meane by this terme Uicare:. For Christ neuer called Peter, ne none other so in Scripture. If you meane thereby, that after the departing hence of Christ, when he was risen from death in his immortall body, and so styed into heauen, whereas he remayneth sitting vpon y^e right hand of his Father, that he so being away from hence, S. Peter occupied his rounge: then I say, it is not vntrue but Peter in a manner (which I shal shew here vnder) was his Uicar, and like as Peter was his Uicar, euen so was Paule, and the other Apostles, and the one no lesse then the other if it be true,* that S. Cyprian doth write: whiche is also consenting to Scripture, he sayth thus: That Christe spake vnto Peter saying: I say (quoth our Sauour,) that thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke of stone shall I builde my congregation, and the gates of hel shal not ouercome it. To thee will I giue the keies of heauen, & what thinges thou shalt binde vpon earth, the same shalbe bounde also in heauen: and what so euer thou shalt lose vpon earth, shalbe losed also in heauen. And to him after his resurrection doth Christ say: feed my sheepe.

And albeit that hee gaue equall power vnto all his Apostles after his resurrection, and saith:like as my Father sent me, do I also send you: Take you the holy ghost: If you shal retayne to any man his sinnes, they shalbe retayned: If you shal remitte to any man his sinne, to him they shalbe remitte. Neuerthelesse, because he woulde declare vnitie,* he ordayned by his authoritie; the originall of the same vnitie beginning of one. The other Apostles truely were the same that Peter was, induced with equall partaking both of honor and authoritie, or power,* but the beginning commeth of one that the congregation shoulde be shewed to be one. These are the wordes of Cyprian in a treatise that is called, De simplicitate Praelatorum, wherein you may see that Christ made all the Apostles of equal honour and like authoritie. Notwithstanding because he would testifie the vnitie of his Church or Congregation, he spake,* as it were alonely vnto Peter, when he sayd: feede my sheepe: And I shall geue thee Peter, the keyes of heauen: but in so saying, though the wordes seeme spoken to Peter onely, yet they were spoken vnto him,* in that hee sustayned the generall person of all the Church, being as it were a common speaker for the same. So that in speaking to him, Christ spake vnto all other the Apostles, vnto whome also he gaue all the same authoritie, that he gaue vnto Peter, as you may see both in these wordes of Cyprian, and also the same is clearely shewed out of S. Augustine in diuers places,* but no where more playnly in a few wordes then in a treatise called de Agone Christiano.

To this accordeth well that is writtē of Paule, Gal. 2. Ab his qui videbantur aliquid esse: quales aliquando fuerunt, nihil mea refert &c.* Of those Apostles (quoth Paule) which seemed to be of authoritie, I was not taught (what they were in tyme passed, it skilleth me nothing: God regardeth not the exterior appearaunce of man) neuerthelesse they whiche appeared to be of price, shewed me no learning, nor gaue me no counsell. But contrary, when they had seene that the Gospell of vncircumcision was committed vnto me, like as the Euangely of circumcision was vnto Peter for hee that was mightier then Peter concerning the Apostleship toward the Iewes was mighty also in me toward the Gentiles: Therefore, when Iames, Peter, and Ioh. which appeared to be as pillars, knew the grace geuen me, they gaue vnto me and Barnabe their right handes in signes of fellowship to be their partners, so that we shoulde exercise the office of Apostles among the Gentiles, as they dyd among the Iewes. Wherein you may clearely see, that Paule tooke no instruction of them whiche seemed to be in hygh authoritie, and that Peter Iames, and Iohn, which were noted principals, tooke Paule and Barnabas to be theyr mates and fellowes. Which they woulde not haue done (I suppose, if they had knowne,* that God had granted to thē a prerogative singular to excell Paule, and to be his soueraigne: but according to the prerogative of God granted, they might safely haue shewed it, and enioyed y^e same: like as they did reioyce in other benefites graunted to them of God, to be ministers in his churche for the edifying of the same: and as S. Iohn calleth himselfe the Disciple loued of his maister Iesus, and testifieth, how that vnto him Christ hanging vpon the Crosse, did commit his blessed mother.

Moreouer, if these three Apostles, Iames, Peter, and Iohn, should haue by humilitie, left out to make mention of their prerogative,* when they tooke Paule and Barnabas into their fellowship: yet is it to be thought that Paule which vseth neuer any inordinate arrogancie, writing the wordes aboue sayd for the magnifying of his owne priuiledge and authority geuen him of God, woulde not haue suppressed and passed ouer their primacie vnspeakē of, with whome hee maketh here comparison: for then it might be thought he were enuious, and to pyke away authority frō other to himselfe vnlawfull: that cannot so be. Moreouer he saith a little after the wordes afore rehearsed,* that he reprobud S. Peter euen before his face. Wherupon S. Hierome expounding the same Epistle, saith (as I remember) that Paule woulde not haue bene bolde so to do,* except he had knowne himselfe equall to Peter.

In the words also of Paule aboue written, this might be noted, as seruing to my purpose, that Peter had no pree'minence or primacy aboue the other, for Iames is named afore hym, which Paule would not haue done,* (I thinke) knowing Peter to be Iames superiour. Therefore he making no such variety in order, put Iames afore saying: And Iames, Peter and Iohn, that appeared the principals (quoth he) gaue vnto me and to Barnabe their right handes in signe of fellowship. Yet notwithstanding Paule loued good order Page 1120 (I suppose) as wel as any y^t now are, which contendeth so sore for superiour rouins & preeminencie claiming to be y^e Apostles successours. I wold it were so much for the common wealth of Christen people,* as it is suspect that they do it for vayne glory, and worldly lucre. According to this, shal you find. Acts xj. where is shewed, th•rafter Peter by instinct of the holy Ghost, had gone vnto one of the Gentiles called Cornelius a pety Captaine, hauing the gouernaunce of an hundreth men, teaching him the wayes and doctrine of Christ, and Baptising him and other with him assembled, being like as he afore was, Paganes: the Apostles and other Christen brethren that were in Iewry,* hearing thereof, when Peter came to Hierusalem, they which held vpon Circumcision, made none obeysaunce vnto him (albeit I thinke verily he had more holines then euer had any other Pope) as the Emperor is fayne to do to y^e Pope at his coronation, falling downe to kisse the Popes feete, or to hold the Popes styrrup while he mounteth vpon his horseback,* according to the forme of law written: I am not certaine whether in the Decrees or els the Decretalles, or in both rather (for such ordinaunces are inuiolable & worthy to be principally recorded) but they reasoned sore & disputed both against S. Peter,* and also his doing, saying: you haue gone amongst them that you ought not haue had to do with, ne to haue medled among them, y^t are men vncleane,* because they are vncircumcised: yea & that is more, you haue eate & dronke with them. Peter mildly and coldly made aunswer againe, rehearsing all the maner of his doing in order: shewing that he was so instruct to doe by mightie and cleare reuelations of God, & not by his owne fantasie and pleasure.

Which aunswere being heard, the other that afore had made sore obiections against him (which were both of the Apostles,* and other Christen brethren) were content, holding their peace without any more complaining, and gaue glory therfore to God, saying: Then God hath graunted also vnto the Gentiles to take repentaunce, and so to come to eternall lyfe. Where in you may see, that the other Apostles were as bold with Peter, as before is shewed of Paule, to dispute against him. Neither were they therefore by Peter reproued of inobedience. He did not allege any preeminēce or authoritie, to rebuke them for their complaining, as one wold say: why should you that are my sheepe, control me, that am the head of the church and your pastor, or Christs general vicare, hauing both iurisdiction temporal, and spirituall: with such other like? but shewed them it was the will of God, that he had done, going to the Gentiles to tel them of eternal life, which God pleased to giue to them as well as to the Iewes. In token wherof the holy ghost did sensibly come among them, and so were they baptised.

*Thus may you see, that if Peter were the Uicare of Christ, euen so likewise was Paule, and all the other Apostles. And I do not thinke contrary, but that Peter and all other of the Apostles were Christes Uicars, if you meane by this word Uicar, a deputie or such like for to preach his Euangelie (which is an office of al other most soueraigne) to minister Sacramentes, and to do other such diuine seruice in Gods Church. And thus were they worthy to be called (as the Scripture nameth them) Christs true Apostles, Bishops, Priestes, Legates, or any such like. Which authority was giuen thē by Christ after his resurrection, when he sayd vnto them these wordes:Peace be amongst you Like as my father hath sent me, so do I sende you. Take you the holy Ghost: whose sinnes soeuer you shall forgiue, are forgiuen them: and whose sinnes you shall retayne, are retayned. And the same authoritie did they receiue when Christe spake vnto all the Church, after the mind of Saint Augugustine and other, in Peter, saying: Peter feede my sheepe.

¶In the xliiij. where you aske, whether I beleue, that the Pope ordina•ly chosen for a time (his proper name being expressed,* be the successour of Peter, I say that it seemeth to me a thing of no great vawle whether a man beleue so or no, I can not see y^t it should be numbred amongst the Articles of our faith.* Notwithstanding I will shewe my rude thought in it, which is this.

The Pope may succede in S. Peters steade or office, and do the same duly & diligently feeding Christes flocke, and shewing vertuous ensample of liuing to the same, & so doing, he may and ought to be thoght and named a true successour of S. Peter.* And thus is your Lordship, S. Peters successour, performing the conditions aforesaid, with otherlike properties requisite to your order and duety: yea and as many other as do truly their duty and duely the office of a Byshop. And otherwise may not the Pope be called the successour of Peter, for because he is entred into S. Peters office, not regarding to do that is requisite for the same, not folowing y^e trace of vertue, but the cōtrary. And then is he wrongfully named, if at any time such be, which is not vnpossible. For what should men cal those Peters successors, that play the pageants and folow with the conditions of Caiphas, Symon Magus, or Iudas? Such verely if any be, cannot rightwilly claime to be Peters successors,* no more then the night may claime to be successour of the day▪ for Peter was neuer so minded, ne taught them so. Yea, they ought rather to be called Peters aduersaries, for so much as they do not his will, that is shewed by his owne actes and writing, but worke against the same. Of such may be saide: Non Sanctorum filij sunt, qurtenent loca Sanctorum, sed qui exercent opera eorum. That is to say,* they are not all Saintes children, that occupy the rowms of Saintes, but they are their children, that exercise their works. Yea, of such may be said, that is written of S. Hierome. Al Byshops (quoth he) are not Byshoppes, marke you well Peter, but marke also Iudas. Behold Stephen, but behold Nicholas. Ecclesiastical dignitie maketh not a Christen man. Cornelius the Centurion being yet a pagan, was made clean through the benefit of the holy ghost. Contrariwise, Daniel being a child, condemneth Priestes, or auncient men. It is no easy thing (saith he) to stande in the rowme of Peter and Paul, & to kepe the seate of them now reigning with Christe: For vnsauery salt is nought els worth, but to be throwen out of the doores,* and troden downe of hogges. This sayth S. Hierome.

Wherunto agreeth wel S. Augustine. Euery one (quoth he) that saith vnto you. Pax vobis, ought not to be heard, or to be beleued, as a doue. Crows be fedde of dead carion: & so is not a doue: but liueth by the frutes of the earth.* Her liuing is pure, innocent and hurtlesse. Whereby you may see, that ill Bishops are no Byshops, and that they which folow no Saints in vertuous liuing, are not the successors of Saints, but vnsauery salt, that is, neither of the church, ne shal come in heauen to reigne there with Peter & Paul, but be thrown out with great contēpt. For God knoweth a doue from a crow, and an innocent liuer from a deuourer of carion. But such as declare and shew good deeds, as the Saints did, be their childrē and successours, and shal with them reigne in heauen.

So that to conclude, I say,* that the Pope ordinatly chosen is the successour of S. Peter, folowing S. Peters godly liuing. And els, except he study to do diligently, that he may be so called worthily, it shal be but a vaine name. For rather may he els be reputed an Image of a Pope, or of a Bishop according as such be called of the Prophet: O Pastor & Idolum: O Idoll shepherds.

¶In the xlv. where you aske,* whether euer I haue promised as any time by an othe, or made any confederacie or league with any person or persons, that I would alway hold and defend certain conclusions or articles seeming to me and to my complices right & consonant vnto the faith? * and will that I should certifie you of the course and forme of the said opinions and conclusions by row, & of y^e names and surnames of them that were to me adherent, & promised to be adherēt in this behalf: I say, that I doe not remēber, that euer I made pact or confederacie w^t any person or persons, ne made any promise by oth, that I would alway hold and defend any conclusions, or articles seming to me and other, right and consonant to the faith, vnlesse it hath chanced me to say in this forme: that I would neuer with the ayde of God, forsake ne decline from the truth, neither for feare, nor yet for loue of man or men.

Thus I haue perhaps sayd in some time, or some place, because I haue in deed so intended, and doe entend, Gods grace assisting me. But I can not yet tell you, whether I haue so said or no, nor to what persōs, ne at what time, neither in what place. Neither I do reckē me to haue any cōplices, but such as do loue me, and I them,* for God and in God. And those doe I reckon all them that are or will be truly Christen, in calling vpon Christes name. And concerning opiniōs or cōclusions, I can tel you of none other, thē I haue shewed: the summe wherof I reckon and think vtterly be concluded in two propositions, which both are written in the new Testament.*

The first is in the Actes of the Apostles in this wise: Christus est caput anguli, nec est in alio quoquam salus. Non enim aliud nomen sub coelo datum est inter homines, in quo oporteat nos saluos fieri. That is to say: Christ is the head corner stone of our faith, whervpon it should be set and grounded: neyther is saluation in any other,*for there is none other name vnder heauen geuen amongst men, wherein we may be sauēd. This is the one of the propositions, wherein is ingrossed or cōprehended my saying, which S. Paul doth thus otherwise explicate: Christ is made of God our wisdomē, our righteousnes, our purenes, or satisfaction, and our redemption. And in an other place: There is none other foundation,*that any man may put, except that which is already put, that is Christ Iesus.

The other proposition is written of the Prophete Esay, Page 1121 and recited of our Sauour in the Euangelie of Mathew,* in these woordes: Men doe worship me in vaine, teaching doctrines and preceptes, or lawes humaine. Of thys wryteth Paule very largely in diuers places,* and euery where wel nigh. Amongest other, Collos. 2. where he warneth the Colossians to take heede that no man do spoyle them, to steale them away, by Philosophie or vaine deception, according to the constitutions of menne, and ordinaunces of thys worlde. Thus I doe certifie you of all the opinions and conclusions, whyche I entend, or haue intended to sustaine, being contained in the two propositions aboue wrytten. Other holde I none, but suche as are mentioned in the Creede, both that is songe at Masse, and also in the other Creede, that all people do daily say euery day.

Finally, that you require to knowe of the names and surnames, in order particularly of them, that be to me adherentes, or that haue promised me to be adherent in thys part:* I say, that I knowe of none particular, that I remēber, wythout I shoulde note vnto you a great multitude, whych you may know, and here of (I suppose) through all regions and realmes of Christendom, that do thinke likewise, as I haue shewed, I weene the multitude mounteth nigh vnto the one halfe of Christendome: and more should doe likewise, by a great sort within a while (I doubte not) but that our ghostly ennemie laboureth a maine, to haue the knowledge of the truthe suppressed,* and letteth, that it can not come abroad for to be seene. I say therefore againe I know of no particular adherentes, ne of none that hath so promised me to be in these matters. And thogh I did, I would not (except I knew that charitie so required, which I do not finde yet hetherto) detect, ne bewray any one of them, for no mans pleasure: For I am bound to obey God aboue men. Who be wyth vs, and graunt the truthe to be knowen. Amen.

These aunsweres of Iohn Lambert, to the 45. Articles aboue expressed,* were directed and deliuered to Doctoure Warham Archbyshop of Caunterbury, as it appeareth, about the yeare of oure Lorde 1532. at what time, the sayde Lambert was in custodie in the Archbishops house of Otforde, beyng there destitute of all helpe and furniture of bookes, as by his owne wordes is to be gathered. But so the prouidence of God wrought for Lambert, that wythin short space after, An. 1533. the sayde Archbyshop Warham died: whereby it seemeth that Lambert for that time was deliuered. In this meane while Doct. Cranmer was sent ouer in Ambassage, with the Earle of Wilshyre, Doctoure Stokesley, Doct. Kerne, Doctor Benet, and other learned men, to the byshop of Rome lying then at Bonony, to dispute the matter of the Kinges mariage, openly first in the Courte of Rome, then in the Courte of the Emperoure. Where after sondry promisses, and appoyntmentes made, yet when the time came, no man there appeared, to dispute with them, in these two propositions: 1. That no man, iure diuino, could or ought to marry his brothers wife. 2. That the Byshop of Rome by no meanes oughte to dispence to the contrary. But of this more copiously we will entreate (the Lordes grace permitting) in the sequele of our storie, comming to Doctour Cranmers life.

After the death of William Warham, succeeded in that Sea the sayde Doctour Cranmer. Lambert in the meane season being deliuered, partly by the death of this Archbyshop, partly by the comming in of Queene Anne, returned into London, and ther exercised himself about the Stocks, in teaching children, both in the Greeke, and latine tounge. And for somuch as priests in those dayes could not be permitted to haue wiues, he left his priesthode; & applied him selfe to that function of teaching, entending shortly after also to be free of the grocers, and to be married. But God, who disposeth al mens purposes after his secrete pleasure, did both intercept his mariage, and also his freedome, and married him to his sonne Christ Iesus, as now consequētly followeth to be declared.*

Thus then after that Iohn Lambert nowe had continued in thys vocation of teaching,* with great commendation, and no lesse commoditie to the youth: it happened thys present yeare 1538. hee was present at a Sermon, in S. Peters Church at London. He that preached, was named Doctor Tailour, a man in those dayes not farre disagreeing from the Gospell, and afterwarde in the tyme of King Edward was made Byshop of Lincolne, and at last in the time of Queene Marie was depriued from the same, and so ended his life, among the confessours of Iesu Christ.

When the Sermon was done, Lambert hauinge gotten oportunitie, wente gently vnto the Preacher to talke with him, and vttered diuers arguments wherein he desired to be satisfied. Al the whole matter or controuersy was concerning the sacrament of the body and bloud of Christ. Taylor excusing himselfe at that present for other busines, willed him to write his minde, and to come againe at more leisure.

Lambert was contented, and so departed. Who wythin a while after, when hee had written hys minde, came againe vnto him. The summe of his arguments were ten, whych he comprehended in wryting, approuing the truthe of the cause, partly by the Scriptures, and partly by good reason, and by the Doctours. The whyche arguments,* although they came not all vnto our handes, yet such menne as were present at those affairs, reported thē to be of great force and authoritie. And of a few which were borne away in memorie, the firste reason was thys, gathered vppon Christes wordes, where it is sayde in the Gospell: Thys cuppe is the newe Testament.

And if (sayeth he) these wordes do not chaunge neyther the Cup,* neither the wine corporally into the newe Testament: by like reason it is not agreeable that the woordes spoken of the bread, should turne the bread corporally into the body of Christ.

An other reason was thys: that it is not agreeable vnto a natural body to be in two places or more at one time: wherefore it must followe of necessity, that either Christ had not a naturall body, or els truely according to the common nature of a body, it cānot be present in two places at once, and much lesse in many: that is to say, in heauen & in earth, on the right hand of hys father, and in the Sacrament.

Moreouer, a naturall body can not be wythoute hys forme and shape, conditions, and accidents, like as the accidents and cōditions also can not be without their subiect or substaunce. Then, for somuch as in the sacrament there is no qualitie, quantitie, or condition of the body of Christ, and finally no apparaunce at all, of fleshe:  who doeth not plainly perceiue that there is no transubstantiate body of hys in the sacrament? And to reason by the contrary: al the proper conditions, signes, and accidents whatsoeuer they be pertaining vnto bread, we do see to be present in the sacrament, which can not be there wythout the subiect: therfore we must of necessitie confesse the bread to be there. Hee added also many other allegations oute of the Doctoures. But to be short, this Taylor the preacher, whome I spake of before, willing and desiring (as is supposed) of a good minde to satisfie Lambert in this matter, amongst other, whome he tooke to counsayle, he also conferred with doct. Barnes, Which Barnes,  although he did otherwise fauor the Gospell, and was an earnest preacher, notwithstanding seemed not greatly to fauour this cause, fearing peraduenture, that it woulde breede some let or hinderance among the people, to the preaching of the Gospell, whiche was now in a good forwardnes, if suche sacramentaries should be suffered: He perswaded Taylor by and by to put vp the matter to Thomas Cranmer Bishop of Caunterbury. And hereby may we see it truely verified, which Wil. Tyndall before writing to Iohn Frith, did note in Doct. Barnes, saieng: that D. Barnes will be whote against you, &c. pag. 154.

Upon these originals, Lamberts quarell first beganne, and was brought vnto this point, that through the sinister doing of many, it began of a priuate talke, to be a publicke and common matter. For hee was sent for by the archbishop and brought into the open court, and forced to defend his cause openly: for the archbishop had not yet sauoured y^e doctrine of the Sacrament, * whereof afterward hee was an earnest professour. In that disputation, it is sayd, that Lābart did appeale from the Bishoppes, to the kinges Maiestie. But how soeuer the matter was, the rumour of that disputation, was by and by spread throughout the whole Court.

I told you before, how that king Henry for two yeres past shewing the part of an hard husband, had beheaded Queene Anne his wife. Which deede did not onely greatly displease the Germaine Princes (who for that onely cause had broken of the league with him, an. 1536. but also many other good men in England.

Moreouer, how that within a while after, Abbayes began to be subuerted, and all theyr goodes to be confiscate and geuen abroad. For which causes, but especially for the late abolishing of the bishop of Rome, the commons had conceiued a very euill opinion of him, in so much as the sediciouse sorte rebelled agaynst him.

At that time Stephen Gardiner then Bishop of Winchester,  was in authoritie amongst the kings Counsellors who as he was of a cruell nature, so was hee no lesse of a subtile and crafty witte, euer gapyng for some occasion how to let and hinder the Gospell: albeit a long time hee was not so greatly esteemed with the king that hee coulde much preuayle to atchieue his conceaued purpose: But at length: vpon this matter aduising himselfe, he thought he Page 1122 had apt occasion and oportunitie to accomplish hys desire.  Neither did he forslacke the occasion ministred, but wente straight vnto the kinge, priuely admonishing him, & wyth faire flattering words, geuing him most pernicious counsell, declaring howe great hatred and suspition was raised vpon him, almost in all places.

First, for abolishing the Bishop of Romes authority, then for subuersion of the monasteries, and also for that the diuorcement of Queene Katherine was yet fresh in mens mindes: and nowe the time serued, if hee woulde take it, easely to remedy all these matters, and pacifie the myndes of them, whiche were offended with him, if onely in thys matter of Iohn Lambert, he woulde manifest vnto y^e people, how stoutly he wold resist hereticks: and by this new rumor he should bring to passe, not onely to extinguish all other former rumors, and as it were with one nail to driue out an other, but also should discharge himselfe of all suspition, in that he nowe began to be reported to be a fauourer of newe sectes and opinions.

*The king geuing eare more willingly, then prudently or godly to this Cyrene, immediately receiued the wicked counsaile of the Bishop, and by and by sent out a generall Commission, commanding all the nobles and Bishops of thys Realme, to come with all speede, to London to assiste the king against heretickes and heresies, whych the kynge himselfe would sit in iudgement vpon.

These preparations made, a day was set for Lambert, where a great assembly of the nobles was gathered from all partes of the realme, not without much wōder and expectation in this so straunge a case. All the seates and places were full of men round about the scaffold.

*By and by the godly seruant of Christ Iohn Lambert was brought from the prison with a garde of armed men, euen as a Lambe to fight w^t many Lyons, and placed right ouer against where the kyngs royal seat was, so that now they taried but for the kings comming to the place.

At the last, the king himselfe did come as iudge of that great controuersie, with a great garde, clothed all in white, as couering by that colour and dissimuling seueritie of all bloudy iudgement.

On his right hand sate the Bishops, and behind them the famous Lawyers, clothed all in purple, accordinge to the maner. On the left hand sat the Peeres of the Realme, the Iustices, and other Nobles in theyr order: behynde whome sate the Gentlemen of the kings priue Chamber. And this was the manner and forme of the Iudgement, which albeit it was terrible inough of it selfe, to abash any innocent, yet the kings looke, his cruell countenance, and his browes bent vnto seueritie, * did not a litle augmēt this terrour, plainly declaring a minde ful of indignation farre vnworthy such a Prince, especially in such a matter and against so humble and obedient a subiect.

When the king was set in his throne, he behelde Lambert with a sterne countenance, and then turning himselfe vnto his counsailours, he called foorth D. Day Byshop of Chechester, commanding him to declare vnto the people, the causes of this present assembly and iudgement.

*The whole effect of hys Oration tended in a manner, to this poynt: That the king in this Session woulde haue all states, degrees, Byshops and all other, to be admonyshed of his will and pleasure, that no man should conceiue any sinister opinion of hym, that nowe the authoritye and name of the Byshop of Rome beyng vtterly abolished, he woulde also extinguish all Religion, or geue libertie vnto heretickes to perturbe and trouble the Churches of England, wythout punishment, whereof he is the heade: and moreouer that they shoulde not thinke, that they were assembled at that present, to make any disputation vpon the hereticall doctrine, but onely for thys purpose, that by the industrie of hym and other Byshops, the heresies of thys man heere present (meaning Lambert) and the heresies of all such like, should be refuted or openly condemned in the presence of them all.

When hee had made an ende of hys Oration, the King standing vp vpon his feete leaning vpō a cushion of white cloth of tussue, turning him self toward Lambert with his browes bent, as it were threatning some greeuous thyng vnto him, sayd these wordes: Hoe good fellow, what is thy name? Then the humble Lamb of Christ, humbly kneling downe vpon his knee, sayd: My name is Iohn Nicolson, although of many I be called Lambert. What (sayde the king? haue you two names? I would not trust you hauing two names, although you were my brother. Lambert, O most noble Prince,* your bishops forced me of necessitie to chaunge my name. And after diuers Prefaces and muche talke had in this maner, the king commaunded him to goe vnto the matter, and to declare hys minde & opinion what he thought as touching the Sacrament of the altare.

Then Lambert beginning to speake for himselfe,* gaue God thanks which had so inclined the heart of the kinge, that he himselfe would not disdaine to here and vnderstand the controuersies of Religion: for that it happeneth oftentimes, through the crueltie of the bishops,* that many good & innocent men in many places are priuely murdered and put to death without the kings knowledge.

But now for so much as that highe and eternall kyng of kyngs, in whose handes are the heartes of all Princes, hath inspired and stirred vp the kings minde, that he hymselfe will be present to vnderstande the causes of hys subiectes, specially whom God of his diuine goodnesse hath so abundantly endued with so great gifts of iudgement and knowledge, he doth not mistrust, but that God will bryng some great thing to passe through him, to the setting foorth of the glory of his name.

Then the king, with an angry voice, interrupting hys Oration: I came not hether (sayd he) to heare mine owne praises thus painted out in my presence, but briefly goe to the matter, wythout any more circumstaunce. Thus hee spake in Latine.

But Lambert beyng abashed at the Kynges angrie words, contrary to al mens expectation, staid a while considering whether hee myght turne him selfe in these great straites and extremities.

But the king being hasty, with anger and vehemencie sayde: why standest thou still?* Aunswere as touching the Sacrament of the aultar, whether doest thou say, that it is the body of Christ, or wilt deny it? And with that word the king lifted vp his cappe.

Lambert. I answere with S. Augustine, that it is the bodie of Christ, after a certaine maner.

The king. Answer me neither out of S. Augustine, neither by the authoritie of anie other, but tell me plainelie,* whether thou saiest it is the bodie of Christ, or no? These words the king spake againe in Latin.

Lambert. Then I denie it to be the bodie of Christ.

The king. Marke well, for now thou shalt be condemned euen by Christes owne words: Hoc est corpus meum.

Then he commanded Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterburie to refute his assertion: who first making a short preface vnto the hearers,* began his disputation with Lambert, verie modestlie, saieng: Brother Lambert, let this matter be handled betwene vs indifferentlie, that if I do conuince this your argument to be false by the Scriptures, you will willinglie refuse the same: but if you shall prooue it true by the manifest testimonies of the scripture, I do promise, I will willinglie embrace the same.

The argument was this, taken out of that place of the Actes of the Apostles, where as Christ appeared vnto S. Paule by the way: disputing out of that place,* that it is not disagreeable to the worde of God, that the bodie of Christ may be in two places at once, which being in heauen was seene vnto S. Paule the same time vpon earth: & if it may be in two places, why by the like reason, may it not be in many places?

In this maner the Archbishop began to refute the secōd argument of Lambert, which as we haue before said, was written & deliuered by the said Lābert, vnto the preacher: for the king had first disputed against his first reason.

Lambert aunswered vnto this argument, saying: that the Minor was not thereby prooued, that Christes bodye was dispersed in two places, or more, but remained rather still in one place, as touching the maner of his bodye.* For the Scripture doth not say, that Christ being vpon earth, did speake vnto Paule: But that sodenly a lighte from heauen did shine rounde about him, and hee falling to the ground, heard a voyce sayinge vnto him, Saule, Saule, why doest thou persecute me? I am Iesus whom thou persecutest. &c. Here this place doth nothing lette, but that Christe sittinge in heauen,* myghte speake vnto Paul, and be heard vpon earth, for they which were wyth Paule, verely heard the voyce, but did see no body.

The Archbishop on the contrary part, sayd: Paule him selfe doth witnesse.* Actes 26. that Christe did appeare vnto him in the same vision.

But Lambert againe sayde, that Christ did witnesse in the same place, That hee woulde againe appeare vnto hym,* and deliuer him out of the handes of the Gentiles: Notwythstanding we read in no place, that Christ did corporally appear vnto him.

Thus,* when they had contended about the conuersion of S. Paule, and Lambert so aunswearinge for hymselfe, that the king semed greatly to be mooued therwith, and the Byshop himselfe that disputed, to be entangled, and all the audience amased: then the Byshop of Winchester, whych was appoynted the 6. place of the disputation, fearing least the argument should be taken out of hys mouth, or rather Page 1123 being drowned wyth malice against the poore man, wythout the kinges commaundement, obseruing no order, before the Archbishop had made an end, vnshamefastly kneeled downe to take in hand the disputation, alledged a place out of the 12. Chapter to the Corinthians, where S. Paule sayeth: Haue I not seene Iesus? And againe in the 15. chapter: He appeared vnto Cephas: and afterwarde vnto Iames, then to all the Apostles, but last of al, he appeared vnto me as one borne out of due time.*&c.

Heereunto, Lambert aunswered, he did nothing doubt but that Christ was seene, and did appeare, but he did deny that hee was in two or in diuers places, accordinge to the maner of his body.

Then Winchester agayne, abusinge the authoritie of Paule, repeateth the place out of the seconde Epistle to the Corinthians and 5. Chapter: And if so be, we haue knowen Christe after the fleshe,*nowe hencefoorth knowe wee hym so no more. &c.

*Lambert aunswered, that this knowledge is not to be vnderstanded according to the sense of the body, and that it so appeared sufficiently by S. Paule, whyche speaking of hys owne reuelation, sayeth thus: I know not whether in the body or without the body,*God knoweth, whiche was rapte into the thirde heauen, I knowe not, whether in the body or without, God knoweth. Whereby, euen by the testimony of S. Paule, a man shall easily gather, that in thys reuelation hee was taken vp in spirite into the heauens, & did see those things, rather then that Christe came downe corporally from heauen, to shew them vnto him: especially, for that it was said of the Aungell: That euen as hee ascended into heauen, so hee should come againe. And S. Peter sayeth, whom it behoueth to dwell in the heauens. And moreouer appoynting the measure of time, he addeth: Euen vntill that all things be restored. &c. Heere againe, Lambert being taunted and rebuked, coulde not be suffered to prosecute hys purpose.

After the Byshoppe of Winchester had done, Tonstall Bishop of Durham tooke hys course, and after a long preface, wherein he spake much of Gods omnipotencie, at the last he came to this poynt,* saying: that if Christ could performe that which he spake touching the conuerting of hys body into bread, without doubt he would speak nothyng, but that he would performe.

Lambert answeared, that there was no euidente place of Scripture, wherein Christ doth at any time say, that he woulde chaunge the breade into hys body: and moreouer, that there is no necessitie why he shoulde so doe. But thys is a figuratiue speache,* euery where vsed in the Scripture, whē as the name and appellation of the thing signified, is attributed vnto the signe. By whiche figure of speache, circumcision is called the couenaunt, the Lambe, the passeouer: beside 600. such other.

Nowe it remaineth to be marked, whether wee shall iudge all these after the words pronounced, to be straightway chaunged into an other nature. Then agayne began they to rage a freshe againste Lambert, so that if hee coulde not be ouercome wyth arguments, he shoulde be vanquished with rebukes and tauntes. What shoulde he doe? He might well holde his peace like a Lambe, but bite or barke againe he could not.

Next orderly stepped forth the valiant champion Stokesly byshop of London, who afterward lying at y^e poynte of death, reioysed, boasting, that in his life time he had burned 50. heretickes.*

Thys man amongst the residue, intending to fight for his belly, with a long protestation promised to proue, that it was not onely a worke of a diuine miracle, but also that it did nothing abhorre nature. For, it is nothing dissonant from nature (sayeth he) the substances of lyke things to be oftentimes chaunged one into an other: So that neuertheles,* the accidentes doe remayne, all be it the substaunce it selfe, and the matter subiecte be chaunged. Then hee declared it by the example of water boylinge so long vppon the fire, vntill all the substance thereof be euaporate. Nowe (sayeth he) it is the doctrine of the Philosophers, that a substaunce can not be chaunged, but into a substaunce: wherefore we doe affirme the substaunce of the water, to passe into the substaunce of the aire. Notwythstanding the qualitie of the water, which is moystnesse, remaineth after the substaunce is chaunged, for the ayre is moist, euen as the water is.

When this argument was heard, the Byshops greatly reioysed, and sodenly their countenance chaunged, as it were assuring themselues of a certaine triumph and victory by this Philosophicall transmutation of elements, and like as it had ben of more force, then Crisippus argument, which passed all maner of solution.

Lambertes aunswere was long looked for heere of all men. Who, assoone as he had obtained silence and liberty to speake, first of all denied the Bishoppes assumpte, that the moisture of the water did remaine after the substance was altered. For all be it (sayth he) that we doe graunt with the Philosophers, the ayre to be naturall moist, notwythstanding it hathe one proper and a diuers degree of moysture, and the water an other. Wherefore, when as the water is conuerted into the aire, there remaineth moisture, as you doe say, but that is not the moisture of water, but the proper and naturall moisture of the aire. Whereupon there is an other doctrine amongst the Philosophers, as a perpetuall rule, that it can by no meanes be, that the qualities & accidents in natural things should remaine in their owne proper nature, without their proper subiect.

Then againe the king and the Byshops raged against Lambert, in somuch that he was not only forced to silence, but also might haue ben driuen into a rage, if his eares had not bene acquainted with such tauntes afore. After this the other Bishoppes, euery one in his order, as they were appoynted, supplied their places of disputation.

There were appoynted ten in number, for the performing of this Tragedie, for his ten Arguments, which (as before we haue declared) were deliuered vnto Taylor the preacher. It were too long in this place,* to repeate the reasons and arguments of euery Byshop: and no lesse superfluous were it so to doe, specially for somuch as they were all but common reasons, and nothing forceable, and suche as by the long vse of disputation haue ben beaten,* and had little in them, either worthy the hearer, or the reader.

Lambert in the meane tyme beyng compassed in wyth so many and great perplexities, vexed on the one side with checkes and taunts, and pressed on the other side, with the authority and threats of the personages, and partly being amazed with the maiestie of the place in the presence of the King, and especially being wearied with longe standinge,* whych continued no lesse then fiue houres, from twelue of the clocke, vntill fiue at nyght, being broughte in despayre that he shoulde nothing profite in thys purpose, and seeing no hope at all in speaking, was at this poynt, that he chose rather to holde his peace.

Whereby it came to passe, that those Byshoppes, which last of all disputed with him, spake what they lusted wythout interruption, saue onely that Lambert now and then, would alledge somewhat out of S. Augustin for the defence of hys cause, in which author he seemed to be very prompt and ready. But for the most parte (as I sayde) being ouercome with wearines and other griefes, he held his peace, defending himselfe rather with silence, then with argumentes, which he saw would nothing at al preuaile.

At the last, when the day was passed, and that torches begā to be lighted, the king minding to breake vp this pretended disputation, sayd vnto Lambert in this wise: What sayst thou now (sayd he) after al these great labours which thou hast taken vpon thee,* and all the reasons & instructions of these learned men, art thou not yet satisfied? Wilt y^u liue or dye? What sayst thou? Thou hast yet free choose. Lambert aunswered: I yelde and submit my selfe wholly vnto the will of your Maiestie. Then said the king. Commit thy selfe vnto the handes of God, and not vnto myne.

Lambert, I commend my soule vnto the handes of God, but my body I wholly yeld & submit vnto your clemency. Then sayd the king, if you do committe your selfe vnto my iudgement, you must dye,* for I will not be a patron vnto heretickes, and by and by turning himself vnto Cromwell, he sayd: Cromwell: read the sentence of condēnation agaynst him. This Cromwel was at that time the chiefe frend of the Gospellers. And here is it muche to be maruailed at,* to see how vnfortunately it came to passe in this matter, that through the pestiferous & crafty counsaile of this one Bishop of Winchester, Sathan (whiche oftentimes doth raise vp one brother to the destruction of an other) did here performe the condemnation of this Lambert by no other ministers, then Gospellers themselues. Taylor, Barnes, Cranmer and Cromwell, who afterwarde in a maner al, suffered the like for the Gospels sake: of whō (God willing) we will speake more hereafter.

This vndoubtedly was the malicious and crafty subiltie of the Bishop of Winchester, whiche desired rather,* that the sentence might be read by Cromwell, then by any other, so y^t if he refused to doe it, he shoulde likewise haue incurred the like daunger. But to be short, Cromwell at the kings commaundement taking the schedule of condēnation in hand, read the same: Wherein was contened the burning of heretickes, whiche either spake or wrote anye thing, or had any bookes by them, repugnant or disagreeing from the Papisticall Church, and theyr tradition,* touching the sacrament of the aultare: also, a decree that the same shoulde be sette vppe vppon the Church porches, and be read foure tymes euery yeare, in euery Church Page 1124 throughout the Realme, whereby the worshipping of the bread should be the more firmly fixed in the heartes of the people. And in this maner was the cōdemnation of Iohn Lambert. Wherein great pitie it was, and muche to be lamented, to see the Kinges highnesse that day so to oppose and set his power and strength •o fiercely and vehemently in assisting so manye proude and furious aduersaries, against that one poore seely soule, to be deuoured. Whō hys Maiestie wyth more honour might rather haue aided and supported, being so on euery side oppressed and compassed about wythout helpe or refuge, amonge so many Wolues and vultures,* especially in suche a cause tending to no derogation to him nor to his realme, but rather to the necessary reformation of syncere truth and doctrine decaied. For therein especially consisteth the honour of Princes, to pity the miserable, to relieue the oppressed, to rescue the wrōgs of the poore, and to tender and respect the weaker parte, especially where righte and truth standeth with him: which if the King had done that day, it had ben, in my minde, not so much for the comforte of that poore persecuted creature, as it woulde haue redounded to the immortall renoume of his Princely estate to all posteritie.

But thus was Iohn Lambert, in this bloody Session, by the king iudged and condemned to death, whose iudgement now remaineth with the Lord against that day, whē as before the tribunall seate of that great iudge, both princes and subiects shall stande and appeare, not to iudge, but to be iudged, according as they haue done and deserued. Ex testimonio cuiusdam 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . A.G.

And thus muche hetherto of Lambertes articles, aunsweres, disputation, and his condemnation also. Nowe to proceede further to the storie of his death.

Upon the day that was appoynted for this holy martyr of God to suffer,* he was brought out of the prisone at 8. of the clocke in the morning, vnto the house of the L. Cromwel, and so caried into his inward chamber, where as it is reported of many,* that Cromwell desired him of forgeuenes, for that he had done. Ther, at the last, Lambert being admonished, that the houre of his death was at hande, hee was greatly comforted and cheared, and being broughte out of the chamber into the Hal, he saluted the gentlemen, and sate downe to breakfast wyth them, shewing no manner of sadnesse or feare. When as the breakfast was ended, he was caried straight way to the place of execution, wher as hee shoulde offer hymselfe vnto the Lorde a sacrifice of sweete sauour, who is blessed in his Saintes for euer and euer. Amen.

As touching the terrible maner and fashion of the burning of this blessed Martyr, heere is to be noted, that of all other, which haue beene burned and offered vp at Smithfielde, there was yet none so cruelly and piteously handled, as he. For after that his legges were consumed and burned vp to the stumpes, and that the wretched tormentours and enemies of God had withdrawne the fire from him, so that but a small fire and coales were left vnder hym, then two that stode on eche side of him, with their Hallebardes pitched him vpon their pikes, as farre as the chaine wolde reache, after the manner & forme as here in this picture is described. Then hee lifting vp such handes as hee had, and his fingers endes, flaming with fire,* cried vnto the people in these wordes: None but Christ, none but Christ, and so being let downe againe from their Hallebardes, fell into the fire, and there gaue vp his life.

Thus yee haue heard by what crafte and subtiltie thys good man was intrapped, and wyth what crueltie he was oppressed, so that nowe remaineth nothing, but onely his punishment and death, which the drunken rage of the byshops thought not to be long protracted.

During the time that hee was in the Archbyshoppes Warde at Lambeth, which was a little before his disputation before the king, he wrote an excellent confession or defence of his cause vnto king Henrie.

Wherein he first mo•lifying the kings minde and eares, w^t a modest & sober preface, declaring how he had a double hope of solace laid vp, the one in the most high and mighty Prince of Princes, God: the other nexte vnto God, in hys Maiestie, which shoulde represent the office and ministerie of that most high Prince in gouerning here vppon earth: after that proceeding in gentle wordes, he declared y^e cause which mooued him to that which he had done.

And albeit he was not ignorant howe odious this doctrine woulde be vnto the people, yet notwithstanding, because he was not also ignoraunt how desirous the kynges mind was to search out the trueth,* he thought no time vnmeete to performe his duetie, especially for so muche as hee woulde not vtter those thyngs vnto the ignoraunt multitude, for auoiding of offence, but only vnto the Prince him selfe, vnto whom he might safely declare his minde.

After thys Preface made, hee entring into the Booke,* confirmed his doctrine touchinge the Sacramente, by diuers testimonies of the Scriptures, by the whiche Scriptures, hee prooued the bodye of Christe, whether it riseth, Page 1125 or ascendeth, or sitteth, or be conuersant here, to be alwaies in one place.

Then he gathering together the mindes of the auncient Doctours, did proue and declare by sufficient demonstration, y^e sacrament to be a misticall matter. Albeit hee so ruled himselfe in suche temperaunce and moderation, that he did not deny, but that the holy sacrament was the very naturall bodye of our sauour, and the wine hys naturall bloud, and that moreouer his naturall body & bloud were in those misteries, but after a certayne maner, as al y^e auncient Doctours, in a maner do interpret it.

After this protestation thus made, hee inferreth y^e sentence of his confession, as here followeth.

A treatise of Iohn Lambert to the king.

CHrist is so ascended bodily into heauen, & his holy māhode thether so assumpt, whereas it doth sit vppon the right hand of the father,* that is to say, is with the Father there remanent and resident in glory, that by the infallible promise of God, it shall not or cannot from thence return before the generall dome, whiche shall be in the ende of the world: And as he is no more corporally in the world, so cā I not see how he can be corporally in the sacrament, or his holy supper. And yet notwithstanding do I knowledge & confesse that the holy sacrament of Christes body & bloud is his very body & bloud in a certayne maner, which shall be shewed hereafter with your graces fauour & permissiō, according to the wordes of our sauour instituting y^e same holy sacrament, & saying: This is my body, whiche is geuē for you.*And agayne: This is my bloud which is of the new Testament▪ which is shed for many for the remission of sinnes,

But now for approuing of the first part, that Christ is so bodily ascended into heauen, and his holy manhooe so thether assumpte. &c. that by the infallible promise of God, he shall not, or cannot any more from thence boldly return before the generall dome, I shall for this alledge first the scriptures, and following the authorities of olde holye Doctors, w^t one consent testifying with me. Besides thys, I neede not to tel, that the same is no other thing, but that we haue taught to vs in these. 3. articles of our Creede: He ascended into heauen, and sitteth on the right hand of GOD the father almightye, from thence he shall come to iudge the quicke and the dead. For Christ did ascend bodily, the God head which is infinite, vncircūscriptible, replenishing both heauen and earth, being immutable, and vnmooueable, so that properly it can neither ascend nor descend.

Scriptures affirming the same.

The Scriptures whych I promised to alledge for the confirmation of my sayd sentence, be these: Hee was lifted vp into heauen in their sight,*and a cloude receaued him from theyr eyes and when they were looking vp into heauen, they sawe two men. &c. Heere it is euidently shewed, that Christ departed and ascended in a visible and circumscrip^t body. That thys departing was visible and in a visible bodye, these woordes doe testifie: And when they were looking vppe. Whye stande ye heere looking vppe into heauen. And: euen as yee haue seene him. &c. That secondly it was in body, I haue afore prooued, and moreouer the Deitie is not sene, but is inuisible, as appeareth: To God onely inuisible. &c. and, He dwelleth in the inaccessible lighte,*whiche no man seeth nor may see. &c. Therefore the manhead and naturall body was assumpt, or did ascend. That thirdly it was in a circumscrip^t body, appeareth manifestly in this. First, y^t his ascension and bodily departing, caused them to loke vp. And secondly, that he was lift vp, that is to witte, from beneath or from a lowe. And thirdly, that a cloud receaued him. Where as no cloud nor cloudes can receiue or embrace the Deitie. &c.

I am •aine to leaue out other euident Argumentes for the same purpose, least I shoulde be ouer prolix and tedious. It doeth there also further followe in like forme, how the Aungels made aunswere to the Disciples, saying: Yee menne of Galile, why stande yee gasing into heauen? Thys Iesus which is taken vppe from you into heauen, shall so come agayne, as you haue seene him going vppe into heauen. Here we see againe, that Iesus is assumpte, or taken away into heauen. And then it must be from oute of the worlde,* accordinge to that we read, Iohn 16. I went foorth from the father, & I came into the worlde. I leaue the worlde againe, and I go vnto the Father: That is not els, but as hee came from the father of heauen into thys worlde, in that he was incarnate & made man, for hys Godhead was neuer absent, either from heauen, or yet from earth: euen so shoulde his manhoode leaue the worlde againe, to go to heauen. Moreouer, in that it is sayde: So shall he come, is plainly testified, that hee is away, and nowe corporally absent.

Finally, it is shewed further, after what maner he shal come againe, by these woordes: Euen as you haue seene hym going vp into heauen. Which is not els, but, as you did visibly see him ascend or go away to heauē, a cloud embrasing him and taking him from among you: euen so shal you visibly see hym to come againe in the cloudes, as wee reade. Math. 26.*You shall see the sonne of man to come in the clouds of heauen. And againe, Math. 24. And they shall see the sonne of man. Such other textes haue we full many, declaring my sentence to be Catholicke and true. Of which I heere shall brieflye note some places, and passe ouer them, knowing that a litle rehearsall is sufficient to youre noble wisdom, The places be, Marke 16. Luke 24. Iohn 13.14.16. and 17. Rom. 8. Ephes. 1. and 2. and 2. Cor. 6. Hebr. 8.9.10. and 12. and 1. Thess. 4. and 1. Pet. 2. which all do testifie, that Christ hath bodily forsaken the world, departed from it vnto hys father, ascended into heauen, sitting still vpon the ryghte hand of the father aboue all dominion, power, and principalitie, where he is present aduocate and intercessor before hys father, and that he shall so bodely come againe, lyke as he was seene to depart from hence.

Nothing can better or more clearely testifie and declare, what is contained in the Sacrament of Christes holy body and bloud, then do the words of Scripture,* wherby it was institute. Marke doth agree wyth Mathewe, so that in a maner he reciteth his very wordes. And no maruaile it is. For as the Doctours doe say, the Gospell of Marke is a very Epytome or abridgement of Mathew. I shall therefore write the relations of them touching the institution of this sacrament together. The relation or testimonie of Mathewe is this: As they were eating, Iesus tooke bread, and when hee had geuen thanks he brake and gaue to hys disciples, and sayde: Take, eate, this is my body. And taking the cup, and geuing thanks, hee gaue it to them,*saying drinke yee all of this, for this is my bloud of the new Testamēt which is shed for manye, for the remission of sinnes. And I say vnto you, I will not drinke hencefoorth of this fruite of the vine, vntill that day, that I drinke it new with you in the kingdome of my father.

The testimonie or relation of Marke, is this: And as they did eate, Iesus tooke the breade,and when hee hadde geuen thanks, he brake it and gaue it to them, and sayde: Take, eate, thys is my body. And hee tooke the cuppe, and when hee hadde geuen thanks, he gaue it to them, and they all dranke of it, and hee sayd vnto them▪ This is my bloud of the new Testament which is shed for many. Verely, I say vnto you, I wil drinke no more of the fruit of the vine vnto that day that I drinke it newe in the kingdome of God. Luke being the companion of Paule, as appeareth in the Actes, and 2. Timothie 4. doth so next agree with him in making relation of thys Supper, and holy institution of the Sacrament. Hys relation or reporte is thys: When he had taken breade and geuen thanks, hee brake it and gaue to them, saying: This is my bodye which is geuen for you, doe thys in remembraunce of me. Likewise also after Supper,*he tooke the cuppe, saying: This cuppe is the newe Testament in my bloude which is shedde for you.

Paules testimonie doeth followe nexte, agreeablye to Luke, & it is thus: For I haue receiued of the Lorde, that which I also haue deliuered to you.*That oure Lorde Iesus Christe in the same night wherein he was betrayed, tooke breade, and when hee had geuen thanks, he brake it and said: Take, eate, this is my body which is broken for you: this doe ye in the remembraunce of mee. After the same maner also he tooke the cup when he had supped, saying: This cuppe is the newe Testament in my bloude: thys doe as oft as yee drinke it, in the remembraunce of me: for as often as ye shall eate this breade, and drinke this cuppe, ye shall shewe the Lordes death, till he come. By these testimonies shall I declare my sentence to your grace, whiche I conceyue of the holy Sacrament of Christes blessed body and bloude, and in all poyntes of difficultie, shall I annexe the very interpretation of the olde holy Doctours and Fathers, to shew that I doe not grounde any thing vpon my self. Thereafter shall I adde certaine arguments, whiche I truste shall clearely prooue and iustifie my sentence to be true, Catholike, and according both with God and his lawes, and also with the minde of holy Doctours.

My sentence is this, that Christ ascended into heauen, and so hath forsaken the worlde, and there shall abide, sitting on the right hande of hys Father, wythout returning hether againe vntill the generall dome: at what time hee shall come from thence, to iudge the dead and liuing. This all do I beleue, done in his natural body, which he tooke of the blessed virgine Marie hys mother, in the which he also suffered passion for our safetie & redemption vpon a crosse: which died for vs & was buried: in which he also dyd arise againe to life immortall. That Christe is thus ascended in his manhode and natural body, & so assumpt into heauen, we may soone proue, for as much as the godhead of him is neuer out of heauē, but euer replenishing both heauen and earth, and al that is besides, being infinite and interminable Page 1126 or vncircumscribable, so that it neither cā properly eyther ascende or descend, being without all alterations and vnmutable or vnmoueable.

So that now his naturall body being assumpt from among vs,* and departed out of the worlde, the same can no more returne from thence vnto the ende of the worlde. For as Peter witnesseth. Act. 3. Whome the heauen must contayne vntill the time that all things be restored which God had spoken by the mouthe of all his holy Prophetes, since the worlde began. And the same doth y^e Article of our Creede teach vs, which is: From thence (.i. from heauē) he shall come to iudge the quick and the dead.* Which time Paule calleth the appearing of oure Lord Iesus Christ. 1. Timoth. 6.

Seeing then, thys naturall body of our Sauour, that was borne of hys mother Marie, being a Uirgine, is all whole assumpt into heauē, and departed out of this world, and so, as sayth S. Peter: He must remaine in heauen vntil the ende of the worlde, which he calleth the time when all thynges must be restored: This (I say) seene and beleueed according to our Creede and the Scriptures, I cā not perceiue how the naturall body of hym can contrariwise be in the world, and so in the Sacrament. And yet notwithstanding is this true, that the holy Sacrament is Christes body & bloude, as after shall be declared.

Doctors affirming the same.

But firste, for the establishing of my former purpose, that the naturall bodye of our Sauour is so absent from thys worlde,* and ascended to heauen, that it can be here no more present vnto the generall dome, I wold beseech your grace to consider the minde and sentence of olde holy Doctours, in thys purpose or matter, how agreeably they testifie wyth that is tofore shewed. Amongest whom we haue first S. Augustine, wryting thus to Dardanus: Proinde quod ad verbum attinet, Creator est Christus: Omnia enim per ipsum facta sunt. Quod verò ad hominem. &c. Therefore as concerning the woorde, Christe is the Creator: all things are made by hym: but as touching man,*Christe is a creature made of the seede of Dauid accordi•g to the flesh, and ordained accordinge to the similitude o••enne. Also because man consisteth of two thinges, the soule and the flesh: in that hee had a soule, hee was pensiue and sorrowfull vnto death, in that he had flesh he suffered death. Neyther when wee call the sonne of God Christ, wee do separate hys manhoode, nor when we cal the same Christ the sonne of manne, we doe separate his Godhead from him. In that he was manne, he was conuersaunt vppon the earth (and not in heauen where hee nowe is) when hee sayde: no man ascendeth vp into heauen, but he whych descended from heauen, the sonne of manne whyche is in heauen. Although in that respect that he was the sonne of God, he was in heauen, and in that he was the sonne of man, he was yet in the earth, and as yet was not ascended into heauē. Likewise in that respect that he is the sonne of God, he is the Lord of glory: and in that he is the sonne of man, he was crucified. And yet notwythstanding the Apostle sayth▪ And if they had knowen the Lord of glory, they woulde neuer haue crucified him. And by this both the sonne of man was in heauen, and the sonne of God in that hee was man, was crucified vppon earth. Therefore as he might well be called the Lorde of glory being crucified, when as yet that suffering did onely pertaine vnto the flesh, so it might well be sayde:

Thys day thou shalt be with mee in Paradise, when according to the humilitie of hys manhoode in his flesh, hee lay in graue, and according to his soule hee was in the bottome of hell that same day. According to his diuine immutabilitie hee neuer departed from Paradise, because he by his Godhead is alwaies euery wher. Doubt you not therefore that there is Christ Iesus accordinge to hys manhoode, from whence he shall come. Remember it well, & kepe faithfully thy Christian confession: for he rose from the dead, he ascended into heauen, he sitteth at the right hand of the father: neyther will hee come from any other place, then from thence to iudge the quicke and the deade. And he shall come, as the voice of the Angell beareth witnesse, as he was seene to goe into heauen, that is to say, in the selfe same forme and substance of fl•sh, wherunto vndoubtedly hee gaue immortalitie, but hee did not take away the nature therof: According to this fourme of hys flesh he is not to be thought to be euery where And we must take heed that we doe not so affirme the diuinitie of his manhode, that we therby take away the truthe of his body. For it is not a good consequente, that that thinge whych is in God, shoulde so be in euerye place as God. For the Scripture sayeth very truely of vs, that in hym wee liue, mooue, and haue our being: and yet notwithstanding wee are not in euery place as he is, but*that man is otherwise in God, because that God is otherwise in man, by a certayne proper and singular maner of being:*for God and man is one person, and onely Iesus Christ is both. In that he is God, he is in euery place: but in that he is man, he is in heauen.

By whych wordes of holy Augustine, your grace may euidently see, that hee testifieth and teacheth the blessed bodye or flesh of Christ to be no where else then in Heauen. For to it being assumpt or ascended into heauen, God (as hee sayeth) hath geuen immortalitie, but not taken away nature. So that by the nature of that holy fleshe or bodye,*it must occupie one place. Wherefore it followeth: According to thys fourme: that is to witte, of hys fleshe. Christe is not to be thought to be in euery place. For if Christ should in hys humanitie be euery where diffused or spreade abroad, so shoulde hys bodely nature or naturall bodye bee taken from hym. And therefore hee sayeth: For wee muste beware that we doe not so affirme the diuinitie of manne, that we do take away the humanitie of his bodie. But in that hee is God, so is hee euery where, according to my woordes before wrytten: and in that he is manne, so is he in heauen. And therefore it is sayde: For God and man is one person, and onely Iesus Christ is both. Hee in that he is euery where, is God: but in that hee is man, he is in heauen,

And yet do we read agreeable to the same matter, more largely in the same Epistle, by these woordes: Christum Dominum nostrum vnigenitum Dei filium, equalem patri eundemque hominis filium, quo maior est pater, vt vbique totum, praesentem esse non dubites tanquam Deum, & in eodem templo Dei esse tanquam inhabitantem Deum, & in loco aliquo coeli propter veri corporis modum. Thou shalt not doubt Christ our Lorde the onely sonne of God, equall with his father, and the same being the sonne of man whereby the father is greater, is presente euery where as God, and is in one and the same Temple of God as God, and also in some place of heauen as concerning the true shape of hys body.

Thus finde we clearely, that for the measure of his very bodye, he must be in one place, and that in heauen, as concerning hys manhode, and yet euery where present in that he is the eternall sonne of God & equall to his father. Like testimonie doeth he geue in the 30. Treatise that he maketh vpon the Euangelie of Iohn. These be his woordes there wrytten: Donec saeculum finiatur, sursum est Dominus, sed etiam hic est veritas Domini. &c. Vntill the worlde be at an ende, the Lord is aboue, but heere is the truth of the Lorde also, for the body of our Lorde in which hee rose, must be in one place: *but hys trueth is abroad in euery place. The first parcell, that is, vntill the worldes ende, is so put, that it may ioine to the sentence going before, or else to these woordes following: The Lorde is aboue. &c. And so shoulde it well accorde to my sentence before shewed, whyche is, the Lorde is so bodely ascended, that in hys naturall body he cannot againe retourne from heauen vntill the generall dome.

But howsoever the sayde clause or parcel be applied, it shall not greatly skill: for my sentence notwithstanding remaineth full stedfast. In somuch, as the scripture doth mention but of two Aduents or commings of Christe, of which the first is performed in his blessed incarnation, * and the second is y^e coming at the general dome. And furthermore, in this Article of our Creede: From thence shall hee come to iudge the quicke and the dead, is not onely shewed wherfore hee shall come againe, but also when he shall come agayne so that in the meane while, as y^e other Article of our Crede witnesseth: He sitteth at the right hande of God his father, that is not els to say, thē he remaineth in glory with the father. Furthermore, euen as I haue before rehearsed the foresaid authority of Augustine, so haue I read it in his Quinquagenes vpon a Psalme, of whiche I can not now precisely note or name the number. And the same words doth he also write in the Epistle to S. Hierome. So y^t we may know he had good liking in it, that he so commonly doth vse it, as his vsuall prouerbe or by word. *

In the same is also testified, that his blessed body can be but in one place, so that it being now according to the scripture and article of our beliefe or Creede, in heauen it cā not be in earth: and much les can it be in so vnnumerable places of the earth, as we may perceiue that the Sacrament is. Thus, although the body of our Sauior must be in one place, as he writeth agreeably to y^e saying of Peter: Whome the heauens muste receiue vntill the time of the restitution of all thing: Yet as the wordes following make mention: Veritas autem eius vbique diffusa est. But his veritie is scattered euerie where. This verity of Christ, or of his body, * I do take to be that he in other places, doth call Virtus Sacramenti The vertue of the Sacrament. As in the 25. treatise vpon Iohn we finde thus written: Aliud est Sacramentum, aliud virtus Sacramenti. The Sacrament is one thing, & the vertue of the Sacrament, is an other thing. And againe: Si quis manducauerit ex ipso, non moritur, sed qui pertinet ad virtutē sacramēti, nō qui pertinet ad visibile sacramētū. &c. If any mā eat of him he dieth not, but he meaⁿeth of him, which doth apertain to the vertue of the sacramēt, & not of him which pertaineth to the visible sacramēt. And to declare what is the vertue of the sacramēt, y^t I coū^t to be y^e truth of the lord or of his body▪ he saith: Qui māducatur int{us}, nō foris, qui Page 1127 manducat in corde, non qui premit dente. He which eateth inwardly in spirit, not outwardly: he that eateth in hart, and not he which chaweth with teeth.

So that finally, this truth of the Lord or his body, which is dispersed euery where abroad, * is the spirituall profite, fruite, and comforte, that is opened, to bee receiued euery where of all men by faith in the veritie of the Lord, that is to witte, in the very and true promise or Testament made to vs in the Lordes body that was crucified and suffered death for vs, and arose againe ascending immortall into heauen: where he sitteth, that is, abideth on the right hand of his father, from thence not to retourne vntill the generall dome or iudgement. This bodily absence of our Sauior is likewise clearely shewed in the 50. treatise that hee maketh vpon Iohn: where he doth expound this text: Ye haue the poore alwayes with you, *but you shall not alwayes haue mee with you, to my purpose, that thereby I count and holde mine opinion to be rather Catholicke, then theirs that hold the contrary. Finally, the same doth he confirme in his Sermons of the seconde and thirde Feries of Gaster, and in so many places besides forth, as here can not be recited, the number of them is so passing great.

With him consenteth full plainely Fulgentius in hys second booke,* to Trasimundus, writing in this wise: Vnus idemque homo localis ex homine, qui est Deus immensus ex patre Vnus idemque secundum humanam substantiam, absens coelo cum esset in terra, &c. One and the same man being locall, in that he is man which is God almighty of the Father. One and the same according to humane substance, being absent from heauen when he was in the earth, and leauing the earth when he ascended vp into heauen. But according to his diuine and almighty substance, neyther departing from heauen, when hee descended from heauen, neyther leauing the earth, when hee ascended into heauen. The which may well be knowne by the vndoubtfull sayeng of our Lord hymselfe: which that he might the better shewe his humanitie occupyeng a place, sayd vnto hys Disciples: I ascend vp vnto my father and your father, vnto my God and your God. Also when he had sayde of Lazarus: Lazarus is dead, he adioyned sayeng: And I am glad for your sakes, that you may beleue, because I was not there. But shewing the greatenes of hys diuinitie, he sayd to his Disciples: Behold I am with you vnto the ende of the world. For how did he ascend into heauen? but because he is locall and true man? And how is hee present to hys faithfull, but because he is almighty and true God? &c. In thys maner doth he proceede foorth, speaking much, full agreeably to my sentēce, which is now ouerlong here to write. But what can be sayd more plainely in so few words making for me?

First he saith, that Christ being a man, is as concerning his manhead,* locall, that is to say, contained in one place. And to expresse that more clearly, he addeth to it, sayeng: He is one and the same according to his humane substaunce, absente from heauen when he was in earth, and leauing the earthe when he ascended into heauen. Whereas he hath a contrary Antithesis for the godly nature, to shew forth the first point the more effectually. The Antithesis is thus: But according to his diuine and incomparable substaunce,*neither leauing heauen when he descended from heauen, neither forsaking the earth whē he ascended into heauen. Whereby is also confirmed, that I said: Christ did descend and ascend, as touching his humanitie, but not in his Deitie, which is immutable and vnmoueable: as we may perceiue by that he here doth call it, Almighty substance. Furthermore, to shew, that Christ (as touching his humane and naturall body) is locall, and in one place: he alledgeth, and that right iustly, two textes of Scripture. The first is: I ascend to my father, &c. And the second is of Lazarus, I am glad for your sakes, &c.

Finally, he maketh this demaund: But how he did ascend into heauen, but because he is a locall and very man? Whereby we may see, that by this sentence, Christ could not ascend, except he had bene locall, that is, contained in one place, and so very man.* And that is according to S. Augustine, writing as is aboue shewed: And he shall so come (as the Angell witnesseth) euen as you haue seene him going vp into heauen, that is to say, in the same forme and substance of his flesh. According to this forme he is not spread abroad in euery place: for wee must beware that we do not so esteeme his diuinitie, that we thereby doo take awaye the veritie of his bodie. So that they both do testifie, that Christ could not haue ascended, except he had bene locall, that is to witte, contained in one place, and very man: and that if he were not locall, he coulde not be a man. Wherefore Saint Augustine sayeth further, ad Dardanum: Spatia locorum tolle corporibus, & nusquam erunt, & quia nusquam erunt,*nec erunt. That is to witte: Take away localitie, or occupieng of place from bodies, and they shall bee no where: and for because they shall be no where, they shall haue no being at all.

We therfore coueting to find Christ or his natural body, should seeke for him in heauen, where his naturall manhood is sittynge on y^e right hād of his father. So willeth vs S. Ambrose in the x. booke which he writeth vpon Luke, speakyng of Christes humanitie assūpt, in this wise: Ergo, nō supra terram, nec in terra, nec secundū carnem te quaerere debemus, si volumus te inuenire.* &c. Therefore we ought not to seeke thee vpon the earth, nor in the earth, neither accordyng to the flesh, if we will finde thee: for now accordyng to the flesh we do not know Christ. Furthermore, Stephē did not seeke thee vpon the earth, when that he did see thee standyng on the right hand of God the Father. But Mary whiche sought thee vpon the earth, could not touch thee. Stephen touched thee because hee sought thee in heauen. Stephen amōgest the Iewes saw thee beyng absent. &c. Thus we must seeke for the naturall body of Christ, not vpon the earth, but in heauen, if we will not be deceiued. And that doth he more largely shew in the same treatise, speakyng thus of the veritie of Christes body: Quomodo nō corpus quiesceret, in quo manebant insignia vulnerum, vestigia cicatricum, quae Dominus palpanda obtulit? &c. How could it come to passe that the body could not rest in the sepulcher, in whiche the tokens of the woundes and scarres did appeare, which the Lord him selfe did offer to be touched (in whiche doynge hee did not onely stablish the fayth, but also augmēted deuotion?) Because he would rather cary vp into heauen the woundes receaued for vs, and would not put them away, that he might present to God the Father, the price of our libertie. Such a one the Father doth place at his right hād, embracing the triumph and victory of our saluation▪ &c.

Gregory also in an Homely of Pentecost, sayth agreeably to the other, in these wordes: Quando non maneret apud eos, qui ascensu•us coelos, promittit dicens: Ecce ego vobiscū sum omnibus diebus vsque ad consummationem saeculi?* &c. When was it that he did not tary with them, which ascending vp into heauen, promiseth, saying: Behold I am here with you continually vntill the ende of the world? But the word incarnate tarieth and also goeth away. It departeth in body, and tarieth in Diuinitie. And therefore he sayth that he 〈◇〉 with them: euen he which was euer present with them 〈...〉 power, and now departed by his corpora••• 〈...〉 doth he testifie in the Home•y of 〈...〉

With these doth Bede accord in an Homely of 〈◇〉 in which he declareth this text. Ioh. 16. A litle while, and ye shall not see me: And agayne, a litle while and ye shall see me.* And also in an Homely of the vigill of Pētecost. And who can otherwise say or thinke, knowyng the Scripture and our belief, but that the naturall body of Christ is so assūpt into heauen all whole, that it must there abide without returnyng, vntill the generall Iudgement. Notwithstandyng, seyng this is the chief poynt whereupon I seeke to establish my sentence in this matter of the holy Sacramēt, that Christes holy & naturall body is so assumpt into heauen, that there it must remayne all whole without returnyng vntill the generall dome: I will yet with the permission of your grace, adde one or two Arguments deduced out of the Scriptures, to declare further my sentēce to be faythfull and Catholicke.

¶ Argumentes out of Scripture.

First, as Christ was enclosed and so borne about in the wombe of his mother bryng a Uirgin vndefiled,* and after was borne into this world, and put in a maunger, and so he growyng in age did abide in diuerse places, but in one after an other, sometime in Galile, sometime in Samaria, sometime in Iury, sometyme beyond, & sometyme on this side of Iordan, & consequently he was crucified at Hierusalem, there beyng enclosed & buried in a graue, frō whēce he did arise, so that the aungels testified of him: He is risen and is not here. Mathew. 28. and as at the tyme appointed,* after his resurrectiō, he was assumpt or lifted vp into heauen, from the top of the Moūt of Oliuet, in the sight of his Disciples, a cloude compassing him about: Euen so shall he come from the same celestially place corporally, as they did see him to depart out of the one place corporally, accordyng to the testimony of the aūgels. Actes. 1.* So that in this we may vndoubtedly finde that Christ, as touchyng his manhead, can not be corporally in many & diuers places at once, and so to be corporally in his naturall body in heauen and also in the earth, and that it is moreouer, in so many partes of the world, as men haue affirmed.

Neither doth the Scripture require that we should spoyle Christ of the propertie of mans nature,* which is to be in one place, whō the same Scripture doth perpetually witnesse and teach to be man, & so to counfound the condition of his bodily nature, with the nature Diuine. Paul doth teach that Christ in māhead, was made in all pointes lyke vnto his brethren, sinne excepted: how then can his Page 1128 body be in more places at once, vnlike vnto the naturall propertie of the bodies of vs his brethren? But heere doo some wittie Philosophers, yea, rather Sophisters then Diuines, bring in to the annulling of Christes humanitie, a similitude of mans soule whiche beeing one, is yet so all whole in all our whole body, that it is said to be all whole in euery part of the body. But such should remēber, that it is no conuenient similitude which is made of things different and diuerse in nature, such as be the soule and body of man, to proue them to haue like properties. This is as if they woulde proue Christes body to be of one nature and propertie with his soule, & that things naturally corporal, were not most diuers from creatures naturally spirituall.

Furthermore, if so it might be, that the body or fleshe of Christ,* were meerely spirituall, and full like vnto the substance of Angels, yet could it not in this wise follow, that his body could be euery where, or in diuers places at once. Wherefore such subtilties are to be omitted, and the trade of Scripture should well like vs, by whiche the olde Doctors do define, that the body of Iesu exalted or assumpt into heauen, must be locall, circumscrip, and in one place: notwithstanding that the veritie, spirituall grace, & fruite that commeth of it, is diffused and spread abroad in all places, or euery where. How coulde Christ corporally depart out of this world,* and leaue the earth, if he in y^e kinds of bread and wine be not onely corporally contened and receiued, but also there reserued, kept and enclosed? What other thing else do these words testifie, Iohn xiiij. But Iesus knowing that his houre was come, that he should passe out of this world to his father,*&c. And in like forme, Luke 24. And it came to passe, that as he blessed them, he departed from them, and was caried vp into heauen: What doe they signifie, if Christ went not verely out of this worlde, his naturall body being surely assumpt into heauen?

They do therefore vndoubtedly declare that Christ, being very God and very man, did verely depart out of this world in his naturall body, his humanitie being assumpt into heauen, where it remaineth sitting in glory wyth the father: Where as yet his Deitie did not leaue the world, ne depart out from the earth. Paule doth say Philippians 2. that of ij. things he wist not which he might rather choose,* that is to witte, to abide in the flesh for preaching the Gospell, or els to be dissolued from the flesh, seing that to abide with Christ is much and farre better. By the which Paule doth manifestly proue, that they bee not presentlye with Christ, which yet do abide mortall in the flesh. Yet they bee with Christ in suche wise, as the Scripture doth saye that the beleeuing be the Temple of Christ. And as Paule doth say 2. Cor. 13. Do you not know your selues that Iesus Christ is in you? In which sense he also promised to be with vs vnto the end of the world. Christ therefore must be otherwise in that place, in which the Apostle desired to be with him, being dissolued, and departed from his body, then he doth abide either in the supper, or else in any other places of the Churches. He therefore doth vndoubtedly meane heauen, which is the paradise of perfect blisse and glory: Where as Christ being a victour, triumpher, and conquerour ouer death, sinne, and hell, and ouer all creatures, doth reigne & remaine corporally. Thus do I trust that your grace doth see my sentence, this farforth to be right Catholicke, Christen, and faithfull, according to holy scripture, to holy Fathers, and to the Articles of our Christen beliefe. Whiche sentence is thus: Christes naturall body is so assumpt into heauen, where it sitteth or remaineth in glory of the father, that it can no more come from thence, that is to wit, from heauen returne, vntill the end of the world: and therefore can not the same naturall body, naturally be heere in the world, or in the Sacrament: For then should it be departed or gone out of the world,* and yet be still remaining in the world. It should then be both to come, and alreadye come, which is a contradiction, and variaunt from the nature of his manhead.

The second part of this matter.

Now my sentence in the second part of thys matter, is this (if so be your grace shall please to knowe it,* as I your poore and vnworthy, but full true subiect, woulde with all submission and instance beseech you to know it) I graunt the holy sacrament to be the very and naturall body of our Sauour, and his very naturall bloud, and that the naturall body and bloud of our Sauour, is in the Sacrament after a certaine wise, as after shall appeare. For so doe the words of the supper testifie: Take, eate, this is my body which is geuen for you. And againe: Drinke yee all of this, this is my bloud which is of the newe Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sinnes. Of which words, seeing in them dependeth a greate triall and prooue of this matter, and that for the interpretation of them, is and hath bene all controuersie of this matter, I therefore shall shewe the interpretation, that holy Doctours haue made of them, that as to me seemeth, be full woorthy credite.

First,* wee finde in the seconde booke of Tertullian which he writeth against Marcion: Ipse Christus nec panem reprobauit, &c. Christ did not reprove the bread, because it doth represent his body. This Marcion, against whome Tertullian doth thus write, did erroneously reprove all creatures as euill. Whiche thing Tertullian doth improue by the Sacrament, saieng as is aboue written:*Christ did not reprove the bread, which representeth his body. As who woulde saye: If Christ had iudged the bread euill, then woulde hee not haue left it for a signe or sacramente to represent his blessed body. Agreeably to the same doth hee also saye in the fourth booke made againste the saide Marcion in these wordes: Christus acceptum panem & distributum Discipulis, corpus suum illud fecit, &c.Christ made that same bread whiche he tooke and distributed to his Disciples, his body, sayeng: This is my body, that is to say, the figure of my body. But it could not haue bene a figure, vnlesse it were the body of a very true thyng in deede. Furthermore, a voyde thing which is a phantasie, could not receyue a figure or a forme. This Marcion had an erroneous opinion, that Christ had no naturall body, but a body phantasticall. Which error or heresie, this famous Doctor Tertullian doth improue by the holy Sacrament, saing as afore is written, That the Sacramente is a figure of Christes body: Ergo, Christ had a very and true body. For a thing which is vaine and fantasticall, can receiue no figure. So that in both places we may clearely perceiue his interpretation of these wordes: Thys is my bodye: Whiche interpretation is not new but authentike or full auncient, like as is the Writer. And this interpretation do I the rather allow, because none of the olde Doctours,* whiche folowed him, did euer improue hym therefore, but rather haue folowed it, as appeareth by holy Augustine. In the Preface vpon the third Psalme, doth the sayde Augustine highly commend the wonderfull sufferance of Christ, which so long did suffer and forbear Iudas, as if hee had bene a good and an honest man: where as notwithstanding he did knowe his trayterous thoughtes,* when hee receyued hym to the feast or supper, in which he dyd commend and delyuer to his Disciples, the figure of his body and bloud. The wordes of Austen in Latine, be these. In historia noui Testamenti,* ipsa Domini nostri tanta & tam admiranda patientia erat, quòd eum tādīu pertulit tanquā bonū, &c. In the story of the new testament, the patience of our Lorde was so great, and so to be marueiled at, because hee suffered Iudas so long as a good man, when as he knewe his thoughtes when he rereceiued him to the feast, in the which he did commende and deliuer the figure of his body and bloud to his disciples.

The same holy Doctour also wryting agaynste Adamantius, saith thus: Non enim dubitauit Dominus dicere,* hoc est corpus meum, cūm daret signum corporis sui: For the Lorde did not doubt to say: This is my body, when he gaue a signe of his body. And for a further declaration of the same Chapter, he saith: Sic enim sanguis est anima, quomodo petra erat Christus, &c. For the bloud is so the soule, as the rocke was Christe. Notwithstanding hee dothe not saye, that the rocke did signifie Christ: but he doth say that the rocke was Christ.

Expressely doth Augustine here call the signe of Christes body, his body, playnely interpreting these words, This is my body, as both he and Tertullian did before.

Moreouer, he taketh these three sentences: This is my body: The soule is the bloud: and Christ was the stone,* to be of one phrase, and to be like speaches, or to be expounded, after one fashion. And this texte: The rocke was Christe doth hee commonly thus expounde: The rocke did signifie Christ, as appeareth Lib. 18. de Ciuitate Dei. Cap. 48. Also in the booke of Questions vppon Genesis,* and in the booke of Questions vppon Leuiticus, handling the 28. Chapter of Iohn: and in his Sermon of the Annuntiation of oure Lady.

In like maner also Saint Hierome expoundeth it in the small scholies, written vpon the first chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians,* and all other writers with one consent, so far as I can reade: and so doth the text require it to be expounded. For Christe was not a naturall stone, as all men may well perceyue, and yet was hee the verye true stone figuratiuely, as Lyra sayth: Solet res quae significat, nomine rei quam significat, nominari: The thing which signifieth is wont to be called by the name of the thing whiche it doth signifie. And so is the stone signifieng Christe,* called Christe, whiche thereby is signified. And as hee doth approoue this text, The stone was Christ, likewise doth hee expounde: The bloud is the soule, wyth the whiche hee dooth knit thys texte: This is my body, to be figuratiuely expounded, as they be. According to this, doth the holy Doctour Page 1129 write,* Psalme 50. Nisi quis manducauerit carnem meam, non videbit vitam aeternam, &c. Vnlesse a man doo eate my flesh, hee shall not see eternall life. They vnderstoode that very foolishly, and conceyued the same carnally, and thought that oure Lorde woulde cutte awaye lumpes or peeces of his body, and geue to them. And they sayd: This is an hard sayeng. But they were hard of beliefe, and not the sayeng. For if they had not bene hard, but meeke, they would haue sayd to them selues: He speaketh not this without a cause, but because there is some hyd Sacramente or mysterie therein. They shoulde haue aboden with hym, easie of beliefe, and not hard, and then shoulde they haue learned of him that which other learned, that tarried, after they were gone awaye.

In this may we see, that our Sauour willeth his precious flesh to be eaten. But for the maner of eating, is, and hath bene much controuersie. The Iewes of Capernaum were offended with Christ, when he sayd, he woulde haue his flesh eaten: and except a man shoulde eate hys flesh, hee could not come to lyfe eternall.* They supposed grossely, and vnderstoode hym (if a man might so playnely speake it) butcherly, that he would cut out lumpes and peeces out of his body, as the butcher doth out of dead beastes, and so geue it them to eate of, as Augustine dooth heere say. And vpon this grosse, or (as holy Augustine doth heere call it) foolish and fleshly vnderstanding, they were offended, and sayde to him: This is a sore or hard sayeng. They did shoote foorth their bolt, and vnwise sayeng ouer soone, and were offended before they had cause. They tooke that for hard and sore, which shoulde haue bene passing pleasaunt and profitable to them, if they would haue heard the thing declared throughly to the end.

And euen so now, that whiche in this matter maye appeare at the first blush, a sore, strange, and intollerable sentence, for as much as we haue not heard of it before, but the contrary hath of long time ben beaten into our heads, and perswaded to our mindes, yet by deliberation and indifferent, and abiding a triall of that which at the first may appeare sore and intollerable, shal (I trust) be found a sweete truth, to such specially as your grace is, louing to heare & to knowe all truth. But the Capernautes were hard, as here sayth Augustine, and not the worde. For if they had not bene hard, but soft and pacient to heare, they woulde haue said in themselues, Christ sayeth not this without a cause, and there is some hid misterie therein: and so by pacient •ariance, they shoulde haue knowne the trueth, that they coulde not attaine to, for peruerse hastines, or haste, which is a great stoppe and let of true iudgement.* But the Disciples taried patiently to heare further, and so did they knowe this speach of Christ to be the words of life, that to the other, ouer readily departing from Christ, were words of death:.* For they tooke them literally and grossely, and the letter (as Paule sayth) slayeth.

But to shewe what the Disciples remayning wyth Christ did learne, saint Augustine doth consequently shew by the wordes of the Gospell, saieng thus: Ille autem instruxit eos, & ait illis: Spiritus est qui viuificat, caro nihil prodest, &c. But he instructed them, and sayd vnto them: The Spirite is that which geueth life, the fleshe profiteth nothing. The words that I haue spoken vnto you, are spirite and life. Vnderstand you that which I haue spoken, spiritually. You shall not eate this body which you see, neyther shall you drinke that same bloud which they shall shed foorth, that shall crucifie mee. I haue set foorth to you a certayne Sacrament or mysterie, which beeing spiritually vnderstande, shall geue you lyfe: and although it be requisite that this be celebrated visibly, yet it ought to be vnderstād inuisibly. In thys do we see,* that both Christ and Augustine would haue Christes wordes to be vnderstande spiritually, and not carnally: figuratiuely, and not literally, and therefore doth he say: You shall not eate this body whiche you see, neyther shall you drinke that same bloud which they shall shed foorth that shall crucifie mee. And what else is this, but that Christ would his body to be eaten, and his bloud to be drunken: But he would not his bodie to be carnally eaten, whyche was materially seene of them to whome he spake, nor hys materiall or naturall bloud to be carnally drunken, which hys crucifiers shoulde cause to issue from his naturall bodye crucified,* as sayeth Augustine: but hee ordeyned and willed his bodye and bloud to bee spiritually eaten and drunken in faith and beliefe, that his body was crucified for vs, and that his bloud was shed for the remission of our sinnes.

This eating and drinking is nothing but suche true fayth and beliefe as is shewed. Wherefore as Christ sayth: He that eateth my fleshe, and drinketh my bloud, hath lyfe euerlastyng. Euen so doth he saye: He that beleueeth in mee, hath lyfe euerlastyng. And Saint Augustine agreeably to the same,* treating vpon Iohn, doth say: At quid paras dentem & ventrem? Crede, & manducasti, &c. Why dost thou prepare thy teeth and belly? Beleue, and thou hast eaten. I do know that Christ ordeineth his Sacrament to be receiued and eaten, which is in a certayne wise called his body, as after shalbe more largely opened: but the same doth not feede y^e mynde of them, except it be takē spiritually & not corporally. Heb. 13. It is good to stablish the hart with grace, & not with meat.

And S. Augustine assentyng to the same, doth say in a Sermō, that he maketh vpō these wordes,* in the Gospell of Luke: Lord teache vs to pray. Panem dixit, sed Epiouision, hoc est supersubstantialem. &c. He sayd bread, but supersubstantiall bread. This is not the bread, which goeth into the body: but that bread whiche doth satisfie the substaunce of our soule. Our soules therfore, into whom nothyng corporall, can corporally enter, doth not carnally receiue the body & bloud of our Sauour, neither did he ordeine his blessed body and bloud so to be eaten and drunken. Although our soules can not lyue, except they be spiritually fedde with the blessed body and bloud of him, spiritually eatyng and drinkyng them, in takyng also at tymes conuenient,* the blessed Sacrament, whiche is truely called his body and bloud: Not that it is so really, but as is shewed by the interpretation both of Tertullian & Augustine, because it is a signe or figure of Christes body and bloud. And the signes or Sacramentes both commonly, as sayeth Augustine, both ad Bonifacium, and in his worke, De Ciuitate Dei,* take their denomination of the thynges by them represented and signified.

But for somuch as some will object, that Augustine in the worde afore rehearsed, doth not speake of eatyng the Sacrament, for the text of the Scripture, vpon the which he doth ground, is not spoken by eatyng the Sacrament, whiche text is this: Vnlesse a man eate my flesh. &c I aunswere, that true it is, he began of spirituall eatyng, and thereto serueth the text recited. Neuerthelesse,* he meaneth that Christ is not ordeyned to be eaten, either without the Sacrament, or in the Sacrament, but spiritually of the faythfull: as more euidently doth appeare by these wordes there folowyng: Sacramentum aliquod vobis commendauī, quod spiritualiter intellectum viuificabit vos. &c. I haue commēded vnto you a Sacrament, which beyng vnderstand of you spiritually, shall quicken you. Although it were necessary that the same should be celebrated visibly, yet notwithstanding it ought to be vnderstand inuisibly.

Here doth hee shewe, that hee meaneth of eatyng, not without the Sacrament onely, but also in the Sacramēt: And therefore he doth not onely say, I haue commended vnto you a certaine Sacrament. &c. But he addeth moreouer. Although it is requisite the same to be celebrate visibly. How therefore can the eatyng of Christ, and the Sacramēt therof be visibly celebrate, but in the Maūdy, or in his Supper? Which is celebrate visibly in visible thynges of bread and wine: which can not quicken or relieue vs and our soules, except they be vnderstand and so recieued spiritually.

Furthermore, as concernyng the Exposition of these wordes of the Supper, This is my body &c.* S. Augustine writyng to Bonifacius, sayth thus: Sepè ita loquimur, vt Pascha appropinquāte, crastinam vel perendinam Domini passionem dicamus. &c. We vse oftentimes this maner of phrase, that when Easter doth approche,*we name the day that commeth after, or the next day after that, the Passion of the Lord, when as he notwithstanding had suffered before that, many yeares: neither that Passion was done but once for all. So truly do we say vpon the Lordes day: This day the Lord hath risen, when so many yeares are past since he rose. Wherefore no man is so fonde, that he will reprove vs as lyers, for this maner of speakyng, because we call these dayes accordyng to the similitude of those, in which these thynges were done: so that it is called the same day which is not the same, but by course of tyme of the yeare commyng about, is like vnto it: and also because that thing is sayd to be done that day, through the celebration of the Sacramēt, whiche was not done that day, but long before that tyme. Was not Christ once offered vp in him selfe? And yet notwithstanding he is not onely offered vp in the Sacrament, in the solemne feastes of Easter, but euery day mystically for the people. Neither doth he make a lye, which beyng demaunded, aunswereth, that Christ is offered vppe. For if the Sacramentes had not a certaine similitude of those thynges whereof they are Sacramentes, then should they be no Sacramentes at all. By reason of this similitude or likenesse, Sacramētes oftentimes do receiue the names of the selfe same thynges, wherof they are Sacramentes.

Therefore, as after a certaine maner, the Sacrament of Christes body, is the body of Christe,*and the Sacrament of Christes bloud, is the bloud of Christ: euen likewise the Sacrament of fayth, is fayth For to beleue is none other thyng, then to haue fayth. And by this it is aunswered, that the very infantes haue fayth, because of the Sacrament of fayth, and conuert them selues vnto God, because of the Sacrament of Page 1130 conuersion: for the very answeare it selfe doth appertayne vnto the celebration of the Sacrament: as the Apostle speaketh of Baptisme. For he sayth, We are buried by Baptisme, into death. He doth not say, we haue signified a burieng, but he playnely saith we are buried. Therefore he named the sacrament of so weightie a matter or thing by no other name, but by the very name of the thing it selfe.

Nothing can be more playnely spoken, nor more agreeably to the natural vnderstanding of the texts of the Supper, and to the exposition afore shewed, of Tertullian and of himselfe. For seeing that Christ is bodily in heauen, and so absent from the earth, it is needefull to know, howe the holy Sacrament, which he doth call his body and bloud, should be his body and bloud.

This holy Doctor therefore Augustine, doth this matter manifestly and sincerely declare by other like speeches, and first by common speeches,* and secondly by speeches of Scripture. The common speech is this: We do (sayth he) vse often to say, that when Easter doth approach to drawe nigh, to morrowe or the next daye, is the Lordes Passion, whereas he did suffer afore many yeares past, and that passion was neuer but once done.

The second common speache is, And of that Sondaye wee saye, that this day the Lorde did rise from deathe, whereas so many yeares be yet past sith the time he arose. Wherefore, to conclude he saith: No man is so foolish, that he will reprove vs for so saieng, or to saye, that we haue lyed, for because we do call these daies after the similitude of those, in which these things were done. So that it is called the same day, not for that it is the selfesame, but by reuolution of time, like vnto it. And the resurrection is sayd to be done in the same day, through the celebrating of the Sacrament of that which is not done that day, but long time afore past.

The third speache: was not Christ offered vp once for all in his owne person? Yet is he neuerthelesse offered in the Sacrament mystically for the people,* not onely euery yeare at the feast of Easter, but also euery daye. Neyther doth he lie, which when he is demanded, shal answer, that he is offered vp or sacrificed. For if the Sacramentes had not a certaine similitude of those thinges, of which they be Sacraments, then shoulde they be no Sacraments at all. By reason of which similitude, they do for the most parte receiue the denomination or name of those thinges signified. And therefore after a certaine maner, the Sacrament of Christes body, is the body of Christ, and the Sacrament of Christes bloud,* is the bloud of Christ, and so also be the Sacraments of faith, called faith.

This doth he yet proue by an other example of speach, which is this: It is none other thing to beleue, then to haue fayth. And therfore when answeare is made, that the infantes haue fayth, which in deede haue it not in ful working, it is answeared, that suche haue faith for the Sacrament of faith, and that they doo conuert themselues vnto fayth, for the Sacrament of Conuersion. For the very answeare it selfe doth pertaine to the celebration of the Sacrament, &c. Thus doth it sufficiently appeare, that as we vse truely to call that good Friday, or the day of Christes passion, which is not in deede the day of Christes Passion, but onely a memoriall thereof once done for euer: and as we vse to call the next Easter day, the daye of Christes resurrection, not because that Christ in the same daye shall arise, but only for a memoriall of his resurrectiō once done for euer, and that of long time passed.

And Christ beeing offered vp once for all in his owne proper person, is yet sayde to be offered vp, not only euery yeare at Easter, but also euery day in the celebration of the Sacrament, because his oblation once for euer made, is thereby represented. Euen so (saith Augustine) is the Sacramēt of Christes body, the body of Christ, and the sacrament of Christes bloud, the bloud of Christ, in a certayne wise or fashion.* Not that the Sacrament is his naturall body or bloud in deede, but that it is a memoriall or representation thereof, as the dayes before shewed, be of his verye and naturall body crucified for vs, and of his precious bloud shed for the remission of our sinnes. And thus be the holy signes or Sacramentes truely called by the names of the very thinges in them signified. But why so? For they (saith Augustine) haue a certaine similitude of those things wherof they be signes or Sacraments, for else they should be no Sacraments at all: And therefore do they commonly, and for the most part receiue the denomination of the things whereof they be Sacraments.

So that we may manifestly perceiue that he calleth not the Sacrament of Christes body and bloud, the very body and bloud of Christ, but as he sayd before. But yet he sayth in a certaine maner or wise: Not that the Sacramente absolutely and plainely, is his naturall body or bloud. For this is a false argument of Sophistrie, which they call, Secundum quid ad simpliciter, that is to say,* that the Sacramēt of Christes body, is in a certaine wise, the body of Christe, Ergo, it is also playnely and expressly the naturall body of Christ. For such an other reason might this be also: Christ is after a certayne maner, a Lion, a Lambe, and a doore: Ergo, Christe is a naturall Lion and Lambe, or materiall doore. But the Sacrament of Christes body and bloud, is therefore called his body and bloud, because it is thereof a memoriall, signe, sacrament, token, & representation, spent once for our redemption. Which thing is further expounded by an other speech, that he doth heere consequently allege of baptisme: Sicut de ipso baptismo apostolus dicit, &c.

The Apostle (quoth Augustine) sayeth not, we haue signified buryeng, but he sayeth vtterly, we be buried with Christ, For else should all false Christians be buried wyth Christ from sinne, which yet do liue in all sinne. And therefore saith Augustine immediately therupon, he called therfore the sacrament of so great a thing, by none other name, then of the thing it selfe. Thus (O moste gracious and godly prince) do I confesse and knowledge, that the bread of y^e sacrament is truely Christes body, and the wyne to be truely his bloud, according to the wordes of the institution of the same Sacrament: but in a certaine wise, that is to wit, figuratiuely, sacramētally, or significatiuely, according to the exposition of the Doctours before recited, & heereafter folowing. And to this exposition of the old Doctours, am I enforced, both by the articles of my Creede, and also by the circumstances of the sayde Scripture, as after shall more largely appeare. But by the same can I not finde the natural body of our Sauour to be there naturally, but rather absent, both from the sacrament, & from all the world, collocate and remaining in heauen, where he by promise must abide corporally, vnto the end of the world.

The same holy Doctor writing agaynst one Faultus, sayth in like manner:Si Machabaeos cum ingenti admiratione praeferimus, quia escas quibus nunc Christiani licitè vtuntur, attingere noluerunt (quia pro tempore tunc Prophetico non licebat) quanto nunc magis pro Baptismo Christi, pro Eucharistia Christi, pro signo Christi, &c.* If we doo preferre wyth greate admiration the Machabees, because they would not once touche the meates which Christian men now lawfully vse to eate of, for that it was not lawfull for that tyme then beyng propheticall, that is, in the tyme of the olde Testament: how muche rather now ought a Christian to be more ready to suffer all things for the Baptisme of Christ, and for the Sacrament of thankesgiuing, and for the signe of Christe, seeyng that those of the old Testamente were the promises of the things to be complete and fulfilled, and these Sacramentes in the newe Testamente are the tokens of things complete and finished? In this do I note, that according to the expositions before shewed, he calleth the Sacrament of Baptisme, and the Sacrament of Christes body & bloud, otherwise properly named Eucharistia, signum Christi, and that in the singular number,* for as much as they both do signifie welnigh one thing. In both them is testified the death of our Saueour. And moreouer, he calleth them Indicia rerum completarum: that is to wyt, The tokens or benefits that we shall receiue by the beliefe of Christe for vs crucified. And them doth he call vsually both the sacraments, signum Christi, in the singular number. And as the same Saint Augustine in his fiftie treatise vpon the Gospel of Saint Iohn teacheth, where he sayeth thus: Si bonus es, si ad corpus Christi pertines, (quod significat Petrus) habes Christum, & in praesenti, & in futuro. In praesenti per fidem, &c. If thou be good,*if thou pertayne to the body of Christ (which this word, Petrus, doth signifie) then hast thou Christ both heere presente, and in time to come: Heere presente through fayth: heere presente by the signe and figure of Christe: heere presente by the Sacrament of Baptisme: heere presente by the meate and drinke of the altar, &c.

More there was that Iohn Lambert wrote to the king, but thus much onely came to our hands.

The death of Robert Packington.

AMong other actes and matters passed and done thys present yeare,* which is of the Lorde 1538. heere is not to be silenced the vnworthy and lamentable death of Robert Packington, Mercer of London,* wrought and caused by the enemies of Gods worde, and of all good proceedings. The story is this: The said Robert Packington, being a man of substance, and dwelling in Chepeside, vsed euery day at fiue of the clocke, Winter and Sommer, to goe to prayer at a Churche then called S. Thomas of Acres, but now named Mercers Chappell. And one morning amongst all other, being a great mistie morning, such as hath seldōe bin seene, euen as he was crossing y^e streate from his house to the Churche, he was sodenly murthered Page 1131 with a gunne, which of y^e neighbours was plainly heard: and by a great nūber of labourers standing at Soper lane end, he was both seene go foorth of his house, and the clap of the gunne was heard, but the deede dooer was a greate while vnespied and vnknowne. Although manye in the meane time were suspected, yet none could be founde faulti• therein. The murtherer so couertly was conueied, tyll at length by the confession of Doctour Incent Deane of Paules in his death bed, it was knowne, and by him confessed, y^t he himselfe was the authour thereof, by hiring an Italian for lx. crownes or thereabout,* to do the feate. For the testimonie whereof, and also of the repentaunt wordes of the said Incent, the names both of thē which heard him confesse it, and of thē which heard the witnesses report it, remayne yet in memorie, to be produced, if neede required.

The cause why he was so litle fauored with the clergie, was this, for that he was known to be a mā of great courage, & one that could both speake, & also would be heard: for at y^e same time he was one of the burgesses of the Parlamēt for the city of Londō, & had talked somewhat against the couetousnes & cruelty of the clergie, wherefore he was had in cōtempt with them, and was thought also to haue some talke with the King, for the whiche he was the more had in disdaine with them, & murthered by the sayde Doctour Incent, for his labour, as hath bene aboue declared.

And thus muche of Rob. Packington, whiche was the brother of Austen Packington aboue mentioned, who deceiued bishop Tonal, in bying the new translated Testament of Tyndall. Whose pitious murther, although it was priuie and soden, yet hath it so pleased the Lorde, not to keepe it in darkenes, but to bring it at length to light.

The burning of one Collins at London.

NEither is here to be omitted the burning of one Collins, sometime a Lawyer & a Gentleman, which suffered the fire this yeare also in Smithfielde,* anno. 1538. Whom although I do not here recite, as in the number of Gods professed martyrs, yet neither do I thinke him to be cleane sequestred from the companie of the Lordes saued flocke and family, notwithstanding that y^e bish. of Romes Church did condemne and burne him for an heretike: but rather do recount him therefore, as one belonging to the holy company of Saints. At leastwise this case of hym and of his end may be thought to be such, as may well reprove and condemne their crueltie and madnesse, in burning so without all discretion, this man being madde and distract of his perfect wittes, as he then was, by this occasion as heere followeth.

This Gentleman had a wife of exceeding beautie and comelines, but notwithstanding of so light behaue our and vnchaste conditions (nothing correspondent to the grace of her beautie) that she forsaking her husband, whiche loued her entirely, betok her self vnto another paramour. Which thing when he vnderstood, he tooke it very greeuously and heauily, more then reason woulde. At the last being ouercome with exceedyng dolour and heauynesse, he fell mad, beyng at that tyme a student of the law in London. When he was thus rauished of his wittes, by chaunce hee came into a Church where a Priest was a saying Masse, & was come to the place where they vse to hold vp and shewe the Sacrament.

Collins beyng beside his wittes, seyng the Priest holdyng vp the host ouer his head, & shewing it to the people,* he in like maner counterfeityng the Priest, tooke vp a litle dogge by the legges, and held him ouer his head, shewyng him vnto the people. For this he was by and by brought vnto examination, and condēned to the fire, and was burned, and the dogge with him, the same yeare of our Lord in the which Iohn Lambert was burned. 1538.

*The burnyng of Cowbridge at Oxford. anno. 1538.

With this foresayd Collins, may also be adioyned the burnyng of Cowbridge, who likewise beyng mad,* & beside his right senses, was either the same, or the next yeare folowyng, condēned by Longland, Byshop of Lyncolne, and committed to the fire by him to be burnt at Oxford. What his opinions and Articles were, wherewith he was charged, it needeth not here to rehearse. For as he was then a man mad, and destitute of sense and reason, so his wordes and saynges could not be sound. Yea rather, what wise man would euer collect Articles agaynst him, whiche sayd, he could not tell what?*_ And if his Articles were so horrible and madde, as Cope in his Dialogues doth declare them, then was he in my iudgement, a man more fitte to be sent to Bethlehem, then to bee had to the fire in Smithfield to be burned. For what reason is it to require reason of a creature madde or vnreasonable, or to make heresie of the wordes of a senselesse man, not knowyng what he affirmed.

But this is the maner and propertie of this holy mother Church of Rome, that what soeuer commeth in their handes and inquisition, to the fire it must. There is no other way: neither pitie that will moue, nor excuse that will serue, nor age that they will spare, nor any respect almost that they consider: as by these two miserable exāples both of Collins and Cowbridge, it may appeare. Who rather should haue bene pitied, and all wayes conueniēt sought, how to reduce the seely wretches into their right myndes agayne, according as the true Pastours of Israell be commaūded by the spirite of God, to seeke agayne the thynges that be last, to bynd vp the thynges that be broken &c. and not so extremely to brust the thyngs that be bruised before. But to ende with this matter of Cowbridge,* what soeuer his madnesse was before, or how soeuer erroneous his Articles were (whiche for the fonde fantasies of them, I do not expresse) yet as touching his end, this is certaine, that in the midst of the flame, he lifyng vp his head to heauen, soberly and discretly called vpon the name of the Lord Iesus Christ, and so departed.

¶William Leiton and Puttedew Martyrs.

ABout the same tyme & yeare, or not much before,* when Iohn Lābert suffered at London, there was one Puttedew also condemned to the fire, about the parts of Suffolke, who commyng into the Church, and meryly tellyng the Priest, that after he had dronke vp all the wyne alone, he afterwarde blessed the hungry people with the emptie Chalice, was for the same immediately apprehended, and shortly after burned, leauyng to vs an experiment.*Quàm parum sit tutum ludere cum sanctis, as the olde saying was then: but rather as we may see now. Quàm male tutum sit ludere cum impijs.

The other, Williā Leyton, was a Mōke of Aye, in the Countie of Suffolke & was burned at Norwich, for speakyng agaynst a certaine Idole,* which was accustomed to be carried about the Processions at Aye: & also for holding that the Sacramentall Supper ought to bee administred in both kyndes, about the yeare and tyme aforesayd.

¶The burnyng of one Peke at Ipswich.

IN the burnyng of an other Suffolke man,* named N. Peke dwellyng sometye at Earlestoneh•, and burnt at Ipswich, somewhat before the burnyng of these aforesayd thus I finde it recorded and testified: That when as hee beyng fast bound to a stake, and Furse set on fire round about him, was so scor•hed, that he was as blacke as soote, one Doctour Redyng there stāding before him, with Doctour Heyre and Doct. Springwell, hauyng a long white, wand in his hand, did knocke him vpon the right shoulder, Page 1132 and sayd, Peke, recant, and beleue that the Sacrament of the aultar, is the very body of Christ, fleshe, bloud, and bone, after that the Priest hath spoken the words of Consecration ouer it, and heere haue I in my hande to absolue thee for thy misbeliefe that hath ben in thee, hauing a scrole of paper in his hande. When he had spoken these wordes, Peke answered, and sayde, I defie it and thee also, & with a great violence he spit from him very bloud, whiche came by reason y^t his vaynes brake in his body for extreame anguishe. And when the sayde Peke had so spoken, then D. Reding sayd: To as many as shall cast a sticke to the burning of this heretique,* is graunted fortye dayes of pardon by my Lord Byshop of Norwich. Then Barne Curson, Sir Iohn Audley Knight, with many others of estimation being there present, did rise from their seates, and wyth their swords did cut downe boughes, and throw them into the fire, and so did all the multitude of the people.

[illustration]

Witnes Iohn Ramsey and others, who did see this acte.

In the yeare last before this, whiche was of the Lorde. 1537. it was declared how Pope Paul the third indicted a general Councel to be holden at Mantua.* Whereunto the king of England among other Princes being called, refused either to come or to sende at the Popes call, and for defence of himselfe, directed out a publike Apologie or Protestation, rendring iust and sufficient matter, why neyther he would, nor was bound to obey the Popes commandement. Which Protestation is before to be read, page. 1084. This Councell appointed to begin the 23. daye of Maye, the yeare aforesayde, was then stopped by the Duke of Mantua, pretending that hee woulde suffer no Councell there, vnlesse the Pope would fortifie the Citie with a sufficient armye, &c. For whiche cause the Pope proroged the sayd Councell, to be celebrate in the moneth of Nouember folowing, appointing at y^e first no certaine place. At length named and determined the citie of Uincence (lyeng within the dominion of the Uenetians) to be the place for the Councell▪ Whereunto when the King (the yeare next folowing, which is this present yeare of the Lorde 1538.) was requested by the Emperour and other states, to resort eyther hymselfe, or to sende: he agayne refusing (as hee dyd before) sendeth this Protestation in waye of defence and aunswere for hymselfe, to the Emperour and other Christen princes: the copie and effect whereof heere vnder foloweth, and is this.

Henry the eight by the grace of God, King of Englande and Fraunce, &c. saluteth the Emperour, Christian princes, and all true Christen men, desiring peace and concord amongst them.

WHereas not long sithens, a booke came forth in our and al our Counsailes names,* which cōteined many causes why we refused the Councell, then by the Byshop of Romes vsurped power first indicted at Mantua,* to be kept the xxiiij. day of May, after proroged to Nouember, no place appoynted where it should be kept, and whereas the same booke doth sufficiently proue, that our cause could take no hurt,* neither with any thing done or decreed in such a company of addict men to one sect, nor in any other Councell called by his vsurped power: we thinke it nothing necessarie so oft to make newe protestations,* as the Bishop of Rome and his Courts by suttletie and craft, do inuent wayes to mocke the world, by newe pretensed generall Councils. Yet notwithstanding, because that some things haue now occurred, either vpon occasion geuen vs by change of the place, or else through other consideratiōs, which now being knowne to the worlde, may do muche good, we thought we should do but euen as that loue enforceth vs, which we owe vnto Christes fayth and religion, to adde this Epistle. And yet we protest,* that we neyther put forthe that booke, neither yet wee woulde this Epistle to be set afore it, that thereby we should seeme lesse to desire a generall Councell, then any other Prince or Potentate, but rather to be more desirous of it, so it were free for all partes, and vniuersall. And further, wee desire all good Princes, Potentates, and people, to esteeme and thinke that no Prince would more willingly be presente at such a Councell then we: suche a one we meane, as we speake of in our protestation made concerning the Councell of Mantua.

Truely as our forefathers inuented nothyng more holyer then generall Councils, vsed as they ought to be, so there is almost nothing that may do more hurt to y^e Christian cōmon wealth, to y^e faith, to our religion,* then general Coūcels, if they be abused to lucre, to gaines, to y^e establishment of errorrs. They be called general, and euen by their name do admonish vs, that all Christen mē which do dissent in any opinion, may in thē openly, frankly, & without feare of punishment or displeasure, say their mind. For seeinge suche thyngs as are decreed in generall Councils, touche equally all men that geue assent thereunto, it is meete that euery man may boldly say there, that hee thinketh. And verily we suppose, that it ought not to be called a generall Councell, where alonely those men are heard, which are determined for euer, in all pointes, to defend the Popish parte, and to arme themselves to fight in the Byshop of Romes quarrell, though it were against God and his Scriptures. It is no generall Councell, neyther it ought to be called generall, where the same men be onely Aduocates and aduersaries: the same accused and iudges.* No it is against the lawe of nature, either that we shoulde condescend to so vnreasonable a law against our selues, eyther that we should suffer our selues to be lefte without all defence, and beeing oppressed with greatest iniuries, to haue no refuge to succour our selues at. The Byshop of Rome and his, be our great enemies, as wee and all the world may well perceyue by his doings.

He desireth nothing more then our hurt, and the destruction of our Realme: Do not we then violate the iudgement of nature, if we geue him power and authoritie to be our Iudge?*_ His pretended honor first gotten by superstition, after encreased by violence, & other waies as euill as that: his power set vp by pretence of religion, in deed both against religion, and also contrary to the word of God: his primacie borne by the ignorancie of the world, nourished by the ambition of Bishops of Rome, defended by places of Scripture falsely vnderstande: these three things (wee say) which are fallen with vs, and are like to fall in other Realmes shortly, shall they not be established agayne, if he may decide our cause as him lusteth? if he may at his pleasure oppresse a cause most righteous, and set vp his, most against truth? Certainly he is very blinde, that seeth not, what ende we may looke for of our controuersies, if suche our enemy may geue the sentence.

We desire, if it were in any wise possible, a Councell, where some hope may be, that those things shall be restored, which now being deprauate, are like (if they be not amended) to be the vtter ruine of Christian Religion. And as we do desire suche a Councell, and thinke it meete that all men in all their praiers should desire & craue it of God: euen so we thinke it pertaineth vnto our office, to prouide both that these Popishe subtilties hurte none of oure subiects, and also to admonishe other Christian Princes,* that the Bishop of Rome may not by their consente, abuse the authoritie of kings, either by the extinguishing of the true preaching of Scripture (that now we beginneth to spryng, to growe, and spreade abroad) eyther to the troubling of Princes liberties, to the diminishing of Kings authorities, and to the great blemish of their princely maiestie. We doubt nothing but a Reader not parcial, wyll soone approue such things as we heere write, not so muche for our excuse, as that the worlde may perceiue both the sundrye Page 1133 deceites, craftes, and subtleties of the papistes, & also how much we desire that controuersies in religion may once be taken away.

All that we sayde there of Mantua, may here well be spoken of Uincence.* They do almost agree in al poyntes. Neither is it like, that there will be any more at this coucell at Uincence, then were the last yere at Mantua. Truly he is worthy to be deceiued, y^t being twice mocked, wyll not beware the third time. If any this last yere made forth toward Mantua, and being halfe on theyr way, then perceiued that they had taken vpon them that iourney in vayne, we do not think them so foolish, that they will here after ride farre out of towne to be mocked. The time also and the state of thinges is such, that matters of Religion may rather now be brought further in trouble (as other thinges are) thē be commodiously intreated of and decided. For whereas in maner the whole world is after such sorte troubled with warres,* so incombred with the great preparations that the Turke maketh, can there be any man so against the setling of religion, that he will thinke this time meet for a generall Councell? Undoubtedly it is meer that such controuersies as we haue with the Bishop of Rome, be taken as they are, that is, much greater then that they may either be discussed in this so troublesome a time, or els be committed vnto proctors, without our great ieopardy, albeit the time were neuer so quiet.

What other princes will doe, we can not tell: but we will neither leaue our realme at this time,* neither wil we trust any Proctor with our cause, wherein the whole stay and wealth of our Realme standeth, but rather we will be at the handling thereof our selfe. For except both an other Iudge be agreed vpon for those matters, and also a place more commodious be prouided for the debating of our cau'ses, albeit all other thinges were as we would haue them, yet may we lawfully refuse to come or send any to this pretended Councel. We will in no case make him our arbeter, which not many yeres past, our cause not heard, gaue sentence agaynst vs. We will that such doctrine, as we folowing y^e Scripture, do professe, be rightly examined, discussed, and brought to the Scripture, as to the onely touchstone of true learning.

We will not suffer them to be abolished, ere euer they be dicussed,* ne to be oppressed, before they be known: much lesse we will suffer them to be troden down being so clearly true. No, as there is no iote in Scripture, but we will defend it, though it were with ieopardy of our life, and peril of this our Realme: so is there nothing that doth oppresse this doctrine, or obscure it, but we will be at continuall warre therew^t. As we haue abrogated al old popish traditions in this our Realme, which eyther did help his tyranny, or encrease his pride: so if the grace of God forsake vs not,* we will well foresee, that no new naughty traditions be made with our consent, to blinde vs or our Realme.

If mē will not be willingly blind, they shall easily see euen by a due and euident prooffe in reason, though grace doth not yet by the word of Christ enter into them, how small the authority of the Bishop of Rome is, by the lawfull deniall of the Duke of Mantua for the place. For if the Bishop of Rome did earnestly intend to keepe a Coucell at Mantua, and hath power by the law of God, to call Princes to what place him liketh: why hath he not also authority to chuse what him listeth: The Bishop chose Mantua: the Duke kept him out of it. If Paule the Bishop of Romes authority be so great as he pretendeth,* why could he not compell Fridericus the Duke of Mantua, that the Councell might be kept there? The Duke would not suffer it. No, he forbad him his towne.

How chaunceth it, that here excommunications flee not abroad? Why doth he not punish this Duke? Why is his power, that was woont to be more then full, here empty? wont to be more then all, here nothing? Doth he not call men in vayn to a Councell, if they that come at his calling be excluded the place, to the which he calleth them? May not kinges iustly refuse to come at his call, when the Duke of Mantua may deny him the place that he chooseth? If other Princes order him as the Duke of Mantua hath done,* what place shalbe left him, where he may keepe hys generall Councell?

Agayne, if Princes haue geuen him this authoritye to call a councell, is it not necessary, that they geue him also al those thinges, without the which he can not exercise that his power? Shall he call men, and will ye let him to finde no place to call them vnto? Truely he is not woont to appoynt one of his owne cityes, a place to keep the Councell in. No, the good man is so faythfull and frendly toward other, that seldome he desireth Princes to be his gestes.

And admitte he shoulde call vs to one of his Cittyes, shoulde we safely walke within the walles of such our enemies towne? Were it meete for vs there to discusse controuersies of Religion, or to keepe vs out of our enemies trappes? meete to study for the defence of such doctrine as we professe,* or rather how we might in such a throng of pe'rilles be in safegard of our life? Well, in this one arte the Bishop of Rome hath declared, that he hath none authority vpon places in other mens dominions, and therefore if he promise a Coūsel in any of those, he promiseth that, that is in an other man to performe, and so may he deceiue vs agayne.

Now if he cal vs to one of his owne townes,* we be afraid to be at such an hostes table. We say, better to ryse an hungred, then to go thence with our bellyes full. But they say, the place is found, we need no more to seek where the Coūcell shalbe kept. As who sayth,* that that chaunced at Mantua, may not also chaunce at Uincence: and as though it were very like, that the Uenecians, men of suche wisdom, should not both foresee, and feare also, that the wise Duke of Mantua semed to feare. Certes, when we thinke vppon the state that the Uenecians be in now, it seemeth no very likely thing, that they will eyther leaue Uincence theyr Cittye to so many Nations, wythout some great garrison of souldiours, or els that they beyng els where so sore charged already, wil now nourish an army there?

And if they would, do•h not Paule himselve graūt that it should be an euill President, & an euill example to haue an armed Councell?

Howe so euer it shall be, we most hartily desire you, that ye will vouchsafe to read those thinges that we wrote this last yeare, touching the Mantuan Councell. For we nothing doubt, but you, of your equity, will stand on our side agaynst theyr subtlety and fraudes, and iudge (except we be deceiued) that we in this busines, neither gaue so much to our affectiōs, neither without great and most iust causes, refused theyr Councelles, theyr Censures, and Decrees.

Whether these our writinges please all men, or no, we thinke we ought not to passe much. No, if that which indifferently is written of vs, may please indifferēt readers, our desire is accomplished. The false and mistaking of thin'ges by men parciāll shall moue vs nothing, or els very litle. If we haue sayd ought agaynst the deceites of the Byshop of Rome, that may seeme spoken too sharply, we pray you, impute it to the hatred we beare vnto vices, and not to any euill will that we beare him. No, that he and all his may perceiue that we are rather at strife with his vices, then with him and his: our prayer is, that it may please God, at the last to open theyr eies, to make soft their hard hartes, and that they once may with vs (theyr owne glory set apart) study to set forth the euerlasting glory of the euerlasting God.

Thus mighty Emperour, fare you most hartily well, and ye Christen Princes the pillars, and stay of Christendome, fare ye hartily well. Also all ye, what people so euer ye are, which do desire that the gossell, and glory of Christ may flourish, fare ye hartily well.

As the Lorde of his goodnes hath raised vp Thomas Cromwel to be a frend and patrone to the Gospell: so on the contrary side Sathan (which is aduersary, and enemy to all good thinges) had his organe also, which was Steuen Gardiner, by all wyles and subtile means to impeach and to put backe the same. Who after he had brought his purpose to passe, in burning good Iohn Lambert (as ye haue hearde) proceeding still in his craftes and wyles, and thinking vnder the name of heresies, sectes, Anabaptistes, & sacramentaris, to exterminate al good bookes, and faithful professours of Gods word out of England, so wrought with the king, that the next yeare following, which was of our Lord. 1539. he gaue out these Iniunctions, y^e copy and contentes wherof I though here also not to be pretermitted, and are these.

Certayne other Iniunctions set forth by the authority of the King, agaynst English bookes, sectes, and Sacramentaries also, with putting downe the day of Thomas Becket.

First, that none without special licence of y^e king, transporte, or bring from outward parties into England,* any manner of Englishe bookes, neither yet sell, geue, vtter, or publishe any suche, vpon payne to forfeyte all their goode and cattelles, and their bodies to be imprisoned, so long as it shal please the kinges maiestie.

Item, that none shal print, or bring ouer any English Page 1134 bookes with annotations or Prologues, vnles such books before he examined by the kings priuy Counsell, or others appoynted by his highnesse, and yet not to put therto these wordes: Cum priuilegio Regali, w^tout adding, Ad imprimendum solum: neither yet to print it, without the kinges priuledge be printed therewith in the English tongue,* that all men may read it. Neyther shall they print any translated booke, without the playne name of the translator be in it, or els the printer to be made the translatour, and to suffer the fine and punishment therof at the kinges pleasure.

Item, that none of the occupation of Printing shall within the Realme, print, vtter, sell, or cause to be published any Englishe bookes of Scripture,* vnlesse the same be first viewed, examined, and admitted by the kings highnesse, or one of his priuy Counsell, or one Byshop with^{••} the Realme, whose name shall therin be expressed, vpon payne of the kinges most high displeasure, the losse of their goods and cattels, and prisonment, so lōg as it shal please the king.

Item, those that be in any errours, as Sacramentaries,* Anabaptistes, or any other, or any that sell books, hauing such opinions in them, being once knowne, both the bookes and such persons shalbe detected and disclosed immediately vnto the kinges Maiesty, or one of hys priuye Counsell, to the intent to haue it punished without fauor, euen with the extremity of the law.

Item, that none of the kings subiects shall reason, dispute, or argue vpon the sacramēt of the aulter, vpon paine of losing theyr liues,* goodes and cattels, without all fauor, onely these excepted that be learned in Diuinitye: they to haue theyr liberty in theyr scholes and appoynted places, accustomed for such matters.

Item, that holy bread and holy water, procession, kneeling,* and creeping on good Friday to the crosse and Easter day, setting vp of lights before the Corpus Christi, bearing of candles on Candlemas day, Purification of women deliuered of child, offering of Crisomes, keeping of the foure offering dayes, paying theyr tithes, and such like ceremonyes must be obserued & kept, till it shal please the king to chaunge or abrogate any of them. This article was made for that the people was not quieted and contēted (many of them) with the ceremonies then vsed.

Finally, all those Priestes that be maryed, and openly knowne to haue theyr wiues,* or that hereafter do intēd to marry, shall be depriued of all Spirituall promotion, & from doying any duety of a Priest, and shall haue no manner of office, dignity, cure, priuiledge, profit, or commodity in any thing appertaining to the Clergy, but from thence forth shalbe taken,* had, and reputed as lay persons, to all purposes and intentes: and those that shall after thys proclamation marry, shall runne in his graces indignatō, and suffer punishment and imprisonment at his graces will & pleasure.

Item, he chargeth all Archbishops, Bishops, Archdeacons, Deacons, Prouostes, Parsons, Uicars, Curates, & other Ministers, and euery of them in their own persons, within their cures diligently to preach, teach, open, and set forth to the people, the glory of God, & trueth of his word: and also considering the abuses & superstitions that haue crept into the hartes and stomackes of many, by reason of their fond ceremonies, he chargeth them vpon payn of imprisonment at his graces pleasure,* not onely to preach and teach the word of God accordingly, but also sincerely and purely, declaring the difference betwene things commaūded by God, and the rites and ceremonies in theyr church then vsed, least the people therby might grow into further superstition.

Item, for as much as it appeareth now clearely, that Thomas Becket sometime Archbishop of Caunterbury, stubbornely withstanding the wholesome lawes established agaynst the enormities of the Clergy, by the kynges highnesse noble Progenitour King Henry the second, for the common wealth, rest, and tranquility of thys Realme, of his froward minde fledde the Realme into Fraūce, and to the Bishop of Rome, maynteyner of those enormities, to procure the abrogation of the sayd Lawes, (whereby arose much trouble in this sayd Realme) and that his death which they vntruly called Martyrdome, happened vpon a rescue by him made, and that (as it is written) he gaue opprobrious wordes to the Gentlemen, which then counselled him to leaue hys stubbornnesse, and to auoyde the commotion of the people risen vppe for that rescue, and he not onely called the one of them bawde, but also tooke Tracie by the bosome, and violently shook hym, and plucked hym in such maner, that he had almoste ouerthrowne him to the pauement of the church, so that vpon this fray, one of theyr companye perceiuing the same, strake him, and so in the thronge Becket was slayne: and further, that his canonization was made onely by the Byshop of Rome, because he had bene a champion to mayntayne his vsurped authority, and a bearer of the iniquitye of the Clergy.

For these and for other great and vrgent causes long to recite, the kinges Maiesty by the aduise of hys Counsell, hath thought expedient to declare to hys louyng subiectes, that notwithstanding the sayd canonization,* there appeareth nothing in his life and exterior conuersation, wherby he should be called a Saynt, but rather esteemed to haue bene a rebell and traytor to his Prince.

Therefore his grace straitly chargeth and commaundeth, that from henceforth the sayd Thomas Becket shall not be esteemed, named, reputed, and called a Saynt, but Bishop Becket, and that his Images and Pictures thorow the whole Realme shalbe pluckt downe and auoyded out of all Churches, Chappels, and other places, and that from henceforth the dayes vsed to be festiuall in his name, shall not be obserued, nor the seruice, office, Antiphons, Collectes, & prayers in his name read,* but rased & put out of all the bookes: & that all their festiuall dayes already abrogated, shalbe in no wise solemnized, but his graces ordinaunces, and iniunctions therupon obserued, to the intēt his graces louing subiectes shalbe no longer blindly ledde & abused to commit Idolatry, as they haue done in tymes passed, vpō payne of his maiestyes indignation, & imprisōment at his graces pleasure▪

Finally his grace straightly chargeth and commaundeth that his subiects do keep and obserue all and singuler his iniunctions made by his maiesty, vpon the payn therin contened.

Here foloweth how religion began to goe backward.

TO many which be yet aliue, & can testify these thinges, it is not vnknowne, how variable the state of Religiō stood in these daies:⚭ how hardly and with what difficulty it came forth: what chaunces and chaunges it suffered. Euen as y^e king was ruled and gaue •are sometime to one, some time to an other, so one while it went forward, at an other season as much backward agayne, and sometime clea• altered & changed for a season, according as they could preuayle which were about the king. So long as Queene Anne liued, the Gospell had indifferent successe.

After that she, by sinister instigation of some about the king was made away, the cause of the gospell began again to incline, but that the Lord then stirred vp y^e Lord Cromwell, oportunely to helpe in that behalfe. Who, no doubt did much auayle for the encrease of Gods true Religion, & much more, had brought to perfection,⚭ if the pestilent aduersaryes maligning the prosperous glory of the Gospel, by cōtrary practising had not craftily vndermined him and supplanted his vertuous procedings. By the meanes of which aduersaries it came to passe after the taking away of the sayd Cromwel, that the state of Religion more and more decayed, during all the residue of the raygne of king Henry.

Among these aduersaries aboue mentioned, y^e chief captain was Steuen Gardiner bishop of Wint. who with his confederats and adherentes, disdayning at the state of the L. Cromwel, and at the late mariage of the Ladie Anne of Cleue (who in the beginning of the yere of our Lord. 1540. was married to the king) as also greued partly at the dissolution of the Monasteries,⚭ and fearing the growing of the Gospell, sought al occasions how to interrupt these happy beginnings, and to traine the king to their owne purpose. Now what occasion this wilye Winchester found out to worke vpon, ye shall heare in order as followeth.

It happened the same time that the Lorde Cromwell for the better establishing of sincere religion in this realm, deuised a mariage for y^e king to be concluded betwene him & the Lady Anne of Cleue,⚭ whose other sister was already married vnto the duke of Saxony. By this mariage it was supposed that a perpetual league, amitie, and ally shold be nourished between this realm and the princes of Germany, & so therby godly religion might be made more strong on both parts against the bishop of Rome, and his tyrannical religion. But the diuel euer enuying the prosperity of the gospell, layd a stumbling blocke in that cleare way, for the king to stumble at. For when the parentes of the noble lady were commoned withall for the furtherance of y^e sayd mariage, among others of her frends, whose good wil was required, y^e duke of Saxony her brother in law misliked y^e mariage, partly for that he wold haue had her bestowed vpon some prince of Germany more nigh vnto her sister, & partly for other causes, which he thought reasonable. Wherupon it followeth that the slacknes of the Duke in that behalfe being espyed, crafty Winchester taking good holdfast Page 1135 theron, so alienated the kinges mind from the amity, that semed now to begin and grow betwene the Duke and the king, that by the occasion thereof, he brought the king at length cleane out of credit with that religiō and doctrine, which the duke had then mayntained many yeares before.

Thus wily Winchester with his crafty fetches partly vpon this occasion aforesayd, & partly also by other pestilent perswasions creping into the kinges eares ceased not to seeke all meanes how to worke his feat & to ouerthrow Religion, first bringing him in hatred with the Germane Princes,* then putting him in feare of the Emperor, of the French king, of the Pope, of the king of Scottes, and other forraigne powers to rise agaynst him, but especially of Ciuil tumultes & commotions here within this realme (which aboue all thinges he most dreaded) by reason of innouation of religiō and dissoluing of Abbies: and for abolishing of rites, and other customes of the Church, sticking so fast in the mindes of the people, that it was to be feared, least theyr hartes were or woulde be shortly styrred vp agaynst him,* vnlesse some speddy remedy were to the contrary provided: declaring moreouer what a daūgerous matter in a common wealth it is to attempt new alterations of any thing, but especially of Religion. Which being so, he exhorted the king for his owne safegard and publicke quiet and tranquility of his realme, to see betime how and by what pollicy these so manifold mischiefes might be preuēted. Agaynst which no other way nor shift could better be deuised, then if he would shew himself sharp and seuer agaynst these new Sectaryes, Anabaptistes, & Sacramētaries (as they called them) & would also set forth such Articles, confirming the auncient & Catholick fayth, as wherby he might recouer agayne his credence with Christen Princes, and whereby all the world besides, might see and iudge him to be a right and perfite Catholicke. By these & such like crafty suggestions,* the king being to much seduced and abused, began to withdraw his defēce from the reformation of true Religion, supposing thereby to procure to himselfe more safety both in his owne realme, and also to auoide such daungers, which otherwise might happen by other Princes, especially seing of late he had refused to come to the generall Councell at Uincence, being thereto inuited both by the Emperor, & other forraigne potētates, as ye haue heard before. And therefore, although he had reiected the Pope out of this Realme, yet because he woulde declare himselfe neuerthesse to be a good Catholicke sonne of the mother Church, and a withstander of new innouations and heresies (as the blinde opinion of the world did then esteme them) first he stretched out his hand to the condemning and burning of Lambert,* then after he gaue out those Iniunctions aboue prefixed: & now further to encrease this opinion with all men,* in the yeare next folowing, which was of the Lorde. 540. through the deuise and practise of certayne of the Popes factors about him, he sūmoned a solemne Parliamēt to be holden at Westminster the 28. day of Aprill, of all the states and Burgeses of the Realme: Also a Synode or conuocation of all the Archbishops, Bishops, and other learned of the Clergy of thys Realme to be in like maner assembled.

The Acte of the vi. Articles.

In which Parliamēt Synode, or conuocation, certein Articles, maters and questions, touching religiō, were decreed by certein prelates,* to the nūber especially of 6. commonly called the 6. Articles (or the whip with 6. stringes) to be had & receiued among the kings subiects in pretence of vnity. But what vnity therof folowed, y^e groning harts of a great number, and also the cruell death of diuers both in the dayes of K. Henry, & of Queene Mary, can so well declare, as I pray God, neuer the lyke be felt hereafter.

The doctrine of these wicked articles in the bloody act contained, although it be worthy of no memory amongst christen men, but rather deserueth to be buried in perpetuall obliuion, yet for that the office of history, compelleth vs therunto, for the more light of posterity to come: faythfully and truly to comprise thinges done in the church, as well one as another, this shalbe briefly to recapitulate y^e sūme & effect of the foresayd 6. articles, in order as they were geuen out, and hereunder do folow.

The first Article.

THE first Article in this present Parliament accorded and agreed vpon: * was this: that in the most blessed Sacramēt of the aultar, by the strength and efficacy of Christes mighty worde (it being spoken by the priest) is present really vnder the forme of bread and wine, the naturall body and bloud of our Sauour Iesu Christ, conceiued of the virgine Mary and that after the cōsecration there remayneth no substaunce of bread or Wyne, or any other substance, but the substance of Christ God and man.

The 2. Article.

Secondly, that the communion in both kindes, * is not necessary ad salutem, by the law of God to all persons: and that it is to be beleued & not doubted of, but that in the flesh, vnder forme of bread, is the very bloud, & with the bloud, vnder forme of wine, is the very flesh as well aparte, as they were both together.

The 3. Article.

Thirdly, that priestes after the order of priesthoode receiued as afore, may not mary by the law of God.

The 4. Article.

Fourthly, that the vowes of chastity or widowhead, * by mā or woman made to God aduisedly, ought to be obserued by the law of God: and that it exempteth them from other libertyes of christen people, which without that they might enioy.

The 5. Article.

Fiftly, that it is meete and necessary, that priuate Masses be continued and admitted in this english Church and congregation, as whereby good Christē people, * ordering themselues accordingly, do receiue both godly & goodly consolations and benefites: And it is agreable also to Gods law.

The 6. Article.

Sixtly that auricular confession is expedient and necessary to be retayned, and continued, * vsed and frequented in the Church of God.

After these Articles were thus concluded and consented vpon the Prelates of the Realme craftely perceiuing that such a foule & violent act could not take place or preuayle, vnlesse straight and bloudy penalties were set vpon them, they caused through theyr accustomed practise to be ordeyned and enacted by the king and the Lordes spiritual, and temporall, and the commons in the sayd Parliament, as foloweth.

The penalties vpon the 6. Articles.

That if any person or persons within this Realme of England, or any other the kings dominions,* after the xij. day of Iuly next comming by word, writing, imprinting, ciphring, or any otherwise, shuld publish, preach, teach, say affirme, declare, dispute, argue or holde any opinion, that in the blessed Sacrament of the Altar, vnder forme of bread and wine (after the consecration therof) there is not presēt really,* the naturall body and bloud of our Sauour Iesus Christ, conceiued of the virgin Mary, or that after the sayd consecration, there remayneth any substaunce of bread or wine, or any other substance but the substāce of Christ, god and mā, or after the time abouesayd, publish, preach, teach, say, affirme, declare, dispute, argue, or hold opinion, that in y^e flesh, vnderforme of bread, is not the very bloud of christ or that with the bloud of Christ, vnder the forme of wine, is not the very flesh of Christ, aswell aparte, as though they were both together: or by any of y^e meanes abouesayd or otherwise, preach, teach, declare, or affirme the said sacra^lment to be of other substance then is abouesayd, or by any meane contemne, depraue, or despise the sayd blessed sacrament: that then euery such person, so offēding their ayders comforters, counsellors, consenters and ab•eters therein (being therof conuicted in forme vnder written, by the authority abouesayd) should be deemed and adiudged hereticke,* and euery of such offence should be adiudged manifest heresy: & that euery such offender and offenders, should therefore haue & suffer iudgemēt, execution, payn & paynes of death, by way of burning, without any abiuratiō, benefite of the cleargy, or Sanctuary, to be therefore permitted, had, allowed, admitted or suffered:,* and also should therefore forfeit and loose to the kinges highnesse, his ayres and successors, all his or theyr honors, manors, castles, landes tenementes, rentes, reuersions, seruices, possessions, & all other his or theyr hereditaments, goods and cattell,* termes and freeholdes, whatsoever they were, which any such offence or offēces, committed or done, or at any time after, as in any cases of high treason.

The penalty of the last v. Articles.

And as touching the other v. articles folowing, the penalty deuised for them, was this:,* That euery such person or persons, which do preach, teach, obstinately affirme, vphold, mainteine or defend, after the 12. day of Iuly, the sayd yeare any thing contrary to the same, or if any being in orders or after a vow aduisedly made did mary, or make mariage, or contract matrimony, in so doing should be adiudged as felones, and lose both life, and forfeit goodes, as in case of felony, without any benefite of the clergie, or priuiledge of the Church or of Sanctuary &c.

Page 1136Item, that euery such person or persons, which after y^e day aforesayd, by word, writing, printing, cyphring, or otherwise, did publish, declare, or holde opinion contrary to the 5. articles aboue expressed, being for any such offēce due^lly conuict or attainted, for the first time, besides the forfayt of all his goodes and cattell and possessions what so euer, should suffer imprisonment of his body at the kings pleasure: & for the second time, being accused, presented, & therof conuict, should suffer, as in case aforesayd of felony.

Item, if any within order of pristhood, before the time of the sayd Parliament, had maryed or contracted Matrimony, or vowed widowhead, the sayd matrimony should stand vtterly voyd and be dissolved.

Item, that the same daunger that belonged to priestes marying theyr wiues, shuld also redound to the womē ma|ryed vnto the Priestes.

*Furthermore, for the more effectuall execution of the premises, it was enacted by the sayd Parliament, that full authority of Inquisition of all such heresy, felonies and contemptes, should be committed and directed down into euery shyre, to certayn persons specially therunto appointed: of the which persons three at least (prouided alwayes the Archbishop or bishop, or his Chauncellor, or his Com|missarie to be one) should sitte foure times at least, in the yeare, * hauing full power to take information & accusation by the depositions of any two lawfull persons at the least, as well as by the othes of xij. men, to examine and inquire of all and singular the heresy, felonies and contemptes aboute remēbred, hauing also as ample power to make pro|ces agaynst euery person or persons indited, presented, or accused before them: also to heare & determine the foresayd heresy, felonies, contemptes and other offences, as well as if the mater had bene presented before the Iustices of peace in their Sessions: And also that the saide Iustices in theyr Sessions, & euery Steward or vndersteward, or his Deputy in theyr law daies, should haue power by y^e othes of xij. lawfull men to enquire likewise of all & singular the heresy, felonies, contemptes and other offences, and to heare and determine the same, to all effectes of this present Acte. &c.

Prouided withall that no person nor persons therupō accused, indited, or presented, should be admitted to chalēge any that shoulde be enpanelled for the triall of any matter or cause, other thē for malice or enuy: which chalēge should forthwith be tryed in like maner, as in cases of felony. &c.

Prouided moreouer that euery person that shoulde be named Commissioner in this inquisition, should first take a corporall oth, the tenor of which oth here ensueth.

The oth of the Commissioners.

*YE shall swere, that ye to your cunning, witte and power, shall truely and indifferently execute the authority to you geuen by the kinges Commission, made for correction of heretickes & other offenders, mentioned in the same Commission without any fauor, affection, corruption: dread or malice, to be borne to any person or persons, as God you helpe, and all Sayntes▪

And thus much briefly collected out of the act and Originals, * which more largely are to be sene in y^e statute an. 31 Reg. Henr. 8. concerning the sixe Articles, which otherwyse for the bloudy cruelty thereof are called the whip with sixe stringes, set forth after the death of Queene Anne, and of good Iohn Lambert, deuised by the cruelty of y^e Bishops. but specially of the Bishop of Wint. and at length also subscribed by K. Henry. But herein, as in many other parts moe, the crafty pollicy of that Bishop appeared, who like a lurking Serpent, most slyly watching his time, if he had not taken the king comming out vpon a soddayne, there where it was (I spare here to report as I heard it) it was thought and affirmed by certaine, which then were pertaining to the king, that Winchester had not obtained y^e matter so easely to be subscribed as he did.

These sixe Articles aboue specified, although they contened manifest errorrs,* heresies, and absurdities agaynst all Scripture and learning (as all men hauing any iudgemēt in Gods word may plainly vnderstand) yet such was the miserable aduersity of that time & the power of darcknes, that the simple cause of truth and of religion, was vtterly left desolate and forsakē of all frends. For euery man seing the kinges minde so fully addict vpon polliticke respectes to haue these articles to passe forward, few or none in all that Parliament would appeare,* which either could perceiue that was to be defended, or durst defend that they vnderstood to be true, saue onely Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, who then being maryed (as is supposed) like a constant Patron of Gods cause, tooke vpon him the earnest defence of the trueth oppressed in the Parliamēt, three dayes together disputing against those sixe wicked articles, bringing forth suche allegations and authorities, as might easely haue helped the cause nisi pars maior vicisset, vt saepe solet, meliorem. Who in the sayd disputation,* behaued himselfe with such humble modesty, and with such obedience in words toward his Prince, protesting the cause not to be his, but the cause of almighty God, that neither his enterprise was misliked of the king, & agayne his reasons and allegatiōs were so strong, that well they could not be refuted. Wherefore the king (who euer bare speciall fauour vnto him) well liking his zealous defēce, onely willed him to depart out of the Parliament house, into the Councell Chamber, for a time (for sauegarde of his conscience) til the Acte should passe and be graunted: which he notwithstanding, with humble protestation refused to do.

After the Parliament was finished & that matter concluded, the king considering the constant zeale of the Archbishoppe, in defence of his cause, and partly also weighing y^e many authorities, & reasons wherby he had substantially confirmed the same, sent the Lord Cromwell (which w^hin few dayes after was apprehended) the ij. dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, and all the Lordes of the Parliament, to dine with hym at Lambeth, where they signified vnto him that it was the kinges pleasure that they all shoulde in his hignes behalfe, cherish, comfort & animate hym,* as one that for his trauell in that parliamēt had declared him selfe both greatly learned, and also a man descreet & wyse, and therefore they willed him not to be discouraged in any thing that was passed in that Parliament contrary to hys allegations. He most humbly thanked first y^e kinges highnes, of his singuler good affection towards him, and them all for theyr paynes, adding moreouer, that he so hoped in God that hereafter his allegations and authorities should take place, to the glory of god, & commodity of the realme. Which allegations and authorities of his, I wish were amongst vs extant to be seene and read, no doubt but they would stand in time to come in great good stead, for y^e ouer throw of the wicked and pernicious Articles aforesayd.

Allegations agaynst the vi. Articles.

IN the meane while for so much as the sayd hereticall articles are not so lightly to be passed ouer,* wherby y^e rude & ignorant multitude hereafter may be deceiued in the false & erroneous doctrine of them any more, as they haue bene in times past, for lack of right instructiō, and experience of the aūcient state, & course of times in our fore elders dayes I thought therefore (the Lord therunto assisting) so much as antiquity of stories may helpe to the restoring agayn of truth and doctrine decayed, to annexe hereunto some allegations out of auncient recordes, which may geue some light to the conuincing of these newfangled Articles and heresies aboue touched.

And first as touching the Article of transubstantiation wherein this Parliament doth enact that the Sacrament of the Altar is the very naturall body of Christ the selfe same which was borne of the virgin Mary: and that in such sort as there remayneth no substance of bread & wine, after the Priestestes consecration, but only the body & bloud of Christ, vnder the outward formes of bread and wine: First here is to be noted, that this monstrous article of theyrs, in that forme of words as in standeth, was neuer obtruded, receiued, or holden either in the Greek Church, or in the Latine Church vniuersally for a Catholicke, that is, for a generall opinion or article of doctrine, before y^e time of the Laterane Counsell at Rome, vnder Pope Innocent the 3. an. 1216.

And for so much as it hath bene a common persuasiō amongst the most sort of people,* that this article in y^e forme of words as here standeth is & hath bene, euer since Christ his time, a true Catholick, & generall doctrine, commonly receiued and taught in the Church, being approued by the Scriptures and doctors, and consent of all ages vnto this present time. To the entent therfore that the contrary may appere, & the people may see how far they haue herin bene beguiled: we will here (Christ willing) make a litle stay in our story, & examine this foresayd article by true antiquity and course of historyes, to try whether it be a doctrine old or new.

Now therfore, for y^e better discussing of y^e matter, let vs first orderly and distinctly aduise the wordes of the Article,* the contents of which Article consist in 2 parts or mēbers. In the first whereof is noted to vs a presence of a thyng which there was not before. In the secōd is noted a priuation or absence of a thing which there before was present.

The presence is noted by these wordes of the Article where is said, that in the blessed Sacrament, by the words pronounced, is present the naturall body and bloud of our Page 1137 Sauior, vnder y^e formes of bread and wine: so that in these wordes, both the sacrament, & the naturall body is imported necessarily to be presēt. For els, how can y^e natural body of Christ be present in the Sacrament vnder the formes of bread and wine,* if the Sacrament there were not presēt it selfe? or how can a thing be sayd to be in that, which is not there? Wherefore, by these wordes, both the Sacrament and also the body must necessarily haue theyr beyng and presence, the one being in the other. And this presence both of the Sacrament, and of the body, being rightly taken, may right well stand together, the Sacrament to the outward eyes and mouth of man, the body of Christ to the inward eyes of fayth and mouth of the soule.

And therefore touching these prepositions in thys Article (In) and (Vnder) if question be asked in what is the body of Christ,* it may be well aunswered, in the Sacrament to the eyes of our fayth, like as the outward sacrament is also present to the outward eyes of the body. Agayne, if the question be asked vnder what is the body of Christ? it may be well aunswered, vnder the formes of bread, and wine, so as the Doctors did take the forme••, to meane the outward elements and natures of the Sacrament, and not the accidences.

*And thus, to the first part of the article beyng well expounded, we do assent, and confesse the same to haue bene the true Catholick opinion approued by the auncient Doctors and consent of all times, euen from the first institutiō of this Sacrament.

But as concerning the second member or part of y^e article, which taketh away all presence and substance of bread from the Sacrament: to that we say, that first it standeth not with theyr owne article. Secondly, that it standeth not with the doctrine of Scripture. Thirdly, that it standeth not with antiquity, but is meerly a late i•••ention.

And first that it agreeth not with theyr owne Article, it is manifest. For whereas in the former part of their article, they say that the naturall body of Christ is present in the blessed Sacrament, vnder the formes of bread & wine, how can the naturall body of Christ be present in the Sacrament, if there remayne no sacrament? or howe can any sacramēt of y^e body remayne, if there remayne no substaūce of bread which should make the sacrament? For how can the body of Christ be in that thing, which is not? or how cā the sacrament of the body haue any being, where the substance of bread hath no being.*

For first, that the body it selfe can not be the sacrament of the body, it is euident of it selfe.

Secondly, that the accidēces of bread without the substance of bread, can not be any Sacrament of Christes body, certayne it is and demonstrable by this argument.

Argumentum a definitione.

*Ca- A sacrament is, that beareth a similitude of that thing wherof it is a Sacrament.

mest- Accidences bere no similitude of that thing, which is there signified.

res. Ergo, Accidences can in no wise be a Sacrament.

Wherefore vpon this argument being thus concluded, vpon the same this also must nedes folow.

¶Argument,

Da- In the Sacrament of the Lordes body, the thing that representeth must nedes beare a similitude of the thing represented.

ti- The substance of bread in the Sacrament, is onely that whiche beareth the similitude of Christes body.

j. Ergo, the substaunce of bread, must nedes be in the Sacrament.

And therefore by this demonstratiō, it is apparant, that these ij. partes in the Article aforesayd, are euil couched together, wherof the one must nedes destroy the other. For if the first part of the Article be true, that the naturall body of Christ is present in the Sacrament, vnder the formes of bread and wine, and seing the Sacrament wherein the body of Christ is present, must nedes be the substance of bread and not the accidents onely of bread, as is aboue proued, then the substance of bread can not be euacuated from the Sacrament, and so the second member of the Article must nedes be false.

Or if the second part be true that there is no substaunce of bread remayning, and seing ther is nothing els to make the sacrament of the naturall body of Christ, but onely the substaunce of bread, for as much as the accidents of bread can make no Sacramēt of Christes body, as is aboue shewed: then taking away the substance of bread, the first pa•t of the article must nedes be false, which sayth that the naturall body of Christ is present in the sacrament forasmuch as the substance of bread being euacuated, there remaineth no Sacrament, wherein the body of Christ should be presēt. 2. Secondly,* that it disagreeeth from the whole order and course of the scriptures, it is sufficiently explained before, in the treatise of Iohn Lambert, vpon the Sacrament. pag. 1099. as also in other sūdry places in this volume besides. 3. Thirdly, that the sayd Article of transubstantiation is no auncient nor authentike doctrine in the church publickly receiued: but rather is a nouelty lately inuēted,* reaching not much aboue y^e age of 3. or 4. hundred yeares or at most aboue the the time of Lanfrancus an, 1070. it remayneth now to be proued, Wherin first may be ioyned this issue, that this monstrous paradoxe of transubstantiation was neuer induced or receiued publickely in the church, before the time of the Laterane Councell, vnder Pope Innocentius the 3. ann. 1216. or at most before the time of Lanfrancus, the Italian, Archbishop of Cant. 1070.

In which time of Lanfrancus, I denye not, but that this question of transubstantiation began to come in controuersy, and was reasoned vpon, amongst certaine learned of the clergy. But that this Article of transubstantiation was publickely determined, or prescribed in the church for a general law or Catholick doctrine of all men necessarily to be beleued,* before the time of the forsayd Innocentius the 3. it may be doubted, and also by histories of tyme proued to be false.

And though our aduersaries seeme to alledge out of the olde Doctours certayne speeches and phrases, which they wrast and wring to theyr purposes: wherein they say: that the bread is called, is beleued, & is the body of Christ that of bread is made the body of Christ: that the bread is chaunged,* altered, or conuerted to the body of Christ, or is made to be his body, that the creatures be conuerted into the substance of the body and bloud of Christ: that the bread and wine doe passe into the diuine substaunce, with such other like sentences: and beare themselues bragge vpon the same as thought thys doctrine of transubstantiation stood vpon y^e consent of the whole vniuersall Church,* of all ages and times of nations and people, and that the iudgement of the Church was neuer other then this: and yet if the olde Doctors sayings be well weyed, and the discourse of times by this historye well examined, it will be found that this prodigious opinion of transubstantiation hath no such ground of consent and antiquity as they imagine: nor yet that any heresy or treason was made of denying of transubstantiatiō before y^e time of Innocentius the 5. or at the furthest of Lanfrancus, as is aforesayd: about the which time Sathan the old Dragon was prophesied by the Apocalips to be let lose, to seduce the world.

For probation whereof, first I will beginne with the time of Tertullian, and of Augustine:* which both doe teach the Sacrament to be a figure, a signe, a memoriall, & representation of the Lordes body, and knewe no suche transubstantiation: & yet were no traytors nor heretickes.*

Neyther was S. Ambrose any hereticke or traytour, where he writeth these wordes: Vt sint, quae erant, & in aliud conuertantur. &c.* Which wordes Lanfrancus coulde not aunswere vnto any otherwise, but by denying them to be the wordes of Ambrose.

Gelasius was byshop yf Rome, and liued about 500. yeares after Christ,* and speakth of a transmutation of the bread and wine into the diuine nature, but there expounding himselfe, he declareth what he meaneth by that mutation, so that he expressly sheweth the elementes of bread & wine, notwithstanding to remayne still in their proper nature, with other wordes moe, very playne, to the same effect: vnto the which words Contarenus in the assemble of Ratesbone, could not well aunswere, but stood astonied.

Theodoretus likewise speaking of the visible simboles, hath these words: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 .*i. after the sanctification they remayne in theyr former substaunce, figure and forme. &c.

Ireneus, where he sayth, that the bread broken and the cuppe mixt, after the vocation of God,* cease to be cōmon bread any more, but are the Eucharist of the body and bloud of Christ: and explicating his wordes more playnely addeth moreouer, that the Eucharist consisteth in 2. things, one being earthly, which is bread & wine: the other heauenly: which is the bodye and bloud of Christ. &c. declareth in these woordes, both his owne opinion playnely, & also teacheth vs what was then the doctrine of his time.

Page 1138* Hesichius also who was 500. yeares after Christ where he speaketh of the sayd mistery, quòd simul panis & caro est. i. which he sayth to be both flesh, and bread, declareth therby two substances to be in the Sacrament. By the whiche we haue to vnderstande, that transubstantiation in hys age was not crept into the Church: and yet neyther heresy nor treason therefore was euer layd to his charge for so saying.*

Emissenus, comparing a man conuerted to Christ, by regeneration, vnto the holy misteryes conuerted into the body and bloud of our Lord, expresseth playnly, quod in exteriori nihil additum est, & totum in interiori mutatum est. That is, that outwardly nothing is chaunged, and that all the chaunge is inward. &c. wherin (no doubt) he spake playne agaynst this Article, and yet no man in all that age did accuse him therfore either to be hereticke or traytor.

Here might be added the wordes of Fulgentius, Hic calix est nouum Testamentum, id est. Hic calix quem vobis trado, nouum Testamentum significat. i. This cup is the new Testament: that is, this cup which I deliuer vnto you, signifieth the new Testament.

Bede also who liued about the yeare 730. writing vpō the psalme 21. hath these wordes: Edent pauperes. &c. Pauperes id est mundi contemptores, edent quidem realiter, si ad sacramenta referantur, & saturabuntur aeternaliter, qui intelligent in pane & vino visibiliter sibi proposito, inuisibile scilicet corpus verum, & sanguinē verum domini, quae verus cibus & verus potus sunt, quo non venter distenditur, sed mens saginatur. &c. that is: Poore men, to wit, despisers of the world, shall eat in deed really, if it be referred vnto the Sacramentes, and shalbe filled eternally, because they shall vnderstand in bread and in wine, beyng visibly set before them▪ a thing inuisible, to wit, the true body and true bloud of the Lord, which are true meat, & true drinke, wherewith not the belly is filled, but the mind is nourished.

And thus in these words of Bede likewise is to be vnderstand, that no transubstantiation, as yet in his time was receiued in the Church of England.

Long it were to stand vpon all particulars Briefely to conclude, the farther the church hath bene from these our latter dayes, the purer it was in all respectes, and especially touching this barbarous article of trāsubstātiation.* We will now draw more neare our owne time, cōming to the age of Bertrame, and of Haimo, who were about the yeare of our Lord 810. vnder Carolus Magnus.

By whose writings it is euident, that the church was infected as yet with no such phantasy of transubstantiatiō neither did any almost, dreame of taking away y^e substance of bread from the Sacrament. For although Haymo, Remigius, Rabanus, and other which liued in that age, doe attribute to the Sacrament, the honorable name, and reue'rence (as we also doe) of the Lordes body and bloud: yet they exclude not from thence all substaunce of mele & bread & leane the bare accidences, as our new come Catholickes do,* as by the wordes of Haymo doth appeare. Where he folowing the wordes of Bede, sheweth also the cause, why it is so called by the name of the Lordes body. Quia (sayth he) panis corpus confirmat, ideo ille corpus Christi congruenter nuncupatur: Vinum autem quia sanguinem operatur in carne, ideo ad sanguinem Christi refertur. That is: Because bread confirmeth the hart of man, therefore it is called conueniently the body of Christ, and because wine worketh bloud in the fleshe of man, thereof is it referred to the bloud of Christ. What canne be more effectually spoken to proue the substaunce of breade there to remayne? For take away the substance of bread & wine, what is in the accidences left, that can confirme mā's hart, or ingender bloud in the flesh. And therefore seeyng there must nedes something remaine, that must be referred to Christes body & bloud in that Sacramēt, it either must be the substaunce of bread and wine, or els it canne be no Sacrament. And furthermore, speaking of the visible thinges which are sanctified how and whereunto they be conuerted, he sayth: that by the holy ghost they passe to a Sacrament of the Lordes body.

And likewise the same Haymo in an other place, speaking of the feuites of the earth, that is, of corne and wyne, declareth,*how our Sauour making of them an apt mistery, cōuerteth them to a Sacrament of his body and bloud. &c. Lib. 7. in Ecclesiast. cap. 8.

Bertramus likewise, as he liued in the same age, so in like sort he shewed his opinion therein, to the like effect as Haymo did. For as Haymo writing in these words declareth, quia aliud est Sacramentum, aliud virtus sacramenti: sacramentum enim uero percipitur, virtute Sacramenti interior homo satiatur,* that is: the sacrament is one thing, and the vertue of the sacramēt is an other thing; for the sacrament is receiued with the mouth, but with the vertue of the Sacrament, the inward man is satisfied.

So after like maner, Bertramus according to y^e same, thus writeth: Ille panis, qui per Sacerdotis ministerium Christi corpus efficitur, aliud exterius humanis sensibus ostendit, & aliud interius fidelium mentibus clamat. &c. That is: the bread, which by the ministry of y^e priest is made the body of christ doth import one thing outwardly to the senses of man,* & an other thing it speaketh to the mindes of the faythfull. Outwardly it is bread, the same as was before, the same forme is pretended, the coulour appeareth, the same taste remayneth. But inwardly there is an other matter fare more precious, and more excellent, because it is heauenly, which is the body of Christ, that is scene, not with the outwarde eyes of the fleshe, but with the syght of a faythfull minde. &c.

We will now proceede to the testimonye of Rabanus Maurus byshop of Mentz & scholer somtime to Alcuinus in Paris, an english man: ^{} who liuing also in the same age with Haymo and Bertrame, (which was 800. yeares after Christ) geueth the like testimony of this doctrine in his booke of Institutions. Where he asking the question, why the Lord would geue the misteries of his body and bloud, then vnder suche thinges as might be kept and reserued whole with great honor? thus he aunswereth agayne: The Lord (sayth he) would rather that the Sacramentes of his body and bloud should be receiued with the mouth of the faythfull, ^{} and made to be theyr food, that by the visible action, the inuisible effecte might be shewed: For like as materiall meate outwardlye nourisheth and quickeneth the body, so also the word of God inwardly nourisheth and strengtheneth the soule. For man lyueth not onely by bread, but by euery word proceeding from the mouth of God.

And after foloweth: For this bread and drink, signifieth the eternall society of the head, and of the members together.

And agayne: For the Sacrament is one thing, and the vertue of the Sacrament is an other thing. The Sacramēt is receiued with the mouth, with the vertue of the Sacrament the inwarde man is nourished: For the Sacrament is turned to the nourishmēt of the body, but the vertue of the Sacrament, the dignity of eternall life is gotten.

Wherefore, like as the same is turned into vs, when we eate of it: so also are we turned into the body of Christ, when we liue obediently and godly. &c. Who seeth not by these wordes of this Byshoppe, what forme of doctrine was then in the Church receiued concerning this article of the Sacramet, much diuers from this our grosse opinion of transubstantiation.

With the sayd Rabanus also accordeth an other of the like standing and also doctrine, ^{*} called Christianus Druthmerus: who writing vpon Math. The wine (sayth he) doth chere and cherish the bloud, and therefore not incōueniently the bloud of christ is figured therby: for whatsoever procedeth frō him to vs it chereth vs with true gladnes, & encreaseth al goodnes vnto vs.

And a [•]it[•]e before, the sayd Druthmarus sayth: The Lorde gaue to his Disciples the Sacrament of his body, to the remission of sinnes, and keeping of charity, that they alwayes remembring his doing, might do that in figure, which he should doe for them. This is my body (sayth he) that is, in Sacrament. This Druthmarus liued also in the time of Carolus Magnus, as witnesseth Abbas Spaynehemensis.

After Bertamus was Ioannes Scotus, or els as some call him, Ioannes Erigena, ^{} a man well accepted with Carollus Caluus, and afterward with Lodouicus Balbus, about the yere of our Lord 880. ^{} He wrote a Booke De corpore & sanguine Domini, so affirming therein, & teaching, as he knew that Bertramus had taught a litle before in Fraunce. ^{*} This booke y^e pope caused to be condemned in Vercellensi Synodo, Of the life and conuersation of this Iohannes Scotus, & also of hys death, read before, pag. 146.

In the yere of our Lord. 950. liued Odo Archbyshop of Cāterbury, in whose time it appeareth in the catholickes owne confession, that many priests then affirmeth, that the bread and wine after consecration, did remayn in their former substance, and that the sayd mysteries were onely a figure of the body and bloud of Christ, as we finde it witnessed by Osberne himselfe, who did write the liues of Odo, Dunstane. and Elphege, at the bidding of Lanfrāke Archbyshop of Canterbury, as reporteth Edmerus, Anselmus Chaplain. The wordes of Osberne be these: *Hoc ferè tempore, quidam clerici maligno errore seducti, asseuerare conabantur panem & vinum, quae in altari ponuntur, post consecrationem, in priori substantia manere, & figuram tantummodo esse corporis & sāguinis Christi. &c. That is: About this time (saith Osbern, * writing in the daies of Lanfrak) certaine of the Clergy, being seduced by wicked error, did hold and maintein, that bread and wine, which are set vpon the aulter, after the consecration do remaine in their former substaunce, and are but onely a figure of the body and bloude of Christe. &c. And no doubt but at that time, the common opinion of most of the Clergye was so that the Sacrament was the bodye and Page 1139 bloud of Christ, and that the substaunce of bread and wine notwithstanding were not transubstantiate, as the Romish Catholikes do now teach. But this is the guise of these men that in their writinges and stories, stil they diminish the better number, wherby their faction may seeme euer to be the bigger and therefore to extenuate the common opinion then receiued in the Church, he inferreth mention of certaine of the Cleargy. &c.

And as he fayleth in the number of these Clergymen which then held against transubstantiation, so he vpholdeth the same with as lying a miracle: * Which miracle hee faineth to be wrought the same time, for the conuersion of the sayd Clergy men, by the bloud dropping out of the host at Masse, as Odo was breaking the host ouer the chalice. At the sight wherof, first Odo himselfe (saith he) wept for ioye, seeing his petition accomplished, which he so earnestly praied for. Secundarily, all those Clergie men (saith he) which before beleueed not this transubstantiation, by & by were conuerted, and blessed the archbishop that euer he was borne, desiring him to pray againe, that the bloud might returne to his former shape, * & streight it was done. And this was the miracle: which seemeth as true, as that which W. Malmesbury writeth of the sayde Odo, howe by his prayers, he caused a sworde to come flying from heauē into king Aethelstanes scabbard whē he had lost his owne, as he should fight aginst Analanus: or els as that miracle where the sayd Odo is said to couer and defend the church of Caunterbury, that no droppe of raine could touch it, so long as the rooffe thereof was in making. *Ex W. Malmesb. Vid sup. pag. 151.

In the which so miraculous a myracle, many things are to be marueiled. First I maruel, that at this great myracle of the Archb. in his Cathedral Church, amongst so ma'ny singing men, we read of no Te Deum ther to be song, after the doing thereof.

*Secondly I maruell, that those Priestes and Clerkes, which then denied transubstantiation, were suffered to be so neare the Archb. at his Masse, and that they were not committed rather to ward like heretickes and traitours, if this Article of transubstantiatio had ben then such a Catholike doctrine, and so publikey receaued in the Church as they say it was.

Thirdly I maruel, seeing the time of myracles is expired, we hauing the scriptures to guide vs, why y^e Archbyshop would seeke to miracles and apparitions to conuert men, rather then to the lawe and Prophets, according as we are commaunded, especiall hauing no such example of all the olde Doctors, which in confutatiō of so many erroneous opinions, yet neuer sought to such myracles, or blynde meanes, Fourthly, I maruel much at the discrepance in telling this tale,* betweene Osbern and the other which since haue written Legendes of Odo. For wheras Osbern speaking of certaine Priestes, nameth no place, but leaueth the matter at large, and speaketh absolutely: quidam clerici: all other which haue since written the Legendes of Odo, doe tell this tale against certaine Priests of Caunterbury, adding to the wordes of Osberne, quidam Clerici Cantuarienses But to conuict the falshode of them all, as well Osberne as of the rest, there is a legend of the life of Odo, and of Oswald together, more auncient then this of Osberne, written (as it may seeme) in the time of Aelfricus Archb. of Canterbury & Elphege then Bishop of Winchester, wherein mention is made in deede of this miracle, but after an other sort, then this of Osberne, & to an other purpose, then to dissuade certaine priestes infected with that errour frō the opiniō before declared: which is only brought to shew the holines of Odo: as comonly the maner of Legendes is to do. So that in this olde Legend it is thus reported, that when this miracle was done, Odo disclosed the matter not to many priests of England, that were in that error as Osborne would: sed vocat protinus fidelem seruum, qui cominus erat, & miraculum secretè demonstrat, &c. that is, but called vnto him a certaine faithful seruaunt, which was neare about him, and shewed vnto him the miracle secretly. Wher vpon the Priest (sayth the Legende) muche reioyced at the holines of Odo, and desired him to make his prayer to almighty God, that the body might returne againe to the former shape. &ce. Out of this old lying Legend, Osberne, and other likewise that followed him, seemeth to haue takē this tale: so that out of the errour of one (as the maner is) springeth the errour of a number mo.

But this much more I maruel, why this miracle is not stored in Henry Huntington,* which professedly writeth of such miracles, nor in Rog. Houeden, and such other: but onely in such blinde Legendes, which commonly haue no substance of veritie, nor certeinetic of time or writer, to know when, and by whom they were written, and for the most part are stuffed with lying visions, and prodigious fables.

Finally, if this miraculous fiction of Osberne, were true y^t for the conuerting of Priestes of England, whiche would not beleue transubstantiation, this bloud did drop out of the hoste (of the which bloud peradventure came the bloud of Hales) and that by the sight thereof the Priestes e•tsoone were all conuerted (as Osberne pretendeth) how then came it to passe, that after the time of Odo, in the daies of Elfricus, which was after him Archb. of Canterbury, y^e third from Dunstane, and fourth from Odo, not onely the Priestes of England, but also the Archbishop himself, wer not yet brought to the beliefe of this transubstantiatiō, but taught the very same doctrine of the sacrament thē, whiche we doe nowe? as most clearly appeareth both by the Epistles and Homelies of the foresayde Archbishop Elfricus, whiche herunder, for the more euidence (Christ willing) wee will annexe.

This Elfricus, as sayth Capgraue, in the life of Oswald bishop of Worceter, was first Abbot of S. Albo•es and after made archbishop of Canterbury,* about the yere of our Lord 996. in the time of king Etheldred, & of Wulfsinus B. of Scyrburne, Elfricus also (as witnesseth Wil. of Malmesbery, in Vita Adelmi) was Abbot of Malmesbery. Furthermore the sayd Wil. of Malmesbery writing of Elfricus Archbishop of Caunterbury, saith that he was before bishop of Welles, and afterward archbishop of Cāterbury. So that Elfricus was Archbishop of Canterbury, it is out of al ambiguitie.* But whether Elfricus which was Abbot (of whom we doe here intreate) were the same Archbishop, or not, by this diuersitie of Capgraue & Malmesbery, it may be doubtful. But whether, he were or no, to this our present purpose is not greatly materiall, for so much as the said Elfricus, & Elfricus (although they were diuers persons yet were they both in one age, and liued in one time together.

Furthermore, the same Elfricus (of whome nowe we speake) of what calling soeuer he was,* yet notwithstanding hee was of suche estimation and good liking in those dayes among the most learned, that for his learnyng authoritie, and eloquence, hys writings were accepted and authorised among y^e Chanons & constitutions of y^e Church in that time, as hereby may appeare: For where as the bishops and Priestes before the comming of William Conquerour had collected together a certayn booke of Canons and ordinaunces, to gouerne the Clergie,* gathered out of generall and particular counsels, out of the bookes of Gildas, out of the poenitentiall bookes of Theodorus Archbyshop of Canterbury, out of the writings of Egbertus archbishop of Yorke, out of the Epistles of Aleuinus, as also out of the writynges of the olde Fathers of the primitiue Church. &c. among the same Canons & Constitutions be placed these two Epistles of the sayd Elfricus here vnder folowing, wherof the one was sent to Wulfsinus Bysh. of Scyrburne, the other to Wulfstane Archb. of Yorke, as yet are to be sene in ij. bookes belongyng to the Library of the Church of Worceter,* the one written in the old Saxones tongue intituled 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , the other for the most part in Latine, with this title: Admonitio spiritualis doctrinae. Which booke of Saxon Canons & Constitutions belongyng sometyme to Wulfstane Byshop of Worceter, was geuen by him as for a great iewell, to the Church o^r Worceter, as by the same booke appeareth.

Moreouer, besides this booke of Worceter aboue touched,* there is yet extant also another like booke of Canons belōgyng to the Church of Exeter, wherein the same two Epistles of Elfricus be contained in the old Saxon tōgue, and also in Latine, and prescribed yearly to be read to the Clerkes and Priestes of that Church: Which booke in like maner was geuen to the Church of Exeter by Leofricus the first, and most famous Bishop of that sea.

Of this Elfricus further is to be vnderstanded,* that hee translated two bookes of 80. sermons out of Latin, into the Saxon speach, vsed then orderly to be read in Churches on sondayes & other festiual dayes of the yeare, as by his own words may appeare in the end of one of y^e said books of sermons, whose woordes be these: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; We let passe many good Gospels whiche he that lyst, may translate. For we dare not enlarge this booke muche further, left it be ouergreat, and so be a cause of lothsomnes Page 1140 to men, through the bignes therof. &c.

Also in an other place he confesseth the same of himselfe: whose wordes in the preface before his grammer be these. Ic AElfric polde þa listlan boc apendan to engliscum gereorde of ðam staef craefte ðe is gehaten grammatica. syððan ic tpa bec apende on hund eahtatigum spellum;* I

Elfrike was desirous to turne into our English tongue from the arte of letters, called grammer, this little booke, after that I had translated the two bookes of fourescore sermons, &c.

Of his Epistles especially we read of foure, which he wrote. One to the monkes of Egnesham. De consuetudine monachorum. An other to Wulfstane Arch. of Yorke, wherin is touched the matter of the Sacrament. The thirde, he wrote against priestes marriage,* to one Sygeferth, with whom there was a certaine Anker abiding, which defended the marriage of priests, affirming it to be lawfull. The fourth, he wrote to Wulfsinus B. of Scyrburne, touching the matter of the sacramēt. In the which epistle he taking occasion by a certaine abuse in his time, which was, that priests on Easter day filled their housel boxe, and so kept it for the space of the whole yeare, till Easter came againe, for sicke persons, writeth vppon that occasion, in these words as follow in his owne Saxons tongue.

A writing of Aelfrike to wulfstne.

Men shal reserue more carefully that holy housell, & not reserue it to long, but halow other of new for sicke men alwayes within a week or a fortnight,* that it be not so much as hory. For so holy is the housel which to dayis halowed, as that which on Easterday was halowed, That housel is Christes body not bodily but ghostly. Not the body which he suffred in,* but the body of which he spake, when he blessed bread and wine to housel the night before his suffring, and sayd by the blessed bread: this is my body, & agayn by the holy wine, this is my bloud, which is shed for many in forgiuenes of sinnes. Understand now that the Lord, who could turne that bread before his suffering to his body, and that wine to his bloud ghostly, y^t the selfe same Lorde blesseth daily through the priestes handes, bread and wine to his ghostly body, and to his ghostly bloud.

After this Epistle aboue prefixed of Elfricus, written to Wulfsinus B. of Shireburne, concerning the sacramental bread, how it is not Christes body, lichamlice that is, bodily, or (as we terme it now) really: and also howe the same ought not to be ouerlong kept in y^e pixe: here foloweth further an other epistle of the sayd Elfricus written to Wulfstane Archb. of Yorke, both reprehending y^e said abuse aboue touched, and also conteining matter more at large against the bodily presence in the sacramental bread. The copy of his epistle, both in his owne Saxon, and in our English here followeth.

An other Epistle of Aelfricus against the bodily presence to Wulfstane Archbishop of Yorke.

*Some Priests fil their boxe for housel on Easter day, and so reserue it a whole yere for sicke men, as though that housel were more holy then any other. But they do vnaduisedly, because it waxeth hory, or altogether rotten by keping it so long space: and thus are they become giltye, as y^e booke witnesseth to vs. If any do kepe y^t housell to long or lose it or myse or other beastes doe eate it, se what the penitential booke saith by this: So holy is altogether that housel, which is halowed to day, as that which is halowed on Easter day. Wherefore I beseech you to keepe the holy body of Christ with more aduisement: for sick men, frō Sunday to Sunday, in a very cleane boxe: or at the most not to keepe it aboue a fortnight, and then eate it, laying other in the place. We haue an example hereof in Moyses books, as God him selfe hath commanded in Moyses law, how the Priestes should set euery Saterdag, twelue loaues al new baked, vpon the tabernacle: the which were called Panes propositionis: and those shoulde stand thereon Gods tabernacle, till the next Saterdag, and then did the Priests thēselues eate them, and set other in the place. Some Priestes will not eate the housell, which they do hallowe: But we wil now declare vnto you how the booke speaketh by thē Presbyter missam celebrans, & non audens sumere sacrificium, accusante conscientia, an athema est. The Prieste that doeth say masse and dare not eate the housel, his conscience accusing him, is accursed. It is lesse daunger to receiue the housel, then to hallowe it. Hee that doth twise hallow one host to housel, is like vnto those heretickes, who doe christen twise one childe. Christ himselfe blessed housell before his suffering: he blessed the bread and brake it, thus speaking to his Apostles: Eate this bread, it is my body. And againe, he blessed one Chalice with wyne, & thus also spake vnto them: Drinke ye al of this, it is mine owne bloude of the newe Testament, which is shed for many for the forgiuenesse of sinnes. The Lord which hallowed housel before his suffering, & saith that the bread was his own body, & that the wyne was truly his bloud, haloweth daily by the handes of the prieste, breade to his body and wine to his bloud in ghostly mystery, as we read in bookes▪ And yet notwithstanding that liuely bread is not * bodily so, nor the self same body that Christ suffered in: nor that holy wine is the Sauours bloud which was shed for vs in bodily thinge: but in Ghostly vnderstanding. Both be truely, y^e bread is his body, & that wine also is his bloud, as was the heauenly bread, which we call manna that fedde forty yeares Gods people. And the cleare water which did then runne from the stone in the wilderness, was truely his bloud, as S. Paul wrote in one of his Epistles: Omnes patres nostri candemescam spiritualem manducauerunt, & omnes eundem potum spiritualem biberunt, &c. Al our fathers did eat in the wil'dernes the same ghostly meat, and dranke y^e same ghostly drinke. They dranke of that Ghostly stone, and that stone was Christ. The Apostle hath saide (as you nowe haue heard) that they all did eate the same ghostly meate, & they all did drinke the same ghostly drinke. And he saith not bodily, but ghostly. And Christe was not yet borne, nor his bloud shedde, when that the people of Israel did eate that meat and dranke of that stone. And the stone was not bodily Christ, though he so said. It was the * same mystery in the olde lawe, and they did ghostly signifie that ghostly housell of our Sauours body which we consecrate nowe.

Besides these Epistles aboue prefixed, of Elfricus to Wulfsinus,* and Wulfstane, whiche fight directly against transubstantiatiō, mention was touched also before of certein Sermons to the number of lxxx. translated by the said Elfricus, out of Latine into the Saxon, that is, into our English tongue, as ye partly haue heard before. Of the which lxxx. Sermons, xxiiij. were chiefly selected, to bee read,* as in stede of Hom•lies, or treatises, vnto the people: in such order, as the first xij. Sermons or treatises, intreating of general matters (as De initio creaturae, de augurils, de die iudicij, vnus confessoris de vanilo•uio & negligentia, d• auaritia, de falsis dijs, &c.) were appointed to be read at pleasure, & at the discretion of the Minister. The other xij. sermons were prescribed of proper feasts: (as De annūtiatione beate Mariae, de natiuitate domini, de circumcissione domini, de Epiphania, de purificatione sanctae Mariae. Dominica prima in Quadragesima, Dominica palmarum Die Pascae &c. Wherof this testimony remaineth in y^e same book yet to be sene both in the Saxon tongue, and also in the Preface of the latter xij. Sermons in Latine, in these wordes following: In hoc codicillo con tinentur sermones Anglice, quos accepimus de libris quos Abbas Anglicè transtulit. &c.

Furthermore as touching these lxxx. Sermons aforesayd, which El•ricus translated into Englishe, here is to be vnderstanded, that in the said Sermons vsed then orderly to be recited to y^e people, there is one appointed to be red in die Sancto Pascae, that is, vpon Easter day, Which Sermon being translated by the sayd Elfricus, we haue here exhibited both in Saxon speache and in English, to the entent, that the Christen and indifferent reader perusing the same, may iudge therby, how the fantastical doctrine of trāsubstantiation, in those daies of Elfricus & before his time, was not yet receiued nor knowen in the Church of England: for so much as the sayd Sermon being in Latine before, doth leaue vnto vs an euident declaratiō, what was the common opinion of this Sacrament in the Church receaued: before that Elfricus did euer set hande to translate the same out of the Latin.

And thogh the Latin copies and exemplars of these foresaid Sermons, are not remaining in our Libraries,* let y^t be no maruel to thee, louing reader: but vnderstand therby the craftie packing of the Popes Clergie, who in the time of Lanfrancus, & Pope Innocent, studying by al meanes, how to preferre and further this their newcome doctrine of transubstantiation, did abolish and rase out of Libraries and Churches, all such bookes which made to the contrary. And therefore because Lanfrancus and other Italian Priestes here in England vnderstood not y^e Saxon bookes as they did the Latine, all that whiche they vnderstoode, they made away. The Saxon bookes, because they knewe them not, they let remaine, And this is the cause why our Latine copies now are not to be found. Which to be true by iij. reasons coniectural it may probably be supposed.

First,* for that these Saxon Sermons being translated out of the Latine (as ye haue heard by the wordes of Elfricus already proued) onely we see the Saxon bookes reserued: of the Latin none doth appeare.

Secondly, there is yet remaining one certaine peece or fragment of an epistle of Elfricus in the Library of Worceter, wherin, so muche as maketh agaynst the matter of transubstantiation, we haue found in the middle of the said Latin epistle, vtterly rased out, so that no letter or piece of a letter doth there appeare. The woordes cut out, were these: Non est tamen hoc sacrifici•um corpus eius, in quo passus est pro nobis ne{que} sanguis eius quem pro nobis effudit:*sed spiritualiter corpus eius efficitur & sanguis, sicut Manna quod de caelo pluit, & aqua quae de petra fluxit. Sicut Paulus &c. 1. Notwithstanding this sacrifice is not the same body of hys, wherin he suffered for vs, nor the same blood of hys: whiche he shed for vs but spiritually it is made his body and blood as that Manna whiche rayned from heauen and the water whiche did flowe out of the rocke, as Paule. &c. These woordes so rased out are to be restored agayne by an other Saxon booke found in Exceter. By the rasing of whiche one place, it may easily be coniectured, what these practisers haue likewyse done in the rest.

Thirdly by one Italian tricke of Polydore Uirgill in our daies,* the properties and doinges of all other Italian papists of elder time, may partly be coniectured. For so I am informed by such, as precisely will affirme it to be true y^t when Polydore being licensed by the king to viewe and searche all Libraries, had once accomplished his storye by the help of such books as he had compiled out of Libraries in y^e end, when he had taken out what he would: like a true factor for y^e popes own tooth, he piled his bookes together & set them al on a light fire. For what cause he so did, I can not certaynly pronounce: but who so considereth well his religion, may shrewdly suspect him. For a probatiō, wherof, this may serue for a sufficient tryall: that whereas of all other writers of historyes that haue bene in Englād, as of Fabian, Lanquer, Rastall, More, Leland, Balle, Halle, & such other, some of their bookes which they then occupied yet remayn in hands to be seene. Onely of suche books, as Polydore vsed and which past his handes, what Englishe man is he that hath seene, or can shewe me one? Whereby it may wel be thought, the foresaid information to be true. As also by this one Italian tricke of Polydore, may other Italians likewise be suspected, in making away such Latin books within this land, as made not for their purpose. But for somuch as those Latine bookes be n•w abolished, and can not be had, let vs returne to our Saxon tongue agayne, and see what this Saxon sermon of Elfricus translation, doth say for transubstantiation: The copy whereof here ensueth.

A Sermon on Easter day.

MEn beloued, it hathe bene often sayde vnto you about our Sauours resurrection,* howe hee on this present day, after his suffering mightely rose from deathe. Nowe will we open vnto you through Gods grace, of the holye housell, which ye should nowe go vnto, and instruct your vnderstanding about this mysterie, both after the olde couenaunt, and also after the newe, that no doubting maye trouble you about thys liuely foode. The almightye God bad Moses hys Captaine in the Lande of Egypt, to commaund the people of Israel to take to euery family a lamb of one yere old, the night they departed out of the countrey to the land of promise, and to offer that lambe to God, and after to cutte it, and to make the + signe of the Crosse wyth the lambes bloud vpon the side postes, and the vpper post of theyr doore, and afterwarde to eate the Lambes flesh roasted, and vnleauened bread with wilde lettisse, God sayeth vnto Moyses: Eate of the Lambe nothing rawe, nor sodden in water but roasted at the fire. Eate the heade, the feete, and the inwardes, and lette nothing of it be left vntill the morning, if anye thing therof remaine▪ that shall you burne with fire. Eate it in this wise: Girde your loynes▪ and doe your shoes on your feete▪ haue you staues in your handes, and eate it in haste. The tyme is the Lordes Passeouer. And there was slaine on that night in euery house through oute Pharaos raigne, the firste borne childe: and Gods people of Israel were deliuered frō that sodaine death through the Lambes offering & his bloudes marking. Then sayde God vnto Moyses. Keepe this day in your remembraunce, and holde it a great feaste in your kindredes wyth a perpetuall obseruation, and eate vnleauened breade alwayes seuen dayes at this feaste.* After thys deede, God led the people of Israel ouer the red Sea with drye foote, & drowned therein Pharao and all his army together with theyr possessions, and fedde afterward the Israelites 40. yeares, wyth heauenly foode,* and gaue them water out of the hard rocke, vntill they came to the promised land. Parte of thys storie we haue treated off in an other place, partly we shall nowe declare, to witte, that which belongeth to the holye housell, Christen men may not nowe keepe that olde lawe bodely, but it behooueth them to knowe what it Ghostly signifieth. That innocent Lambe which the old Israelites did then kil, had signification after Ghostly vnderstanding, of Christes suffering, who vnguiltie shedde his holy bloud for our redemption. Hereof sing Gods seruants at euery * Masse, Agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis. That is in our speach: Thou Lambe of God that takest away the sinnes of the world, haue mercy vpon vs. Those Israelites were deliuered from that sodaine deathe, and from Pharaos bondage by the lambes offeryng, which signified Christes suffering: through which we be deliuered from euerlasting death, and from the deuils cruell raigne, if we rightly beleue in the true redemer of the whole world Christ the Sauour. That Lambe was offered in the euening: and our sauour suffered in the sixt age of this world. This age of this corruptible worlde is reckened vnto the euening. They marked with the lambes bloud vpon the doores, and the vpper postes *Thau, that is the signe of the crosse, and wer so defended from the Angels that killed the Egyptians first borne childe. And wee * ought to marke our foreheades and our bodies with the token of Christes roode, y^t we may be also deliuered from destruction, when we shalbe marked both on forehead, and also in heart with the bloude of oure Lordes suffering. Those Israelites dyd eate the lambes flesh at their Easter time, when they were deliuered, and we receiue ghostly Christes body, & drynke his bloude, when we receiue with true beliefe, that holye housell. That time they kept with them at Easter 7. daies with great worship, when they were deliuered from Pharao, and went from that land. So also Christen men keepe Christes resurrection at the time of Easter these 7. dayes, because throughe his suffering and rising we be deliuered, and be made cleane by going to this holy housel, as Christ sayeth in hys Gospell: Verely, verely I say vnto you ye haue no life in you excepte yee eate my flesh and drinke my bloud. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my bloude, * abideth in mee, and I in him, and hath that euerlasting life, and I shall raise him vp in the last day. I am the liuely bread that came downe from heauen: not so as your forefathers did eate that heauenly breade in the wilderness, and afterwarde died. Hee that eateth this breade, liueth for euer. Hee blessed breade before his suffering, and deuided it to hys Disciples, thus sayinge: Eate of thys breade, it is my body, and doe this in my remembraunce. Also hee blessed wyne in one cuppe, * and sayd: Drinke ye all of this: This is my bloude that is shedde for manye, in forgeuenesse of sinnes. The Apostles did as Christ commanded, that is, they blessed breade and wine to housel againe afterward in his remembrance. Euen so also their successours and all priestes by Christes commaundement do blesse bread and wine to housel in his name wyth the Apostolicke blessing. Nowe menne haue often searched and doe yet often * search, how bread that is gathered of corne, and through fires heate baked, may be turned to Christes body: or howe wine that is pressed out of many grapes is turned through one blessing, to y^e Lords bloud. Now say we to such men, that some thinges be spoken of Christ by * signification▪ and some be thinges certayne. True this is and certayne that Christ was borne of a mayd, and suffered death of his owne accord, and was buried, and on this day rose from death. He is sayde to be bread by signification, and a Lambe, & a Lyon, & a mountayne. He is called bread, because he is our life and angels lyfe. He is sayd to be a Lambe for his innocencie: a Lyon for strength wherewith he ouercame the strong deuil. But Christ is not so notwithstanding after true nature, neither bread, nor a lambe, nor a lyon. Why is then the holy house called Christes body, or his bloud, if it be not truely that it is called? * Truely the bread and the wine which in the supper by the priest is hallowed, shewe one thing without to humaine vnderstanding, and an other thing within to beleuing mindes. Without they be seene bread and wine both in figure & in taste, & they be truely after theyr hallowing Christes body and his bloud through ghostly mistery. An heathen childe is christened, yet hee altereth not his shape without, though he be chaunged within. He is brought to y^e fontstone sinfull through Adams disobedience: howbeit he is washed frō all sinne within, though he hath not chāged his shape without. * Euen so the holy font water that is called the welspring of life, is like in shape to other waters, and is subiect to corruption, but y^e holy ghostes might commeth to the corruptible water through the priests blessing, and it may after wash the body and soule from al sin, through ghostly might. Behold now we see two things in this one creature: after true nature, y^t water is corruptible moysture, and after ghostly mistery, hath wholsom vertue. So also i• we behold the holy housell▪ after bodily vnderstanding, then we see that it is a creature corruptible and mutable. If we knowledge therein ghostly might, thē vnderstand we that life is therein, and that it geueth immortalitie to thē that eate it with beliefe. Muche is betwixt the inuisible might of the holy housel, and the visible shape of proper nature. It is * naturally corruptible bread, and corruptible wine, & is by might of Gods word truely christes body and bloud, not so notwithstanding bodily, but ghostly. Much is betwixt the * body of Christ which he suffered in, and the body that is hallowed to housel. The body truly that Christ suffered in, was borne of the flesh of Marie w^t bloude and with bone, with skin and with sinewes, in humane lims, with a reasonable soule liuing, and his ghostly body, which we call the housel, * is gathered of many cornes, without bloud and bone, without limme, w^tout soule, * and therefore nothing is to be vnderstand therein bodely, but all is ghostly to be vnderstande. Whatsoever is in that housel, which geueth substaunce of life that is of the ghostly might, and inuisible doing. Therefore is that holy housell, called a myserie, because there is one thing in it seene, and an other thing vnderstanded. That which is there * seene, hath bodely shape: and that we do there vnderstande, hath ghostly might. Certainly Christes body whyche suffered death and rose from death neuer * dieth hencefoorth, but is eternal and vnpassible. That housel is temporal, not eternal,  corruptible and dealed into sundrye partes chewed betweene teeth and sent into the belly: howbeit neuerthelesse after ghostly myght it is all in euery parte. Many receiue that holy body: and yet notwithstandinge, it is so all in euery part after ghostly myserie. Though some chewe the lesse, yet is there no more might notwithstāding in the more parte, then in the lesse, because it is whole in all men after the inuisible might. This myserie is a * pledge and a figure: Christes body is truth it selfe. Thys pledge we doe kepe mystically, vntill that we be come to the truth it selfe, and then is this pledge ended. Truly it is so as we before haue sayde, Christes body and his bloude: not bodily, but ghostly. But now here the Apostles words about this misterie. Paul the Apostle speaketh of the old Israelites thus writing in his epistle to faithful men: Al our forefathers were baptised in the cloud and in the sea, * and all they did eate the same ghostly meat, & dranke the same ghostly drinke. They drank truly of the stone that followed them, and that stone was Christ Neither was that * stone then from which the water ran bodily Christe, but it signified Christe, that calleth thus to all beleuing and faithful men: Who soeuer thirsteth, let hym come to mee and drinke, and from his bowelles shall flowe liuely water. This he sayd of the holy Ghost, whych they receiued who beleued on him. The Apostle Paul sayth: that the Israelites did eate the same ghostly meat, & dranke the same ghostly drinke, Page 1146 because that heauenly meate that fed them 40. yeares, and that water which from the stone did flowe, had signification of Christes body and hys bloud, that now be offred daily in Gods Church. It was the same which we now offer, not bodely, but ghostly.

We said vnto you ere while, that Christ halowed bread and wine to housell before his suffering, * and sayde: Thys is my body and my bloud, Yet he had not then suffered: but so notwithstanding he * turned through inuisible mighte, the bread to his owne bodye: and that wine to his bloud: as he before did in the wildernes, before that he was borne to be a man, when he * turned y^e heauenly meate to his flesh, and the flowing water from that stone to his owne bloud. Uery many did eate of that * heauenly meat in the wildernes, and drinke the ghostly drinke: and were neuerthelesse dead, as Christ sayd. And Christ meant not y^e death whych none can escape, but that euerlasting death which some of that folke deserued for theyr vnbelief. Moyses and Aaron, and many other of that people which pleased God, did eate that heauenly bread: and they died not y^e euerlasting death, though they died the common death. They sawe that the heauenly meate was visible and corruptible, & they ghostly vnderstood by that visible thing, and ghostly receiued it. The Sauour sayeth: * Hee that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my bloud▪ hath euerlasting life. And he bad them not eate that body wherewith hee was enclosed, nor to drinke that bloude which he shed for vs: * but he meant with those wordes that holy housell, which ghostly is his body and his bloud, and hee that tasteth it with beleueing heart, hath that eternall life. In the olde lawe faithfull men offred to God diuers Sacrifices, that had * foreshignification of Christes bodye, which for our sinnes he himselfe to his heauēly father hath since * offered to sacrifice. Certainly this housell which we do now halow at Gods alter, is a * remembrance of Christes body which he offered for vs: and of hys bloud whych he shed for vs: So he himselfe commaunded: Doe thys in my remembraunce. Once suffered Christe by hym selfe, but yet neuerthelesse hys suffering is daily renued at thys supper, through myserie of the holy housell. Therefore we ought to consider diligently: howe that this holy housell is both Christes bodye, and the bodye of all * faithfull menne, after ghostly myserie. As wise Augustine sayeth of it: If ye wil vnderstand of Christes body, here the Apostle Paule thus speaking. Yee truely be Christes body and his members. Nowe is your myserie sette on Gods table, and ye receiue youre myserie, which myserie ye your selues be. Be that which ye see on the altare, and receiue that which yee your selues be. Againe the Apostle Paule sayeth by it: We manye be one bread, and one bodye. Understande nowe and reioyce, many be one bread, and one body in Christ. He is our heade, and we be his limmes: and the bread is not of one corne, but of many: nor the wine of one grape, but of many. So also we all shoulde haue one vnitie in our Lorde, as it is wrytten of the faithfull armie, how that they were in so great an vnitie, as though al of them were one soule, and one heart. Christe hallowed on hys table the myserie of oure peace and of our vnitie. He which receiueth that myserie of vnitie, & keepeth not the bonde of true peace, receiueth no myserie for himselfe, but a witnesse against himselfe. It is very good for Christen men, that they goe often to howsell, if they bring with them to the alter, vngiltines and innocēcy of hart: if they be not oppressed with sinne. To an euil man it turneth to no good, but to destruction, if hee receyue vnworthely that holy housell. Holy * bookes commaund that water be mingled to that wine which shall be for housell, because the water signifieth the people, & the * wine Christes bloud, and therefore shall neither the one wythout the other be offered at the holy masse, that Christ may be wyth vs, and we with Christ, the head with the limmes, and the limmes with the head. Wee woulde before haue intreated of the Lambe whyche the olde Israelites offered at theyr Easter time, but that we desired first to declare vnto you of this myserie, and after how we should receiue it. That signifying lambe was offered at the Easter, And the Apostle Paule sayeth in the Epistle of this present day, that Christ is our Easter who was offred for vs, and on this day rose from death. The Israelites did eate the Lambes fleshe as God commaunded, with vnleauened bread and wilde lettisse: * so wee shoulde receiue that holy housell of Christes body and bloud without the leauen of sinne, and iniquitie. As leauen turneth the creatures from their nature: so doth sinne also chaunge the nature of manne from innocencie to vncleannesse. The Apostle hath taught howe we shoulde feast, not in the leauen of the euilnesse, but in the sweete doughe of puritie and truth. The herbe which they should eate with the vnleauened bread is called lettisse, and is bitter in taste. So we should with bitterness of vnfained repentaunce purifie oure minde, * if wee will eate Christes bodye. Those Israelites were not woonte to eate rawe fleshe, and therefore God badde them to eate it neyther raw nor sodden in water, but rosted with fire. He shal receiue the body of God rawe, that shal thinke without reason, that Christ was onely manlike vnto vs, and was not God. And he that will after mans wisdom search y^e mystery of Christs incarnation, doth like vnto him that doth seeth lambes fleshe in water, because that water in this same place signifieth mans vnderstanding: but we should vnderstand, that all the mistery of Christes humanitie was ordered by the power of the holy Ghost: and then eate we his body rosted with fire because the holy ghost came in fyry lykenes to the Apostles in diuers tonges. The Israelites should eate the lambs head, and the feete: and the pur'tenaunce, and nothing therof must be le•te ouer night. If any thing thereof were left, they did burne that in the fire: and they breake not the bones. After Ghostly vnderstanding we doe eate the lambes head, when wee take holde of Christes diuinitie in our beliefe. Agayne when we take holde of his humanitie with loue, then eate we the lambs feete, because that Christe is the beginning and end, God before all worlde, and man in the end of this worlde. What bee the lambes purtenaunce but Christes secrete precepts, and these we eate when we receiue with the greedines the word of life. There must nothing of the lambe be left vnto the mornig, because that all Gods sayings are to bee searched with great carefulnesse: so that all his precepts may be knowen in vnderstanding and deede in the nyght of this present life, before that the last day of the vniuersall resurrection doe appeare. If wee cannot searche out thoroughly all the mysterie of Christes incarnation, then ought we to betake the rest vnto y^e might of the holy ghost with true humilitie, and not to search rashly of that deepe secretenes aboue the measure of our vnderstanding. They did eate the Lambes flesh wyth theyr loynes girt. In the loynes is the lust of the bodye, and he whiche will receyue that housell, shall couer or wrap in that concupiscence, and take with chastitie that holy receite. They were also shod. What be shoes but of the hides of dead beasts? We be truely shod if we match in our steppes and dedes, the life of mē departed this life, which please God with keeping of hys commandements. They had stauies in their handes when they did eate. This staffe signifieth a carefulnes & diligent ouerseeing. And all they, that best knowe and can, shoulde take care of other men, and stay them vp with theyr helpe. It was inioyned to the eaters y^t they should eate the lambe in haste, for God abhorreth slouthfulnesse in his seruants, and those hee loueth, that seeke the ioye of euerlasting lyfe with quickenes, and hast of minde. It is written: Prolong not to turne vnto God, least the time passe away throughe thy slow tarrying. The eaters mought not breake the lābs bones. No more mought y^e souldiers that did hang Christ, breake his holy legges, as they did of the two theeues that hanged on either side of him. And the Lord rose from death sounde without all corruption: and at the last iudgement they shall see him, whom they did most cruelly wounde on the crosse. This time is called in the Ebrue tongue Pasca, & in Latine Transitus, and in English a Passeouer, because that on this day the people of Israel passed from the land of Egypt ouer the red sea: from bondage to the lād of promise. So also did our Lorde at this time departe as sayeth Iohn the Euangeliste, from thys world to hys heauenly father. Euen so we ought to folow our head, and to goe from the deuill to Christe: from thys vnstable worlde, to hys stable kingdome. Howbeit we shoulde firste in this presente lyfe departe from vice to holy vertue: from euill manners to good manners, if we wil after this our lente life goe to that eternall life, and after our resurrection, to Christ. He bring vs to hys euerlasting father, who gaue hym to deathe for our sinnes. To hym be honour and praise of well doynge world wythout ende. Amen.

And thus I suppose, it standeth cleare & evidently prooued by course of al these ages afore recited, from the time of Tertullian and Austen vnto the daies of this Elfricus aboue mencioned, and after him, that this newcome miracle of transubstantiation was not yet crept into the heades of men, nor almost came in any question amongst learned mē nor was admitted for any doctrine in the Church,* at least for any general doctrine of all men to be receiued, til a M. yeare compleate after Christe, that is, till that Sathan began to be let at large. Apoca. 20.* For who euer heard in all the primitiue Church, or euer reade in the woorkes of the old ancient Doctors this question once to be asked, or disputed, whether any substance of bread and wine remained in the Lordes Supper? Or what manne was euer so doltish to beleue any suche thyng, or euer called hereticke for not beleuing the same, before the time of seduction that is Page 1147 before the 1000. yeares aforesayd were expired.

*Wherefore they that stand so much vppon the antiquity of this Article as a doctrine which hath euer since Christes time bene receaued in the Church, taught by the Apostles, beleued of all Catholickes, and confirmed by consent of all ages, of Councels, of natiōs, and people vnto this present day: these I say, either shewe them selues very ignoraunt in hystories and in all state of antiquitie or els most impudently they doe abuse the simple credulitie of the people.

To procede now farther in this discussion of antiquitie, it followed, that after the time of Elfricus aforesayde, this matter of transubstantiation began firste to be talked off, & to come in question among a few superstitious monkes: so that as blindnes and superstition began more and more to encrease,* so the sayd grosse opinion still more and more, both in number and authoritie preuailed, in so much that about the yeare of our Lord. 1060. the denying of transubstantiation began to be counted heresie.

And in this number firste was one Berengarius a Frenche man,* and Archdeacon of Angeowe, whyche of all Christen men, which we read of, was first called and counted an hereticke for denying of transubstantiation, & troubled for the same, as ye shall heare.

This Berengarius liued in the time of Pope Leo 9. Uictor, and Nicholas 2. which was about the yeare of our Lorde. 1060. Albeit I doe finde our wryters heere in some discrepance. For the most of them doe holde, that he firste recanted vnder Pope Leo 9. in the Councel of Uercellense: and afterwarde againe vnder Pope Nicholas 2. about the yeare 1062. as is to be gathered of Gratian, De consecrat. dist. 2. Ego Berengarius, where he sayth, that Pope Nicholas did send about to Bishops and Archbishops, the Copie of his recantation.

Againe, by the Actes of the Councell of Rome, it there appeareth, that the sayd Berengarius made this hys sayde last recantation vnder Pope Hildebrande, called Gregory 7. But this difference of times is no great matter to stand vpon. The truth of the story is this: that when Berengarius had professed the truth of the sacrament, & had stande in the open confession therof, according to the auncient veritie of the doctrine receaued in the Church before, he was so handled by certaine malignaunt & superstitious monks that what by euill entreatie, and what for feare of deathe (such is the weake frailty of man) he began to shrink, and afterward did in deede recant the truth.

Of these malicious ennemies againste Berengarius, the chiefest troubler was Lancfranke, Abbot of Codune, afterward Archbishop of Canterbury, Guimond monke, likewise first of the abbey of Leufrede, & afterward Archb. of Auersane: Algerius also monke of Corbein: Fulbertus also monke and byshop: and Hildebrand sometime monke of Cluniake, and then Archdeacon of Turon, & afterward Bishop of Rome.

By these and such other monks of the like fraternitie, the errour and heresie of transubstantiation began firste to be defended, and partes publikely in wryting to be taken about that matter.* Of the which sides and partes, the firste that began to set vp that faction by wryting, seemeth to be Paschasius, who was a little before Berengarius aboute the time of Bertrame: and likewise Lancfrancke the firste that brought it into England.*

On the contrary side againe, the firste that was openly impugned and troubled for denying transubstantiation, was this Berengarius: with whom Lancfranck also was supposed at the first beginning to holde and take part, but afterward to cleare himselfe, he stode openly against hym in the Councell, and wrote against him.

It foloweth then in the Acte of the Councel, that when the Synode of Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, and other Prelates were together assembled, y^e greater number (saith the storie) did holde, that the breade and wine were turned substantially into the body and bloud of Christ. Notwithstanding (sayeth he) diuers there were in the sayde Councel whych helde the contrary wyth Berengarius,* but at laste were driuen to geue ouer. Berengarius amonge the rest, after he had long stand in the constant defence of the truth, at last relented to their willes, confessing his error where none was, and desired pardon of the Councell. And thys was (as seemeth to W. Malmesb.) hys firste geuing ouer. Who afterwarde returning to hymselfe agayne after the death of Pope Leo,* and prickte with the stinge of conscience, was driuen agayne to recognise the truthe, whych he before had denied.

The Pope (sayeth Malmesb.) perceauing this, would not leaue him so, but sent into Fraunce, Hildebrande hys Cardinall Chaplaine (as meete a mate for such a feate, as was in all Satans courte) and made him with a wany and to come agayne coram nobis: who so handled Berengarius and bringing hym before the face of the Councel bolden at Turon, that he made him to say, erraui, once again: against whome stode vp in that Councell Lanfrancus, and Guimundus aforesaid, impugning his assertion. And thus stādeth the narration of W. Malmesbery. But by the actes of y^e Councel of Rome appeareth an other declaration, which is, that thys latter recantation of Berengarius shoulde be at Rome vnder Hildebrand, being then Pope,* in the yere of our Lord. 1076. and in the moneth of February, and that in the sayde Councell holden in Ecclesia Saluatoris, thys recantation of, Ego Berengarius, was made, and he enioyned by the sayd Pope Hildebrand, vpon hys oth, neuer hereafter to teache or dispute contrary to that faith of the Sacrament there holden. &c.

Againe, Henry Bullinger in his booke,De origine erroris, following belike some other authour, expresseth the order of the foresayd recantation after thys sorte, and sayeth, that in the time of Pope Leo. 9. Anno. 1051. there was a Romane Councell holden at Uercellense, in the whyche Councell Lanfrancke beinge then present, the Booke of Ioh. Scotus was openly read, and there condemned. Also Berengarius was sent for, who seeing the preiudiciall proceeding of that Councell, refused himselfe to come, but sent two Clerkes, which openly there defended hys cause and quarell, and were for the same committed vnto prison. Such is the freedome of the Popes generall Councils, w^t prisons and violence to defend their verities. Against the doings of this Councel notwithstanding, the French men stode stiffe, both at Angew, and Turon, ioyning and consenting wyth Berengarius.

Not long after this, died Pope Leo, and after him succeeded Pope Uictor,* by whom an other Synode was kept at Florence, where the Actes and doings of the foresayde Councel of Uercellense, were confirmed, and a Legate also appointed to be sent to Turon in Fraunce. This legate was Hildebrand aboue mentioned,* who calling the clergy of Fraunce together in a Synode, fell there in hande wyth the cause of the Sacrament. Berengarius not being ignoraunt of these Romaine Councils, so kept himselfe, that in all his action, he would geue none other answere, but that he beleued and consented with the faith of the Catholicke Church: & so for that time did frustrate the purpose of the councel, rather deluding the pretēses of his ennemies, then freely confessing the simple truth.

Againe,* after Uictor came Pope Nicholas 2. who congregating an other Councell at Rome, An. 1058. sent for Berengarius there to appeare, who being present, argued what he could, for the iustnesse of his cause, but all woulde not serue: In the Popes generall Councils, such a stroke and mastership beareth authoritie aboue veritie. Berengarius being thus borne downe on euery side by might & superioritie, when no remedye woulde serue,* but hee muste needes recant againe (for the law of relapse was not yet in season) he desired to know what other confession of the sacrament the Pope woulde require of him,* besides y^t whych hee hadde there confessed. Then Pope Nicolas committed that charge to Humbart a Monke of Lotharinge, and after a Cardinall, y^t he should draw out in formable wordes, the order of his recantatiō, after the prescription of Rome, whych hee shoulde reade and publickely professe before the people. The forme of which words is registred in the Decrees, De consecrat. dist 2. Ego Berengarius. &c. The effecte whereof is thys: That hee pretendeth with heart and mouth, to professe, that he acknowledging the true, catholicke,*and Apostolicall faith, doth execrate all heresie, namely, that, wherewyth hee hath lately bene infamed, as holding that the bread and wine vpon the Altare, after the consecration of the Priest, remaine onely a Sacrament, and are not the very selfe body and bloude of oure Lorde Iesu Christ, neither canne be handled or broken wyth the priestes handes, or chewed with the teethe of the faithfull, otherwise then onely by maner of a Sacrament Consenting now to the holy and Apostolicall Church of Rome,*he professed wyth mouth and heart, to holde the same faith touching the Sacraments of the Lordes masse, which the Lorde Pope Nicholas, with his Synode heere present doth holde, and commaundeth to be holden by hys Euangelicall and Apostolicall authoritie, that is, that the bread and wine vpon the Altar, after consecration are not only a Sacramēt, but also are the very true and selfe body, and bloud of our Lorde Iesu Christ, and are sensibly felt and broken with handes, and chewed with teethe: swearing by the holy Euangelistes, that whosoeuer shall holde or say to the contrary, he shall holde them perpetually accursed, and if he himselfe shall hereafter presume to preach or teach against the same, he shall be content to abide the seueritie and rigour of the Canons. &c.

This cowardly recantation of Berengarius, as it offended a great number of the godly sorte: so it gaue to the cōtrary part no litle triumph, wherby euer since they haue taken the greater courage to tread downe the truth.

Page 1148It happened shortlye after this, that Hildebrande the Popes graunde Captaine, in the behalfe of hys Mayster Pope Nicolas, went in warfare against the Normandes. Which warre being finished, shortly after, he set vppon a new viage to fight for Pope Alexander, against Cadolus: which victory being also atchieued, it was not long, but he put the new Pope Alexander beside the cushion, and was made Pope himselfe: so that during the busie stirre of these warres, the Popes holinesse had no laisure to attende the debating of this controuersie of the Sacrament.

*At length, when al was quieted, and Pope Hildebrand now was where he woulde be, hys restlesse brayne coulde not be vnoccupied, but eftsoone summoneth a new Councell at Rome in the Church of Laterane, to reuiue agayne the olde disceptation of Berengarius, about the yeare (as some holde) 1079.

Thus Berengarius beyng toste by these Monkes and Phariseis, was so confounded, and bayted on euery side, that partly for worldly feare, straining him on the one side, partly for shame and grieve of conscience, that he had nowe twice renied the truth, on the other side, that the man (as is of hym reported) after these suche turbulent tragedies, forsaking his goods, his studies, learning, and former state of life, became a labourer, and wrought wyth hys handes for liuing, all the residue of his life.

The opinion which Berengarius sustained touchyng the Sacrament (as by his owne wordes in Lancfrankes booke may appeare) was thys: *The sacrifice of the Churche consisteth of two things: The one visible: the other inuisible, that is, of the Sacrament, and of the thing or matter of the Sacrament. Which thing (which is to meane, the body of Christe) if it were here present before our eyes, it were a thing visible & to be sene: but being lift vp into heauen, and sitting on the right hand of his father, to the time of restoring of all thing (as S. Peter sayeth) it can not be called downe from thence. For the person of Christ consisteth of God and man: the Sacrament of the Lords table consisteth of bread and wine, which being consecrate are not chaunged, but remaine in their substances, hauing a certaine resemblance or similitude of those things, wherof they be sacraments, &c. Ex Lib. Lancfranci.

By these wordes of Berengarius doctrine, all indifferent readers may see & iudge, that he affirmed nothing but that was agreable to the holy scripture, beleuing wyth S. Austen, and all other auncient elders of the Churche, that in the holy supper all faithful beleuers be refreshed spiritually, with the body & bloud of the Lord, vnto euerlasting life. * Wherefore most impudently they doe misreporte hym (as they doe many other besides) whych falsely lay to hys charge, as though his teaching should be, that in the sacred supper of the Lord, nothing els were receiued of y^e faithful, besides onely y^e bare signes, which is the bread & the wine.

And nowe that you haue seene the doctrine of Berengarius, let vs also take a vewe of the contrary teaching of Lanfrancus and his fellowes, conferring and comparyng together the institution of the one side, with the institution of the other, to marke and cōsider whych of them soundeth nearer to the truth of the scriptures. The wordes of Lanfrancke be these:

I beleue the earthly substances, which vpon the Lordes table are diuinely sanctified, through the ministration of the Priest, to be conuerted vnspeakeably, incomprehensibly, and miraculously by the operation of Gods mightye power, into the essence of the Lordes body, *the outward formes only of the things themselues, and certaine qualities reserued, and that for two respectes: The one, least the sight of the rawe and bloudy flesh might otherwyse make men to abhorre from eating thereof for that they whiche beleue the thinge they see not, might haue the greater merite for their beliefe. The conuersion of which earthly substances into the essence of the Lordes body, notwithstanding, yet is the selfe same body of the Lorde in heauen, and there hathe hys essentiall being at the right hande of hys father immortall inuiolate, perfect, vndeminished, and vncorrupted: so that truely it may be affirmed, the selfe same body both to be receiued of vs, and yet not the selfe same. *The self same, I meane, as touching the essence, propertie, and vertue of his true nature: and yet not the selfe same as touching the formes of breade and wine, and other outwarde qualities incurring to our outwarde senses. &c. And thus haue ye the confession of Lancfranke Archb. of Cant.

From thys confession of Lancfranke, the opinion and assertion also of Guimundus Archb. of Auersane, doth nothing differ in grosenesse and impietie, but rather passeth the same, thus affirming and defending: That the bodye of Christ is pressed, and torne with teethe euen like as it was felt and touched with the handes of Thomas.

And moreouer, the sayde Guimundus (if his booke be not rather counterfayted at Louaine) in the same place answearing to an obiection put out, that it is not lawfull for Christe to be torne in pieces with teethe, doubteth not to pronounce that whether we take tearing for hard biting, or soft biting, it is not repugnant nor disagreeing, but that (by the will of God agreeing therunto) the body of Christ may be touched with handes, bitten wyth mouth, crushed,* yea and deuided in pieces, wyth hard or soft pressing of the teeth: and that, as hee was brused vppon the crosse, according to the Prophete, saying: Hee was brused for our iniquities, &c. so the same body for the health of the faithfull, may deuoutly be torne and rent with theyr teethe any thyng to the contrary notwithstanding. &c. Guimund. lib. Sacrament. fol. 30. Iudge now all good studious readers, what is to be thought of this kinde of doctrine, and howe thys opinion cohereth with the infallible voyce of Gods worde, saying: Exod. And of him ye shall not breake a bone. &c.

Thys rude and mishapen doctrine of these Monkes, concerning transubstantiation, as ye haue heard,* whē and by whome it began first to be broached: so if ye would now know by what learning and scriptures they did confirme, and establish the same, ye must here thinke and vnderstād, howe their chieftest groundes and substaunce to perswade the people was at this time, certain myracles by them forged, and published both in theyr wrytings and preachings whereof one was the same of Odo aboue recited, whyche Osberne, or some other monkish Legend inuented of him, howe he shoulde shewe vnto certaine the host turned into the likenesse of flesh and bloude droppinge into the chalice for the conuersion of those clearkes, whiche before would not beleeeue it.

An other like miracle is also told by the sayde Osberne of Dunstane in this order,* how the sayd Dunstane appeared to a certaine lame crepill in the nyght, willing hym to resort vnto his tombe, to haue hys limmes again restored. Which crepil, according as he was willed, after he had ther continued praying for health a lōg time, and could not obtaine, began to returne home againe after long tarying,* w^tout all hope of recouery. To whom the sayd Dunstane appearing againe by the way, asked from whence hee came, and whether he would. The crepill answearing, declared how he came thether vppon hope of health, where hee had long taryed, and because he could finde no recouerie, therfore he nowe was returning home. To whome then sayde Dunstane: I am (sayeth he) Dunstane the fellowe seruant of all Gods seruants,* and haue bene occupied with certain necessary busines, for the which I could not be present ther with my children. For Elfrike (sayde hee) otherwise surnamed Bata hath attempted to disherite my church, but I haue so stopped him, that he could not preuaile.

Many other fabulous miracles of the like stampe are rife in popish stories, counterfayted & forged vnder diuers and sondry names, some referred to Gregory, some to Paschasius, and to other moe, whiche to recite all, would fill a whole sea full of lyes & fables. Among many,* one is thus inuented of Paschasius. There was a Priest, sayth hee, of Almain, named Plegildus, who did see and handle wyth his hands, visibly the shape of a childe vpon the aulter & so after he had imbraced and kissed him, it returned againe to the likenes of bread, as hee shoulde come to the receiuing therof. This miracle when it was objected against Berēgarius, he merely deriding the blinde fable, aunswered in these wordes: Speciosa inquit, pax nebulonis, vt cui oris praeberet basium, eo dentium in ferret exitium. That is, A goodly peace quoth he of a false verlet, that whō he before kissed with his mouth, by & by he goeth about to teare him with •is teeth.

An other miracle is reported of a Iew body, who vpon a time entring into the Church, with an other Christian lad which was his play fellow, saw vpon the altar a little childe broken & torne in peeces,* and afterward by portions to be distributed among the people. Which sight when the young Iew comming home had told vnto his father to be true and certayne, hee was for the same, condemned to be burned. Thus he being inclosed in a house, and the dore fast where he should be burned, he was founde and taken out from thence by the Christians, not onely aliue, but also hauing not one heare of his heade blemished w^t the flames about him. Who then being of the Christians, demaunded howe he was so preserued from the burning fire: there appeared (sayd he) to me a beutiful woman sitting on a chair, whose sonne the childe was, which was before deuided & distributed in the Church among the people, who reached to me her hand in the burning flame, and wyth her gowne skirtes kepte the flame from mee, so that I was preserued thereby from pearishing. &c. Belike these Monkes lacked miracles among the Christians, when they were faine to borow such figmentes of the Iewes to prooue their fayned transubstantiation.

And these commonly were then the argumēts of these Monkes,* wherwith they perswaded the people to beleue their transubstantiation. But to leaue these monkes fictions, & to returne againe to Berengarius, thus Malmesbury Page 1152 of him reporteth, that after he had once or twice recāted (as is aforesayde) yet notwythstanding this doctrine of the Sacrament still remained in the minde of his hearers. And how so euer the tirāny of the Pope did driue him thorough feare to denye his opinion, and wrought him much trouble, yet notwithstanding after hys death he lacked not his well willers. In the number of whom was Hildebertus Bishop Cenomanensis, whose verses in commendation of his master, I thought here not vnworthy to be preserued, being otherwise rare peraduenture to be founde in our storie wryters.

Verses in praise of Berengarius.

QVem modo miratur, semper mirabitur orbis,

*Ille Berengarius non obiturus obit:

Quem sacrae fidei fastigia summa tenentem,

Tandem extrema dies abstulit ausa nefas.

Illa dies damnosa dies, & perfida mundo:

Qua dolor & rerum summa ruina fuit.

Qua status ecclesiae, qua spes, qua gloria cleri,

Qua cultor iuris iurè ruente ruit.

Quicquid Philosophi, quicquid cecinere Poetae,

Ingenio cessit eloquioquè suo.

Sanctior & maior sapientia, maius adorta,

Impleuit sacrum pectus & ora Deo.

Pectus eam voluit, vox protulit, actio prompsit:

Singula factori sic studuere suo.

Vir sacer & sapiens, cui nomen crescit in horas:

Quo minor est quisquis maximus est hominum.

Qui census peperit paucos, seruauit honores:

Cui potior pauper diuite, iusque lucro.

Cui nec desidiam, nec luxum res dedit ampla:

Nec tumidum fecit multus & altus honos.

Qui nec ad argentum, nec ad aurum lumina flexit:

Sed doluit quoties cui daret haec, aberat.

Qui non cessauit inopum fulcire ruinas,

Donec inops, dando pauper & ipse fuit.

Cuius cura sequi naturam legibus vti,

Et mentem vitij, ora negare dolis:

Virtutes opibus, verum praeponere falso,

Nil vacuum sensu dicere vel facere:

Laedere nec quemquam, cunctis prodesse, fauorem

Et popolare lucrum pellere mente, manu.

Cui vestis textura rudis, cui non fuit vnquam,

Ante sitim potus, nec cibus ante famem.

Quem pudor hospitium statuit sibi, quam{que} libido

Incestos superat, tam superauit eam.

Quem natura parens cum mundo contulit, inquit,

Degenerant alij, nascitur iste mihi:

Quaeque vagabatur & penè reliquerat orbem,
Inclusit sacro pectore iustitiam.
Vir sacer à puero, qui quantum praeminet orbi
Fama, adeò famae praeminet ipse suae.
Fama minor meritis cùm totum peruo let orbem,
Cùm semper crescat, non erit aequa tamen.
Vir pius atque grauis, vir sic in vtroque modestus,
Vt liuor neutro rodere possit eum.
Liuor enim destet, quem carpserat antea, nec tam
Carpsit & odit eum, quam modo laudat, amat:
Quàm prius ex vita, tam nunc ex morte gemiscit,
Et queritur celeres huius abisse dies.
Vir verè sapiens & parte beatus ab omni:
Qui coelos anima, corpore ditat humum.
Post obitum secum vi•ram precor ac requiescam,
Nec fiat melior sors mea sorte sua.

Although in this time of Berengarus, whyche was about the yeare of oure Lorde. 1060. (as ye haue heard) this error of transubstantiation began to growe in force and strength, by the supporting of certaine popishe monkes aboue rehearsed, as Lancfrancus, Guimundus, Algerius, Hugo, Bishop of Lincolne. Fulbertus, (of whom it is said in stories, that our Ladie gaue him sucke being sicke, wyth her owne brestes) and such other: yet notwithstanding, all this while the sayd Transubstantiatiō was decreed for no publicke law, * nor doctrine to be holden by any general cōsent, either of the Church of Rome, or any other Councell, before the Council of Laterane, vnder Pope Innocent the 3. who in the yeare of our Lorde. 1215. celebrating in the church of Laterane, a generall council of 1300. bishops, enacted there diuers constitutions, as of yerely cōfession, and the communion to be vsed of the whole multitude once a yeare through euery parish church.

Item, for the recouery of the holy land, with a subsidie also to be leauied for the same.

Item for the abolishing of the bookes and wrytinges of Ioachim Abbas, and also the opinions of Almaricus afore mentioned: notwithstanding that y^e said Ioachim did subscribe with his owne hand that he held the same doctrine, * which was in the church of Rome, and also submitted hys bookes to be presented to the Sea of Rome, there to bee corrected or approoued. And yet was he iudged though not an heretike yet to be erroneous, & especially in those bokes which he wrote against Peter Lombard, calide afterward the master of Sentence.

In the sayde Counsel, besides diuers other constitutions and the Articles of the Creede there in order repeated,* as appeareth, Extr. De summa trinit. & fide Catholica, cap. 1. firmiter, there was also enacted, decreed, and establyshed the fayth and beliefe of Transubstantiation, in these woordes following.

There is one vniuersall Church of the faithful, without which none can be saued, in the which Church the self same Iesus Christ is both Priest and also the sacrifice,* whose body and bloude are truly contained in the Sacrament of the aulter, vnder the formes of breade and wine, the breade being transubstantiated into the body and the wine, into the bloud, by the power and workinge of God: so that to the accomplishing of thys mysterie of vnitie, wee might take of his, the same which he hath taken of ours. And thys sacrament none can make or consecrate, but hee that is a prieste lawfully ordained, according to the keyes of the Church, whych Iesus Christ hath left to his Apostles, and to their successours. &c.

And thus was the foundation layd for the building of transubstantiatiō, vpon the consent of these foresayd. 1300. Byshops, in the yeare of our Lorde aboue specified, vnder pope Innocentius, and the doctrine therof intruded for an article of fayth into the church, necessarily to be beleueed of all men vnder payne of heresie.

But yet all this while, notwithstanding that the substaunte of bread and wine was nowe banished out of the sacrament,* and vtterly transcorporated into the substance of Christes very body and bloud: yet was not this body eleuated ouer the priestes head nor adored of the people till the dayes of pope Honorius the 3. succeeding after Innocentius, who by his counsaile likewise commaunded adoration and eleuation to be ioyned with transubstantiation as one idolatry commonly bringeth forth an other.

Agayne, the sayd sacrament of the Lordes supper being now consecrated, transubstantiated, eleuated and adored yet it was not offered vp for a sacrifice propitiatory for the quicke and the dead, nor for a remedye of the soules in Purgatory, nor for a merite operis operati, sine bono motu vtentis. &c. before that other popes comming after, added still new additions to the former inuentions of theyr predecessours.

And thus haue you the whol order and origine of these Idolatrous partes of the masse described by theyr times & ages,* whiche first began with consecration and the forme therof, which were wordes of the Canon. Then came trāsubstantiation by Innocentius, and after eleleuation & adoration by Honorius, and last of all came the oblation meretorious and propitiatory for the quicke and dead in remission of sinnes, Ex opere operato.

Which thinges being thus constituted by the to muche vsurped authority of the church of Rome,* shortly after followed persecution, tyranny and burning among the christians, first beginning with the Albingenses, and the fayth full congregation of Tholouse, neare about the tyme of the sayd Innocentius, as is afore remembred. pag. 271.

And thus much for the first article of transubstantiatiō which (as ye haue heard) was not admitted into y^e Church for any generall doctrine of fayth, before the yeare and time aboue assigned, of pope Innocent the third, and therefore if any haue bene otherwise perswaded, or yet doe remayne in the same perswasion still of this doctrine, as though it had bene of a longer cōtinuance then frō the time aboue expressed, let him vnderstand that by ignoraunce of hystories he is deceiued, and for the more satisfyinge of his mynde, if he credite not me,* let him beleue the wordes of one of hys owne catholike sort, Iohn Duns I meane, who in hys 4. booke wryting of Transubstatiatiō, in what time and by whose authority it was first establieshd, hath these words, which also are before mentioned, pag. 257. These woordes of the Scripture might be expounded more easily and more plainly wythout transubstantiatiō: but the Church did chuse thys sence, whych is harder, being thereto mooued (as seemeth) chiefly because men shoulde holde of the Sacraments, the same whyche the Church of Rome doth holde. &c. And further in the same place the sayde Duns expounding himselfe what hee meaneth by the church of Rome, maketh there expresse mention of the sayde Innocentius the 3. and of thys Councell of Laterane. &c.

And furthermore, to the entent that such as be indifferent seekers of the trueth, may be more amplie satisfied in Page 1150 this behalfe, that this transubstantiatiō is of no antiquitie, but of a late inuention: I wil also adioyne to this testimonie of Iohan. Scotus,* the iudgement and verdict of Erasm. lib. Annot. where he wryteth in these wordes: In Synaxi transubstantiationē serò definiuit Ecclesia. Diu satis erat credere siue sub pane consecrato, siue quocun{que} modo adesse verum corpus Christi.*&c. That is, In the sacrament of the communion, the church cōcluded transubstantiatiō but of late dayes. Long before that it was sufficient to beleue the true body of Christ to be present eyther vnder bread, or els by some maner. &c.

The second Article.

As touching the seconde Article, which debarreth from the lay people the one halfe of the Sacramente,* vnderstanding that vnder one kind, both partes are fully contained, for so much as the world wel knoweth that thys Article is but young, inuented, decreed, and cōcluded no longer since then at the Councel of Constance, not past 200. yeres agoe: I shal not nede to make any long standing vpon that matter,* especially for that sufficient hath bene •aid th•rof before in our long discourse of the Bohemians story, pag. 611.

First, lette vs see the reasons and obiections of the aduersaries in restraining the Laitie from the one kynde of this Sacrament.* The vse (say they) hath bene so of longe continuance in the Church. Whereunto we aunswere, that they haue no euident nor authentike example of anye auncient custome in the church, which they can produce in that behalfe.

Item, where they alledge the place of S. Luke, where Christ was known in breaking of bread.* &c. citing moreouer many other places of Scripture, wherein mention is made of breaking of bread: to aunswer therunto, although wee doe not vtterly repugne, but that some of those places may be vnderstanded of the Sacrament, yet that beyng graunted, it followeth not therefore, that one parte of the Sacrament was only ministred to the people without the other, when as by the common vse of speach, vnder the naming of one part, the whole action is meant. Neither doth it followe, because that breade was broken among the brethren, therefore the cuppe was not distributed vnto them. For so we finde by the words of S. Paule, that y^e vse of the Corrinthians was to communicate not onely in breaking of bread, but in participating the cuppe also. The cup (sayeth he) which we participate.*&c.

Also after the Apostles, in the tyme of Cyprian, of Hierome, of Gelasius and other successiue after them, it is euident y^t both the kindes were frequented in the Church. First Cyprian in diuers places declareth that the sacramēt of the bloud was also distributed.*How do we (sayth he) prouoke them to stand in the confession of Christ, to the shedding of their bloud, if we deny vnto them the bloud of Christ when they prepare themselues to the conflict?

The wordes of Hierome are plaine. Priestes (sayth he) whiche minister the Eucharist,*and deuide the bloude vnro the people.

In historia tripartita, it was sayde to y^e Emperour Theodosius,*how will you recieue the body of the Lord, with such bloody handes, or the cup of hys precious bloud, with that mouth, which haue spilled so much innocent bloud?

In the Canon of Gelasius, and in the Popes own decrees,* these words we read: We vnderstand that there be some whych receauing onely the portion of the Lordes bodye, doe abstaine from the cuppe of hys sacrate bloud, to whom we enioyne, that either they receaue the whole Sacrament in both the kinds, or els that they receaue neither:*for the diuiding of that whole & one Sacrament cannot be done without great sacriledge, &c. So that thys decree of Pope Gelasius being contradictorie to the councell of Constance, it must follow, that either y^e pope did erre, or els the councell of Constance must needes be a sacrilegious Councel, as no doubt it was.

The like testimonie also appeareth in the Councell of Toletane,* that the laitie did then communicate in bothe kindes, besides diuers other olde presidēts, remaining yet in the churches both of Germanie and also of Fraunce, declaring likewise the same.

And thus it standeth certain and demonstrable by manifolde probations, how farre this newfound custome differeth from all antiquitie and prescription of vse and time. Againe, although the custome therof were neuer so auncient, yet no custome may be of that strength to gainstand or countermaunde the open and expresse commaundement of God, which sayeth to all men: Bibite ex hoc omnes. Drinke yee all of this. &c.

Againe, seeing the cup is called the bloude of the newe testament, who is hee that dare or can alter the Testament of the Lorde, when none may be so hardy to alter the Testament of a man, being once approoued or ratified?

Further, as concerning those places of Scripture before alledged, De fractione panis, that is, of breaking of bread, wherupon they thinke themselues so sure that the Sacrament was then ministred but in one kinde: To aunswere thereunto, first we say, it may be doubted whether all those places in Scripture, De fractione panis,* are to be referred to the Sacrament. Secondly, the same beyng geuen vnto them, yet can they not inferre thereby, because one parte is mentioned, that the full Sacrament therefore was not ministred. The common maner of the Hebrue phrase is, vnder breaking of bread to signifye generally the whole feaste or supper: as in the Prophete Esay, these woordes, Frange esurienti panem tuum, doe signifie as well geuyng drinke as bread, &c.

And thirdly howsoever those places, De fractione panis be taken, yet it maketh little for them, but rather against them. For if the Sacrament were administred amongst them in fractione panis. i. in breakinge of breade, then must they nedes graūt, that if bread was there broken. Ergo, there was breade,* forasmuche as neither the accidences of bread without breade can be broken, neither can the naturall body of Christ be subiect to any fraction or breakyng by the Scripture, which sayeth: *And yee shall breake no bone of him. &c. Wherefore take away the substance of breade, and there can be no fraction. And take away fraction, how then do they make a Sacrament of this breaking, whereas neither the substance of Christes body, neither yet the accidences wythout their substance can be broken, neither agayne will they admit any bread there remaining to be broken? And what then was it in thys their Fractione panis▪ that they did breake, if it were not Panis, that is, Substantia panis quae frangebatur? To conclude, if they say that this fraction of bread was a Sacramentall breaking of Christes bodye, so by the like figure let them saye that the being of Christes naturall body in the Sacrament is a Sacramental being, and we are agreed.

Item, they obiecte further and say,*that the churche vpon due consideration may alter as they see cause, in rites, ceremonies and Sacraments.

Aunswer. The institution of this sacrament standeth vpon the order, example, & commandement of Christ.* This order he tooke: First he deuided the breade seuerally frō the cuppe, and afterward the cuppe seuerally from the breade.* Secondly this he did not for any neede on his behalfe, but onely to geue vs example how to do the same after him, in remembraunce of his death to the worldes ende. Thirdly, beside this order taken, and example left, hee added also an expresse commaundement: Hoc facite, Doe thys. Bibite ex hoc omnes. Drinke ye all of this. &c. Against this order, example, and commaundement of the Gospel, no Church nor councill of men nor aungell in heauen hath any power or authoritie to change or alter, according as we are warned: If any bring to you any other Gospell beside that ye haue receiued, holde him accursed. &c.

Item, an other Obiection.*And why maye not the Churche (say they) as well alter the fourme of thys Sacramente, as the Apostles did the fourme of Baptisme, where in the Actes S. Peter sayth: Let euery one be baptised in the name of Iesu Christ. &c.

Aunswere. Thys text sayeth not, that the Apostles vsed thys fourme of baptising: I baptise thee in the name of Christ.&c. but they vsed many times this manner of speache, to be baptised in the name of Christe, not as expressing thereby the formable words of baptising, but as meaning this, that they would haue them to become members of Christe, and to be baptised as Christians, entring into his baptism, and not only to the Baptisme of Iohn: and therefore, althoughe the apostles thus spake to the people, yet notwithstanding when they baptised any themselues, they vsed (no doubt) the forme of Christ prescribed, and no other.

Item, among many other obiections, they alledge certaine perils and causes of waight and importance, as spilling, sheding, or shaking the bloud out of the cuppe, or souring, or els sticking vpon mens beardes. &c. for the which they say it is wel provided, the halfe communion to suffice. Wherunto it is soone aunswered, that as these causes were no let to Christ, to the Apostles, to the Corinthians, and to the brethren of the Primitiue Churche, but that in theyr publike assemblies they receiued al the whole Communion, as well in the one part as in the other: * so neither be the sayd causes so important nowe, to adnull and euacuate the necessarye commaundement of the Gospell, if we were as carefull to obey the Lorde, as wee are curious to magnifie oure owne deuises, to strayne gnattes, to stumble at strawes, and to seeke knottes in rushes, whych rather are in oure owne phantasies growing, then there where they are sought.

Page 1151 *In summa, diuers other obiections and cauillations are in Popish bookes to be found as in Gabriell the difference made betwene the laitie and Priests, also the distinction vsed to be made betweene the Priestes communion and the laicall communion. Where is to be vnderstand, that when Priests were bidde to vse the laicall communion, thereby was ment not receauing vnder one kinde as lay men doe nowe, but to absteyne from consecrating, and onely to receaue as the lay men then did. Some also alledge certeyne speciall or particular examples, as of the cuppe onely seruing for the bread, or of the bread only sent to certeine sicke folke for the cuppe. And heere they inferre the story of Sozomenus, touching the woman in whose mouth the Sacrament of bread, whiche she onely receaued without the cuppe, was turned to a stone, &c. other alledge other priuate examples likewise of infants, aged mē, sicke persons, men excommunicate, phrentickes and madde men, or men dwelling farre off from Churches, * in mountaynes or wildernes, &c. All which priuate examples neither make any instance against the auncient custome of publicke congregations frequented from the Apostles time, and much lesse ought they to derogate from the expresse and necessarye precept of the Gospell which saith to all men without exception: Hoc facite, &c. Bibite ex hoc omnes, &c.

The third Article.

Priuate Masses, trentall Masses, and dirige Masses, as they were neuer vsed before the time of Gregory, * vi.C. yeares after Christ: so the same do fight directly agaynste our christian doctrine, as by the definition therof may wel appeare: The Masse is a worke or action of the priest, applied vnto men for meriting of grace, Ex opere operato, in the which Action the Sacrament is first worshipped, * and then offered vp for a sacrifice for remission of sinnes, à poena & culpa, for the quicke and the dead. Of this definition as there is no part, but it agreeth with their owne teaching: so there is no part thereof which disagreeeth not from the rules of christian doctrine, especially these, as follow.

*1. The first rule is: Sacramentes be instituted for some principall end and vse, out of the which vse they are no sacraments. As the sacrament of Baptisme is a Sacrament of regeneration, and forgiuenes of sinnes to the person that is Baptised. But if it be caried about to be worshipped and shewed to other as meritorious for their remission, and regeneration, to them it is no sacrament.

2. No sacrament nor ceremonie doth profite or conduce, but them only which take and vse the same. *

3. Only the death of Christ, and the worke of his sacrifice vpon the crosse is to be applied to euery man by faith for saluation and health of his soule. * Beside this worke alone, to apply any action or worke of Priest or any other person, as meritorious of it selfe, and conducible to saluation, to soules health, or to remission of sinnes, it is Idolatrie and derogatorie to the Testamente of God, and to the bloud of Christ preiudiciall.

4. To make Idoles of sacramentes, and to woorshyp dumbe things for the liuing God,* it is Idolatry. Fugite Idola, &c. 1. Cor. 10.

5. Euery good worke whatsoever it be that a man doth, profiteth onely himselfe,* and cannot be applied to other men, Ex opere operato, to profite him vnto merite or remission, only the Actions of Christ except.

6. No man can apply to an other the sacrifice of Christes death by any worke doing;* but euery man must apply it to himselfe by his owne beleeuing. Iustus ex fide sua uiuet. Habacuc. 2.

7. The Sacrifice of Christes deathe dothe saue vs freely by it selfe,* and not by the meanes of any mans working for vs.

8. The Passion of Christ once done and no more, is a full and a perfecte oblation and satisfaction for the sinnes of the whole world,* both originall and Actuell: by the vertue of which Passion, the wrath of God is pacified toward mankind for euer, Amen.

9. The Passion of Christ once done is onely the obiect of that faith of ours whiche iustifieth vs and nothing else.* And therefore whosoever setteth vp any other obiect, beside that Passion once done, for our faith to apprehend and to behold the same, teacheth damnable doctrine, and leadeth to Idolatrie.

Against all these rules, priuate Masses directly doe repugne. For first beside that they transgresse the order, example, and commaundement of Christ (which diuided the bread and cup to them all) they also bring the Sacramente out of the right vse wherunto principally it was ordeined. For where as the vse of that Sacrament is principally instituted for a testimoniall and remembraunce of Christes death, the priuate Masse transferreth the same to an other purpose, either to make of it a gasing Idoll, or a worke of application meritorious,* or a sacrifice propiciatory for remission of sinnes, or a commemoratiō for soules departed in Purgatory, accordyng as it is written in their Masse booke: Pro quorū memoria corpus Christi sumitur, Pro quorū memoria sanguis Christi sumitur. &c. Where as Christ sayth contrary, Hoc facietis in meam commemorationem.

Furthermore,* the Institution of Christe is broken in this, that where the Communion was giuē in common, the priuate Masse suffereth the Priest alone to eate & drink vp all, and when he hath done, to blesse the people with the emptie cuppe.

Secōdly, whereas Sacraments properly profite none but thē that vse the same in the priuate Masse the Sacramēt is receaued in the behoofe not onely of him that executeth, but of them also that stand looking on, & of them also which be farre of, or dead and in Purgatory.

Thirdly,* whē by y^e scripture nothyng is to be applyed for remission of our sinnes, but onely the death of Christ, cōmeth in the priuate Masse as a worke meritorious done of the Priest, which beyng applyed to other, is auayleable Ex opere operato, both to him that doth it, and to them for whom it is done, ad remissionem peccatorum.

Fourthly, priuate Masses & all other Masses now vsed of the Sacramēt make an Idol, of commemoration make adoration, in stead of a receauyng, make a deceauyng,* in place of shewing forth Christes death, make new oblation of his death, & of a cōmuniō, make a single sole supping.* &c

Fiftly, whereas in this generall frayltie of mans nature,* no mā can merite by any worthynes of workyng for him selfe, the Priest in his priuate Masse taketh vpon him to merite both for him selfe, and for many other.

Sixtly, it standeth agaynst Scripture, that the Sacrifice and death of Christ can bee applyed any other wise to our benefite and iustification, then by fayth: Wherefore it is false that the action of the Masse can apply the benefite of Christes death vnto vs. Ex opere operato,*sine bono motu vntis vel sacrificantis.

Seuenthly, where as the benefite of our saluatiō and iustifyng standeth by the free gift & grace of God through our fayth in Christ:* contrary the application of these Popish Masses stoppeth the freenesse of Gods grace and maketh that this benefite must first come through y^e Priestes handes and his opus operatum, vnto vs.

The eight contrarietie betweene priuate Masse, and gods word, is in this: That where the scripture sayth Vnica oblatione cōsummauit eos, qui sanctificantur in perpetuum With one oblation he hath made perfect them that be sanctified for euer:* agaynst this rule the priuate Masse proceedeth in a contrary doctrine, making of one oblation a dayly oblation, and that which is perfectly done and finished, newe to be done agayne: And finally, that which was instituted onely for eating and for a remembraunce of that oblation of Christ once done, the Popish Masse, maketh an oblation and a new satisffection dayly to be done, for the quicke and the dead.

To cōclude these both priuate and publicke Masses of Priestes,* turne away the obiect of our fayth from the body of Christ crucified, to the body of Christ sacrificed in their Masses. And where God annexeth the promise of iustification, but onely to our fayth in the body of Christ crucified: they do annexe promise of remissiō a poena & culpa, to the body in their Masses sacrificed, by their application: besides diuers other horrible and intolerable corruptions whiche spryng of these their priuate and publicke Masses, whiche here I leaue to other at their leysure further to conceaue and to consider. Now let vs proceede to the other Articles folowyng.

¶The fourth and fift Articles of vowes and Priestes Mariage.

As we haue discoursed before by histories and order of tyme,* the antiquitie of the iij. former Articles aboue mentioned, to witte, of trāsubstātiation, of the halfe cōmunion and of priuate Masses, so now commyng to the Article of vowes and of Priestes mariage, the reader will looke perchaunce to be satisfied in this likewise, as in the other before & to be certified from what cōtinuaunce of tyme these vowes & vnmarried lyfe of Priests haue continued.* Wherin although sufficient hath bene sayd before in the former processe of this history, as in the life of Anselmus. pag. 195. also of Pope Hildebrād, pag. 175. &c. yet for the better establishing of y^e readers mynde agaynst this wicked article of Priests mariage, it shalbe no great labour lost, here briefly to recapitulate in the tractatiō of this matter, either what before hath bene sayd, or what more is to be added.

Page 1149 And to the entent that the world may see and iudge the sayd lawe and decree of Priests single sole life, to be a doctrine of no auncient standing heere within this Realme, but only since the time of Anselmus,* I will first alledge for me the wordes of Henr. Huntynghton. lib. 7. De historia Anglorum heere following.

Eodem anno ad festum Michaelis tenuit Anselmus Archiepiscopus Concilium apud Londonias: In quo prohibuit sacerdotibus Anglorum, vxores antea non prohibitas. Quod quibusdam mundissimum visum est, quibusdam periculosum: ne dum mundicias viribus maiores appeterent, in immundicias horribiles ad Christiani nominis summum dedecus inciderent, &c. That is, The same yeare at the feast of S. Michael. Anselme the Archbyshop of Canterbury held a Synode at London: *In the which Synode he forefended Priestes heere in Englande to haue wiues, which they were not inhibited before to haue. Which constitution seemed to some persons very pure and chaste. To othersome againe it seemed very dangerous, *least while that men should take vpon them such chastitie more then they should be able to beare, by that occasion they might happily fall into horrible filthines, whiche shoulde redound to the exceeding slaunder of christian profession, &c.

Albeit I deny not but before the time also of Anselmus, both Odo, and after him Dunstane Archb. of Canterbury, and Ethelwold B. of Winchester, and Oswold B. of Worcester in the dayes of King Edgar, anno. 963. as they were all Monkes themselues, so were they great doers against the marriage of priests, placing in Monkes in Churches and Colledges,* and putting out the married Priests as ye may read before pag. 153. Yet notwithstāding neither was that in many Churches, and also the priests then married, were not constrayned to leaue their wyues, nor theyr rouses, but onely at their owne choyce. For so writeth Malmesbury in vita Dunstani: Ita{que} clerici multarum Ecclesiarum,data optione, vt aut amictum mutarent, aut locis valedicerent, cessere, &c. That is: Therefore diuers & sondry clerkes of many Churches, being put to their choice, whether to chaunge their weede, or to part from their places, wente their waies, &c. So also Elfricus after them (of whome mention was made before) was somewhat busie in setting forward the single life of Priestes, and Lanfrancus lykewise. But yet this restreynt of Priestes lawfull marriage was neuer publickely established for a lawe heere in the Church of England, before the cōming of Anselme in the daies of William Rufus, & king Henry 1. writing in these words: Boldly I commaunde by the authoritie which I haue by my Archbishoprike,*not only within my Archbishoprike, but also throughout England, that all Priests that keepe women, shall be depriued of their Churches, and al ecclesiasticall benefices, &c. As ye may reade more at large before, page. 196. whiche was much about the same time whē as Hildebrand also at Rome begā to attempt the same matter, as before hath ben shewed: & also besides him were other Popes mo, as Innocent the 3. Pope Nicholas the 2. and Calixtus the 2. by whome the acte against Priests mariage was brought at length to his ful perfectiō, and so hath cōtinued euer since.

Long it were and tedious to recite here all such constitutions of Councils prouinciall and generall, namely of y^e council of Carthage, & of Toledo, which seemed to worke something in that behalf, against the matrimony of priests. Againe, longer it were to number vp the names of al such bishops and priests, which notwithstāding haue bin married since that time, in diuers countreys, as more amplye shall be shewed (the Lord willing) in the sequele hereof. In the meane season, as touching the age & time of this diuelish prohibition for priests to haue their wiues, thys is to be found by credible proofes, and conferring of histories, that in the yeare of our Sauour 1067. at what time Pope Hildebrand began first to occupy the Papall chayre,* this othe began first to be taken of Archbishops and Byshops, that they should suffer none to enter into the ministerie, or into any ecclesiasticall function hauing a wife: and lykewise the Clergie to be bound to promise the same.

And this was (as I said) about the yeare of our Lorde, 1067. well approued and testified by course of hystories.* Whereby appeareth the prophesie of S. Paule truely to be verified, speaking of these latter times. 1. Tim. 4. Where he writeth in these wordes. The spirit speaketh playnely, that in the latter times, there shall some depart from the faith, harkening vnto spirits of errour, and to doctrines of deuils, forbidding to marry, and commaunding to abstayne from meates, whiche the Lord hath created to be taken with thankesgeuing, &c.

In this prophesie of S. Paule ij. things are to be obserued: First the matter which he prophesieth of, that is, the forbidding of mariage,* and forbidding of meates, whiche God generally hath left free to all men. The second thyng in this prophesie to be noted, is the time whē this prophesie shall fall, that is, in the latter times of the worlde. So that this concurreth right well with these yeares of Pope Hildebrand aforesayde, beeing a thousande yeares complete after the Ascension of our Sauour: so that they may well be called the latter times.

This prophesie of S. Paule thus standing (as it doth firme and certain, that is,* that forbidding of mariage must happen in the latter times of the world, then must it nedes consequently follow therby, that the married life of priestes is more auncient in the Church, then is the single life, then the law I meane commaunding the single life of Priests. Which may soone be proued to be true, by the true count of times, and search of hystories.

For first at the Councill of Nice, it is notorious that this diuelish law of mariage to be restrained, was stopped by Paph•tius.

2. Before this Councill of Nice, in the yeare of our Lord 180. we reade of Polycrates B. of Ephesus, who dissenting from Pope Uictor about a certaine controuersie of Easter day, alledgeth for himselfe how his progenitoures before him 7. together, one after another, succeeded in that seate, and he now the 8. after them was placed in the same: vsing this his discent of his parents, not only as a defence of his cause, but also a glory to himselfe, &c.

3. Pope Syricius about the yeare of our Lord 390. wrote to the priests of Spaine about the same matter of putting their wiues from them, if his Epistle be not counterfeyte. These Spanish priestes had then with them a Byshop of Terragon. Who aunswering to Syricius in this behalfe, alledged the testimonies of S. Paule, that Priestes might lawfully retaine their wiues, &c.* To this Syricius replied againe (if his writing be not forged) most arrogantly and no lesse ignorauntly, reprouing the Priests that were married, and for the defence of his cause, alledged this sentence of S. Paule: Si secundum carnem vixeritis, moriemini. That is: If ye shall liue after the flesh, ye shall die, &c. Whereby may appeare not onely howe they in Spaine then had wiues,* but also how blinde these men were in the Scriptures, which shewed themselues such aduersaries against Priests Mariage.

4. To be short, the further we go & nearer to the auncient time of the church, the lesse auncient we shall finde the depriuation of lawfull matrimony amongst christian ministers, beginning if we will, with the Apostles, their examples and Canons, who although were not all married, yet diuers of them were, and the rest had power and libertie to haue and keepe their wiues, witnessing S. Paule, where he writeth of himselfe: *Non habemus potestatem sororem mulierem circumducendi sicut & reliqui Apostoli? That is to say: haue not we power to leade about a sister to wife, as also the other Apostles haue? Whereby is to be seene, both what he might do, and what the other Apostles did. Also Clemens Alexandrinus, whiche was CC. yeares after Christe, Lib. Strom 7. denieth not but that Paul was married beyng an Apostle, as well as Peter and Philp. * And as the sayde Apostles in their doctrine admonishe all men to marrie that can not otherwise doe, sayeng to euery one beeyng in daunger of temptation: Vnusquisque suam vxorem habeat ne tentet vos Satanas, &c. That is, Let euery man haue his owne wife, least Sathan tempt you, &c. So likewise the same Apostles in their Canons (as in the Popes Decrees cited) do precisely charge, that no Bishop nor priest, * shoulde sequester from him his wife for any matter or pretence of religion, saieng: If anye shall teach that a priest for religion sake, *ought to contemne his owne wife, let him be accursed, &c.

As for the Glose there in the margent, whiche expoundeth this word contemning for exhibiting things necessarye for her sustenance, all the worlde may see that to bee a Glose of meere Sophistry. * And because I haue here made mention of Clemens Alexandrinus, it shal not be to our purpose impertinent, to inferre the wordes of this worthy writer, wherewith he doth defend Priests lawfull matrimonie, against certayne vayne bosters of virginitie in his time. *Dicunt gloriosi isti iactatores, se imitari dominum, qui neque vxorem duxit, neque in mundo aliquid possedit: se magis quam alios Euangelium intellexisse gloriantes. That is: These glorious braggers doe vaunte themselues to bee the followers of the Lord, who neither had wife, nor yet possessed anye thing heere in the worlde, &c. And it followeth: Eis autem dicit scriptura, deus superbus resistit, humilibus autem dat gratiam. Deinde nesciunt causam cur dominus vxorem non duxerit primum quidem propriam sponsam habuit ecclesiam. Deinde vero nec homo erat communis, vt opus haberet etiam adiutore aliquo secundum carnem, &c. To these the Scripture maketh aunswere: God withstandeth the proude, and geueth grace to the humble. Agayne, they consider not the cause why the Lorde tooke no wife. * First he had his owne peculiar spouse: which is y^e Church. Moreouer, neither was he as a common man, that hee shoulde Page 1153 stand in such neede of a helper after the fleshe, &c. And in the same booke a little after alleading against them that abhorre matrimonie, * he inferreth the wordes of S. Paule: how that in the latter dayes some shall fall from the faith attending to spirits of error, and to doctrine of deuils, forbidding to marry, and to absteyne from meates, &c. Which place of Saint Paule, Clement heere applieth not against the Nouatians, and them that condemne matrimony in generall in all men, as naught: but he applyeth it only against suche, as forbid mariage in part, and namely in Priests, &c.

*This Clement wrote after Christ two hundreth yeres, and yet if we come downeward to lower times, we shall finde both by the Councell of Gangren CCC. yeares, and also by the Council of Nice CCCC. yeares after Christe, the same libertie of priestes mariage established and enacted as a thing both good and godly. The wordes of Gangren Councell be these: *Si quis discernit Praesbyterum coniugatum, tanquam occasione nuptiarum, quod offerre non debeat,  & ab eius oblatione ideo abstinet, anathema sit, &c. That is: If any do iudge that a Priest for his mariage sake, ought not to minister, and therefore doth abstaine from the same, let him be accursed.

Moreouer, proceeding yet in times and Chronicles of the Church, we shall come to the sixt Councell called Synodus Constantinopolitana,* almost seauen C. yeares after Christ: the wordes of the which Councell be alleadged in the Decrees, and be these in Latine. Quoniam in Romani ordine canonis esse cognouimus traditum, eos qui ordinati sunt Diaconi vel Presbyteri, confiteri quod non suis iam copulentur vxoribus, antiquum sequentes canonem Apostolicae diligentiae & constitutiones sacrorum virorum, legales nuptias amodo valere volumus, nullo modo cum vxoribus suis eorum connubia dissoluentes, aut priuantes eos familiaritate adinuicem, in tempore oportuno, &c. That is: Because in the order of the Romaine Canon, we know it so to be receaued, that such as be Deacons and Priestes, shall professe themselues to haue no more copulation with their wiues, we following the auncient Canon of the diligent Apostles and constitutions of holy men, enact that suche lawfull mariage, from henceforth, shall stande in force, in no case dissolving theyr coniunction with their wiues, neither depriuing them of their mutuall societie and familiaritie together, in suche time as they shall thinke conuenient, &c. Hetherto ye haue heard the decree: heare now the penaltie in the same decree and distinction contained. Si quis igitur praesumpserit contra Apostolicos canones aliquos Praesbyterorum & Diaconorum priuare à contactu & communione legalis vxoris suae deponatur, &c. That is: If any therefore shal presume, against the Canons of the Apostles,* to depriue either priest or Deacon from the touching and companie of his lawfull wife, let him be depriued. And likewise this Priest and Deacon, whosoever for religion sake shall put away his wife, let him be excommunicate, &c. And the Councell of Gangren sayth: let him be accursed. By these wordes of the Councell recited, sixe things are to be noted.

1. First, how this Councell calleth y^e Mariage of priestes lawfull, contrary to these vj. articles, and to a certeyne late Englishe writer of our countrey, entituling his booke against the vnlawfull mariage of Priestes.

2. In that this Councell so followeth the Canons of the Apostles, and constitutions of holy men: we haue to vnderstand, what the censure both of the Apostles: and determination of other holy men were therein.

3. If the Iniunction of this Councell, agreeyng thus with the Apostles and holy men, stode with truth, the contrary Canon of the Romaines, and also of these sixe English articles, must needes be condemned of error.

4. By this Councell appeareth that so long time, almost 700. yeares after Christ, this prohibition of Priestes mariage was not yet entred into the Orient Church, but stoutely was holden out.

5. By the Romane Canon heere mentioned (which began with Gregorius 600. yeares after Christ, a little before this Councell) it can not be denied, but the Church of Rome began then to disceuer, not onely from the veritie, but also from the vnitie of all other Churches, following the Apostolicke doctrine. Albeit the said Romane Canon, at that time stode not long, but was shortly disanulled by the sayd Gregorius agayne by the occasion of infants heads found in his fish pond, whereof (Christ willing) more shal be spoken heereafter.*

6. Sixtly, heere is to be noted & remēbred the craftie false packing, and fraude of the Romaines: which in the Latine booke of Councels, in diuers new impressions, haue suppressed this Canon, because be like, it maketh little w^t their purpose: plaieng much like with this, as Pope Zosimus Bonifacius and Celestinus played with y^e sixt council of Carthage, which for their supremacy would haue forged a false Canon of Nice, had not the Councell sent to Cōstantinople for the true exemplar therof & so proued them open lyers to their faces. So likewise this Canō aboue mētioned although it be omitted in some bookes, yet beyng found in the auncient & true written copies beyng alledged of Nilus a Greeke Byshop of Thessalonica.* CC. yere tofore and moreouer beyng found & alledged in the Popes own booke of Decrees Distin. 31. must needes conuince them of manifest theft & falsehoode. Thus it may stand sufficiently proued that y^e deprauation of Priestes lawfull mariage all this space was not entred into the church neither Greeke nor Latin,* at least tooke no ful possession before Pope Hildebrandus tyme. Anno Domini. 1070 and especially Pope Calixtus time. Anno Domini. 1120. which were the first open extortors of Priestes mariage.

Auentinus a faythfulll writer of his tyme writyng of the Councell of Hildebrand, hath these wordes: *Sacerdotes illa tempestate publicè vxores, sicut caeteri Christiani habebant filios procreabant, sicuti instrumentis donationū quae illi templis, Mystis, & Monachis fecere: vbi hae nominatim cum coniugibus testes citantur, & honesto vocabulo Praesbiterissae nūcupantur, inuenio Caesar tum. &c. That is: In those dayes Priestes commonly had wiues as other Christē men had, and had children also, as may appeare by auncient instrumentes, & deedes of gift, which were then giuen to Churches to the Clergy and to religious houses in the whiche instrumentes both the Priestes and their wiues also with them (which there be called Praesbyterissae) I finde to be alledged for witnesses. It happened moreouer y^e same tyme (sayth Auentine) that the Emperour had the inuestyng of diuers Archbyshopprickes, Byshopprickes, Abbayes and Nunries within his dominions, Pope Hildebrand disdaynyng agaynst both these sortes aforesayd, that is, both against them that were inuested by the Emperour and also agaynst all those Priestes that had wiues, prouided so in his Coūcell at Rome, that they which were promoted by the Emperour into liuyngs of the Church were counted to come in by Symony: the other which were maryed Priestes were counted for Nicolaitanes. Wherupon pope Hildebrād writyng his letters to y^e Emperour, to Dukes, Princes, and other great Prelates, and Potētates: namely to Bertholdus, Zaringer, to Rodolphus of Sueuia, to Welphon of Bauaria, to Adalberon, and to their Ladyes, and to diuers other to whom he thought good: also to Byshops, namely, to Otto Byshop of Constance, with other Priestes and lay people, willeth them in his letters to refuse and to keepe no company with those Symoniake, and those Nicolaitane Priestes (for so were they termed then, which had either any Ecclesiasticall liuyng by the Emperour, or els which had wiues to auoyd their Masses: * neither talke, neither to eate nor drinke with them, nor once to speake to them, nor to salute them, but vtterly to shunne them, as men execrable and wicked, no otherwise thē they would eschue the plague or pestilence.

By reason whereof ensued a mighty schisme and affliction among the flocke of Christ,* such as lightly the lyke hath not bene seene. For the Priestes went agaynst their Byshops, the people agaynst the Priest, the laytie agaynst the Clergy: briefly all ranne together in heapes & in confusion. Men and women, as euery one was set vpon mischief, wickednesse, contention and auarice, tooke thereby occasion vpon euery light suspicion, to resiste their Minister, to spoyle the goodes of the Church. The vulgare people contemned the Priestes which had maryed wiues, despised their Religion, and all thynges that they dyd: yea and in many places would purge the place where they had bene, with holy water, and brent their Tithes. Also such was, the mischief of them, that they would take the holy mysteries, whiche those maryed Priestes had consecrated, and cast them in the dyrt, & tread them vnder their feete: For so then had Hildebrand taught them, that those were no Priestes, neither that they were Sacramentes, whiche they did consecrate. So that by this occasion, many false Prophets rose, seducing the people from the truth of Christ, by forged Fables, and false miracles, and feyned Gloses, wrastyng the Scriptures as serued best for their owne purposes. Of whom few there were that kept any true chastity. Many could make glorious boastes & brags thereof, but the greatest part vnder the shew & pretence of honesty & purenes of life cōmitted incest, fornication, adultery, euery where almost, and no punishment was for the same. &c. Thus much out of Auentinus: Lib. 5. Annal.

To this testimony of Auentinus aboue mentioned, we will also adioyne the recorde of Gebuilerus a writer of this our latter tyme, and one also of their owne crewe,* who doth testifie that in tyme of the Emperour Henricus the fourth,* an. 1057. the number of 24. Byshops both in Germany, Spayne, and in Fraunce, were maryed, with the Page 1154 Cleargie also of their dioces.

Of the which Spanish Byshops we reade also in Isidorus, whiche wrote more then sixe hundreth yeares after Christ (and the place also cited in the Popes Distinctions) in his booke De clericorum vita,* how they ought eyther to leade an honest chaste life, or else to keepe themselues within the bande of matrimonie, &c. Whereby is declared the single life of Priests, eyther to be then voluntary, or else their mariage not to be restrained as yet, by any law.

Moreouer, such Calistian Priestes as be nowe adayes, counting Priests mariage as a new deuise, and not standing with auncient times,* let them looke vpon the Decree of Pope Symmachus, and answeare there to the Glose. Dist. 81. where it is written: Let Priests be all restrained from the conuersation of all women, except it be their mother, sister, or their owne wife, &c. Where the glose in the margent, geueth a note, saieng: Hic loquitur secundum antiqua tempora.

Thus if either the voyce of scripture might take place with these men which be so rigorous against Priestes mariage:* or if the examples of the Apostles might moue them (whome S. Ambrose witnesseth to haue bene all married, except onely Paule and Iohn) or else if the multitude of married Bishops and Priestes might preuaile with them, heere might be rehearsed:

That Tertullian was a married Priest, as witnesseth Hierome.

*Spiridion Byshop of Cyprus, had wife and children.

Hylary Byshop of Poytiers, was also married.

Gregory Byshop of Nyssa.

Gregory Byshop of Nazianzum.

*Prosper Byshop of Rhegium.

Cheremon Byshop of Nylus. All these were married Byshops.

*Of Polychrates, and his 7. aunciters Byshops and married men, we spake before.

Epiphanius Byshop of Constantinople in Iustinians tyme was the more commended, because his father & aunciters before him, * were Priests and Byshops married.

Hierome sayth, that in his time, Plurimi Sacerdotes habebant matrimonia. That is, many Priestes were then married men.

Pope Damasus reciteth vp a great number of Byshops of Rome, * which were Priestes sonnes, as:

- Syluerius. an. 544.
- Deus dedit, aboute the yeare 622.
- Adrianus 2. aboute the yeare 873. *
- Foelix 3. about the yeare 474.
- Hosius.
- Agapetus. an. 534.
- Gelasius, 484.
- Bonifacius.
- Theodorus, whose Father was Byshoppe of Hierusalem, aboute the yeare 634.
- Ioannes 10. an. 924.
- Ioannes 15. the sonne of Leo a Priest, aboute the yeare 984.
- Richarde Archdeacon of Couentry.
- Henry Archdeacō of Huntingdon.
- Volusianus Byshop of Carthage.
- Tho. Archbishop of Yorke, sonne of Sampson Byshop of Worcester.

And howe many other Byshops and Priestes in other countreys besides these Bishops of Rome, might be annexed to this Catalogue, if our leasure were such, to make a whole beaderole of them all?

In the meane time the wordes of Siluius Cardinall, & afterward B. of Rome, are not to be forgotten, whiche he wrote to a certeyne frende of his, * whiche after his orders taken, was disposed to mariage. To whome the foresayde Syluius aunswereth agayne in these wordes folowing: Credimus te vti non insulso consilio, si cum nequeas continere, coniugium quaeris: quamuis id prius cogitandum fuerat, anteaquam initiaueris sacris ordinibus. Sed non sumus dii omnes qui futura prospicere valeamus. Quando huc ventum est, vt legi resistere nequeas, melius est nubere quàm vri, &c. That is: We beleue that you in so doing, follow no sinister counsayle, in that you choose to be married, when otherwise you are not able to liue chaste. Albeit this counsayle should haue come into your heade, before that you entred into Ecclesiasticall orders. But we are not all gods to foresee before, what shall happen heereafter. Now for so much as the matter and case standeth so, that you are not able to resist the lawe, better it is to marry then to burne, &c.

All these premisses well considered, it shall suffice, I trust though no more were sayd, to proue that this general law and prohibition of priests mariage pretended to be so auncient, is of no such great time, nor lōg cōtinuance of yeres as they make it, but rather to be a late deuised doctrine gēdered by the Monkes, and grounded vpō no reason, law nor scripture, but that certeine, which be repiners against the truth, do racke and wrast a few places out of Doctors and ij. or iij. Councels for their pretended purpose. Whose obiections and blinde cauillations, I as professing heete but to write stories, referre to the further discussion of Diuines: in whose bookes this matter is more at large to bee sought and searched. In the meane season so much as apperteyneth to the searching of times and antiquitie, and to the conseruation of such Actes and monuments as are behoueable for the Church, I thought heereunto not vnprofitable to be adioined a certaine Epistle learned and auncient of Uolusianus, Bishop sometimes of Carthage, tending to the defence of Priests lawfull wedlocke,* which Aeneas Syluius in Descriptione Germaniae, also Illyricus in Catal. and Melancth. Lib. De coniugio do father vpon Huldericus Byshop of Augusta, in the time of Pope Nicholas 2. but as I finde it in an old written example, sent by Iohn Bale to Math. Archbishop of Canterbury, as it is ioyned in the same booke:* so it beareth also the same title and name of Uolusianus Byshop of Carthage: ioining also withall, another Latine Epistle, whiche perhaps hath not bene seene in Print before. The Copies of which both Epistles as being pertinent to the purpose present, heere vnder ensue in forme as foloweth.

¶The epistle in Latin of Volusianus, or as some thinke of Huldericus Byshop of Augusta, to Pope Nicholas, agaynst the forbidding of Priestes Mariage.

Epistola Volusiani Carthaginensis Episcopi ad Nicolaum Romanorum Episcopum.

Nicolao Domino & patri peruigili sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae Prouisori, Volusianus solo nomine Episcopus, amorem vt filius, timorem vt seruus.

CVm tua, ô Pater & Domine,* decreta super clericorum continentia nuper mihi transmissa, à discretione inuenirem aliena, timor me turbauit cum tristitia. Timor quidem propter hoc, quod dicitur, pastoris sententia, siue iusta, siue iniusta timenda est. Timebam enim infirmis Scripturae auditoribus, qui vel iustae vix obediunt sententiae, ne iniustam conculcantes liberè, onerosa, imò importabili pastoris praeuaricatione praecepti, se obligarent. Tristitia verò vel compassio, dum considerabam, qua ratione membra cauere possent, capite suo tam graui morbo laborante. Quid enim grauius quid totius Ecclesiae compassione dignius, quam te summae sedis Pontificem, ad quem totius Ecclesiae spectat examen, à sancta discretione vel minimum exorbitare? Non parum quippe ab hac deuisti, cum clericos, quos ad abstinentiam coniugij monere debebas, ad hanc imperiosa quadam violentia cogi volebas. Nun quid enim meritò communi omnium sapientum iudicio haec est violentia, cum contra Euangelicam institutionem, ac sancti Spiritus dictationem, ad priuata aliquis decreta cogitur exequenda?

Cum ergo plurima veteris ac noui Testamenti suppetant exempla, sanctam (vt nosti) discretionem docentia,* tuae rogo graue sit paterniati, vel pauca ex pluribus huic paginae interseri. Dominus quidem in veteri lege sacerdoti coniugium constituit, quod illi postmodum interdixisse non legitur. Sed idem in Euangelio loquitur: Sunt eunuchi,* qui se castrauerunt propter regnum caelorum, sed non omnes hoc verbum capiunt: qui potest capere, capiat. Quà propter Apostolus quoque ait: De virginibus praeceptum Domini non habeo, consilium autem do. Qui etiam iuxta praedictum Domini, non omnes hoc consilium capere posse considerans, sed multos eiusdem consilij assentatores, hominibus, non Deo, pro falsa specie continentiae placere volentes, grauiora vides committere, patrum scilicet vxores subagitare, masculorum ac pecudum amplexus non abhorrere:* ne morbi huius aspersione ad usque pestilentiam conualescente, nimium status labefactetur Ecclesiae totius: Propter fornicationem, dixit, vnusquisque suam vxorem habeat. Quod specialiter ad laicos pertinere, ijdem mentiuntur hypocritae: qui licet in quouis sanctissimo ordine constituti, alienis tamen vxoribus non dubitant abuti. Et quod flendo cernimus, omnes in supradictis saeuiunt sceleribus. Hi nimirum non rectè Scripturam intellexerunt,* cuius mamillam quia durius pressêre, sanguinem pro lacte biberunt. Nam illud Apostolicum: Vnusquisque suam habeat vxorem, nullum excipit verè, nisi professorem continentiae, vel eum qui de continuanda in Domino virginitate prefixit.

Quod nihilominus tuam, Pater venerande, condecet strenuitatem, vt omnem qui tibi manu vel ore votum faciens continentiae, postea voluerit apotatare, aut ad votum exequendum ex debito constringas, aut ab omni ordine, canonica autoritate deponas: & hoc vt viriliter implere sufficias,* me omnesque mei ordinis viros adiutores habebis non pigros. Verùm vt huius voti nescios omninò scias non esse cogendos, audi Apostolum dicentem Page 1155 ad Timoth: Oportet (inquit) Episcopum irreprehensibilem esse, vnus vxoris virum. Quam sententiam ne quis ad solam Ecclesiam verteret, subiunxit: Qui autem domui suae praeesse nescit, quomodo Ecclesiae Dei diligentiam habebit? Similiter inquit: Diaconi sint vnus vxoris viri, qui filijs suis bene praesint, & suis domibus. Hanc autem vxorem à sacerdote benedicendam esse, sancti Syluestri Papae decretis scio te sufficienter docuisse. His & huiusmodi sanctae Scripturae sententijs, Regulae clericorum scriptor non immeritò concordans, ait: Clericus sit pudicus, aut certè vnus matrimonij vinculo foederatus. Ex quibus omnibus veraciter colligit, quòd Episcopus & Diaconus reprehensibiles notantur, si in mulieribus multis diuiduntur. Si verò vnam sub obtentu religionis abijciunt, vtrunque, scilicet Episcopum & Diaconum, sine graduum differentia, hic Canonica damnat sententia: Episcopus aut Presbyter vxorem propriam nequaquam sub obtentu religionis abijciat, si verò reiecerit, excommunicetur:* & si perseuerauerit, deijciatur. Sanctus quoque Augustinus, sanctae discretionis non inscius: Nullum, inquit, tam graue facinus est, quin admittendum sit, vt deuitetur peius.

Legimus praeterea in secundo Tripartitae Ecclesiasticae libro historiae, quòd cum Synodus Nicaena haec eadem vellet sancire decreta,* vt videlicet Episcopi, Praesbyteri, Diaconi, post consecrationem à proprijs vxoribus vel omninò abstinerent, vel gradum deponerent: surgens in medio Paphnutius, (ex illis Martyribus quos Maximus Imperator, oculis eorum dextris euulsis, & sinistris suris incisis, damnavit) contradixit, honorabiles confessus nuptias, ac castitatem esse dicens connubium cum propria vxore: persuasitque Concilio ne talem ponerent legem: grauem asserens esse causam, quae aut ipsis, aut eorum coniugibus occasio fornicationis existeret. Et haec quidem Paphnutius, licet nuptiarum experts, exposuit: Synodusque eius sententiam laudauit, & nihil ex hac parte sanciuìt, sed hoc in vnusquisque voluntate, non in necessitate dimisit.

Sunt verò aliqui, qui sanctum Gregorium suae sectae sumunt adiutorem: quorum quidem temeritatem rideo, ignorantiam doleo. Ignorant enim, quòd periculosum huius haeresis decretum à S. Gregorio factum, condigno poenitentiae fructu postmodum ab eodem sit purgatum. Quippè cùm die quadam in viuarium suum propter pisces misisset, & allata inde plus quam sex milia infantum capita videret, intima mox ductus poenitentia ingemuit,* & factum à se de abstinētia decretū, tātae caedis causam cōfessus, cōdigno illud, vt dixi, poenitentiae fructu purgavit: suoque decreto prorsus damnato, Apostolicum illud laudauit confilium: Melius est nubere quàm vri: addens ex sua parte: Melius est nubere, quàm mortis occasionem praebere. Hunc forsitan rei euentum si illi mecum legissent,* non tam temerè, credo, iudicarent, Dominicum saltem timentes praeceptum: Nolite iudicare, vt non iudicemini. Inde Paulus dicit: Tu quis es, qui iudicas alienum seruum? suo Domino stat, aut cadit. Stabit autem: potens est enim Dominus statuere illum.* Cesset ergo sanctitas tua cogere, quos tantū deberet admonere: ne priuato (quod absit) praecepto, tam veteri quàm nouo contrarius inueniaris testamento. Nam, vt ait sanctus Augustinus ad Donatum: Solum est quòd in tua iusticia pertimescimus, ne non pro lenitatis Christianae consideratione, sed pro immanitate facinorum censeas coercendum. Quod te per ipsum Christum ne facias obsecramus: sic enim peccata compescenda sunt, vt supersint quos peccasse poeniteat.* Illud etiam Augustini volumus te recordari, quod ait: Nihil nocendi fiat cupiditate, omnia consulendi charitate: & nihil fiat immaniter, nihil inhumaniter. Idem de eodem: In timore Christi in nomine Christi exhortor: Quicumque non habetis temporalia, habere non cupiatis: quicumque habetis, in eis non praesumatis. Dico autem, non si ista habetis, damnamini: sed si in istis praesumatis, damnamini: si propter talia magni vobis videamini: si generis humani conditionem communem propter excellentem vnitatem,* obliuiscamini. Quod nimirum poculum discretionis ex illo fonte Apostolicae hauserat praedicationis: Solutus es ab vxore, noli quaerere vxorem: alligatus es vxori, noli quaerere solutionem. Vbi & subditur: Qui habent vxores, sint tanquam non habentes: & qui vtuntur mundo, tanquam non vtantur. Idem dicit de vidua: Cui vult nubat, tantum in Domino. Nubere in Domino est, nihil in contrahendo cōnubio quod Dominus prohibeat, attentare. Ieremias quo{que} ait: Nolite cōfidere in verbis mendacij, dicētes: Templū Domini, templum Domini, tēplum Domini est. Quod Hieronimus exponens: Potest (inquit) & hoc illis virginibus conuenire,* quae iactant pudicitiam suam impudenti vultu: praeferunt castitatem, cum aliud habeat conscientia: & nesciunt illam Apostoli definitionem de virgine, vt sit sancta corpore & spiritu. Quid enim prodest corporis pudicitia, animo constuprato, si caeteras virtutes, quas Propheticus sermo describit, non habuerit? Quas quidem, quia te aliquatenus habere videmus, & quia discretionem, licet in hac re neglectam, in alijs tamen vitae tuae constitutionibus eam honestè conseruatam non ignoramus: huius intentionis prauitatem te citò correcturum non desperamus. Et ideo non quanta possumus grauitate, istam licet grauissimam negligentia corripimus, vel iudicamus. Quanquam enim secundū vocabula quae vsus obtinuit, sit Episcopatus Praesbyterio maior: tamen Augustinus Hieronymo minor est, & à minori quolibet non est refugienda correptio: praesertim cum is qui corripitur, & contra veritatem, & pro hominibus niti inuenitur. Ne{que} enim, vt ait sanctus Augustinus ad Bonifaciū: Quorumlibet disputationes, quam uis catholicorū & laudatorum virorum, velut Scripturas Canonicas habere debemus: vt non liceat nobis salua honorificentia, quae illis debetur, aliquid in eorū scriptis improbare at{que} respuere, si fortè inuenerimus quòd aliter senserint quàm veritas habeat, diuino adiutorio vel ab alijs intellecta, vel à nobis. Quid autem veritati magis contrariū, quàm hoc, quòd cum ipsa veritas de continentia loquens, nō vnus hominis,* sed omnium planè (non excepto numero professorum continentiae) dicat: Qui potest capere, capiat: isti (nescitur vnde instigati) dicant: Qui non potest capere, feriat anathemate?

Quid verò per homines fieri potest stolidius? quid diuinae maledictioni obligatius, quàm cum aliqui, vel Episcopi videlicet, vel Archidiaconi, ita praecepites sint in libidinem, vt ne{que} adulteria, neque incestus, neque masculorum (proh pudor) turpissimos amplexus sciant abhorre: casta clericorum cōiugia sibi dicant foetere, & ab eis non verae iusticiae compassione, sed falsae iusticiae dedignatione, non vt conseruos rogent cōtinere, sed vt seruos iubeant ac cogant abstinere? Ad cuius imperij, ne dicam consilij, tam fatuam, tam{que} turpē addunt suggestionem, vt dicāt: Honestius est pluribus occultè implicari, quàm apertè in hominū vultu & conscientia cum vna legari. Quod profectò nō dicerent, si ex illo & in illo essent, qui dicit: Vae vobis Phariseis, qui omnia facitis propter homines. Et per Psalmistā: Qui hominibus placent, confusi sunt,* quoniam Dominus spreuit eos. Hi sunt, qui prius deberent nobis persuadere, vt in cōspectu eius, cui omnia nuda & aperta sunt, erubescamus peccatores esse, quàm in conspectu hominū mundi esse. Licet ergo merito suae prauitatis, nullius consiliū mereantur pietatis, nos tamē memores humanitatis diuinae, eis consilium authoritatis nunquam à pietate vacantis, per viscera ministramus charitatis. Dicimus nempe:* Eiice primū hypocrita trabem de oculo tuo, & tunc perspicies vt eiicias festucā de oculo fratris tui.

Illud quoque rogamus eos attendere, quod Dominus dicit de muliere: Qui sine peccato est vestrū, primus in eam lapidem mittat, quasi di•eret: Si lex iubet, si Moses iubet,* iubeo & ego, sed competentes legis ministros exigo. Attendentes, quid adducitis, attendite quaeso & quid estis: quia, si te ipsum, vt ait Scriptura, perspexeris, nulli vnquam detraxeris. Significatum est autem nobis de quibusdā eorum, quod tanta apud se intumescant elatione, vt gregem Domini,* pro quo boni pastores animas non dubitant ponere, isti verberibus etiam abs{que} ratione praesumant laniare. Quorum sentētiam S. Gregorius nimium deplorans ait: Quid fiet de ouibus, quando pastores lupi fiunt? Sed quis vincitur, nisi qui saeuit? quis verò persecutorē iudicabit, nisi qui dorsū suū ad flagella patienter ministravit?* Operae praecium est autē, vt audiatur, quo fructu tantū Ecclesiae Dei inducabant scandalū, tantū cleris despectum, & ab ipsis Episcopis, & ab eorum infidelibus patiatur. Nec enim eos infideles dicere dubitauerim, de quibus Paulus Apostolus dicit ad Timotheum: Quia in nouissimis temporibus discedēt quidam a fide, attendentes spiritibus erroris,* & doctrinis daemoniorum, in hypocrisi loquentium mendacium, & cauteriatam habentium conscientiam, prohibentium nubere.

Hic est autem, si diligēter inspiciatur, totius eorum manipulus zizaniae, totius euentus insaniae,* vt dum clerici licita vnus mulieris cōsortia, Pharisaico deuicti (quod absit) furore, relinquere cogātur, fornicatores & adulteri & aliarum prauitatum turpissimi ministri cum ipsis efficiantur. Qui hanc in Ecclesia Dei haeresim, sicut caeci duces caecorū machinantur, vt videlicet illud impleatur quod Psalmista eis, vt pote doctoribus erroris, taliter imprecatur: Obscurentur oculi eorum ne videant. &c. Quia ergo nemo, ô Apostolice, ignorat,* quòd si tu per tui decreti sententiam, tantam futuram esse pestilentiam solitae discretionis claritate perspexisses, nūquam quorumlibet tam prauis suggestionibus consensisses: debitae tibi subiectionis fidelitate consulimus, vt vel nūc ad tanti scandali ab Ecclesia Dei pro pulsionē euigiles: & qua nosti discretionis disciplina, Pharisaicā ab ouili Dei extirpes doctrinā, ne scilicet vnica Sunamitis, adulterinis diutius vsa maritis, gentem sanctam, regale sacerdotium, per irrecuperabile à sponso Christo videlicet, auellat diuortium: dum nemo sine castimonia, non tantum in virginali flore, sed etiam in coniugali habita coniunctione, visurus sit Dominum nostrum: qui cum Deo patre & Spiritu sancto viuut & regnat per omnia saecula saeculorum. Amen.

As touchyng the antiquitie of this Epistle aboue prefixed it appeareth by the copie which I haue sene, & receaued of the aboue named Matthew Archbyshop of Cāterbury, to be of an old & aunciēt writyng, both by the forme of the characters, and by the wearyng of the Partchment, almost consumed by length of yeares and tyme.

And as cōcernyng the author therof, the superscriptiō (if it be true) playnely declareth it to be the Epistle of Uolusianus Byshop of Carthage. Albeit heretofore it hath Page 1156 commonly bene taken and alleaged by the name of Huldericus Byshop of Augusta, and partely appeareth to be so, both by the testimony of Aeneas Syluius, in Descriptione Germaniae, who in the said treatise affirmeth that Huldericus Byshop of Augusta, did constantly resist the Pope abolishing the mariage of Priests, &c. and also by the record of Illyricus, testifieng that the said epistle not only remaineth yet to this day in old monumentes, but also that hee himselfe did see two exemplars of the same, both pretending the name of the sayde Huldericus to bee the author. Notwithstanding this copie heere aboue prefixed, beareth the title not of Huldericus Bishop of Augusta, but of Uolusianus Bishop of Carthage in Aphricke, as ye may see by the words of the preamble, sayeng, This is the rescripte of Volusianus Byshop of Carthage, vnto Pope Nicholās concerning Priests not to be restrayned from lawfull marriage, &c.

Furthermore, which Pope Nicholas this was to whōe these epistles were written, it is not plainly shewed in the same, but that by probable coniecture it may be gessed rather to be Pope Nicholas 2. for so much as in his time, Priestes mariage began somewhat earnestly to be called in, more then at other times before

Now as touching the English▪ of this Latine epistle aboue exhibited,* forasmuch as the same is before inserted, page 157. we will referre the reader vnto the same place. Wherein if the translation of the English doe swarue any thing from the Latin heere aboue prefixed, the cause was, for that the Latine copie which heere we follow, came not before to our hands.

¶Another epistle of the said Volusianus, concerning marriage not to be restrayned from priestes and ministers of the Church.

CVm sub liberi arbitrij potestate creati simus, & non sub lege, sed sub gratia, qualiter creati sumus, viuamus. Vos qui continentiae legem nobis inuitis, imponitis, liberi arbitrij nos potestate priuatis. Quod nolumus velle, & quod volumus nolle cogendo imperatis, & imperando cogitis: & legis vinculo, à quo ipsa gratia nos in libertatem liberati sumus,*alligare, & spiritum seruitutis iterum in timore accipere, ipsamque gratiam, sine qua nihil facere possumus, omninò euacuare satagitis, ita vt (sicut ait Apostolus) ipsa gratia iam non sit gratia, & Dei donum non sit Dei donum: Et non ex Deo sed ex homine, nec ex vocante, sed ex operante: cum idem Apostolus dicat: Quia non est volentis neque currentis, sed Dei miserentis.

Nam cū sint▪ tria principalia & quasi effectiua, per quae omnis anima humana capax & compos rationis,*quicquid spiritalis boni apprehendere & percipere potest, apprehendit & percipit, & sine quibus nihil prorsus capere possit: liberum arbitrium videlicet, Mandatum, & gratia (libero enim arbitrio bona à malis decernimus atque eligimus: mandato ad omnia facienda prouocamur ac incitamur: gratia promouemur & adiuuamur) horum omnium tamen gratia Domina & Magistra & quasi praepotens imperatrix & Regina est, ad cuius nutum caetera pendent, & ab ea vim & efficaciam expectant, & sine illa nihil praevalent, sed quasi stolidi & mortui, sicut materia sine forma, iacent & subiacent. Loco enim materiae, secundum propositionem aliquam, liberum arbitrium possumus accipere non incongruè: Gratiam verò, loco formae: Mandatum autem quod medium est quasi instrumentum, ad vtrunque respicere, quo summus artifex Dominus liberum arbitrium quasi stolidam materiam moueat & promoueat, & formam gratiae illi componat. Et sicut materia sine formâ est horrida & deformis: ita liberum arbitrium est horridum & deforme sine gratia superueniente se mouente & promouente, mandato medio quasi instrumento (vt diximus) interueniente. Quod ergò forma in materia, hoc in libero arbitrio per quandam similitudinem est gratia: & quod materia sub forma, hoc idem est libera voluntas sub gratia. Et item, quod est instrumentum ipsorum, hoc est mandatum ad vtrunque istorum. Instrumentum namque sordidam materiam, & horridam atque asperam, obscuram, & quasi coecam emaculat & expolit, & claram, planam ac lucidam, forma superueniente, reddit. Sic & mandatum, liberum arbitrium sordidum & horridum, asperum & incultum, obscurum & coecum, nitidat, comit, lenit, & excolit, lucidat, & illuminat: sicut Propheta dicit: praeceptum domini lucidum, illuminans oculos, splendore gratiae superueniente. Et sicut materia & instrumentum sine forma nihil valent, ita libera voluntas & mandatum sine gratia nihil virtutis habent. Quid enim liberum arbitrium vel mandatum sine gratia praeueniente & subsequente potest? Gratia namque ad liberum arbitrium, mandatum quasi nuntium ac famulum mittit: mandatum liberum arbitrium prouocat atque quasi sopitum excitat, vt ad bona facienda euigilet & exurgat, viamque ei quam peragere debeat, quasi coeco deducendo demonstrat. Quorum vtrunque si à gratia deseritur, nihil omnino per se potest. Quod si conatur, deficit, non proficit, neque etiam efficit, vel perficit. Si praesumit, non assumit, sed potius totam operam & laborem frustra consumit. Cum enim mandatum, seu per hominem siue per Angelum mittitur, & etiam liberum arbitrium seu humano seu angelico mandati nuntio commouetur, prouocatur, & instruitur, <◇> diuina gratia comitetur, praeueniat, & subsequatur, quid valebit? Quid nempè homini in paradiso posito mandatū quod audiuit: E• omni ligno Paradisi comede, de ligno vero scientiae boni & mali ne comedat? Nihil prorsus ad salutem, sed potius ad condemnationem. Quare? Quia gratia saluatricis & auxiliatrix defuit, quā ille iniuste suis viribus fisus, contempsit. Aut quid valuit Israelitico populo in Eremo constituto, mandatū legis quod per Moyse accepit, cui obedire neglexit? Aut quid profuit illi qui Dominum se qui suo arbitrio, & non illius vocatione praesumit dicens: Domine, sequa te quocunque ieris. Ex multis alijs diuinae scripturae locis noui & veteris Testamenti demonstrari potest, quod neque mandatū, neque liberū arbitriū per se quicquā valet, nisi diuina gratia praeueniendo & subsequendo adiuuet. Cum igitur continentiae bonū, imò omne bonū sit solius diuinae gratiae donū, nec per mandatum, nec per liberū arbitriū comprehendatur, errant & frustra laborant qui se suis viribus illud apprehendere conantur. Illi etiam magis errant qui hoc inuitis & nolentibus imperant, & non spontaneè sed coactè in Sacrarium Dei dona offerre suadent, nescientes aut obliti illius quod Dominus Moysi & Moyses à Domino praecepit dicens: Separate apud vos primitias Domino: quisque voluntarius & bono animo offerat eas Domino. Quid est separare apud vos primitias Domino, nisi studiosa cogitatione & meditatione in cordibus vestris tractare, & cum discretionem deponere & diuidere, quid Domino de thesauro cordis nostri valeamus offerre? Si enim rectè offeras & non rectè diuidas, peccasti. Et quid est prono animo offerre, nisi quod ait Psalmista: voluntariè sacrificabo tibi? Et Apostolus: Non ex tristitia aut necessitate: Hilarem datorem diligit Deus. Et Salomon, Bono animo gloriam redde Domino, & in omni Dato hilarem fac vultum tuum, & in exultatione sanctifica decimas tuas, & in bono oculo facito adinventionem manuum tuarum. Et Apostolus Iacobus: Nō amat Dominus (inquit) coacta seruitia. Et, maledictus qui opus Domini facit negligenter .i. nō curiosè neque voluntariè. Sicut nos ergo Dominus inuitos aliquid offerre non iubet: ita vos inuitos aliquos offerre aliquid cogere, prohibet per eundem Moysen vbi ait: Ne facias Calumniam proximo tuo, nec vi opprimas eum. Calumniā proximo facere, est eū non cōpatiēdo & miserando corrigere de peccato: sed dedignido & exprobrando & detrahendo arguere & accusare, & non in spiritu lenitatis instruere, sed in spiritu asperitatis & austeritatis destruere, cum Apostolus dicat: *Si praeoccupatus fuerit homo in aliquo delicto, vos qui spirituales estis instruite huiusmodi in spiritu lenitatis, considerans teipsum ne & tu tenteris. Vi opprimere proximū, est vltra vires suas aliquid exigere, & onus quod portare nō potest imponere, imponētibus fortassis importabile, *cū Dominus de Pharisaeis ad Discipulos loquens, hoc eis prohibeat dicens: Super cathedram Moysi sedent Scribe & Pharisaei, &c. Et Apostolus Petrus: Pascite (inquit) qui in vobis est, gregem Domini, prouidentes, non coactē, sed spontaneē, secundū Dominum: neque turpis lucri gratia, sed volūtariē: neque dominantes in Clero, sed forma estote gregi ex animo. Hic pastor pastorū, princeps Apostolorū, quid caeteri pastores vel Apostoli debeant facere, quomodo gregē Domini sibi creditum tractare, apertē & piē demonstrat atque insinuat, & quantam sollicitudinem & compassionem erga subditos habere oporteat, eis inculcat: & omnem potestatem tyrannicae dominationis vel ambitionem cupiditatis, quam quidam in subditos sibi exercent, ab eorum cordibus procul eliminat, & eos non dominos, *sed patres subditorum debere esse pronunciat: neque eis aliquid typo potentiae imperare, sed zelo pietatis admonere & obsecrare iuxta vires vnius cuiusque secundum Dominum, non secundum suae voluntatis arbitrium vel potestatis imperium: & illis formam esse gregi debere, vt quid alijs imperant, ipsi priores faciant, & non minus exemplis quam verbo proficiant. Ex animo▪ inquit: non ex imperio: ex voluntate, non coactione: ex charitate, non ex cupiditate. Sunt enim plaerique qui zelo cupiditatis, nō charitatis accensi, alijs imperant quod implere non valent: & dum lucrum animarum querere se simulant, lucrum potius terrenum captant. Quod bene Baalam propheta exprimit, *qui prophetiae donum & benedicendi gratiam quam diuinitus acceperat, non ad vtilitatē aliorum, sed ad vsum suae cupiditatis vertit: & sicut nonnulli qui dum alios corrigunt, hoc zelo Dei facere se ostendunt, & dū meliores alijs se videri volunt, hoc praesumptione quadam & temeritate agunt, & ideo in ipso praesumptionis suae & temeritatis actu corruunt. De quibus dicit Apostolus: Qui zelum Dei habent, *sed non secundum scientiam. Zelum Dei secundum scientiam est habere, prouidē & cōsulte in diuinis rebus aliquid agere. Quorum profectio Oza similitudinem gerit, qui dum Arcam Domini calcitrantibus bobus qui eam portabant, in•linatum parumper erigere voluit, mox dum ad eam manum tetendit, mortuus cecidit. Arcam Domini calcitrantibus bobus inclinari▪ est legem Domini quam ipsi sacerdotes portare & tenere debent ab eis nō obseruando contradici, & quasi à recto statu in diuersam partem flecti, quam Oza, qui adiutor dei interpretatur, erigere tentat: Quia sunt quidā Prelati, qui dum sacerdotalem ordinem▪ ipsam legem diuinā maligno excessu vel leuiter à sitae rectitudinis vta quasi inclinare & in aliam partem flectere vident, eam inclinationem castigere Page 1157 & corrigere magis virtutis suae ostentatione quā diuina emulatione praesumunt, & quia hoc inconsultē agunt dum adiutores Dei videri appetunt, plerum{que} mortaliter in deterius cadunt. Sunt & alij qui nullam infirmitatis humanae considerationem, *nec vllum misericordiae respectum & compassionis affectū habent, & cum Apostolo dicere nescientes: Quis infirmatur & ego non infirmor? D•m se subditis non conditione qua pares, sed autoritate qua superiores sunt, conferunt, at{que} magistri videri, & plus prae esse quā prodesse cupiunt, illorum infirmitatem vi dominationis premunt, & eos sibi obedire compellunt. Quod nimirum illo facto figuratur, quod de Simone Cyrenaeo in Euangelio legitur, quem angariauerunt persecutores Domini vt tolleret crucem eius. Cuius etiam nomen huic figurae conuenienter aptatur. Simon nam{que} interpretatur obediens. Simon verō, id est obediens, crucem Domini portare angariatur cum subiecti qui{que} à suis magistris vi dominationis vel autoritatis, •el anathematis pressi, & eis obedire compulsi, crucem continentiae patiuntur inuiti: ipsam{que} crucem quam portant, non amant, quia ip'sam plus ad perniciem suam, quàm ad salutem portant, nec ipsa cruce peccato moriuntur,*sed potius ipsi peccato viuificantur: Nam & alia peccata grauiora exindè oriūtur. Inhibito enim naturali vnus mulieris coniugio, surrepit non naturalis, sed contra naturam execrabilis Sodomitica fornicatio: surrepit illicita & damnabilis, non legitima sed contra legem alienae vxoris contaminatio, nec non etiam & meretricabilis nefanda pollutio: quin etiam abominabilis omnibus parentalis incestatio, vel aliarum multarum immundiciarum vel libidinum à diabolo inuentarum id genus, in quibus humana infirmitas periclitatur. Vnde Loth de Sodomitico incendio Angelo domini educente ereptus, & vxoris consortio viduatus, dum sua infirmittas cōscius ad montana non ausus est Angelo monente ascendere, ipse in Segor p•rua ciuitate quae iuxta erat, elegit habitare, ipso Angelo praecipiente & sic ad eum loquente: Salua animam tuam: noli respicere post tergum, sed in monte saluum te fac, ne & tu simul pereas. Cui dixit▪ Loth: Quaeso Domine mi, quia inuenit seruus tuus gratiam corā te vt saluares me: non possum in monte saluari, ne fortè apprehēdat me malum & moriar. Est Ciuitas iuxta hic ad quam▪ possum fugere parua,& saluabor in ea. Quid est quod Loth à Sodomis fugiens praecipiente Angelo vt in monte saluaretur, montem ascēdere quia ibi mori timebat, noluit, sed Segor paruā ciuitatem iuxtā montem positam, vt in ea saluaretur, ad habitandum elegit, nisi quicun{que} fidelium Sodomiticae libidinis incendium & periculum euadere cupiens, dum celsitudinē virginalem non valet, & castitatis vidualis timet ascendere ne in ea periclitetur ad cōiugalem copulam cū ad vtram{que} continentiam p•r•ula est & vtri{que} proxima,*confugit? Nam{que} post continētias supradictas, haec castitas probatur laudabilis, & non priuatur praemio regni coelestis. Ad hanc castitatem, qui non potest continere, iubetur accedere & in ea suluari, ne fortè si montem ascenderit, apprehendat eum malū & moriatur, & ne, si continentiam non sibi diuinitus concessam, suis viribus obtinere tentauerit, malum incontinentiae vel fornicationis vel aliquarum supradictarum pes•um eum apprehendat, & in eis mortaliter pereat. Sunt enim multi qui dū infirmitatem suam non considerant, & dum maiora se apprehendere conantur, ipsa sua praecipitatione retroacti, in deteriora labuntur: quia dum maiora inconsultius ambiunt, minora quae tenere videbantur,*amittunt. Quod sanè exemplo ipsius Loth apertè demonstratur: qui dum relictā Segor quam ad habitandum elegerat, & in qua saluari petierat, in montem ascendit, ibi{que} mansit, in incestum filiarum suarum, ipsarum surreptione corruit, sicut scriptura dicit. Ita nam{que} scriptum est: Ascendit Loth de Segor & mansit in monte, dederunt{que} filia patri suo bibire vinum nocte illa, & ingressa est maior, dormiuit{que} cum patre. Quod nequaquam sibi contigisset, si in Segor in qua saluari poterat, ad praeceptum Angeli, sicut ille postulauerat, remaneret. Sed quia hoc quod sibi ab Angelo concessum fuerat, dereliquit, & quod concessum non fuerat,*id postea sua voluntate contra praeceptum Angeli praesumpsit, salutis suae dispendium pertulit, & graue incestus peccatum incurrit. Sic pleris{que} contingit▪ qui dum quod sibi concessum est à Deo relinquunt, & id quod sibi concessum est ambiunt, & illud quod sibi concessum est perdunt, & illud quod sibi concessum non est, apprehendunt. Quia sunt nonnulli, qui dum coniugalem vitam quae sibi concessa est, & in qua saluari possent, vel inuiti vel volentes deserunt, & maiori profectus desiderio caelibem vitam actitare satagunt, salutem quam in illa habere poterant, perdunt, & periculum maximum in ista incurrunt, & ex quo proficere conabantur, magis deficiunt (& sicut supradiximus) in maioris ruinae voraginem vergunt. Quod bene Doctor gentiū Paulus cōsiderans, & infirmis quibus{que} benignè prospiciens Corinthijs super his scriptis suis se consulentibus, ita rescripsit dicens: De quibus autem scripsistis mihi: bonum homini est mulierē non tangere:*propter fornicationem autem vitandam, vnusquis{que} vxorem suam habeat, & vnaquae{que} virum. Et vxori vir debitum reddat: similiter vxor viro. Et post pauca, Nolite (inquit) fraudari inuicem, nisi fortè ex consensu ad temptus, vt vacetis orationi: & iterum reuertimini in idipsum ne tentet vos Satanas propter incōtinentiam vestram: quoniam, sicut ait Poeta, non omnia possimus omnes: Et sicut Apostolus in superioribus dixit: Quia non est volentis ne{que} currentis, sed Dei miserentis: Et alibi: *Quia vnici{que} nostrum data est gratia secundum mensuram donationis Christi. Hanc mensuram vnici{que} tenendam nec transgrediendam esse, docens mox intulit: Volo autem omnes homines esse sicut meipsum, sed vnusquis{que} proprium habet donum ex Deo, alius quidē sic▪ alius autem sic: Quia videlicet mensura nos arcendos, & debere esse contentos in sequentibus intimauit dicens: Vnumquē{que} sicut vocauit Deus, ita ambulet. Et vnusquis{que} in qua uocatione vocatus est, in hac permaneat apud Deum Et hoc idem repetit paulò inferius causa confirmationis: Vnusquis{que} in quo vocatus est frater, in hoc permaneat apud Deum. Et quia infirmitatem humanā videbat non posse tollerare incentiua *gemini calori▪ nisi per gratiam Dei, ne{que} vincere pugnam carnis aduersus spiritum: & quia sic ipse dixit de se alibi• Videbam aliam legē in mēbris meis, repugnantem legi mentis meae, hoc se misericorditer, & compatiēter, & vnanimiter, nō regulariter ne{que} imperatiuē dixisse, sicut in alia epistola, mōstrauerat vbi ait: Humanū dico propter infirmitatem carnis vestrae. *Et in hac ipsa paulò superius in eodem schemate, vbi ait: Hoc autem dico secūdam indulgentiam, non secundum imperium, subdendo demonstrat: De virginibus autem preceptū Domini non habeo▪ consilium do tanquā misericordiā consecutus, vt sim fidelis. Id est, ea misericordiā qua mihi Dominus consuluit quando ad fidem me vocauit, & sibi fidelem fecit, & ego alijs consulo & eandem misericordiā illis impendo. Et quoniam bonū est vtrum{que} cū vxore esse & sine vxore esse, & cū viro esse & cū viro non esse, ne{que} peccatum est vel cum vxore esse vel cū viro esse, mox subinfert dicēs: Estimo ergo bonū esse propter instantē necessitatē: quo niā bonū est homini esse sic. &c.

Quid est propter instantem necessitatem? Que est necessitas instans, nisi infirmitas praesens? Vel necessitas instans, *est necessitas vrgens & cogens prout necessitas extirerit vel coegerit. Vel instantem necessitatem dicit illius temporis necessitatem & angustiam quae tunc extabat & cum cogebat vt talia scriberet & eis sic indulgeret causa scilicet vitandae fornicationis quae▪ tunc temporis acciderat, & aliarum multarum fornicationum supradictarum quae accidere possent. Pro qua fornicatione hoc inaept, & sibi scribentibus rescripsit, & Corinthijs in superioribus huius epistolae vehementer inuectus, in haec verba prorupit: Quid vultis? In verga veniam ad vos, *an incharitate & spiritu mansuetudinis? Omnino auditur inter vos fornicatio, & talis fornicatio qualis nec inter gentes, ita vt vxorē patris sui quis habeat. Propter hanc ergo necessitatem vitandae fornicationis dico bonum esse homini sic esse, vt si continere non potest, nubat, vel vxorem accipiat, Quod exponendo subdit: Alligatus es vxori? *Noli quaerere solutionem. Solutus es ab vxore? Noli querere vxorem. Si autem acceperis vxorem, non peccasti. Et si nupserit virgo, non peccauit. Et hic iterum non imperando sed indulgendo & compatiendo se dixisse ostendit: Ego autem vobis parco, id est, infirmitati vestrae cedo, Hoc ita{que} in potestate voluntatis vnus cuius{que} posuit vtrum velit eligere: nec se dicit cuiquam violentiam inferre, nec laqueum quo eum astringat & teneat, inijcere, consequenter subiungens: Porro, hoc ad vtilitatem vestram dico: non vt laqueum vobis inijciam, sed ad id quod honestum est, & quod facultatem praebeat Dominum obsecrandi. Hoc dicit illis quos ad continentiam superius hortatus fuerat, & quos consortio vxoriae coniunctionis impediri, vel sollicitos esse nolebat. Alijs verò ita dicit: Si quis autem turpem videri se existimat super virginem suam, quod sit superadulta, & ita oportet fieri: quod vult, faciat: non peccat si nubat. Et iterum: vtrum{que} bonum esse▪ vnum tamen melius esse cōcludendo confirmat: *Igitur qui matrimonio coniungit virginem suam, benè facit, & qui non iungit melius facit. Quod concordatur superiori sententiae vtri{que} sexui datae, in qua ait: Si acceperis vxorem non peccasti, & si nupserit virgo non peccauit. Si ergo virum accipere vxorem, & virginem nubere, iuxta Apostolum peccatum non est, & beatitudinem non aufert, sed affert: & quia vter{que} bene facit, ideo ambo beati: nos qui vxores propter infirmitatem habemus, quid habendo peccamus? Aut si Apostolus vnicui{que} propter fornicationem vxorem suam habere indulget & permittit, cur nos qui ex eadem massa sumus, & carnem peccati ex carne Adae peccatricem traximus, & continere non possumus, propter eandem causam & secundum eandem indulgentiam vxores habere non permittimus, & habitas dimittere angariamur? Aut ita{que} vxores nobis habere imitātes Apostolum permittite, aut nos ex eadem massa non esse docete, aut nobis eandem indulgentiam, & permissionem non esse concessam ab Apostolo, demonstrate. Quod opinor dicturi estis, quia haec indulgentia non fuit data ab Apostolo clericis aut alicui nostri ordinis, sed solis laicis. Quod ex verbis Apostoli vel ex circumstantia epistolae non potest defendi, cū nulla ibi certa distinctio vel denominatio habeatur personarum vel graduum siue professionum, nec ipse discernit seu nominibus seu officijs vel qui sibi scripserunt, vel de quibus, vel quibus ipse rescribebat, nisi tantū generaliter omni Ecclesiae Corinthiorum, sicut ipse in principio huius epistolae his verbis demōstrat: *Paulus vocatus Apostolus Christi Iesu per volūtātē Dei, & Sostenes frater, Ecclesiae Dei quae est Corinthi, sanctificatis in Christo Iesu, vocatis sanctis, cū omnibus qui inuocant nomē Domini. Et post nonnulla alia, quae cōpendij causa hic rescidimus, haud ita multum ad rem attinentia, [Page 1158 subinfert mox ad hunc modum:] Infirmitatem nostrā vos cōsiderate, ac miserari rogamus, & ne ei violentiā inferatis suppliciter imploramus. Nam sicut iam satis superius inculcauimus vobis, null{us} ad cōtinētiā inuitus debet compelli. Ne{que} hoc genus virtutis vlli per legem Dei necessario imparutū est, sed voluntaria deuotione Domino offerendū, dicēte ipso de hoc, Euangelio: Nō omnes capiunt verbū istud, sed quibus datū est. Ad quā tamē benigna mox exhortatione eos qui possūt inuitat dicēs: *Qui potest capere •apiat. ¶The same in English.

FORasmuche as we are created vnder the power of * free will, * & not vnder the law but vnder grace let vs so liue as we are created. You which lay vpon vs the law of continency agaynst our will, do depriue vs of the liberty of fre will. You commaund vs, and by commaunding compell vs to will that we would not, & not to will that we would do. You binde vs to the law, from the which by grace we are made free: and you constrayne vs to receiue the spirite of bondage agayn to feare: and go about to make the grace of God of no effect, without the which we can do nothing, so that, as the Apostle sayth: Grace is now no grace: and the gift of God is not the gift of God. And not of God, but of mā: not of him that calleth, but of him that worketh where as the Apostle sayth: It is not in him that willeth, nor in hym that runneth, but in God that sheweth mercy. *

For where as there be three principal & effectual things wherby euery humane soule endued with reason apprehēdeth & perceiueth whatsoever spirituall thing it is able to apprehend and perceiue, and without the which it can perceiue nothing: the which three thinges be these: * to wit free will, the cōmaundement, and grace (for by free wil we discernē and chose the good from the euill: by the commaūdement we are prouoked and styrrēd vp to do all thinges: by grace we are furthered & holpen to performe the same) yet of all these, grace is the Lady & Maistres, and as a mighty Empresse and Queene, * vpon whose becke the other doe wayte and geue attendance, receiuing of her both strength and efficacy, and without her can do nothing, but remayne as thinges of themselues dull and dead, much like as amongst the Philosophers, their Materia without Forma, being thereto adioyned. For in the stead of Materia, we maye, after a maner not vnfitly place free will: and in the place of Forma we may set grace, & the commaundement (which is the meane betwene them both,* as a certayne instrumēt) to haue respect to both: whereby the principall Artificer which is God, furthereth and setteth forward free will as a rude dul matter, applieth to it his grace as y^e forme therof. And like as the sayde Materia without Forma, is rude and shapelesse, so free wil is a thing rude and deforme, if it Page 1159 be not holpen with grace comming therunto, to moue it & to further it, the commaundement cōming as a meane betwene them both in the stead of the instrumentall cause, as is before sayd.

Therefore like as Forma is in respect of Materia, the like resemblaunce beareth free will in respect of grace. And agayne, as Materia is in respect of Forma, the same also is free will in respect of grace.* And as the instrument serueth betwene the foresayd Materia and Forma, so doth the commaūdement betwene free wil and grace. The instrument comming and working vpon the sayd Materia being of it selfe ougle, rugged, and a thing without all shape and fashion, doth forme it, shape and pullish it, and maketh it hansom, lightly, lightsome, bright and cleare: euen so likewise the commaundement comming and working vpon free will, being of it selfe, a thing rude, grosse, vnshapen & deformed, blind and obscure, doth clarify it, decke ⟨◇⟩, adourne it, bewtifye and lighten it through the brightnesse of grace comming vnto it, according to the saying of the Prophet: The •ommaundement of the Lord is bright and cleare, geuing sight to the eyes.*

And as the matter & the instrument without the forme can do nothing, euen so free will and the commaundement without grace haue no power to worke. For what can eyther free w^{ll} or the cōmandement do except they be helpē with grace both going before and folowing? For grace sēdeth the commaundement as a messenger and minister to free will: the commandement prouoketh freewil and styrreth it vp, as out of a sleepe to do good workes and leadeth it as a blind man, by the hand, teaching him the way wherⁱn to go. Which both if they be destitute of grace, are able of thēselues to do nothing. And if they beginne, yet they proceede not, neither do they performe or accōplish any thing: and if they presume, it prospereth not, and is but labor lost. For where the commaundement commeth, •yther by man or by Aungell: and also where freewill is mooued, prouoked and enformed either by the motion of man or of Aungell, yet vnlesse Gods grace go withal preuenting and folowing the same what is it able to do? For whē man was put in Paradise, what auayled him the commaundement which he heard: Thou shalt eate of euery tree of Paradise, but onely of the tree of knowledge of good and euill, thou shalt not eate.* Which commaundement wrought not to his saluation but to his condemnation. And why? because grace that saueth and helpeth,* was wanting, whiche he presuming vniustly vpon his owne strength despised. Or what did the commaundement of the law geuen by Moyses, profite the people of Israel in the wilderness, which law they refused to obey? Or what profite wrought it to hym whych presumed to folow the Lord of his owne free will and not of the Lordes calling, saying vnto him: Lord I wil folow thee whether soeuer thou goest. By these and many other places of holy Scripture both of the olde and newe Testament,* it may be prooued that neyther the commaundement nor free will haue power to woorke of themselues, vnlesse they be holpen by Gods grace preuenting and folowing them.

Seing therefore the gift of continency, as all other gifts be, is the gifte onely of Gods grace, and commeth not by the commaundement nor by free will: they erre therefore & striue in vayne which labour to obteyne it by theyr owne power. And much more they also do erre, whiche by force constrayne men agaynst their will thereunto, mouing thē to offer giftes into the sanctuary of God, not of theyr own accord but by coactiō, either not knowing or els not remēbring the saying of the Lord to Moyses: Seperate amongst you the first frutes vnto the Lord, and let euery man of his owne voluntary and willing minde, come and offer the same vnto the Lord. What is this, to separate with you the first frutes to the Lord, but onely to wey and consider diligently in your hartes, and with discretion to lay down and separate vnto the Lord, what we ought to present vnto him out of the treasure of our hart? For if thou offer rightly & doest not rightly deuide, thou sinnest. And what is to offer with a willing and ready minde,* but as the psal'mist, sayth: I will offer sacrifice vnto thee willingly and chearefully: And the Apostle sayeth: Not grudgingly or of necessity: for God loueth a chearefull geuer. And Salomon sayth: Geue the Lord his glory with a good and free hart, and in euery gift thou geuest,* shew a ioyfull countenance, and sanctify thy tythes with gladnes: and with a chearefull eye do all that thou takest in hand. And the Apostle James sayth: The Lord loueth not constrayned seruice. And cursed be he that doth the worke of the Lord negligently, that is, not carefully and with a willing minde.*

Wherefore, as the Lord willeth vs not to offer any thing to him agaynst our willes: so doth he forbid vs to compell any man to offer any thing agaynst their wils by the foresayd Moyses where he sayth: Thou shalt not do thy neigh'bour wrong, neither oppresse him with violence. To do wrong to thy neighbour, is to correcte him for his sinne not of any compassion or mercy towards him, but to re, proue him and to cause him in disdayning, vpbrayding,* 〈◇〉 rebuking him: not to informe him in the spirite of lenity: but to destroy him in the spirit of bitterness and rigour, as the Apostle sayth: If a man be taken in any fault,* you that are spirituall informe such in the spirite of lenity, considering thy selfe least thou also be tempted.

To oppresse our neighbor with violence, is to exact any thing of him aboue his power, & to lay vpon him more then he is able to beare, an• more peradventure then they thēselues are able to weeld, which lay it vpon him. Where as the Lord speaking of the Pharises to his disciples,* forbiddeth them the same, saying: The Scribes and Pharises doe sitte vpon the chayre of Moyses. &c. And the Apostle Peter: Feed (sayth he) as much as in you lyeth, the Lordes flocke, prouiding for them, not by constraint, but willingly after a godly sort, and not for filthy lucre, but of a ready a minde: not as though ye were Lordes ouer the Clergy, but be you as an example to the flocke of good will.

This shepheard of shepheardes and Prince of the Apostles doth playnely and evidently declare and insinuate what all other Pastors and Apostles ought to do: how to entreat the flocke of the Lord committed vnto them,* and what great care and compassion of minde they ought to haue towards theyr Cure: and remoueth farre out of their harts all power of Tyrannicall Lordship and all ambitiō, which some do exercise with gredynes vpon those that are committed to their charge, and pronouceth that they ought not to be Lordes, but fathers ouer their flocke: and not imperiously to commaūd them, as exercising stately authority and power vpon them, but gētly to admonish them and beseech them in the zeale of piety, according to the strength of euery person, after the Lord, and not after the affection of theyr owne will, or ambitiously setting forth theyr own power and iurisdictiō, and that they ought to be an example to the flocke, doing first themselues that thing, whiche they commaund others, and so to teach them no lesse by examples then by words. Willingly (saith he) and not by cōstraynt: of charity, & not for greedy gayne. For there be many which being inflamed with affection, not of charity, but of couetous gredines and ambition, commaūd others that which they are not able to accomplish,* and while they pretend to seeke the gayne of soules, they hunt and seek rather for worldly lucre. Which Baalam the Prophet did well expresse: who conuerted the gift of prophecy, and the grace of blessing which he had receiued of God, not to the profite of others, but to his owne commodity.

And some there be, which whiles they correct others, they pretēd to do it with the zeale of God: and whiles they would seeme to be better then other, this they doe with a certayne presumption & rashnes, and so fall in their owne presumption and temerity.* Of whome the Apostle speaketh: Which haue a zeale of God, but not according to knowledge To haue a zeale of God, according to knowledge, is to do any thing in Gods matters prudently and circumspectly. Of whom Oza beareth a type and resemblaunce: Who whiles that he went about with his hand to stay the Arke of the Lord staggering a litle by reason of the kicking of the Oxen which caried it, fell downe therfore dead.* The Arke of the Lorde to stagger or miscarye by the kickyng of the Oxen, signifieth the law of the Lord (which the priestes themselues ought to beare and hold vp) to be contraried of them in not obseruing the same,* & to be turned out of the right course to the contrary part, which Oza, who is interpreted to be a helper of god, attempteth to hold vp. For there be certayne Prelates, which while they see the order of priesthood by some enormity or excesse, to strayne the law of God neuer so litle out of the right course, and la'bor to redresse and rectify that disorder, rather by vayne ostentation of theyr owne strength, then for any pure zeale to God, while they thus presume inordinately to do, thinking to seme to be the helpers of God, many times do mor'tally fall, and incurre therby great daunger and perill.

Some other also there be whiche hauing before theyr eies no consideratiō of mans infirmity neither being touched with any respect of mercy and compassion, nor know'ing how to say with the Apostle: Who is infirme and I am not infirme? these whiles they compare themselues to suche as be vnder theyr charge, not in condition wherein they are equall, but in authority wherein they are superiours, & couet to be theyr maysters, & more to rule ouer them then to profite them, they oppresse the weakenesse of thē by force and violence of authority, and compell them to theyr obedience: which is rightly figured by the fact, which is reade in y^e Gospell of Symon Cyrenaeus,* whom the persecutours Page 1160 of the Lord constrayned to take vp the Crosse of Christ. Whose name also doth fitly agree w^t y^e same figure. For Simon by interpretation is called obedient. Symon then, that is to say, the obedient man is forced to beare y^e Crosse of the Lord, when as subiectes being constrayned of theyr maysters by the rigour either of Lordship, or authority, or fere of theyr curse, and so compelled to obey them, are dryuen to sustain the Crosse of continency agaynst theyr wils: who neither do loue the Crosse which they beare, because they beare it rather to theyr destruction thē to theyr health: neither by bearing the Crosse, do dye vnto sinne, but by the bearing therof are rather quickned vnto sinne. For ther'of ryse diuers other more greuous sinnes. For by the inhibiting of lawfull and naturall mariage with one woman, riseth the vnnaturall and most execrable Sodomitical fornication:* riseth also the vnlawfull and damnable defiling of other mens wiues: riseth furthermore cursed and whorish filthines and pollution: and moreouer riseth most abhominable incest agaynst all nature, with theyr owne kindred, with a heape of manifolde other filthy ahhominatiōs and lecherous pollutions, whereby the frayle infirmity of man is brought (no doubt) into great perill.

Wherefore Loth being deliuered from the burning of Sodome through the guiding of the Lordes Aungell, and beriued of the felowship of his wife, whiles that he cōsidering his owne infirmity durst not ascend vnto the mountaine as the Angell badde him, did choose rather to dwel in Segor a litle City nere by, the Aungell thus bidding hym and speaking vnto him: *Saue thy soule and looke not behinde thee, but saue thy selfe in the mountayne least thou also perish. To whome Loth aunswered: I pray thee Lord, because thy seruant hath found such grace in thy sight that thou wilt saue me, I can not be saued in the mountayne, least perhappes some euill take me and I dye: There is a litle City hereby whereunto I may flye and may be saued in it.

What meaneth this that Loth flying from Sodome by the commaundement of the Aungell to be saued in y^e moūtayne, would not ascend vp to the hill fearing there to perish but did chose rather to dwell in Segor a small Cittye neare vnto the hill, *there to be saued, but that euery faythfull man coueting to eschue the burning & daunger of Sodomiticall lust, while neither he is able to mount vp to the toppe of virginity, and also is afearde to ascend to the moūtayne of the state of widowhood least he perish therein, flyeth therfore to the state of matrimony, which is a small cōtinēcy in respect of the other two, & also nere vnto thē both. For after those two kindes of continencye, *this chastity is also proued to be laudable, & is not depriued of the reward of the kingdome of heauen.

Unto this chastity, he is commaūded to flie which can not otherwise cōteine, & to be saued in it, least peraduēture if he clime vp to the moūt, he fall into inconueniency & perish therin: that is, least if he shall attempt to obtēin by his owne strength the contenencye whyche is not geuen vnto him of God, the euill of incontineny or fornication, or of some of the other euilles afore rehearsed, do fall vpon him, and so he perish in them mortally. For there be many who while they consider not their owne infirmity, & while they striue to atchiue greater thinges thē they are able to reach in this theyr climbing do fall headlong into worse inconuenience, and while they foolishly seeke for great thinges, doe lose the lesse, which before they seemed to haue. Whych we may well vnderstand by the example of Loth aforesayde: Who what time he left the small Cittye Segor, which he chose before to inhabite, in the which he sought to be saued: went vp to the mountayne and there abyding fell into the stolne incest of his owne daughters, as the scripture witnesseth, saying: Loth went vp from Segor and remayned in the mountayne, and his daughters gaue to theyr father wine to drinke that night. And the elder of them went and lay with her father. Which thing had not happened vnto him, if he had kept himselfe still in Segor, where he might haue bene saued at the bidding of the Aungell, as he himselfe required. But because he forsooke that, which was graunted to hym of the Aungell, and presumed to that vpon his owne will; contrary to the precept of the Angel, which was not graūted:: therfore he fell into great daunger of his soule & committed the greuouse sinne of incest.

No otherwise doth it happē to many other, who while either they forsake y^e thing which is graunted thē of God, or ambitiously clime after that which is to thē not graunted, *both they lose that which they had graunted vnto thē, and fall into that which to them was not graunted. For diuers there be which while they forsake eyther willyngly or agaynst theyr will, the maryed life which is to them lawfully permitted, and in which they might be saued, and striue with a presūptuous desire to lead a single life, both they lose that health and safety, whych they might haue had in one, and incurre great daunger in the other: so that whereby they suppose most to gayne, by the same they lose & fall into the pit of greater ruine. Which thing S Paule y^e Doctor of the Gentiles well considering, and tenderly prouiding for the infirmity of the weake Corintheians writing to him for counsell touching this matter, did write to thē agayne in this wise, saying: As concerning the thinges wherof ye wrote vnto me, as it is good for a man not to touch a womā.Neuerthelesse to auoyd whoredome, let euery man haue his wife and let euery woman haue her husband. Let the husband geue vnto his wife due beneuolēce: likewise also the wife vnto her husband. And a litle after: withdraw not (sayth he) your selues one from an other, except it be with consent for a time, that you may geue your selues vnto fasting and praier: and afterward come together agayne le• to Sathan tempte you for your incontineneye. For as the Poe• sayth, we can not all do all thinges, and as the Apostle sayth: It is not in him that willeth not in him that runneth, but in God that sheweth mercy. Also an other place: For to euery one of vs is geuen grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ.* And that euery one of vs ought to keepe and not to transgresse this measure, he teacheth anone after saying: I wish that all men were as I my selfe am but euery man hath his proper gift of God, one after this maner, an other after that.*

And that we are to be kept within our compasse, and measure, and ought therewith to be content, hee teacheth moreouer as followeth: Let euery man abide in that vocation wherein he is called, And shortly after, for confirmatiō therof, hee repeteth the same agayne and sayth: Let euery man wherein he is called, therein abide with the Lord And because he perceaued that the infirmitie of man was not able to susteine the burning motiōs and heates of nature styrring in a man, but onely by the grace of God, neither to be able to conquere the fleshe fighting agaynst the spirite, according to that whiche he sayth of himselfe in an other place: For I see an other Lawe in my members rebelling agaynst the Lawe of my minde, he therefore of mercy and compassion, as condescending vnto their weakenes: and not by rigour of law and force of commaundement, thus sayde. As also in an other place in his Epistles he speaketh in like woordes saying: I speake thus grosly after the maner of men, because of the infirmitie of your flesh. And in this foresaid Epistle,* moreouer a litle before, vsing the same maner of speach, he saith, Thus I say to you as of fauour and not of commaundement. And adding moreouer, he sheweth: As touching virgines I haue no commaundement of the Lord,*but onely do geue counsell, as one that haue found mercy with God, that I shoulde be faythfull. That is, after the same mercy wherwith the Lord hath informed and instructed me when he called me to the fayth, and made me faythfull to hym: so I likewise doe geue counsell to other and shewe the same mercy to them.

And for asmuch as both are good: to witte to haue a wife or not to haue: to haue a husband or not to haue: neither is there anye sinne in hauing wife or husband: shortly after he inferreth saying: I suppose therefore this to be good for the present necessitie: I meane, that it is good for a man so to be: What meaneth this, for present necessitie? What is this necessitie present, but present infirmitie? or els instant necessitie, compelling to doe, as y^e order of necessitie requireth. Or els he meaneth by this present necessitie,* the distresse of that time which then was instant, and compelled him to write, and so to beare with them which was for the auoyding of the fornicatiō amongst them, and many other kinds of filthines aboue touched which might haue happe'ned. For the which fornication he tooke occasion to write vnto the Corinthians and to answere to theyr letters: and therefore he vehemently agaynst the sayd Corinthians in y^e former part of the sayd Epistle vttereth these words: What will you shall I come to you with a rod? or in loue and in the spirite of meekenes? There is heard among you to be fornication,*& such fornication as is not named among the Gentiles, that one should haue his own fathers wife. &c. And therefore for this necessity of auoyding such fornication, he saith: It is good for a man so to be: that he which cannot cōteine,*should mary & take a wife. which afterward he expouñdeth thus inferring: art thou boūd to a wife? seek not to be losed. And if thou be losed frō a wife seek not a wife. But if thou takest a wife thou sinnest not, and if a virgine mary, she sinneth not. &c. And that he spake not thys by way of commaunding, but of sufferance and compassion, he sheweth plainly in these words folowing: But I spare you: that is to say, I beare with your infirmity: & therefore he leaueth it in the free power and will of euery man, to chuse what he best liketh, Neither doth he inforce any man (he sayth) violently, nor charge them with any strait commaundement, and therefore addeth these words folowing: And this I speake for your owne commodity, not to tangle you as in a snare, but for that it is good and honest for you, that you Page 1161 may serue the Lord without separation.

This he sayth to them whom before he exhorted to cōtinency, and whom he woulde not to be let or troubled by matrimoniall coniunction. But to other he sayth thus: If any man thinke that it is vncomely for his virgin to remayne ouer long vnmarried, and if neede so require, let him doe what he thinketh good, he sinneth not: let them mary: And agayne both be good, he saith, but yet the one to be better he concludeth saying: Therefore he that ioyneth in Matrimony, his virgin doth wel, but he that doth not doth better. Which agreeth wel with the text aboue, speaking of both kindes, as well the man as the woman, where he sayth: If thou take a wife thou sinnest not, and if the virgin take a husband she sinneth not.

If therfore it be no sinne for the man to take a wife, nor for the virgine to take a husband, after the apostles mynd, neither doth diminish theyr felicity, but rather encrease it, & for as much as both do well, & so both be blessed: we then which take wiues for our infirmity, what doe we sinne in hauing them? Or if the apostle do suffer & permit to euery man for the auoyding of fornication to haue his wife, we then which come of the same lumpe or masse & taking our sinnefull flesh of the sinnefull flesh of Adam, are not able otherwise to containe, why are we not permitted for y^e same cause & by the same permissiō, to haue likewise our wiues, but are enforced to forsake them being maryed?

Wherefore either do you permit vs, folowing the apostle, to haue our wiues, or els teach vs that we come not of the same masse,* either els shew vs that the same sufferaūce & permission is not graūted to vs by the Apostle which is graūted to other. Which cause peraduenture you wil thus pretend: that this sufferance was graūted of the Apostle, not to the clergy or to any of our order, but only to lay mē. Which cannot well be defended neyther by the wordes of the Apostle, nor by any circumstance of his Epistle for as much as there is no certayne distinction or denomination either of persōs or degrees, or professions there mētioned, neither doth he make any difference either in names or offi|ces of men, either of them which wrote vnto him either of those persons of whom he wrote, or els of those to whō he answereth, but onely in general to the whole church of the Corinthians, as he himself in the beginning of his Epistle purporteth in these wordes: Paule called the Apostle of Iesus Christ,by the will of God & Sosthenes his brother to the church which is at Corinth, such as be sanctified in Christ Iesus, called sayntes, with all that inuocate the name of the Lord. &c. [And after a few other wordes, which here for breuityes sake we omit, as not being greatly to the purpose pertinent: thus he inferreth:] These premisses being then wel considered, we besech you to haue regard & compassiō of our infirmity, most humbly desiring you, not to oppresse vs with this violence. For as we haue sufficiently before proued, no man ought to be cōstrayned vnto continency agaynst his wil, neither is thys kind• of vertue commaunded of God to any man, of necessity, but onely of voluntary deuotion to be offred vnto the Lord: as he himselfe speaketh in the Gospell: All men can not receiue this saying, but to whom it is geuen. Whereunto he gently exhorteth them that can take it, saying: He that is able to receiue this, let him receiue it. &c.

Wherefore for distinctions sake Moyses is not himselfe commaūded to cloth Aaron and his sonnes with breeches as in these wordes going before: *Thou shalt cloth with these Aaron thy brother, and his sonnes with him. &c. But he thus sayth: Thou shalt make linnen breches that they thēselues may couer the filth of theyr flesh. That they themselues (sayth he) may couer the filth of theyr flesh. Thou (sayth he) shalt make the breches for the bishop and his sonnes: thou shalt teach the rule of chastity: thou shalt exhort them to absteine from the company of theyr wiues, which shall do the priestes office: Yet laying vpon none violently the sayd yoake of continency, but whosoouer shalbe priests and shal serue the aulter, shall of their owne accord surcease from the vse of matrimony: which when they shall do, & of theyr owne voluntary consent shall take vpon them the purpose of cōtinency to serue the aulter, then shall the grace of God be present, which as it did apparell those other priestes aforesayd with attyre for thē conuenient: so shall it instruct these abundantly how they ought to liue and to teach. And this sence well agreeth with the text that foloweth, saying: And when thou shalt wash the father and his sonnes with water, *thou shalt take the garmentes, that is, the strait coat, the tunicle & the brestlappe, and put them vpon Aaron, & gird them to him with a brodered girdle of the Ephod. Then thou shalt put the myter vpon his head, and shalt put the holy crowne vpon the miter, and thus shall he be consecrated. Also thou shalt bring his sonnes and put coates vpon them, and shalt gird them with girdles, both Aaron & his sonnes, and shalt put bonettes on them, and the Priestes office shalbe theirs for a perpetuall law.

Thus then you see a commaundement of receiuing the linnen breches of Moyses. Wherby it playnely appeareth, * that Aaron and his sonnes, first did apparrell themselues with this kind of apparell, and so entred in to be washed, inducted, annointed & cōsecrated by the hands of Moyses.

By the which we are playnely taught, that the yoke of continency is not to be inforced vpon any man against his will, but is to be receiued of God with a prōpt & a deuout will. Which thing also Dyonisius Areopagita that godly wise man, the Disciple of S. Paule and ordeined of hym B. of Athenes, in a certayne Epistle of his sent to Pymtus B. of the Gnasians, in which he toucheth many things of mariage and chastity (as is in y^e Ecclesiastical history rehearsed) doth admonish the sayd Pymtus, and prayth him that he will lay no grieuous burthens vpon the neckes of the Disciples, neither inferre any necessity of compelled chastity vpon the brethren, whereby the infirmity of some of thē might be in daunger. * And Pymtus answering to Dyonisius agayn, sheweth himself willing to embrace the sentēce of his wholesome coucell. The same also did Paphnutius, the diuine & chaste bishop, who in y^e coucell of Nice (as the Tripertite history doth shew vs) when the fathers, which there were present went about to restrayne Priestes from mariage: he rising vp amongst thē & moued with the zeale of mans infirmity, desired thē that they would not so doe, but rather to leaue it vnto the voluntary discretiō of euery man, least in so doing they might peraduenture geue occasion of adultery and fornicatiō. For those holy men did thē vse this cautele and moderation in religion, that whē they treated any thing concerning instructiō and edification of the people, * and would haue them styrred vp to a better life by godly instructions, they would rather perswade things to be obserued with patience and lenity, then commaund with rigour and authority: neither would they compell any man to theyr obedience agaynst his will.

Whose examples you also folowing, which succede in their rowme and name, do you not lay vpō vs infirme per|sons, such importable burthēs, lest you be partakers with the Pharisyes and lawyers of the Lords curse: Who saith: Woe to you lawyers which lay burthens vpon men, which they can not beare, and you your selues touch not the burdens wyth one finger. And least the cry of the children of Israel ascend vp to the Lord for the cruell dealing of them which are ouerseers of the workes: Neither do you make such Eunuches which are so borne from theyr mothers wombe, or such Eunuches which are violently made by men, but rather those Eunuches which of theyr owne accord haue gelded themselues for the kingdome of heauē. Neither do you bring vpon the holy order of Gods ministers for vs only, such an offence and sclaunder, that for our wicked life you make the ministry to be despised of others, while you wil not suffer them either to heare vs, or to receiue the sacramentes of vs, infaming therby our lend life, & causing the sauor of vs to stinke before Pharaο, & his seruants. Wherin it semeth to vs that you deale not soundly & vprightly, if a man may so say (I pray you take it in good worth, that I speak) & also to be agaynst y^e authority of Gods word, & the canonicall constitutions which you doe: where as the Lord sayth by Moses the lawgeuer: the shame of thy mother thou shalr not disclose, & her ignominy thou shalt not discouer. Our mother is y^e church: y^e sonnes of this mother be all the faythfull, which name yet most fitly is appropriate vnto priestes: for they do beget y^e faythfull, both by y^e word of preaching & sacramēt of baptisme. Was not he to be coūted a right mother: who sayd, my litle children of whom I trauell in byrth agayne? The shame & ignominy of our mother, what is it but the reproveable conuersation of the life of priests which shame & ignominy is thē reueiled, whē y^e life of priests is publickly infamed. Which thing you do, y^e discouer & notify vnto men our fragility, lying before as hyd & couered, because before it was not known & for the same you bring y^e holy ministry & misteries of god into cōtēpt & hatred: as though the polluted life of other did any thing p•rtaine thereto to pullute the same, & as though our vncleannes did any thing blemish thē, or diminish the purenes therof, where as the Psalmist sayth: The law of the Lord is pure and immaculate: Or as though they were any whitte polluted by our infection, which do receiue the sayd misteries either by our mouth, or by our ministry. Which if you graunt to be so, then the Lord would neuer haue spokē so to his disciples & the people, touching the Phariseis, saying: Whatsoeuer they bid you obserue, that obserue and do.

And agayne, if it were so, the Lord would not haue sēt forth Iudas, whom he knew should betray him, with the other Disciples to preach, neither would haue committed to him the power of working myracles, & of geuing health nor admitted him to the Communion of the Supper. And if our impurity shuld infect our holy misteries or ministrations, and make them worse that heare and receaue the Page 1162 same then the Lord would neuer haue touched the Leper whom he had healed, neither woulde he haue kissed hym, neyther would haue eaten with Symon an other Leper, neyther would haue suffered his feet to be kissed, and with the teares to be washed, and with the heare to be dryed, & his head to be annoynted of Mary the sinner.

Therefore the holy Canons haue thus decreed, that no man which rightly receiueth the Lordes Sacramentes of an heretique, shoulde be therefore any thing corrupted by his hereticall pranity, nor the sayd Sacramentes shoulde be any whitte distayned by the infection of him. Whereupon the Church of Rome in a certayne Epistle directed vnto Anastasius the Emperour, by Anastasius the Pope, did so ordeine and write, that none of all them whom Acatius did baptise, or whom he ordeined Canonically to be priestes or Leuites, shoulde be any thing hurt by the name of the sayd Acatius: so that thereby the Sacramentes which by him were ministred, should seme the lesse firme and effectuall. For the sacrament of Baptisme also being ministred of an adulterer or a thiefe (which God forefend to be in the Church) doth come vnto the receiuer neuer a whit the worse. What meant that voyce which sounded by the Doue, but that it excluded all euill and impurity of the corruption of man? * in the which it is declared and sayde: This is he which baptiseth. &c. For if the beames of this visible Sunne passing by the filthy places, receiue no spot of filthinesse thereby, much more the grace of him which made this visible Sunne, is not tyed to any worthinesse of our workes. What soeuer therefore any minister of the Church worketh in his functiō to the behoofe of the people, all that taketh his effecte by the operation of God. Thus witnesseth Paule by whom Christ speaketh: I haue planted, and Apollo hath watered, but it is the Lord that hath geuē the encrease. God regardeth not so much, who or what maner of person doth preach, but that he so preach, that he may confirme thē that be nought, and cause them to preache well of Christ. For such is the operation of Gods mighty grace, * that by euill men he winneth good men, and by reprobate and wic'ked persons he getteth and gathereth together those that be good.

By these and such other reasons and authorities aboue alledged, you ought to be perswaded, neyther to abandon vs that be married, from the administration of diuine seruice, nor yet to excommunicate such, to whom the matter nothing pertaineth, from the communion thereof. And if we be euill, we are euill to our selues, and hurt our selues more then others. And such as you suppose peradventure to be vitious, yet may haue some good thing inwardly whi'che you know not of.

For many there be whom you iudge to be incontinent, which liue more chastly then they whom you so greatly extoll for their continency. * We that haue wiues, according to the Apostles minde, so haue them as though we had them not. Which gift of continency for as much as you can not geue vs, pray therefore with vs and for vs, that he wil geue it vnto vs, who only is the giuer therof, & without whom no man is able to liue continently. For otherwise we can not haue it, vules we pray vnto him frō the bottom of our hartes, who is knowne to be the author and geuer therof. And this same (sayth Salomon) is wisdom, *to know whose gift it is: neither is there any gift aboue this.

These two Epistles written to Pope Nicolas vnder the title of Uolusianus, geueth vs to vnderstande by the contentes thereof, first that he himselfe was then a married Bishop.

Secondly, that the liberty of Priestes marriage ought not to be restrayned by any generall Law, of compulsion: but to be left to euery mans free choyse and voluntary deuotion.

Thirdly the sayd Epistles being written to Pope Nicolas (if the title be true) declare, that this law prohibiting the lawfull matrimony of Churchmen, began first in thys Popes times generally to be enacted.

And although it be not here expressed, which Pope Nicolas this was, yet by the circumstance of time, and especially by the wordes of Pope Alexander 1. Distinct. 32. Praeter, * it may probably be esteemed to be Nicolas. 2. and not Nicolas the first, as some do suppose amongst whom is Illyricus in Centur. 9. cap. 10. and also Iohn Bale, De Scriptoribus Cent. 2. with certayne other: from whose iudgements although I am loth to dissent, yet notwithstanding modestly and freely to vtter herein my opinion, thys I suppose, that if the trueth of this matter were throughly tryed, it might peraduenture be found, that they be herein deceiued, and al by mistaking a certayne place of Gracian. For the better explanation wherof, here is to be vnderstāded, that amongst the distinctions of Gracian there is a constitution, Dist. 32. Nullus, the tenour whereof is thi•Nullus Missam audiat Praesbiteri, quem scit Concubinam iud•bitanter habere, aut subintroductam mulierem. &c. That is: That no man shall heare masse of any Priest, whome he knoweth vndoubtedly to haue a Concubine, or a woman priuily resorting to him. &c.

This Decree for as muche as Gracian doeth alledge vnder the name and title of Pope Nicolas, not namynge what Nicolas he was, therefore Iohn Bale and Illyricus, one folowing the other, and they both folowing Uolaterane Lib. 22. doth vouch this constitution vpon Nicolas the first. The wordes of Uolaterane be these, writing of Nicolas the first: Multa hic vtilia constituit, inter quae, nequis Concubinam habenti praesbitero aut sacrificanti interesset, vt testatur Gracianus. &c.

In like effect folow also the wordes of Illyricus afore sayd: Decretum fecit, *ne quis à Sacerdote Sacramentum su•cipiat, quem sciret habere Concubinam, seu vxorem, and alledgeth, as Uolaterane doth, the sayd Distinction of Gratian Distinct. 32. Nullus. In alleadging whereof both they seme to be deceiued, mistaking belike one Nicolas for an other, as may be proued, & made good by three or foure reasons.

First, by the wordes of Pope Alexander the second, in the next Chapter folowing, * who being the successour of Leo and Nicolas the second, vseth the same wordes in his Synode of Mantua (which Gracian referreth vnto Nicolas, and prosecuteth the same more amply and fully alledging moreouer the former constitution of both his predecessours Pope Leo and Nicolas: whiche by all storyes are knowne to be Leo the nyynth and Nicolas the second, which both were next before him. The wordes of Alexander. 2. be these: Praeter hoc autem praecipiendo mandamus, vt nullus Missam audiat praesbiteri quem scit Concubinam habere indubitanter, vel subintroductam mulierem, vnde etiam sancta Synodus hoc capitulum sub excommunicatione statuit, dicens• Quicumque Sacerdotum, diaconorum, Subdiaconorum, post cōstitutum beatae memoriae praedecessoris nostri sancti Leonis Papae & Nicolai, de castitate Clericorum, Concubinam palam du•erit, vel ductam non reliquerit. &c. By the which words speaking of Nicolas his predecessor it is euident to vnderstand this to be Pope Nicolas the second, which was his next predecessor and not Pope Nicolas the first, who was about 200. yeares before him.

The second reason, I take out of the next Chapter of Gracian going before, * where he allegeth agayne the same Nicolas writing to Otho Archbishop. Which Otho was then in the time of this Nicolas the second Archbishop of Colen, and was afterward in the Counsell of Mantua, vnder Pope Alexander 2. teste Ioan. Quintio, Iure consulto, * Wherby it must needes be graunted, that this was Nicolas the second, and not the first.

The third coniecture or reason is this, for that Pope Nicolas the first neuer made any such Act or Decree, the Priestres that were entangled with a Concubine, shoulde neither sing Masse, nor that any should resort to heare the Masse of such. &c. but rather the contrary. * For so we reade in the history of Antoninus, and in the Decrees 15. q. 8. Sciscitantibus. Sciscitantibus vobis si à sacerdote quifuerit comprehēsus in adulterio, siue de hoc sola fama resperserit, debeatis Cōmunionem suscipere, nec ne, respondemus: *Non potest aliquis quantumcunque pollutus sit, sacramenta diuina polluere, quae Purgatoria cunctarum contagionum existunt. &c.

And yet more playnely also afterward he sayth: Consulendum decernitis vtrum praesbiterum habentem vxorem debeatis sustentare & honorare, an à vobis preijcere? In quo respondemus, quoniam licet ipsi valdè sint reprehensibiles, *vos tamen conuenit Deum imitari, qui solem suum oriri facit super bonos & malos: deijcere enim à vobis eos non debetis. Distinct. 18. Consulendum. &c. That is: *Where ye demaund concerning the Priest that hath a wife, whether ye ought to susteine him, and honour him, or reiecte him from you, we aunswere, That albeit they be very much blame worthy, yet ye ought to be folowers of God, which maketh his sunne to rise both vpon the good, and vpon the badde. And therefore ye ought not to reiect such away from you. &c.

And this Nicolas, Antoninus confesseth playnely to be Nicolas y^e first. Wherby it is not onely not vnlike, * but also most certayne that Nicolas the first was not the father of this constitution, either to exterminate married priestes from theyr churches, or to excommunicate the people from receiuing their Communion, much lesse then frō hearing theyr seruice.

Fourthly, for as muche then as it is vndoubted that Nicolas 2. and Alexander 2. through the intrigation of wicked Hildebrand, were the authors of that constitution, whereof Gracian speaketh, it remaineth playne by the wordes of Uolusianus, in the latter end of his Letter, Page 1063 (wherin he maketh mention both of discharging the priest from singyng Masse, & the people from hearing) that the saide Epistle was written, not to Pope Nicolas the first but to the secōd, for because both these were decreed against married priestes vnder Nicolas. 2. and Alexander. 2. as is afore declared.

And further, least my iudgement herein should seeme to stand alone and singular, without some to take my part, I will here produce for me a Parisian Doctour, * and a famous Lawyer, Ioannes Quintius aboue mentioned, who in his booke De Clericorum moribus, plainely accordeth wth mine opinion, touching this Nicolas authour of the Decree aforesaide, where he writeth in these wordes: Nicolaus Papa Othoni Coloniensi Archiepisc. &c. Quinque fuerunt hoc nomine pontifices Primum, secundumū oportuit esse, qui haec rescripserit, ille Romanus, anno. 860. hic Burgundus, ann. 1059. Reliquos Ninolaos antecessit Gratianus, qui scripsit haec, anno. 1150 Posteriores fuisse credo, qui in Panomiae lib. 3. Tit. de lapsis, nominatur Nicholaus iunior, cuius est & aliud Decretum sequens. *&c. That is to say in English: Pope Nicolas writing to Otho Archebishop of Colen. Glos. There haue bene in all, fiue Popes called by this name of Nicolas. Of the whiche fiue, this Nicolas the writer hereof muste bee eyther the first, or seconde: the one a Romane, anno. 860. the other a Burgundian, ann. 1059 or. 1060. the other Nicolas liued after Gratian, who wrote in the yere. 1150. In my iudgement I suppose this to be Nicholas the seconde, which in the thirde booke of the Lawes called Pannomiae. Tit. de lapsis, is named Nicolas the younger. Which Nicholas also is authour of the next Decree that followeth. &c.

Wherfore if any man shal objecte hereafter, that because Gratian in the Distinction aforesayde, nameth Pope Nicolas absolutely without any additiōs, * it is therfore to be taken for Nicolas the first: vnto this obiection I set here these two Lawiers to answeare. Unto whose aunsweare this I adde also, that the common manner of Gracian lightly in all his Distinctions is, that when he speaketh of Popes, as of Innocentius, Gregorius, Leo, Lucius, and suche other, verye seldome he expresseth the difference of their names. So in the Dist. 18. Praesbyteris, where he bringeth in the Decree of Pope Calixtus in like maner against the Matrimonie of Priestes, Deacons, and Subdeacons, he addeth therto no discrepance of his name: and yet al the world knoweth, that this was Calixtus the second, & not the first, &c. But whether he were or no, the matter forceth not much. The letters (no doubt) by their title appeare to be written by Uolusianus. Most certaine this is, by whō so euer they were written, fruitfull Epistles they are, and effectual to the purpose.

But least wee shall seeme too muche to digresse from our purpose, let vs returne to the story & time of Nicolas y^e second againe, which was about the yeare, as is said. 1060. a litle before Hildebrand was Pope. Which Hildebrande, albeit he was then but a Cardinal, yet was he the whole doer of all thinges,* and concluded what him listed in the Church of Rome, and also made Popes, whom he would, as appeared both by this Nicolas, & also Pope Alexander which followed him. pag. 174. So that this dissolution of priests mariage began somewhat to kindle vnder this pope Nicolas,* through the pestilent meanes of Hildebrand, and after him increased more vnder Pope Alexāder, as appeareth by the Synode holden at Millane, an. 1067. but moste of al it burst out vnder the sayd Hildebrand himselfe being Pope, the yeare (as is sayd) 1076.

Although as touching this prohibition of priestes to be married, I am not ignoraunt, that certaine of the contrary faction, in searching out the reache and antiquitie of this tradition, for priestes to abstaine from wiues, doe referre the same to the time of the seconde Councell of Carthage, which was about y^e time of Pope Syritius, a great enemy to Ministers wyues, as appeareth Distinct. 84. Cum praeterito.* Yet notwithstanding to the same may be aunsweared, that this was no vniuersall or generall Councell, but some particular Synode, and therfore of no such great forceable authoritie.

2 Secondly, the same Synode being about the time of Pope Syritius, who was a capitall enemy against priests marryage:* may seeme to draw some corruption of the time then present.

3 Thyrdly, neither is it vnpossible, but as diuers bastard Epistles haue bene falsely fathered vpon certaine auncient Bishoppes of the Primitiue Church, and diuers Canons also (as of the Councell of Nice) haue bene corrupted by Byshoppes of Rome, so some falsehode likewise or forgery might be vsed in this seconde Councell of Carthage.

4 Fourthly, although no false conueyance had ben vsed therein, yet for so much as the sayd Canon of this secōd Councell of Carthage doth misreport and falsifye the Canons of the Apostles, in so doing it dooth iustly diminishe his owne credite.

5 Fiftly, seeing the foresayde Canon of this seconde Council of Carthage tendeth cleane contrary to the Canons of the Apostles, to the Council of Gangra, and other Councils moe, and commaundeth that, whiche they doe accurse, the authoritie thereof ought to haue no great force, but rather may be reiected.

6 Finally, though this constitution of the Councell of Carthage, were perfectly sounde, without all corruption,* yet plaine and euident it is by this Uolusianus, Byshop also of Carthage, that the same constitution tooke no great holde in the Church, for so muche as we see, that both this Uolusianus was married after that in Carthage him selfe, and also besides him many hundreth yeares after, Marriage was a common matter through moste Churches of Christendome, amongst Bishoppes and priests, as partly before hath beene declared. And more maye be seene in hystories, what great tumultes and busines was long after that in Hildebrandes time, and after him also amongst the Clergy men, both in Italie, Spayne, France, and in al quarters of Christendome, for seperating priestes from their libertie of marrying.

And againe, if this tradition concerning the vnmarried life of Priestes had stand vpon such an olde foundation from the second Council of Carthage (as they pretend) what needed then in the time of Pope Nicolas. 2. Pope Alexander. 2. Pope Gregory. 7. and other Popes after them, so much labour to be taken, so many Lawes and decrees to be deuised & enacted, for the abolishing o• priests marriage, if the same had bene of such a long antiquitie as they would make men beleeeue?

By these thinges considered it may appeare, that this distraction of Priests marriage, by publique Lawe compelling them to single life,* was nether receiued for a ful law generally to be obserued in the Church of Rome, but only since the beginning of Hildebrand, that is, since these fiue hundred yeares.

Aboute whiche time firste is to be noted, that vnder Pope Leo and this Pope Nicolas, Cranzius, and certayne Germaine Chronicles doe saye, that Symonie and Priestes Marriage were prohibited. This Pope Leo was. ann. 1051.

After him Pope Nicolas (to whom the foresaid Letter of Uolusianus seemeth to be written) made this ordinaunce: Vt nullus missam audiat praesbyteri quem scit concubi nam indubitanter habere aut subintroductam mulierem. Et mox: Quicumque Sacerdotum, Diaconorum, Subdiaconorum, post constitutum beatae memoriae praedecessoris nostris sanctiss. Papae Leonis, de castitate clericorum, concubinam palam duxerit, vel ductam non reliqueret,*ex parte omnipotentis Dei & autoritate beati Petri & pauli praecipimus, & omninò contradicimus vt Missam non cantet &c. That is, What soeuer priest Deacon, or Subdeacon, according to the constitution of Pope Leo our predecessour, conserning the chastitie of Clerkees, shal openly mary a Concubine, or shal not put her away beyng married in the behalfe of almighty God &c. we vtterly charge and forbid the same, that he sing no Masse, nor read the Gospell or Epistle at Masse, nor execute any diuine seruice. &c. And this was about the yeare of our Lord. 1058.

Although in this constitution of Pope Nicolas, thys word Concubine may be vnderstanded for no wi•e, but so as Gratian vnderstandeth it in the 16. Canon of the Apostles in these wordes: Concubina verò intelligenda est praeter vxorem: That is, for one besides a mans wyfe.* Then after this Pope Nicholas, comming pope Alexander, and specially Pope Hildebrand,* do expound this Concubine forbidden, for a wife, and such priestes as be married, they expound them for Nicolaitans: for so we read in the Synode of Millane, vnder Pope Alexander the second:*Nicholaitae autem dicuntur Clerici, qui contra castitatis Ecclesiasticae regulam foeminis admiscentur. &c.

And further it followeth in the same Synode: Nicolaitarum quoque haeresin nihilominus condemnamus,* & non modo praesbyteros, sed & Diaconos & Subdiaconos ab vxorū, vel concubinarum foedo consortio nostris studijs, in quantum nobis possibilitas fuerit, arcendos esse promittimus &c.

And after it followeth in this wise: Si haec de Simoniaca & Nicolaitarum haeresi delenda & funditus destruenda fideliter non obseruauero, ab omnipotenti Deo & omnibus Sanctis sim excommunicatus et anathematizatus, & ab omni Christianorum consortio inueniar alienus.

And moreouer it followeth vpon the same: Anathematizo quoque omnes haereses extollentes se aduersus sanctam Catholicam et Apostolicam Ecclesiam,* specialiter vero et nominatim. Simoniacam haeresin: deindē Nicolaitarum aquē abominabilem haeresin, quae impudēter latrat, sacri altaris Ministros Page 1164 debere vel posse licenter vti coniugibus, quomodo & laicos, &c. As much to say in English, as, I doe accurse all heresies extolling thēselues against the holy catholike and Apostolike church,* but especially and namely, the heresie of Simonie: and in like maner, the abominable heresie of the Nicolaitanes, whiche impudently barketh, that the Ministers of the holy aaltar may & ought to vse wiues lawfully, as well as lay men, &c. And thus much concerning the Synode of Millain, vnder Pope Alexander. 2. ann. 1067.

Nexte after this Alexander, rose vppe Pope Hildebrand, of all other, the chieftest and most principal enemy agaynste Priestes Marriage. For whereas all other approued Canons and Councelles were contented, that any Clergie man hauing a wife before his entring into his ministerie,* might enioy the libertie of his marriage, so that he married not a widowe, or a known harlot, or kept a Concubine, or were twice married, nowe commeth in Pope Hildebrande, making Priestes Marriage to be heresie, and further enacting: That what soeuer Clerke, Deacon, or Minister had a wife, what so euer she was, (mayde or other) either before his orders, or after, should vtterly put her from him, or elles forsake his Ministerie. &c.

Although notwithstanding the greatest parte of Ecclesiasticall Ministers seeing this straunge doctrine and proceedinges (whiche Saint Paule expressly calleth the doctrine of Deuilles) did what they coulede to withstande the same. Of whom Lambertus Scafna burgensis thus writeth: Aduersus hoc Decretum protinus vehementer infremuit tota factio Clericorum, hominem planē haereticum, & vesani dogmatis esse clamitans, qui oblitus sermonis Domini, quo ait: Non omnes capiunt hoc Verbum: Qui potest capere, capiat, &c. Et Apostoli: Qui se non continet nubat: Melius est nubere, quā vri, Violenta exactione homines viuere cogeret ritu Angelorum. Quod si pergeret, malle se sacerdotium, quā coniugium deserere, &c. In English thus: Agaynste this Decree, the whole number of the Cleargie did vehemently storne and grudge, crying out vpon him, as a pernicious heretique, & one that maynteyned phantasticall doctrine: who forgetting what the Lorde sayth:* All men can not take this worde: Hee that can take it, let him take it. And also what the Apostle sayeth: Who so can not otherwise conteyne let him marrye, better it is to marry then to burne, &c. Yet notwithstanding woulde bynde men to liue like Aungelles. Who if he continued as he beganne, they woulde (they sayd) sooner forsake the order of Priesthode, then their order of Matrimony, &c.

*Which Hildebrand, all this notwithstanding, yet ceased not still to call vpon them, and to sende to the Bishops euery where to execute his commaundement with all seueritie, threatning to lay the Apostolicall Censure vppon them, if otherwise they shewed not their diligence there in to the vttermost. Ex Lamb. This was, ann. 1074. Of the same Hildebrande, Radulphus de Diceto also writing hath these wordes:

Gregorius Papa septimus Hildebrandus, celebrata Synodo, Symoniacos*anathematizauit, vxoratos sacerdotes à Diuino remouit officio, & Laicis Missam eorum audire interdixit, nouo ex exemplo, & (vt multis visum est) inconsiderato praeiudicio, contra sanctorum patrum sententiam, &c. The English is this: Pope Gregorie the seuenth called Hildebrand holding a Synode, accursed, such as committed Simonie, and remooued married Priestes from saying seruice, forbidding also the lay men to heare their Masse, after a new and strange example, & as many thought, after an vnconsiderate preiudice, against the sentence of holie fathers.

And thus much for the antiquitie of bringing in the single life of Priests, which first springing from the tyme of Pope Nicholas and Alexander 2. began first with a custome, and afterward was brought into a lawe, chieflie by Pope Hildebrand, and so spread from Italie into other countries, and at length into England also, albeit not with out much adoe, as ye shall heare, the Lord willing.

In the meane while as Pope Nicolas and Hildebrand were busie at Rome, so Lanfranke Archb. of Canterbury likewise was doing here in England about the same matter, although he began not altogether so roughlie as Pope Hildebrand did, for so it appeared by his Councell holden at Winchester: where though he inhibited such as were Prebendaries of cathedrall churches to haue wiues, yet did he permit in his Decree,* that such Priests as dwelt in townes and villages, hauing wiues, should reteine them still, and not to be compelled to be separate from them: and they which had none, should be inhibited to haue: enioyning moreouer the Bishops thus, to foresee hereafter, that they presumed not to admit into order, any priests or Deacons, vnlesse they should first make a solemne profession to haue no wiues.

The words of the Councell be these: Decretumque est, vt nullus Canonicus vxorem habeat, sacerdotum verò in castellis & in vicis habitantium habentes vxores,*non cogantur vt <◇> non habentes, interdicantur vt habeant: & deinceps caueant Episcopi, vt Sacerdotes vel Diaconi non praesumant ordinare, nisi profiteantur vt vxores non habeant, &c.

And here to note by the way of the said Lanfranke, for all his glorious gaye shew of his monkish virginitie and single life, yet he escaped not altogether so vnspotted for his part, but that the storie of Mathew Paris, writing of Paulus Cadonensis,* whom Lanfranke preferred so gladly to be Abbot of S. Albons, thus reporteth of him: Paulus (inquit) Monachus Cadonensis Archiepiscopi Lanfranci nepos, iure, aliquorum relationibus, consanguinitate propinquior, &c. That is, Paule a Monke of Cadune, and nephew of the Archbishop Lanfranke, yea as some say further, more neere in blood to him, then so, &c.

Then after Lanfranke, came Anselme into the See of Canterbury, who taking to him a stouter stomacke,* more fiercelie and egerlie laboured this matter, in abrogating vtterly the mariage of priests, Deacons, Subdeacons, and of the vniuersall clergy, not permitting as Lanfranke did, Priests that had wiues in villages and townes, to keepe them still, but vtterly commanding, and that vnder great paine, not onelie Priests and Deacons, but Subdeacons also (which is against the Councell of Laterane) which were already married, to be separated,* and that none should be received into order hereafter, without profession of perpetual chastitie.

And yet notwithstanding, for all this great blustering and thundering of this Romish 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the Priests yet still holding their owne, as well as they could, gave not much place to his unlawful Injunction, but kept still their wives almost two hundred yeares after, refusing and resisting of long time, the yoke of that servile bondage, to keepe still their freedom from such vowing, professing, and promising, as may well appeare by those Priests of Yorke, of whom Gerardus Archbishop of Yorke speaketh, writing to Anselme in these wordes: Sitio Clericorum meorum integritatem, sed praeterquam in paucis admodum, ve Aspidis surditatem, vel fabulosi cuiusdam Prothei mutabilitatem inuenio. Varijs linguarum aculeis, minas, modò conuitia infligunt. Sed hoc facilius in his qui remotiores sunt, tolero. Illud omninò graue genus mali est, quod hi qui quasi in sinu meo sunt, qui Canonicorum nomine gaudent canones aspernant, aduersus concilij nostri statuta, quasi Sophistici disputatores argumētantur, professiones verò mihi penitus abnegant Canonici illi, qui sine professione ad sacros ordines inordinabiliter sunt prouecti, & qui in praesbyteratu vel Diaconatu constituti, vxores siue Concubinas in publico hactenus habuerunt, ab Altari nulla se reuerentia continuerunt. Cum verò ad ordines aliquos inuito, dura ceruice nituntur, ne inordinando castitatem profiteantur: In englishe thus: I much desire the puritie of my clergie men. Howbeit except it be in very few, I finde in them the deafenes of the serpent aspis, and the inconstancie of Protheus that the Poets fable spake of. With theyr stinging tongues they cast out some while threatens; some while tauntes and rebukes. But this grieueth mee lesse in them that be further off. This grieueth mee most of all, that they whiche be of mine owne Church as in myne owne bosome, and prebendaries of myne owne See, contemne our Canons, and argue like Sophisticall disputers, agaynst the statutes of our Councell. The prebendaries which vnordinately haue bene taken into orders heretofore without making vow or profession, refuse vtterly to make profession to me. And they that be priestes or Deacons, hauing married before openly wyues or Concubines, will not be removed for any reuerence from the Altare. And when I call vpon any to receaue order, styffely they deny to professe chastitie in theyr ordering &c.

Thus for al their rigorous austeritie by this Anselme in forcing his Decree made at London, agaynst the marriage of Priests, yet the same had no great successe,* neither in his life time, nor after his life. For although sondry priestes, during his life tyme, were cōpelled by his extremitie, to renounce theyr wyues, yet many denied to obey him.

Diuers were contented rather to leaue theyr benefices, then their wives. A great number were permitted by king Henry, for mony to enioy theyr wives. Which was so chargeable vnto them, (sayth Edmer in his 4. booke) that at length two hundred priestes, in theyr Albes and Priestly vestementes, came barefoote to the kings Pallace, crying to hym for mercy, and especially making theyr sute to the Queene, who vsing much compassion towardes them, yet durst not make for them any intercession.

Anselme at this time was ouer the Sea, making his voyage to the pope. Who hearing hereof,* writeth to the King, declaring that suche forfeitures appertayned nothing to him. But onely vnto Bishops, and in theyr defaulte to the Archbishops. Whereof read more, pag. 194. So wilfull was the blinde zeale of this Prelate, agaynst Page 1165 all reason, against nature it selfe, against the example of his forcelders against publique custome of his owne tyme, against the doctrine of the Apostles, the constitution of Councils against all honestie, and all Gods forbode, that he neither at the contemplation of the king, nor at the crying out and publike dolour of so many priests, nor yet moued with the letters of Pope Paschalis himself (who puttyng him in remembrance of so many priests sonnes,* willed him to consider the necessitie of the tyme, pag. 196. would yet nothing relent from his stubborne purpose, vnto his latter ende. In whom, as many great crimes may iustly be noted, so of all other, this is most principally in him to be reprehended: for that he seeyng and perceauing what Sodomiticall feditie and abhomination, with other inconueniences, did spring incontinently vpon this his Diabolicall doctrine, yet for all that would not giue ouer his pestilent purpose.

For so the storie recordeth, that when Anselme had established his Synodoll constitution,* in seperating priests from their wyues (which was, anno. 1103.) not long after, rumours and complaints were brought to him, of the execrable vice of Sodomitrie, which then beganne speciallie to raigne in the Clergie, after this inhibition of matrimonie.

Whereupon Anselme was constrained to call an other Councell at Paules within London, to prouide for this mischiefe. In which Councell this Act was made: Sodomiticum flagitium facientes, & eos in hac voluntate iuuantes, graui an athemate dānamus, donec poenitentia & confessione absolutionem mereantur, &c. All them that commit the vngracious sinne of Sodomitrie,*and them also which assist them in this their wicked purpose, with greuous curse we doe condemne, till such tyme as they shall deserue absolution by penance and confession, &c.

Thus ye haue heard what abhominable wickednesse ensued after that priests were debarred from mariage, and whatfore punishment was deuised by this maidenly prelate, for extirping that sinful wickednes: in the abolishing whereof, more wiselie he should haue remooued away the occasion whereof he was the authour himselfe, then by penaltie to suppress it, which he could neuer do.

Now let vs heare further, what folowed in that worthy Councell.*Qui vero in hoc crimine publicatus fuerit, statutum est, siquidem fuerit persona religiosi ordinis, vt ad nullum amplius gradum promoueatur, & si quem habet, ab illo deponatur. Si autem laicus, vt in toto Regno Angliae legali sua condignitate priuetur. Et ne huius criminis absolutionem, ijs qui se sub regula viuere vouerunt, aliquis nisi Episcopus deinceps facere praesumat Statutum quoque est, vt per totam Angliam in omnibus Ecclesijs, & in omnibus diebus Dominicis, excommunicatio praefata publicetur ac renouetur, &c. Which is as much to say in English: It is enacted, that whosoeuer shall be publikely known to be guiltie hereof,*if he be a religious person, he shal from thence forth be promoted to no degree of honour, and that degree which he hath alreadie, shall be taken from him. If he be a lay person, he shall be depriued of all his freedome within the whole realme of England. And that none vnder a bishop shal presume to assoyle such as haue bene Monkes professed, of that trespasse. It is also enacted, that euery sonday in the yeare, and in euery parish church in England, this generall curse aforesayd shall be published and renewed, &c. Ex Rog. Houed. & Epist. Anselm. 278.

Is not here (trowe you) good diuision of Iustice, that lawfull wedlocke of priests can find no grace nor pardon, yea, is made now heresie: where adulterie & horrible Sodomitrie is washed away with a little confession? And see yet what foloweth more.* After that this penall curse shuld now go abroad and be published in churches, the monkes perceiuing this matter to touch them somewhat neare, whispered in Anselmus care, perswading him that y^e publication of that Acte might growe to great danger and inconuenience, in opening the vice which before was not knowne: in such sort, that in short tyme after, that curse was called in againe.

And so cursed Sodomitrie & adulterie passed free without punishment,* or word spoken against it, where contrary godly matrimonie could find no mercy.

Now what reasons and arguments this Anselme sucked out of the Court of Rome, to prooue the matrimonie of priests vnlawfull, were it not for combring the Reader with tediousnes, here would be shewed. Briefly, the chiefe grounds of all his long disputation,* in his booke entituled, Offendiculum Sacerdotum, betweene the maister and scholer, come to this effect.

Argument.

Priests of the old law, during the tyme of their ministration, abstained from their wyues:

Ergo, Priests in the tyme of the Gospel, which euery day minister at the aulter, must neuer haue any wiues.*

Another Argument.

Moses, when he should sanctifie the people, goyng vp to the hyll, commaunded them to sequester themselues from their wiues three dayes:

Ergo, Priests that must be sanctified to the Lord always ought to liue chaste alwaies without wiues.

Another Argument.

Dauid before he should eat of the shewbread, was asked whether he and his company had bene without the company of their wyues three dayes:

Ergo, Priests that be continually attending vpon the table and sacraments of the Lord, ought neuer to haue company with any such.

Another Argument.

Oza, which put his hand to the Arke,* was slaine therefore, as it is thought, because he lay with his wife the night before:

Ergo, Priests whose hands be alwayes occupied about the Lordes seruice, must be pure from company of wife, or any woman.

Another Argument.

Nadab, and Abiud, which sacrificed with strange fire, were deuoured therefore,* because they companied with their wiues the same night:

Ergo, Priests and sacrificers must haue no wyues to company with all.

Another Argument.

The priests of the Gentiles, in old tyme when they sacrificed to their idoles, are sayd to lye from their wiues:

Ergo, much more the priests that sacrifice to the liuyng God, ought so to do.

Another Argument.

Christ was borne of a Uirgin, Christ liued euer a virgin, and commaundeth them that will serue him,* to folow him. Qui mihi ministrat, me sequatur: id est, Si vis mihi ministrare, me castè viuendo imitare.

Ergo, Priests that haue wyues are not meete to serue hym.

1. Cor. 7.

Let euery man haue his owne wyfe for auoydyng of fornication.

The exposition of Anselme.

That is meant and granted of the Apostle,* onely to lay men: Hoc solis laicis eum concessisse, nemo ignorat.

1. Cor. 7.

Melius est nubere quàm vri: It is better to marrie then to burne.

The exposition.

Melius, id est, leuius est legitimæ vxori nubere, quàm vri, id est, quàm alienarum mulierum concupiscentia consumi. It is a lighter fault to marrie one lawfull wife, then to be consumed with concupiscence of straunge women.

1. Timoth. 3.

Oportet esse episcopum irreprehensibilem, vnius vxoris virum. &c. A Bishop oughte to be vnreprooeable, the husbände of one wife. &c.

The exposition.

Praecipit Apostolus, ne quis ad sacerdotium accedere praesumat, nisi is qui non nisi vnicam vxorem laicus habuisset: Accepto autem ordine, nunquam ei carnis commixtione se copularet, tantum vitae necessaria ei subministraret: That is, The Apostle here commaundeth, that none shoulde presume to be Priest, but hee who being a laye manne before, hathe had no more but one wife: And after he be made prieste, not to couple him selfe anye more with her, but onely to minister to her, thinges necessary for her liuing. &c.

And finally after these thynges thus disputed, and alleged, the said Anselme concludeth the matter with this final censure and determination, as foloweth: Per hoc autem Page 1166 quod sacras vestes induunt,*vel sacra vasa tangunt, Christo violenter manus injciunt. Per hoc autem quod impudenter offerre praesumunt▪ Christum quodam modo visibiliter in altari crucifigunt. Legitur ministerium eorum, Christi persecutio, imo crucifixio appellatur: In English thus: In that these men (hee speaketh of married Priests) do put on the holy vestments, or do touch the holy vessels, they do lay violent hands vpon Christ. And in that they presume impudently to offer, they do in a maner visibly crucifie Christ vpon the aulter. The ministry of such is read to be a persecution, or rather a crucifieng of Christ, &c.

Loe here the mighty reasons, the strong timbered arguments, and the deepe diuinitie wherewith this Anselm and all other that drawe after his string,* goe about to impugne the lawfulness of Priestes mariage. Because the Israelites when they should appeare before the Lorde at Mount Sinai, were commanded to keepe frō their wiues three dayes: and bicause the Priests of the old Law in doing their function, as their turne came about, refrained the companie of their wiues for that present tyme: Ergo, priests of the new lawe must at no tyme haue any wiues, but liue always single, &c.

And why might not Anselme as wel argue thus: The people of Israel approaching to the Mounte, were commaunded in like sorte to washe their garmentes: Ergo, Priestes of the newe Lawe, which are occupied euery day about the Aultar, ought euery day to washe all their garments.

Moses approaching to the presence of the Lorde in the bush, was commanded to put of his shoes: Ergo, Priestes of the new lawe, which are euer approaching to the presence of their God, should neuer weare shoes.

Of king Daud and his company, which but once in all their lyfe did eate of the shewebread, it was demanded by the high Priest, whether they had kept them from theyr wyues three dayes before: Ergo, Kinges and the people of the newe Testament, which euery yeare eate the breade of the Lordes boorde, more precious then euer was that Panis propositionis, should abide all their life wiuelesse and vnspoused.

But here Anselme should haue considered by these Scriptures, howe we are taught not to put awaye oure wyues,* but wiselie to distinct tymes, when and howe to haue them. For as Salomon teacheth, to be a tyme for all things: so is there a time to marrie, and a time not to marrie, a time to resort, a tyme to withdraw, a tyme of company, a time of abstinence and prayer, which S. Paul calleth, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ,* and as he speaketh of a tyme of prayer and abstinence, so he speaketh also of a tyme of resorting together, and addeth the cause why: Ne tentet vos Satanas propter incontinentiam vestram, &c. That is, Least Satan (saith he) tempt you for your incontinencie.

And thus should Anselme with Salomon & Paul, haue considered the order and distinction of tymes. Oftentymes in scripture that is commanded to some, and at sometime, which extendeth not to others. And that which for a tyme is conuenient, is not by and by alwayes conuenient. Neither that which for a tyme is forbidden in Scripture, is therefore forbidden for euer.* Neither ought speciall examples, to breake generall orders: neither agayne doe extraordinarie prohibitions, make an vniuersall rule.

They were then commaunded to sequester themselues from their wiues at the comming of the Lorde: not that the comming of the Lorde did breake wedlocke,* but his commaundement did bynd obedience: and therefore obeied they, because they were commanded. And yet were they not commanded to put away their wyues, but onely to separte themselues for a tyme, and that not for monethes and yeaes, but onely for three dayes, which abstinence also was enioined them, not in the presence, nor at the appering of the Lord, but three dayes before his descendyng to them on the hill. Whereby it appeareth, that the vse of their wedlocke, neither displeased God being present, nor yet did driue his presence away when he was come: for he remained there present amongst them on the hill xl. dayes notwithstanding.

Furthermore, this time of separation from their wiues, as it was expreslie commanded to them by God: so was it not long nor tedious, but such as was neither hard for them, nor vnconuenient for the time: giuing vs thereby to vnderstand, how to vse separation in wedlocke wiselye, that is, neither at no time, nor yet too long.

For as they do not well, which neuer follow the tyme of S. Paule,* called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, for abstinence and prayer: so do they worse which fall into that 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, whereof S. Paule againe giueth vs warning, Ne tentet vos Satanas per incontinentiam vestram. But worst of all do they, which so separate their wiues cleane from them, and so abiure all matrimonie, that they fall headlong into the diuels pitfall of fornication, and all filthie abomination. And therefore the Lord foreseeing the perill thereof, said vnto the people: Estote parati in diem tertium, & ne appropinquetis vxoribus vestris, &c.* Appointyng in deede a separation from their wyues, but yet knowyng the infirmitie of man, limiteth the tyme withall, addyng, In diem tertium, and goeth no further.

He saith not, as Anselme said in the Councel of Winchester: Iurabunt praesbyteri, diaconi, & Subdiaconi, vxores suas omnino abiurare, nec vllam deinceps cum eis conuersationem habere, sub districtione censurae, &c.

The like order also was taken by the Lorde with the priests of the old Testament, who although they were enioyned to withdraw themselues from their wiues duryng the tyme of their priestly seruice: yet for auoyding fornication, they were permitted to haue their wyues notwithstanding. So that both their absenting from their wyues serued to sanctification, and their resorting agayne vnto them, serued to auoid adultery and fornication.

But here our priestly prelates will object, that because they be continually conversant about the priestly function therefore a perpetual sanctification is of them specially required. Whereunto I answer.*

1 First, the priestly function of those high priests sacrificing for the people in the old lawe, representeth onely the function of Christ the high priest sacrificing for the sinnes of the world, which truly and onely performed that pure chastitie in his sanctified body, which the law then in those priests prefigured.

2 Secondarily, speaking now of the Priestes of the newe Testament (and speaking properly) the Scripture knoweth nor admitteth no Priest to sacrifice to God for the sinnes of man,* but only the high king and priest Christ Iesus.

3 Thirdly, vnto that priest all other be but seruants and Ministers: of whome, some be Apostles, some Prophetes, some Euangelistes, some Preachers, hauyng the gyft of vterance, some Interpreters and Doctours, hauyng the gyft of vnderstandyng, some Deacons seruyng the Lordes boorde. The office of all whome chiefly consisteth in ministring the word, next in administring the Sacraments.

4 Fourthly, for so much as in these principally aboue all other, purenesse and sanctification of lyfe is required, as much and more too, then was in the Priestes of the olde Law, from whom all fornication, adulterie, incest,* and vncleannesse of lyfe ought most to be banished: therefore in these especially aboue the Priestes of the olde Law, matrimonie and spousage is most requisite and conueniēt, who so euer he be, which otherwise can not containe, accordyng to the Apostle, saying: Vnusquisque vxorem suā habeat propter fornicationem.

5 Fiftly, neyther is this matrimonie in these, any hinderance to their sanctification before God,* but rather furthereth & helpeth their sanctification, forasmuch as where matrimonie is not, there commonly reigneth adulterie, fornication, and all kindes of filthinesse accordyng to the true sayeng of Bernard: Tolle de Ecclesia honorabile connubium & thorum immaculatum, nonne repleas eam concubinarijs, incestuosis, seminifluis, mollibus, masculorum concubitoribus & omni denique genere immundorum? That is,*Take frō the Church honourable mariage, and the bed vndefiled, shalt thou not replenish it with Concubinaries, with incestuous persons, Sodomiticall vices, and finally with all kynd of beastly filthinesse?

The truth of which saying, lacketh no kynde of examples for confirmation, if we listed here to ransack the liues of these glorious despisers of matrimony, euen from Lanfrank the first ringleader of this daunce here in England, with * Paulus Monke of Cadone his Nephew, whome Mathew Paris misdoubted to be his owne sonne, vnto Steuen Gardiner with his gouldelockes, the author and workemaister of these sixe articles. But to the reasons of Anselme hitherto sufficient, which of themselues be so friuolous and grosse, that only to recite them, is enough to confute the same.

Permitting therefore the rest to the discussion of Diuines, it shall suffice for our purpose, professing here to write stories, to declare and make manifest by processe of tymes & histories, that this cruell lawe compelling ministers of the church to abiure matrimonie, entred not into this land before Lanfranke and Anselme his successor, as both may appeare by the multitude of priests sonnes lawfully begotten in matrimonie, and succeeding in the churches here of England, testified by the epistle of Pope Paschalis to Anselme before, pag. 196. and also may appeare likewise by the Councill of Anselme holden at Winchester which partly was touched before, and now the full act we Page 1167 haue more largely expressed to be read and seene of all posteritie, as vnder followeth.

The Acte against Priestes mariage concluded in the Councill at Winchester, vnder Anselme, An. 1104.

*HAEc sunt statuta de Archidiaconibus, Praesbyteris, & Canonicis in quocunque gradu constitutis, quae Wintoniae statuerunt Anselmus Archiepiscopus Cantuariensis, & cum eo Girardus Archiepiscopus Eboracensis, & omnes alij Angliae Episcopi, in praesentia gloriosi Regis Henrici, assensu omnium Baronum suorum▪ Statutum est vt Praesbyteri, & Diaconi castè viuant, & foeminas in domibus suis non habeant praeter proxima consanguinitate sibi iunctas, secundum hoc quod sancta Nicena Synodus de•ini•t. Illi verò praesbyteri, diaconi, siue subdiaconi, qui post interdictum Londonensis Concilij, foeminas suas tenuerint vel alias duxerint, si elegerint in sacris ordinibus remanere, iurēt quòd cum eis carnale commercium non habebunt amplius. Sed neque villo modo tollerabunt praesbyteros vxoratos cantare, vel vicarios habere, & quòd ipsi non dissimulabūt per Archidiaconos suos hoc inquirere, & fideliter episcopis suis renunciabunt, & attentè, & fideliter de exequenda huius rei vindicta Episcopos suos adiuuabunt. Qui verò Archidiaconus vel Diaconus hoc iurare noluerit, Archidiaconatum vel Diaconiam irreparabiliter perdet. Praesbyteri verò qui relictis vxorib{us} Deo & sac is ordinibus seruire elegerunt, quadraginta dies ab officio cellantes pro se vicarios habebunt, iniuncta eis poenitentia secundum quod Episcopis eorum visum fuerit.

And yet this vnreasonable statute of Anselme, so diligently defended with sharpe censures and penalties, had no great speed,* neither in the lyfe tyme of the said Anselm, nor long after his death, but that diuers priests notwithstanding kept still their wiues, or that after his death, they returned to their wiues agayne, through the sufferance of the famous & learned king named then Henry Bewclark who somthing stayed the oportunitie of this mōkish prelate, and willed that priests should kepe both their wyues and theyr Churches, as they did before in Lanfrankes dayes.

Then after Anselme followed Radulphus Archbishop of Canterbury, in whose time was no great sturre against the Priestes that were married.* About the tyme of this Archbishop, king Henry called a Counsaile at London, where he obtained of the spiritualtie a graunt to haue the punishment of married priests (which the spiritualtie afterward did much repent) whereby the priests paying a certaine to the king, were suffered to retaine their wiues stil, as is aboute storied,* pag. 294.

Next after this Radulph, then succeeded Williā Turbile, surnamed De Turbine, who renued againe the constitution of Anselme against married priests,* especially by the helpe of Ioannes priest and Cardinall of Crema y^e Popes Legate, sent the same tyme into England, anno. 1129. Of which Cardinall Cremensis, because enough hath bene before declared,* how after his stout replying in the councell of London, against the married state of priestes, exclaiming what a shamefull thing it was, to rise from the sides of an whore, to make Christes body, the night followyng was shamefully taken with a notable whore, &c. as is apparant before, pag. 294.

I will therefore passe ouer that matter, returnyng againe to William the Archbishop, who with the Cardinall Legate aforesaid, although he busily occupied himselfe in repriuing the matrimonie of priestes: in so much, that he would geue thē no longer respit to put away their wiues but from Michaelmas to Saint Andrewes day. followyng, yet could he not bryng hys purpose to passe, but that the priests still continued with their wiues by the Kyngs leaue, as the Saxō story plainly recordeth in these words: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; That is to say in English,* This William the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishops which were in England did commaund,* and yet all these decrees and biddings stood not: all hled their wyues by the kings leaue, euen so as they before did, &c. So hard was this cause to be wonne, that the Archb. at length gaue it ouer, and left the cōtrouersie wholly vnto the kyng. Whereupon he decreed that the Priestes should remaine with their wyues still.* And so continued they after that, in the tyme of Theobaldus after hym, of Tho. Becket, Rich. Baldwine, Steuen Langton, Rich. Edmund, Boniface, Peccham, and other, during we•nere the tyme after Anselme, 200. yeares.

And least the quarelling aduersary beyng peraduenture disposed here to cauill, should object and say,* that such marriage among the Spiritual men might be priuate and secrete, but not openly knowen, nor quietly suffered by any lawe of this Realme: to auoyde therefore what maye be by them objected, I thought it good, and as a thyng neyther impertinent nor vnprofitable to this storye, and for the further satisfyng of the Readers mynde herein, to inferre and make knowen by good recorde, not onely that the libertie of marriage amongst spirituall men, hath continued within this Realme duryng the tyme aforesayde, (videlicet) two hundred yeares or thereabouts, after Anselme, and that not in secrete wise, but also openly, and beyng knowne, the same to be suffered and lawfully allowed of, in such sort, as both they, their wiues, children, and assignes might enherite and enioye landes, tenementes, and other hereditamentes, by waye of feoffament, deede of gyfte, or any other assuraunce, in suche sorte, manner, and fourme, as laye men, their heyres and assignes at this day lawfully may doe. As by diuers writings and instrumentes shewed vnto vs at the writyng hereof, by diuers men (whose names hereafter follow) some to this day remaining fayre sealed, some by antiquitie and long keping, much worne, and their seales mouldred and wasted, is very euident and manifest to be seene. The copies whereof beyng by vs truely and faithfully excerpted out of the very originals (beyng yet extant) we haue here vnder inserted, as followeth.

¶Certayne Instrumentes and Euidences of auncient recorde, declaryng the marriage of priestes to haue stande in tymes paste, both with ancient custome, & publike lawes of this Realme.

¶All the Originals of these seuen seuerall peeces of Euidences, y^e true copyes whereof are here before inserted and last recited, at this present (videlicet) this 23. of Nouēber in the yeare of our Lord. 1575. are in the custody and do remayne among the Euedences,* and writings of Iohn Hunt of Esse alias Ashen, in the Countie or Essex Esquire, and are pertayning, and belonging to his Mannor of Ouerhall, alias Parua Bradley aforesayd, in the County of Suffolke. At whose handes they are easily at this present and long time (I trust) after the writing of this historye, shall remayne to be seene, of good record, if any man eyther be desirous of y^e sight thereof, or doubtfull of the truth of the same.

Although these Instrumentes and Euidences aboue here specified, be of themselues euidēt & playn enough, so that no man can reasonable obiect any thing to the contra!ry: yet to stop the mouthes of all suche wranglers and cauillers, who being satisfied with no truth, wil here peradventure take some occasion vpon this word Clericus, so oftentimes named in these Euidences aforesayd, to obiect y^t this word may as well be taken for other,* as for Priestes therefore, to preuent the cauilling obiections of such, thys shalbe briefly to reply thereunto, that in the cōmon lawes of this realme, in all giftes or feoffmentes made to any spirituall person (vnles he be some graduate of Diuinitie in y^e schooles) the sayde spirituall person is named by no other terme, but by y^e word Clericus: as by diuers places, as well in the printed bookes, as in old Registers and writings of the Lawyers, as well in the common law, as Statute law remayneth of Recorde very euidēt to be seene. Some special notes wherof as well for the ease of the Reader in the search of the same, as also for the further satisfying of some who peradventure shall want the bookes, I thought good here to exhibite in forme and tenour as foloweth.

Certaine notes how this word Clericus is taken in the Lawe bookes.*

SI Clericus aliquis pro reatu vel crimine aliquo, quod ad Coronā pertineat, arestatus fuerit, & postmodum per praeceptum domini regis in Balliū traditus, vel replegiatus extiterit, ita quòd Page 1171 hi quibus traditus fuerit in Ballium eum habeant coram Iusticiarijs, non amercientur de caetero illi quibus traditus fuerit in Ballium, nec alij plegij sui, si corpus suum habeāt coram Iusticiarijs, licet coram eis propter priuilegium clericale respondere noluerit, vel non potuerit propter Ordinarios suos.

An other Note.

Rex & antecessores sui a tempore cuius contrarij memoria non existit, vsi sunt quòd Clerici suis immorantes obsequijs, dum obsequijs illis intenderint,* ad residentiam in suis beneficijs faciendam minime compellantur, nec debet dici tendere in praeiudicium Ecclesiasticae libertatis quòd pro Rege & republica necessarium inuenitur.

An other Note.

*Clericus ad Ecclesiam confugiens pro feloniam, pro immunitate Ecclesiastica obtinenda, si asserit se esse Clericum, regnū non compellatur abiurare, sed legi regni se reddens, gaudebit Ecclesiastica libertate, iuxta laudabilem consuetudinem regni hactenus vsitatam.

An other Note.

Appellatori in forma debita tanquam Clerico per Ordinarium petito libertatis Ecclesiasticae beneficium non negabitur.*

In the Statute intituled Articuli Cleri, made onely for the benefite of the Clergie. An. R. Edwardi. R^a 2. nono. are diuers notes to like effect.

But what nedeth many arguments for the proufe hereof? The Statutes and law bookes of this Realme are very full of them in diuers and many places, besides the presidents, for the forme of geuing of benefices, whereof none are capable, but such as are spiritual men & of the Clergie, wherein they are not called or termed by any other title or terme in the Latin tong,* then Clerici, for the most part, not in the kyngs owne graunt or the Lord Chauncellours, or any other subiectes of his, as very well appeareth both by diuers olde wrytten Presidents whych haue bene shewed vnto me, & also by the formes of presentations collected & set foorth for the instruction of such as are ignoraunt, or not very perfite in the order of them, in a Printed booke called The booke of sundrie Instrumentes. In whyche fourme in the sayd booke the words in the kings graunt be these: Rex Reuerendissimo in Christo. &c. ad Ecclesiam Parochialem de N. vestrae diocesis modo per mortem vltimi incumbentis ibidem vacantem, & ad nostram donationem pleno iure spectantem, dilectum Capellanum nostrum A.B. Clericū, intuitu charitatis vobis praesentamus, & mandamus vti dictum A. Capellanum nostrum ad praefatam Ecclesiam admittere, eumque Rectorem eiusdem instituere, cum suis iuribus. &c.

But if the presentation be from a Knight, an Esquier, or a Gentleman, then these words Capellanum nostrum are alwayes left out, as in the sayd booke apeareth in this sort. Reuerendo in Christo patri. &c. A.B. de N. ad Ecclesiam de N predictam vestrae dioc. modo per mortem T.D. vltimi incumbentis ibidem vacantem, & ad meam praesentationem pleno iure spectantem, dilectum mihi in Christo Iacobum P. Clericum vestrae paternitati praesento, humiliter rogans quatenus prefatum I. ad dictam Ecclesiam admittere, ipsumque in Rectorem eiusdem Ecclesiae institui & induci facere velitis cum suis Iuribus & pertinentijs vniuersis. &c. As in the saide booke is more at large to be sene or perused.

Thus I doubt not, louing reader, but by these so plaine Euidences aboue prefixed, thou hast sufficiently to vnderstand, that thys violent restraunte of Priestes lawful Mariage wythin this Realme of England, is of no suche long reach and antiquitie, as hath bene thought of many, and al by reason of ignorāce of hystories, and course of times. So that briefly as in a Summary Table to comprehende that whole effect hereof:

First about the yeare of our Lord. 946. to the profession of single life,* and displacing of mariage began to come into exāple here in England,* by reason of s. Benets monks, which then began to encrease hereabout the time of King Edgar, and especially by the meanes of Oswald bishop of Yorke, Odo and Dunstane, Archbishops of Canterburie, and Ethelwolde Bishop of Wint. so that in diuers Cathedral churches, and bishops Seas, monkes with theyr professed singlenes of life, crept in, & married Ministers (which were then called secular Priestes) with their wiues out of sondry Churches were dispossessed not from wyues, but onely from their places: and yet not in all Churches, but onely in certaine, wherof read before, page 198.

*Not long after that, about the time of Pope Nicolas 2. An. 1060. of Alexander, and Hildebrande, came into y^e sea of Canterbury an other Monke called Lanfranke, who also being a promoter of thys professed chastitie, made the Decree more generall, that all Prebendaries being married in anye Churches, shoulde be displaced: yet the Priestes in Townes and villages shoulde not be compelled to leaue theyr married wiues, vnlesse they would.

Last of all folowed monkish Anselme. an. 1106. by whō was made this law of Winchester aforesayd, that Priests, Archdeacons, Deacons, & subdeacons, whiche had wyues & spiritual liuing, shoulde be put from them both,* and also that none after shuld be admitted to their orders, but shuld first professe single life, that is, to liue without wiues. And thus much concerning priestes mariage forbidden.

Let vs adde moreouer to these evidences aboue rehearsed, for more confirmation of the ancient vse and liberty of priests mariage an other testimonie or two out of like ancient records with like plaine wordes declaring vnto vs, howe the matrimony of Priests, before the time of Lanckfranke aforesaid was no straunge example in the Church, and first we wil inferre the words of an old Martyrologe pertaining to the Recordes of Canterburie. The wordes of whych Martyrologe be these.

Ex antiq. Martyrilogio Ecclesiae Cant.

LAnfrancus Archiep. reddidit Ecclesiae S. Andreae,* quia de iure ipsius Ecclesiae antiquitus fuerunt, in Suthrege, Mutelac, Lōdoniae, monasterium Sanctae Mariae, cum terris & domibus, quas Liuingus Praesbyter & vxorillius Londoniae habuerunt.

To this also may be adioyned an other like antiquitie out of an olde wrytten history belonging to the church off. Assaph, after the time of Lanfranke, as foloweth.

Anno Domini, 1261. ex antiq. libro Assaphensi manu scripto.

DE Clerico vxorato receptante publicè * forbonizatum scienter, & possit contra ipsum probari, nobis videtur quòd tenetur respondere in fo•o Ecclesiastico. Si verò facit residentiam in terra principis, & cōtingat ipsum mulctari, tota mulcta sua principi debetur. Si verò residentiam in terra Episcopi facit, mulcta diuidatur inter Episcopum & Principem. scienter vel nolenter in eius absentia receptauerit, Mulier in foro Ecclesiastico respondeat, & Clericus ratione sui facti, nō puniatur, nec pro ea (nisi velit) respondere cogatur.

Neither is the testimonie of Mantuanus vnworthye also hereunto to be added, wryting in the life of Hilarius Bishop of Pictauium, as followeth.

The sixt Article touching Auricular confession.

OF confession three kindes we find in the scriptures expressed and approued. The first is our confession priuately or publikely made vnto God alone: * and thys confession is necessary for all men at all times. Wherefore S. Iohn speaketh: If we confesse our sinnes, he is faythfull to forgeue vs. &c.

The second is the confession which is openly made in the face of the congregation. And this confession also hath place when any such thing is committed, whereof riseth a publicke offence and sclaunder to the Church of God: As amplexes of penitentiaries in the prim^etiue Church, & Melciades and other. &c.

Page 1172 The thirde kinde of confession is that, which we make priuately to our brother.  And thys confession is requisite, whē either we haue iniuried or by any way damnified our neighbor, whether he be rich or poore. Wherof speaketh the Gospel: Go and reconcile thy selfe first vnto thy neighbour. &c. Also S. Iames: Confesse your selues one to another. &c. Or els this confession may also haue place, whē any such thing lieth in our conscience, in the opening whereof we stande in neede of the counsell & comfort of some faithfull brother. But herein must we vse discretiō in auoiding these poyntes of blinde superstition. First that we put therein no necessitye for remission of our sinnes,  but to vse therein oure owne voluntarie discretion, according as we see it expedient for the better satisfying of our troubled minde. The second is, * that we be not bound to any enumeration of our sinnes. The thirde, that we tie not our selues to any one persone, more then to an other, but to vse therein our free choyse, whome we thinke can geue vs the best spirituall counsell in the Lord.

But as there is nothyng in the Church so good and so ghostly, which through peuishe superstitiō either hath not, or may not be peruerted: so thys confession also hath not lacked his abuses. First the secret confession to God alone, as it hath ben counted insufficient, so hath it ben but lightly esteemed of many. The publike confession to the congregation hathe bene turned to a standinge in a sheete, or else hath bene bought out for money. Furthermore, the secreat breaking of a mans minde to some faithful or spiritual brother, in disclosing hys infirmitie or temptatiōs, for counsel and godly comfort, hath bene turned into auricular confession in a Priestes eare for assoyling of his sinnes. In the which auriculare cōfession,  first of the free libertie of the penitent in vttering his griefs, they haue made a mere necessitye, and that vnto saluation and remission of sinnes. Secondly, they require withal, enumeration and a full recitall of all sinnes whatsoever:  both great and small, also besids y^e necessity of this eare confessiō, they adde therto a prescription of time, at leaste once in the yeare for all men, whether they repent or no, to be confessed: making moreouer of the same a sacrament. And lastly, where as before it stode in the voluntary choyse of a man to open his hart to what spirituall brother he thought best, for an easement of his griefe & ghostly consolation, they binde him to a Priest (vnlesse some Frier come by the waye to be his ghostly father) to whome he must needes confesse all, whatsoever he hath done, and though he lacke the key of knowledge, and peraduēture of good discretion, yet none must haue power to assoyle him, but he through the authority of hys keyes.

And this manner of confession, say they, was instituted by Christe, and hys Apostles, and hath bene vsed in the Church euer since to this present day. Which is a most manifest vntruth, and easie by storyes to be conuincd.

*For Socrates lib. 5. cap. 19. Sozom. lib. 7. cap. 16. in y^e booke of Ecclesiasticall history, do geue vs plainly to vnderstand, that thys Auricular confession neuer came of Christe, but onely of men.

Item, in the time of Tertullian, Beat. Rhenanus testifieth, that there was no mention made of thys Auricular confession. Which may well be gathered thereof, for that Tertullian wryting vpon repentaunce, maketh no mention at all thereof.

*Item, in the tyme of Chrysostome, it appeareth there was no such assoyling at the Priests hands, by these wordes where he sayeth: I require thee not that thou shouldest cōfesse thy sinnes to thy fellowe seruaunt. Tell them vnto God, who careth for them.

*Item, the sayde Chrysostome in an other place wryting vpon repentance, and confession: Let the examination of thy sinnes, and thy iudgement (sayth he) be secrete and close without witnesse. Let God onely see and heare thy confession. &c.

*Item, in the time of Ambrose, De poenit. Dist. 1. Petrus, the glose of the Popes owne decrees recordeth: That the institution of Baptisme was not then begonne, which nowe in oure dayes is in vse.

Item, it is truely sayd therfore of the Glose in another place, where he testifieth: That this institution of penance began rather of some tradition of the vniuersall church, *then of any authoritie of the new Testament, or of the olde. &c.

The lyke also testifieth Erasm. wryting vpon Hierome in these wordes. Apparet tempore Hieronymi nondum institutam fuisse. &c. That is: It appeareth, that in the time of Hierome, this secrete confession of sinnes was not yet ordained, *whiche the church afterwarde did institute holesomely, if our Priests and lay men woulde vse it rightly. But heerein, diuines not considering aduisedly what the olde doctours do say, are much deceiued. That which they say of general and open confession, they wrast by and by to this priuie and secrete kinde of confession, which is farre diuers, and of an other sort. &c.

The like testimony may also be taken of Gracian himselfe, who speaking of confession vsed then in hys tyme, *leaueth the matter in doubtfull suspense, neither pronouncing on the one side, nor on the other, but referreth y^e matter to the free iudgement of the Readers, which the acte of these six Articles here enioyneth as necessary, vnder paine of death.

Briefly, in fewe woordes to searche out and notifie the very certaine time, when this Article of eare confession first crept into the Church, & what antiquitie it hath in following the Iudgement of Ioannes Scotus, and of Antoninus, it may be well▪ supposed, that the institution thereof tooke his first origine by Pope Innocent the thirde, in hys Councell of Laterane, An. 1215. For so we reade in Ioannes Scotus Lib. 4. Sent. Dist. 17. Artic. 3. Praecipua autem specificatio huius praecepti inuenitur in illo cap. Extra. de poenit. & remiss. Omnis vtriusque sexus. &c. And after in the same Article it followeth: Nam ex prima institutione Ecclesiae non videntur fuisse Distincti proprii sacerdotes. Quando enim Apostoli hinc & inde ibant praedicando verbum Dei. &c. By the which wordes it appeareth that there was no institution of any suche confession specified before the constitution of Innocentius the thirde.

But more plainly the same may appeare by the wordes of Antoninus in 3. parte Histor.* Whyche be these Innocentius tertius in Concilio generali praedicto, circa Sacramenta confessionis & communionis sic statuit: Omnis vtriusque sexus fidelis, postquam ad annum discretionis peruenerit, omnia peccata sua solus saltem semel in anno confiteatur proprio sacerdoti, & iniunctam sibi poenitentiam proprijs viribus studeat adimplere, alioquin & viuens ab ingressu Ecclesiae arceatur, & moriens Christiana careat sepultura. Vnde hoc salutare statutum frequenter in Ecclesijs publicetur: ne quisquam ignorantiae coecitate velamen excusationis assumat. &c. That is to say. Pope Innocent the 3. in hys generall Councell aforesayde, touching the Sacraments of confession and the communion, made this constitution as followeth.* That euery faithfull person, both man & woman, after they come to the yeares of discretion, shall confesse all their sinnes by themselues alone, at least once a yeare, to their owne ordinarie priest, and shall endeouour to fulfil by their owne strength, their penance to them enioyned. Or els who so doth not, shall neither haue entraunce into the Church being aliue, nor being dead shall enioy Christian buriall. Wherefore this wholesome constitution we wil to be published often in the Churches, least any manne throughe the blindnesse of ignorance maye make to them selues a cloke of excuse. &c. And thus much hetherto we haue alledged by occasion incident of these sixe Articles for some part of confutation of the same, referring the reader for the rest, to the more exquisite tractation of Diuines, whyche professedlye wryte vpon those matters.

In the meane time, for asmuche as there is extante in Latin a certaine learned Epistle of Philippe Melancthon, wrytten to king Henrye againste these vj. wicked Articles aboue specified, I thought not to defraud the reader of the fruit therof, for his better vnderstanding and instruction. The tenour and effect of hys Epistle translated into English, thus followeth.

The Copie of Melancthons Epistle sent to king Henry, against the cruel Acte of the vj. Articles.

MOste famous and noble Prince,* there were certayne Emperours of Rome, as Adrianus. Pius, and afterward the two brethren Uerus and Marcus, which did receiue gently the Apologies and defences of the Christiāns: whych so preuailed with those moderate Princes, that they swaged theyr wrath against the Christians, and obtained mitigation of theyr cruell Decrees. Euen so, for asmuch as there is a Decree set foorth of late in your Realme agaynst that doctrine whyche we professe, both godly and necessary for the Church, I beseeche your moste honourable Maiestie fauorably both to read & consider this our complaint, especially seeing I haue not onely for our owne cause, but much rather for the common sauegarde of the Church, directed this my wryting vnto you. For seyng those heathen Princes did bothe admitte and allowe the defences of the Christians, howe much more is it beseeeming for a king of Christian profession, and such a one as is occupied in y^e studies of holy histories, to heare the complaints and admonitions of the godly in the Church? And so much the more willingly I wryte vnto you, for that you haue so fauorably heeretofore receiued my letters w^t a singular declaration of your * beneuolēce towards me. This also giueth me some hope that you wil not vnwillingly read these things▪ for asmuch as I see that the very phrase & manner of wryting doth playnly declare, not your selfe, but onely the byshops to be the authors of those articles and decrees there Page 1173 set forth: Albeit, through theyr wily and subtile sophistications, they haue induced you (as it happened to manye other worthy princes besides you) to condescend and assent vnto thē: as the rulers perswaded Darius beyng otherwise a wise and a iust prince, to cast Daniel vnto y^e Lyons.

*It was neuer vnseemely for a good prince to correct & reforme crue•l and rigorous lawes (as it is commōly said) to haue a second viewe and ouersight of things before passed and decreed.

The wise Athenians made a Decree when the Cittye of Mitilene was recouered, which before had forsaken thē that all the Citizens there should be slayn, and the citty vtterly destroyed. Wherupon there was a ship sent forth with the same commaundement to the armye.* On the nexte morow the matter was brought agayne before the same iudges, and after better aduise taken, there was a contrary de'cree made, that the whole multitude should not be put to y^e sword, but a fewe of the chiefe authors of theyr rebellion, should be punished and the Citty saued. There was therefore an other ship sent forth w^t a countermaund in all haste to ouertake and preuent theyr former ship, as also it happened. Neither was that noble citty which then ruled and reigned farre and wide, ashamed to altar and reform their former Decree. Many suche examples there be, the most part wherof, I am sure are wel knowne vnto you. But in the Church especially, Princes haue many times altered & reformed their Decrees, and Nabuchodonosor & Darius. There was a Decree set forth in the name of Assuerus,* cōcerning the killing of the Iewes. That Decree was afterwarde called in again. So did Adrianus and Antoninus also correct and reforme their Decrees.

Therefore, although there be a decree set forth in England, which threatneth straunge punishmentes and penalties, disagreeing from the custome of the true Church, and swaruing from the rules & Canons thereof: yet I thought it not vnseemely for vs to become petitioners vnto you, for the mitigation of these your sharpe and seuer proceedings. The which when I consider,* it greeueth my minde, not onely for the perill and daunger of them which professe the same doctrine that we doe, but also I doe lament for youre cause, that they should make you an instrument and a minister of their bloudye tyrannie and impietie. And partly also I lament, to see the course of Christian doctrine peruerted, superstitious rites confirmed, whoredome and lecherous •u•tes maintained.

Besides al this, I here of diuers good mē, excelling both in doctrine and vertue, to be there deteined in prisonne, as Latimer, Cromer, Shaxton and others, to whom I wish strength, pacience, & consolation in the Lord. Unto whom albeit there can nothyng happē more luckely or more gloriously,* then to geue their liues in the confession of the manifest truth and veritie: yet would I wish that you should not distaine your handes with the bloude of such menne: neyther woulde I wish suche Lanternes of lyght in youre Churche, to be extinguished: neither these spitefull & malicious Phariseis, the enemies of Christe, to haue their wils so much fulfilled. Neither againe woulde I wish that you shoulde so muche serue the will and desire of that Romishe Antichrist, which laugheth in his sleeue to see you nowe to take part with him, against vs hoping well by the helpe of his bishops, to recouer againe his former possessiō, whych of late by your vertuous and godly meanes be lost. He seeth your Bishops,* for the time, loyall vnto you, and obsequious to obey your wil: but in heart he seeth them linked vnto him in a perpetual bond of fidelitie and obedience. In all these feates and practises, the Romish Bishops are not to seeke. They see what great stormes and blastes heretofore they haue passed by bearing & suffering. They see that great things be brought to passe in time. Neither doe they forget the olde verse of the Poete.

Multa, dies variusque labor mutabilis aevi Retulit in melius.

Manye good and learned men in Germanie conceiued of you great hope, that by your authoritie and example other Princes also would be prouoked to surcease likewise from their vniust crueltie, and better to aduise them selues for the reformation of errours crept into the Church: trusting that you would be as a guide and Captaine of that godly purpose and enterprise. But nowe seeing these your contrary proceedings, wee are vtterly discouraged: the indignation of other Princes is confirmed: the stubbornesse of the wicked is augmented: and olde and great errors are thereby stablished.

But heere your Byshops will say agayne (no doubt) that they defende no errours, but the very truthe of Gods holy worde. And although they be not ignoraunt that they striue in very dede, both against the true word of God, and the Apostolicke Church, yet like craftie Sophisters, they can finde out faire gloses, pretending a goodly shewe outwardly, to colour their errours and abuses.

And this sophistication not onely now in England is had in great admiration, and esteemed for great wisdom,* neither in Rome only raigneth, where Cardinal Couterrenus, Sadolet, and Cardinall Poole, goe about to paynte out abuses wyth newe colours and goodly gloses: but also in Germany diuers noble men are likewise corrupted and seduced w^t the like sophistication. And therefore I nothing maruell that so manye there wyth you bee deceiued wyth these craftie iugglinges. And although you for your parte, lacke neyther learning nor iudgement, yet some times we see it so happen, that wise men also be caried away by faire and colourable perswasions, from the veritie. The saying of Simonides is praise worthy:*Opinion (sayeth hee) manye times peruerteth veritie. And many times falle opinion hath outwardly a fairer shewe, then simple truthe. And specially it so happeneth in cases of religion, where y^e deuill transformeth himselfe into an Angel of light, setting foorth with all colourable & goodly shewes, false opinions. Howe faire seemeth the glose of Samosatenus, vpon the Gospell of S. Iohn:*In the beginning was the word. &c. and yet is it full of impietie, but I omitte forreine▪ examples.

In these articles of yours, how many thinges are craftely & deceitfully deuised? Confession sayth the article, is ne|cessary, & ought to be retayned.* And why say they not plain|ly, that the rehearsing & numbring vp of sinnes is necessary by Gods word? This the bishops knew wel to be very false, & therfore in the article they placed their wordes generally, to bleare y^e eies of the simple people, that whē they heare confession to be necessary, they shuld thereby thinke the enumeration of sinnes to be necessary by Gods worde.

The like legerdimaine also they vse in the article of priuate Masses, albeit the beginning the sayd article conteyneth a manifest vntruth, where they say that it is necessary to retayne priuate Masses. What man in all the primitiue Church, more then 4. hundreth yeares after the Apostles time, did euer so say or thinke, at what tyme there were no suche priuate Masses vsed? * But afterwarde in the processe of the Article, folowe other blinde sophistications, to make the people beleue that they should receiue by them, diuine consolations and benefites. And why doe they not plainely declare what consolations and benefites those be? * The Bishops here do name no application and merite, for they knowe that they can not be defended. Yet they dally wyth glosing wordes, whereby they may winde out and escape, if any should improue their application. And yet notwithstanding they would haue this their application to be vnderstanded and beleued of the people. They woulde haue this Idolatrous perswasion confirmed: to witte, that thys sacrifice doth merite vnto others, remission A poena & culpa: release of all calamities, and also gaine & luer in common trafficke, and to conclude, whatsoeuer els the carefull heart of man doth desire.

The lyke Sophistication they vse also, where they say that Priests mariage is against the law of God. They are not ignoraunt what S. Paule sayth: * A Bishop oughte to be the husband of one wife: and therefore they know right well that Mariage is permitted to Priestes by the law of God. But because nowe, they say, they haue made a vowe, they goe craftely to worke, and doe not say that priests for their vowes sake can not marrie, but plainely geue out the Article after this sorte: that Mariage of Priestes is vtterly against the lawe of God. Againe, what impudencie and tyranny do they shew moreouer, when they compell mariages to be dissolued, and command those to be put to death, whych will not put away their wiues, and renounce theyr matrimony? Wher as the vow of Priestes, if it had any force at all should extend no further but onely to put them from the ministerie if they would mary. And this (no doubt) is the true meaning of the Councils and Canons.

O cursed Byshops.  O impudent and wicked Winchester, who vnder these colourable fetches, thincketh to deceiue the eyes of Christ, and the iudgements of all the godly in the whole worlde. These things haue I wrytten that you may vnderstand the crafty sleights, and so iudge of the purpose and pollicie of these Byshops.  For if they would simply and hartely search for the truth, they would not vse these craftie collusions and deceitfull iugglings.

This Sophistication, as it is in all other affaires pernicious and odious, so aboue al things, most specially it is to be auoyded in matters of Religion: wherein it is a heynous impiety to corrupt or peruert the pure word of God. And heereof the Deuill whiche is called Diabolus, specially taketh his name, because he wrasteth the word of God out of mennes hearts by such false iuggling and sophistical cauillations. And why do not these Bishops as well plainely vtter and confesse that they will abide no reformation of Page 1174 doctrine and Religion in the Church, for that it shall make against their dignitie, pompe & pleasure? Why do not their adherents also, and such as take their part, plainly say that they will retaine still thys present state of the Church for their owne profite, tranquillitie, and maintenaunce? Thus to confesse, * were true and plaine dealing.

Now, whiles they pretende hypocritically a false zeale and loue to the truth and sincere Religion, they come in w^t their blinde sophistications, wherwith they couer their errours: for their Articles set forth in thys act be erroneous, false & impious, how glorious soeuer they seme outwardly. Wherefore it were to be wished that these bishops would remember Gods terrible threatning in the prophet Esay: Wo to you (sayeth he) which make wicked lawes. * What wil you doe in the day of visitation and calamitie to come? &c. Woe vnto you that call euill good, &c.

Now to come more nere to the matter which we haue in hande: this cannot be denied, but that long and horrible darkenes hath bene in the church of Christ.* Mens traditions not onely haue bene a yoke to good mens consciences, but also (which is much worse) they haue bene reputed for Gods holy seruice, to the great disworship of God. There were vowes, thyngs bequeathed to churches, diuersitie of garments, choice of meats, long babling prayers, pardōs, image worship, manifest idolatry committed to saints, the true worship of God and true good workes not knowen. Briefly, little difference there was betwixte the Christian and heathen religion, as stil is yet at Rome, to this present day, to be sene. The true doctrine of repentance, of * remission of sinnes, whych commeth by the faith of Christ, of iustification of faith, of the difference betweene the lawe and the gospell, of the right vse of the Sacramēts, was hid and vnknowen. The keyes were abused to the maintenance of the Popes vsurped tyrannie. Ceremonies of mens inuention were much preferred before ciuile obedience and dueties done in the common wealth.

Unto these errours moreouer was ioyned a corrupte life,* full of all lecherous and filthy lustes, by reason of the law forbidding Priestes to marrie. Out of thys miserable darknes, God something hath begon to deliuer his church through the restoring againe of true doctrine. For so wee must needes acknowledge, that these so great and long festred errors haue not ben disclosed and brought to light by the industry of man,* but thys light of the Gospel, is onely the gift of God, who nowe againe hath appeared vnto the Church. For so doth the holy Ghost prophecie before, how in the later times the godly should sustaine sore & perillous conflicts with antichrist, foreshewing that he should come, enuironed with a mighty and strong army of Bishoppes, hypocrites and Princes: that he should fighte agaynste the truth, and slay the godly.

And that now all these things are so come to passe, it is most euident, and cā not be denied. The tirannie of the byshop of Rome hath partly brought in errors into y^e church, partly hath confirmed them, & nowe maintaineth the same with force and violence, as Daniel well foreshewed. And mucche we reioyced to see you deuided frō him,* hoping and trusting well that the Church of England would now florish. But your Byshops be not deuided from the Romish Antichrist: his Idolatrie, errours, and vices they defende and maintaine with tooth and naile: for the Articles nowe passed, are craftely picked out. They confirme all humane traditions in that they establish solemne vowes, single life and auricular confession. They vpholde and aduaunce not onely their pride and authoritie, but all errours wythal, in retaining the priuate Masse.

Thus haue they craftily prouided that no reformation can take any place, that their dignitie & wealth may still be vpholden. And this to be the purpose of the bishops, experience it selfe doth plainly teach vs. Nowe what man will not lament to see the glory of Christ thus to be defaced? For (as I sayde before) this matter concerneth not onely these Articles whyche be there enacted, but all other Articles of sound doctrine are likewise ouerthrowne,* if such traditions of men shalbe reputed as necessary, and to be retained. For why doeth Christe say? For they worship me in vaine wyth the precepts of men? or why doth S. Paule so oft detest mennes traditions?

It is no light offence to set vp new kindes of worshipping and seruing of God without his worde,* or to defend the same. Such presumptiō God doth horribly detest, which wil be knowen in his word onely. He wil haue none other Religions inuented by mans devise: for els all sorts of religions of all nations might be approued & allowed. Leane not (sayth he) to thine owne wisdome. But he sent Christ, and commaundeth vs to heare him, & not the inuention of subtile and politike heads, which apply religion to their own luker and commoditie.

Furthermore, priuate Masses, •owes, the single life of Priestes, numbring vp of sinnes to the Priest, wyth other thinges moe, being but mere ordinaunces of men, are vsed for Gods true seruice and worship. For although the Supper of the Lorde was truely instituted by Christe, yet the priuate masse is a wicked prophanation of the Lords supper. For in the Canon what corruption is cōtained in this, where it is said that Christ is offered, and that the worke it selfe is a sacrifice which redemeth the quicke and the deade? * These things were neuer ordained of Christ: yea manifold wayes they are repugnaunt to the Gospell. Christ willeth not him selfe to be offered vpp of Priestes, neither can the worke of the offerer or of the receiuer, by any meanes, be a sacrifice. This is manifest Idolatry, and ouerthroweth th• true doctrine of faith, and the true vse of the Sacraments. * By faith in Christ we are iustified, and not by any worke of the Priest. And the Supper is ordained that the Minister should distribute to others, * to the intent that they repēting for their sinnes, shoulde be admonished firmly to beleue the promises of the Gospell to pertaine vnto them: Heere is sette a plaine testimonie before vs, that we are made the members of Christ, and washed by hys bloude.

And thys is the true vse of that Supper, whyche is ordained in the gospel, * and was obserued in the primatiue Church 300. yeares and more, from the which we oughte not to be remooued. For it is plaine impietie to transferre the Lordes institution to any other vse, as wee are taughte by the seconde commaundement. Wherefore these priuate Masses, for asmuche as they swarue from the right institution of Christ manifold waies, as by oblation, sacrifice, application, and many other ways besides, * they are not to be reteined but to be abolished. Flie (sayeth S. Paule) from al Idolatrie. In these priuate masses muche Idolatrie is committed, which we see our bishops now so stoutly to defēd: and no maruell. * For in the latter times y^e scripture plainly sheweth that great Idolatrie shall raigne in the Church of God. As Christ himselfe also signifieth, saying: When ye shal see the abomination of desolation, which is foretold of the Prophet Daniel, standing in the holy place, he that readeth, * lette him vnderstande. And Daniel in the 11. chapter. And he shall worship the God Maozim in his place, and shall adore the God whom his fathers knew not, with gold, siluer, and precious stones. Both these places speake of the masse.

Thys kinde of worship and horrible prophanation of the Sacrament, God abhorreth. For howe many sundry kindes of manifest impiety are here committed in this one action of the Masse? First, it is set foorth to sale. Secondly, * they that are vnworthy, are compelled to receyue whether they will or no. Thirdly, it is applied for meritorious and satisfactorie for the quicke and the deade. Fourthly, many thynges are promised thereby, as prosperous nauigation, remedies against diseases both for manne and beast, wyth other infinite moe. These be most manifest and notorious abominations. But besides these, there be other also no lesse to be reprehended, whych the simple people doe not so plainly see. Such worshipping and seruing of God is not to be set vp after the phantasie of men.

Wherefore they do wickedly when they offer sacrifice to God without his commaundement. For when of this woорke they make a sacrifice, they imagine that priuate Masses are to be done, because God would be worshipped after this sorte, And we see that Masses are bought with gold and siluer, great riches and sumptuous charges: also the Sacrament to be caried about in gold and siluer to be worshipped, whereas the sacrament was neuer ordeined for any such purpose. Wherefore seeing the commandement of God biddeth, flie from Idolatry, priuate Masses are not to be maintained. And I maruell what they saye that such priuate Masses are necessarily to be reteyned,* when it is euident that in the olde time there was none such. Shal we thinke that thinges pertaineing to the necessary worship of GOD, could so long be lacking in the primitiue Church 300. yeares after the Apostles and more? What can be more absurde and against all reason?

We see these priuate Masses to be defended with great labour and much a doe: of some, for feare lest their gayne should decay: of some, because they would serue the affection of the vulgare people (whiche thinketh to haue great succour therby, and therefore are loth to leaue it) rather then for any iust cause or reason to lead them. But howsoeuer they do, a most manifest & euident cause there is why these priuate Masses ought to be abolished. For first their application vndoubtedly is wicked: neither doth the work of the priest merite any grace to any person, but euery one is iustified by his owne fayth. Neither againe would God haue any man to trust vpon any ceremony, but only to the benefite of Christ. And most certaine it is, that the application of these Masses for the dead, is ful of great errour and impietie.

Page 1175 But here come in blinde gloses (albeit to no purpose) to excuse this application.* For vniuersally amongst all the people, who is he that thinketh otherwise, but that thys worke is auaylable for the whole Church? Yea the Canon of the Masse it selfe declareth no lesse. And why then doe some of these craftie sophisters dally out the matter wyth their glosing wordes, denieng that they make any application of their Masses, when they know full well that the errour of the people is confirmed by this their doing: although they themselues do thinke otherwise? Albeit how few be there in very deede which do otherwise thinke?

We ought not to dissemble in Gods matters. Let vs vse them as the holy Scripture teacheth, and as the auncient custome of the primitiue Church doth leade vs.* Why should any man be so presumptuous to swerue from auncient custome? Why now do they defend the errours of other which haue peruerted the institution of Christ?

Now, although some perhaps wil pretend and say, that he maketh no application of his Masses, yet notwithstanding he so dealeth in handling the ceremony priuately by himselfe, that he thinketh this his oblation to be high seruice done to God, and suche as God requireth: whiche is also erroneous and to be reprobued. For why, no seruice nor worship pertaineing to God ought to bee set vp by mans deuise, without the commaundement of God.

Wherefore I beseeche you for the glorie of Christ, that you will not defend the article of this Acte cōcerning these priuate Masses, but that you will suffer the matter to bee well examined by vertuous and learned men. All thinges that we here with vs do, we do them by euident & substantiall testimonie of the primitiue Church, which testimonie I dare bee bolde to set against the iudgementes of all that haue since followed, such as haue corrupted the aunciente doctrine and old rites with manifold errours.

As touching the other articles, they haue no neede of any long disputation.* Uowes that be wicked, fayned, and impossible, are not to be kept. There is no doubt, but thys is the common perswasion of all men touching vowes, that all these wil workes deuised by man, are the true seruice and worship of God: and so thinke they also whyche speake most indifferently of them. Other adde therevnto more grosse errorrs, saying, that these works bring wyth them perfection, and merite euerlasting life. Now all these opinions the Scripture in manye places doth reprove. Christ saith: They woorship me in vayne wyth the preceptes of men.* And Paule sayth, that these obseruations be the doctrine of deuils: for they ascribe to the power and strength of man, false honour, because they are taken for the seruice of God: they obscure faith and the true worshipping of God. Item, the sayd Paule to the Coloss. sayth: Let no man deceyue you by fayned humilitie,*&c. Why make you Decrees? &c. Wherefore these corrupt traditions of men are in deede a wicked and detestable seruice of God.

Unto these also are annexed many other corrupt & wicked abuses. The whole order of Monckery, what superstition doth it containe: What prophanations of Masses, inuocation of Saints, colours & fashions of apparell, choise of meates, superstitious prayers without all measure? Of which causes euery one were sufficient,* why these vowes ought to be broken. Besides this, a greate part of men are drawne to this kinde of life chiefly for the bellies sake, and then afterward they pretend the holines of their vowe and profession.

Furthermore, this vowe of single life is not to all men possible to be kept, as Christ himselfe saith: All men do not receiue this.* Such vowes therefore whiche without sinne can not be performed are to be vndone, but these things I haue discussed sufficiently in other of my workes.

But this causeth me muche to maruell, that this vowe of Priestes in your English Decree,* is more strait and hard, then is the vowe of Monkes, whereas the Canons themselues doe bind a Priest no farther to single life: but onely for the time that he remaineth in the ministry. And certeynely it made my hart to tremble when I reade thys Article which so forbiddeth matrimony, and dissolueth the same being contracted, and appointeth moreouer the punishment of death for the same. Although there haue bene diuers godly Priestes which in certeyne places haue bene put to death for their mariage, yet hath neuer man hetherto bene so bold to stablisch any such lawe.* For euery man in a maner, wel perceiued that all well disposed and reasonable persons would abhorre that crueltie: and also they feared least the posteritie woulde thinke euill thereof. Who would euer thinke, that in the Church of Christ, wherein all lenitie toward the godly ought most principally to be shewed, such cruelties and tyrannie could take place, to set sorth bloudy lawes to be executed vpon the godly for lawfull matrimonie?

But they brake their vowes, will the Byshoppes say.* For (as I sayd) that vow ought not to stād seing it is turned to a false worship of God, & is impossible to be kept. Agayne, although it stooode in force, yet it should not extend to thē which forsake the ministry. Finally, if the Bishops here would haue a care and regarde to mens consciences, they should then ordaine Priestes without any such profession or vow making, as appeareth by the old Canons, how that many were admitted to the ministry without professing of any vow, and the same afterward, when they had married their wiues, to haue remayned in the ministry, as is testified Cap. Diaconi. Distinct. 28.

Certainely what here I may cōplayne, I can not tell.* First, in this Article I can not impute it to ignoraūce that they do. For no man is ignoraūt of the commaundemēt of God, which sayth: Let euery man haue his wife for auoydyng of fornication. Agayne, who is so blynd but he seeth what a life these vnmarried Priestes do liue? * The complayntes of good mē are wel knowen. The filthynes of y^e wicked is toto manifest. But peradventure your Byshops holding w^t the sect of Epicures, doe thinke that God is not offended with filthy lustes. Which if they so thinke, then doe we susteine doubtlesse a hard cause where such must be iudges.

I am not ignoraunt that this single life is very fitte to set out the glory and brauery of Byshops and Colledges of Priestes, & to mainteine their wealth and portely state, and this I suppose to be the cause why some do abhorre so much that Priestes should be married. But O Lamentable state of the Church, if lawes shuld be so forced to serue, not the veritie and the will of God, but the priuate gayne and commoditie of men. They erre which thinke it lawfull for them to make lawes repugnaunt to the commaūdement of God & to the law of nature, so that they be profitable to attaine wealth and riches. * And of trouth frō my very hart I do mourne & lament, right noble Prince, both for your sake & also for the cause of Christes Church. You pretende to impugne and gaynestād the tyrāny of the Romish Byshop, and trully do call him Antichrist, as in deede he is: & in the meane tyme you defēd and maintaine those lawes of that Romish Antichrist, which be the strength & sinowes of all his power▪ as priuate Masses, single lyfe of Priestes, & other superstitions. You threaten horrible punishmentes to good men and to the mēbers of Christ, you violently oppresse and beare down the veritie of the Gospell begynnyng to shyne in your Churches. This is not to abolish Antichrist, but to establish him.

I beseech you therfore for our Lord Iesus Christ, that you file not your conscience in defendyng those Articles which your Byshops haue deuised and set forth touchyng priuate Masses, Auricular confession, vowes, single life of Priestes, & prohibition of the one halfe of the Sacrament. It is no light offēce to establish Idolatry, errorrs, crueltie the filthy lustes of Antichrist. If the Romane Byshop should now call a Councell, what other Articles chiefly would he deuise and publish vnto the world, but the very same which your Byshops haue here enacted.

Understand and consider I pray you, the subtile traynes and deceites of the deuill, * whiche is wont first to set vpon and assayle the chief gouernours. And as he is the enemy of Christ from the begynnyng of the world, so his chief purpose is by all craftie and subtile meanes, to worke contumely agaynst Christ in sparsing abroad wicked opinions and setting vp Idolatry: and also in pollutyng mākind with bloudy murthers and fleshly lustes: in the workyng wherof he abuseth the policies and wittes of hypocrites: also the power and strength of mighty Princes: as stories of all tymes beare witnes what great kyngdomes & Empires haue set themselues with all might & maine, agaynst the poore Church of Christ.

And yet notwithstanding God hath reserued some good Princes at all tymes, out of the great multitude of such giants, and hath brought them to his Church, to embrace true doctrine, and to defend his true worshyp: * as Abrahā taught Abimelech, Ioseph the Egyptian kynges: and after them came Dauid, Iosaphat, Ezechias, Iosias excellyng in true godlynesse. Daniell conuerted to the knowledge of God the kynges of Chaldea & Persia. Also Britāny brought forth vnto the world the godly Prince Constantine. In this number I wishe you rather to be, then amongst the enemyes of Christ, defiled with Idolatry & spotted with the bloud of the godly: of whom God will take punishment, as he doth many tymes forewarne, and many examples do teach.

Yet agayne therefore I pray and beseeche you for our Lord Iesus Christ, that you wil correct and mitigate this Decree of y^e Byshops: In which doyng you shall aduaūce the glory of Christ, and prouide as well for the wealth of your owne soule, as the sauegarde of your Churches.

Page 1176Let the hartie desires of so many godly men through the whole worlde, moue you, so earnestly wishing that some good Kings woulde extend their authoritie to the true reformation of the Church of God, to the abolishing of all Idolatrous worship, and the furthering of the course of the Gospell. Regarde also and consider I beseeche you, those godly persons,* which are with you in bands for the Gospels sake, being the true members of Christ.

And if that cruell Decree be not altered, the Byshops will neuer cease to rage agaynst the Church of Christe without mercy or pitie. For them the deuill vseth as instrumentes and ministers of his furie and malice agaynst Christ.* These he stirreth vp to slay and kill the members of Christ. Whose wicked and cruell proceedings and subtile sophistications, that you wil not prefer before our true and most righteous request, all the godly most humbly & hartily do pray & beseech you. Which if they shall obteyne, no doubt but God shal recompence to you great rewards for your pietie, and your excellēt vertue shalbe renowned both by penne and voyce of all the godly, whiles the world standeth. For Christ shall iudge all them that shall deserue either well or euill of his Church. And whiles letters shal remaine, the memoriall worthy of such noble deserts, shall neuer dye or be forgotten with the posteritie to come. And seing we seeke the glory of Christ, and that our Churches are the Churches of Christ, there shall neuer be wantyng such as both shall defend the righteous cause, and magnifie with due commendation such as haue well deserued, & likewise shal condemne the vniust crueltie of the enemies.

Christ goeth about hungry, thirstie, naked, prisoned, complaining of the raging furie of the Bishops, and of the wrongfull oppression and crueltie of dyuers Kyngs and Princes, entreating that the members of his body be not rent in peeces, but that true Churches may be defended, & his Gospell aduanced. This request of Christ to heare, to receiue, and to embrace, is the office of a godly Kyng, and seruice most acceptable vnto God.

☞Intreating a little before, page 1143. of certayne olde instrumentes for prooffe of Priestes lawfull Marriage in times past, I gaue a little touch of a certayne recorde taken out of an olde Martyrologe of the Church of Cant. touching Liuingus a priest, and his wife, in the time of Lanfrancke. Wherein I touched also of certain lands and houses restored againe by the said Lanfrancke to the Church of S. Andrew.*Now for asmuch as the perfect note thereof is more fully come to my hands, and partly considering the restoring of the sayde landes, to be to Christes Church in Canterbury, and not S. Andrew in Rochester: and also for that I haue founde some other presidentes approouing the lawfull Mariage of Priestes, and legitimation of theyr children, I thought good for the more full satisfying of the reader, to enter the same, as followeth.

A note out of an old Martyrologe of Caunterbury.

OBijt Guillielmus Rex Anglorum, &c. Hic reddidit Ecclesiae Christi omnes ferè terras, &c. That is: After the death of William King of England,* the sayd Lanfrancke restored agayne to Christes Church in Canterbury, all the landes whiche from auncient memory vnto these latter dayes, haue bene taken away from the right of the sayd Church. The names of which landes be these: In Kent, Raculfe, Sandwich, Rateburch, Wodetun, the Abbay of Limming, with the lands and customes vnto the same monasterye belonging, Saltwude, &c. (Stocke and Denentun, because they belonged of olde time to the Church of S. Andrewe,* them he restored to the same Church.) In Sutherey, Murtelac, the Abbay of S. Mary in London, with the landes and houses which Liuingus Priest, and his wife had in London. All these Lanfrancke restored agayne for the health of his owne soule, freely, and without money,* &c.

NOte, that in the xix. yeare of this King, in an Assise at Warwicke, before Syr Guye Fairfax, and Syr Iohn Vauisour, it was found by Verdite,* that the father of the tenaunt had taken the order of Deacon, and after married a wife, and had issue, the tenaunt dyed, and the issue of the tenaunt did enter. Vpon whome the pleyntife did enter as next heyre collaterall to the father of the tenaunt.* Vpon whome he did reenter, &c. and for difficultie, the Iustices did adiourne the Assise. And it was debated in the Escheker chamber: If the tenaunt shall be a Bastard, &c. And heere by aduise it was adiudged that he shall not be bastard, &c. ¶Frowicke chiefe Iustice sayd to me in the xix. yeare of Henry the vij. in the common place, that he was of counsaile in this matter, and that it was adiudged as before, which Vauisour did graunt. ¶And Frowicke sayd, that if a Priest marry a wife,* and hath issue and dyeth, his issue shall inherite, for that the espousals be not voyde but voydable. ¶Vauisour: if a man take a Nunne to wife, this espousall is voyde.

☞Note, that in the latter Impression of Henry the vij. yeares of the lawe, this word Priest in this case aforesayd in some bookes is left out: whether of purpose or by negligence, I leaue it to the Reader to iudge.

Concerning these vj. Articles passed in this Acte aforesayd in the 21. yeare of King Henry, sufficiently hetherto hath bene declared, first what these Articles were: secondly by whom and from whom chiefly they proceded: thirdly,* how erroneous, pernicious, repugnant and contrarious to true doctrine, christian religion, and the word of God, to nature also it selfe, all reason and honesty, and finally to the auncient lawes, customes, and examples of our forcelders during the daies of a thousande yeares after Christe they were. Fourthly, yee haue heard also what vnreasonable and extreme penaltie was set vpon the same,* that a man may deeme these lawes to be written not wyth the inke of Steuen Gardiner, but with the bloud of a Dragon, or rather the clause of the Diuell. The breach whereof was made no lesse then treason and felony, and no lesse punishment assigned thereto then death.

Besides all this, the wordes of the Acte were so curious and subtile, that no man could speake, wryte or cyphar against them, without present daunger, yea scarcely a man might speake any word of Christ and his Religion,* but he was in perill of these vj. Articles. Ouer & besides, the Papistes began so finely to interprete the Act, that they spared not to indite men for abusing their countenance & behaiour in the Church. So great was the power of darkenesse in those dayes. And thus much concerning this Acte.

Besides these vj. Articles in this foresaide Acte concluded, there was also another constitution annexed withall, not without the aduise (as may seeme) of the Lord Cromwell, which was this:* that Priestes and Ministers of the Church, seing now they would needes thēselues be bound from all Matrimony, should therefore by law likewise be bound to such honesty and continencie of life, that carnally they should vse & accustome no maner of woman married or single, by way of aduoutrie or fornication: the breache whereof, for the first tyme, was to forfeite goodes, & to suffer imprisonment at the Kings pleasure: and for the second Page 1177 time, being duely conuicted, it was made felonie as the other were.

In this constitution, if the Lord Cromwell and other good men of the Parliament might haue had their wyll, there is no doubt, but the first crime of these concubinarye Priests, as well as the second, had had the same penaltie, as the other vj. Articles had and should haue bene punished with death. But Steuen Gardiner with his felowe Byshops, who then ruled all the roste, so basted this extraordinarie Article with their accustomed shiftes, that if they were taken and duely conuicte for their not castè nor cautè, at first time it was but forfeite of goodes. Also for the second conuiction or atteinder, they so prouided that the next yeare folowing, that punishment and paine of death by Acte of Parliamente,* was cleane wiped away and repealed. And why so? Because (sayeth the Statute) that punishment by payne of deathe is very sore, and much extreme, therefore it pleaseth the Kyng, wyth the assente of the Lordes, that that clause aboue written concerning felonie, and paynes of deathe, and other penalties and forfeitures, for and vpon the first and seconde conuiction or atteynder of anye Prieste or woman,*for anye suche offences (of whoredome or aduoutrie) aforesayde, shall be from hencefoorth voyde and of none effecte, &c. So that by this statute it was prouided, for all suche votaries as liued in whoredome and adulterie, for the first offence to lose his goodes and all his spirituall promotions except one. For the second, to forfeite all that he had to the King. For the third conuiction to susteyne continuall imprisonment.

In these vngodly proceedings of the Popes Catholicke Clergie, two things we haue to note.

*1. First, the horrible impietie of their doctrine, directly fighting against the expresse authoritie of God & his word, forasmuch as that which God permitteth, they restrayne: that which he biddeth, they forbid. Habeat, sayeth he: non habeat say they, taking exceptions agaynste the worde of the Lord. That which he calleth honorable and vndefiled, they call heresie: that which he cūmendeth and instituteth, they punish with paynes of death. Not onely the Priestes that marry, but them also that say or cyphre that a Prieste may marry, at the first they kill as felons. Neither can any Miserere take place for chaste and lawfull wedlocke: where as cōtrariwise a spirituall man may thrise defile his neighbours wife, or thrise defloure his Brothers daughter, and no felonie at all layde to his charge. What is this in plaine words to say, but that it is lesse sinne thrise to commit aduoutry, then once to marry.

2. The seconde is to be noted, how these paynted hypocrites doe bewray their false dissembled dealinges vnawares, with whome a man might thus reason. Tell vs you Priests and votaries,* which so precisely flie the state of Matrimonie, intende you to liue chaste, and are able so to do without wiues, or do you keepe your selues chaste & honest without them, and without burning, or not? If ye be not able, why then mary you not? why take you not the remedy appointed of God? Why make you those vowes, which you can not performe? or why do you not breake them being made, falling thereby in daunger of breakyng Gods commandemēt, for keeping your owne? If you be able, and so do intend to cōtinue an honest and a continent, conuersation without wiues, then shall I aske of you, according as Doct. Turner grauely & truely layeth to your charge: why do you so carefully prouide a remedie by your lawes aforehand for a mischief to come, whiche you may auoide if ye list,* vnlesse eyther ye listed not to stand, though ye might, or else saw your owne infirmitie, that you could not though ye would? And therefore fearing your owne weake fragilitie, you prouide wisely for your selues aforehand, that where other shall suffer paynes of death at the first for well doing, you may fall thrise in abhominable adultery, and yet by the law haue your liues pardoned.

And heere commeth out your owne hypocrisie by your selues bewrayed. For where as you all confesse, that you are able to liue chaste if ye wil without wiues, this moderation of the lawe prouided before against your aduouterous incontinencie, playnely declareth that eyther ye purpose willingly to fal, or at least ye feare and stand in doubt not to be able to stand. And why then do you so confidently take such vowes vpon you, standing in such doubt and feare for the performance thereof?

And be it to you admitted that all do not fall, but that some keepe their vow,* though some viciously run to other mens wiues and daughters: then here againe I aske you, seeing these vicious whorehunters and aduouterous persons amongst you, do liue viciously (as you can not deny) and may do otherwise if they list (as you cōfesse) what punishmēt then are they worthy to haue, which may liue cōtinent and wil not, neither yet will take the remedy prouided by God, but refuse it? Which beyng so, then what iniquitie is this in you, or rather impietie inexcusable against God and man, to procure a moderation of lawes for such,* and to shew such compassion and clemēcie to these so heynous adulterers, whorehunters, and beastly fornicators, that if they adulterate other mens wiues neuer so oft, yet there is no death for them: and to shew no compassion at all, nor to finde out any moderation for such, but at the very first to kill thē as felons and heretickes, which honestly doe mary in the feare of God, or once say that a Priest may mary? How can ye heare be excused. O you children of iniquitie? What reason is in your doying, or what truth in your doctrine, or what feare of God in your harts? You that neither are able to auoyde burnyng & pollutiō without wedlocke, nor yet will receaue that remedy that the Lord hath giuen you, how will you stand in his face, whē hee shall reuele your operations and cogitations to your perpetuall confusion, vnlesse by tyme ye conuert and repent? And thus beyng ashamed of your execrable doyngs I cease to defile my penne any further in this so stinkyng matter of yours, leauyng you to the Lord.

It was declared before,* pag. 1136. that what tyme these vi. Articles were in hand in the Parliament house, Cranmer then beyng Archbyshop of Canterbury onely withstoode the same, disputyng iij. dayes agaynst them: whose reasons and Arguments I wish were extant and remaynyng. After these Articles were thus passed and concluded, the kyng, who alwayes bare especiall fauour vnto Cranmer, perceiuyng him to bee not a litle discomforted therewith sent all the Lordes of the Parlament, and with them the Lord Cromwell, to dyne with him at Lambeth (as is afore declared) and within few dayes also vpon the same, required that he would geue a note of all his doings and reasonynges in the sayd Parlament, whiche the sayd Cranmer eftsoones accomplished accordyngly,* drawyng out his reasōs & allegations, the copy wherof beyng fayre written out by his Secretary, was sent and deliuered vnto the kyng and there remayned.

Now after these thynges thus discussed as touchyng the vi. wicked Articles, it foloweth next, in returnyng to the order of our story agayne, to declare those thynges, which after the setting out of these Articles ensued, commyng now to the tyme and story of the Lord Cromwell, a man whose worthy fame and deedes are worthy to lyue renowned in perpetuall memory.

¶The history concernyng the lyfe, actes, and death of the famous and worthy Counsailour Lord Thomas Cromwell, Earle of Essex.

THomas Cromwell although borne of a simple parentage, and house obscure,* through the singular excellencie of wisdom and dexteritie of witte wrought in him by God, coupled with like industrie of mynde and desertes of lyfe, rose to hygh preferment and authoritie, in somuch that by steppes and stayres of office and honour,* he ascended at length to that, that not onely he was made Earle of Essex, but also most secret and deare Counsellour to kyng Henry, and Uicegerent vnto his person, which office hath not commonly bene supplied, at least not so fruitfully discharged with in this Realme.

First as touchyng his byrth, he was borne at Putney or thereabout, being a Smithes sonne, whose mother married after vnto a shyreman. In the simple estate & rude begynnys of this man (as of diuers other before him) we may see and learne that the excellencie of noble vertues & heroicall prowesses, which aduance to fame and honour, stād not onely vpon byrth & bloud, as priuileges onely intayled appropriat to noble houses: but are disposed indifferently & proceede of the gift of God, who rayseth vp the poore object many tymes out of the donghill, & matcheth him in throne with Peeres and Princes. Psal. 113.

As touching the order and maner of his comming vp,* it would be superfluous to discourse what may be sayd at large: onely by way of story it may suffice to giue a touch of certaine particulars, and so to proceede. Although the humble condition and pouertie of this mā was at the begynnyng (as it is to many other) a great let & hinderaūce for vertue to shew her selfe, yet such was the actiuitie and forward rypenes of nature in him so pregnaūt in witte & so ready he was, in iudgemēt discret, in tounge eloquent, in seruice faythfull, in stomacke couragious, in his penne actiue, that beyng conuersaūt in the sight of mē, he could not long be vnespied, not yet vnprouided of fauour & helpe of frēdes to set him forward in place and office. Neither was any place or office put vnto him, whereunto he was not apt & fit. Nothyng was so hard which with witte and industrie he could not cōpasse. Neither was his capacitie so Page 1178 good, but his memorie was as great in reteining whatsoeuer he had attained. Which well appeared in cannyng the text of the whole new Testament of Erasmus translation without booke, in his iourney going and comming from Rome:* whereof ye shall heare anone.

Thus in hys growing yeares, as he shot vp in age, and ripenes, a great delite came in his mynde to stray into foreine countreys, to see the world abroade, and to learne experience: whereby he learned such touns and languages, as might better serue for his vse hereafter.

And thus passing ouer his youth, being at Antwerpe, he was there reteined of the Englishe Marchauntes to be their Clerke or Secretary, or in some suche lyke condition placed pertaining to their affaires.

It happened the same time, that the Towne of Boston thought good to send vp to Rome,* for renewing of their two Pardons, one called the great Pardon, the other the lesser Pardon. Which thing although it should stand them in great expenses of money (for the Popes Marchandise is alwayes deare ware) yet notwithstanding such sweetnesse they had felt thereof,* and such gayne to come to theyr Towne by that Romish Marchandise (as all superstition is commonly gaynefull) that they like good Catholicke Marchauntes,* and the Popes good customers, thought to spare for no coste, to haue their leases agayne of theyr Pardons renewed, whatsoeuer they payde for the fine. And yet was all this good Religion then: suche was the lamentable blindnes of that time.

This then being so determined & decreed amongst my coūtreymen of Boston, to haue their pardōs needes repaired & renewed from Rome, one Geffray Chābers with an other cōpanion was sent for y^e messengers, with writings & money, no small quātity, well furnished, & with all other things appointed, necessary for so chargeable & costly exployt, who cōming in his iorney to Antwarpe, & misdoubting himselfe to be too weake for the compassing of suche a weightie peece of worke, cōferred & perswaded with Tho. Cromwell to associate him in that legacie, and to assist him in the contriuing thereof. Cromwell although perceauing the enterprise to be of no small difficultie, to traaverse the Popes Court, for the vnreasonable expenses amōgst those greedy cormorantes, yet hauing some skill of the Italian tounge, and as yet not grounded in iudgement of religion in those his youthfull daies, was at length obtained and content to giue the aduenture, and so tooke his iourney toward Rome.* Cromwell loth to spend much time, & more loth to spend his money: and againe perceiuing that the Popes greedy humor must needes be serued wyth some present or other (for without rewards there is no doing at Rome) began to cast with himselfe, what thing best to deuise, wherein he might best serue the Popes deuotion.

At length, hauing knowledge how that the Popes holy tooth greatly delited in new fangled straunge delicates, and dayntie dishes, it came in his minde to prepare certeine fine dishes of gelly, after the best fashion, made after our countrey maner heere in Englande, which to them of Rome was not knowne nor seene before.

This done, Cromwell obseruing his time accordyngly, as the Pope was newly come frō hunting into his pauillion, he with his companions approched with his english presents brought in with a three mans song (as we call it) in the English tongue, and all after y^e English fashion. The Pope sodenly marueiling at the straungenes of the song, and vnderstanding that they were Englishmen, and that they came not emptie handed, willed them to be called in. Crōwell there shewing his obediēce, & offering his iolye iunkets,* suche as Kings and Princes only (sayd he) in the realme of Englaād vse to feede vpon, desired y^e same to be accepted in beneuolent part, which he and his cōpanions as poore suters vnto his holines, had there brought and presented, as nouelties meete for his recreation, &c.

Pope Iulius seing the straungenes of the dishes, commaunded by and by his Cardinall to take the assay. Who in tasting thereof, liked it so wel, and so likewise the Pope after him, that knowing of them what their sutes were, and requiring them to make knowen the making of that meate, he incontinent without any more adoe, stamped both their pardons,* as well the greater as the lesser.

And thus was the iolye pardons of the Towne of Boston obteyned as you haue heard, for the maintenaunce of their decayed porte. The copie of which Pardons (which I haue in my handes) briefly comprehended, commeth to this effect: That all the brethren and sisters of the gylde of our Lady in S. Botulphes church at Boston,* should haue free licence to choose for their confessor or ghostly father, whome they woulde, eyther seculare Prieste, or religious person, to assoyle them plenarely from all their sinnes, except only in cases reserued to the Pope.

Also should haue licence to carry about with them an aultar stone whereby they might haue a Priest to say them Masse, or other diuine seruice, where they would, without preiudice of any other Church or Chappell, though it were also before the day, yea and at three of the clocke after midnight in the Sommer tyme.

Furthermore, that all suche breethren and sisters of the sayd gilde,* which should resort to y^e chappel of our Lady in S. Botulphes Church at the feast of Easter, Whitsontide, Corpus Christi, the Natiuitie or Assumption of our Lady, or in y^e Octaues of them, the feast of S. Michaell, and first Sondag in Lent, should haue Pardon no lesse then if they themselues personally had visited the Stations of Rome.*

Prouided that euery such person, man or woman, entring into the same gilde, at his first entraunce should giue to the finding of vij. Priests, xij. Queresters, & xiiij. beademen, and to the lightes of y^e same brotherhoode & a Grammer schole, vj. shillings viij. pence, and for euery yeare after, xij. pence.

And these premisses being before graunted by Pope Innocentius, and Pope Iulius 2. this Pope Clement also confirmed, graunting moreouer, that whatsoeuer brother or sister of the same gylde thorough pouertie, sickenes, or any other let could not resort personally to the saide chappell, notwithstanding he should be dispensed withall, as well for that, as for all other vowes, irregularities, censures Canonically whatsoeuer, only the vowe of going the Stations of Rome, and going to S. Iames of Compostella excepted, &c.

He also graunted vnto them power to receaue full remission A poena & culpa once in theyr lyfe,* or in the houre of death.

Item, that hauing their aultar stone, they mighte haue Masse sayd in any place, though it were vnhalloved.* Also in the time of interdict, to haue Masse or any Sacramente ministred: and also being departed, that they might be buried in Christen buriall notwithstanding the interdict.

Extending moreouer his graunt, that to all such breethren and sisters, in resorting to the foresayd Chappell of our Lady vpon the Natiuitie, or Assumption of our Lady, giuing supportation to the sayd Chappel, at euery such Festiuall daye, to haue full remission of all their sinnes. Or if they for any impediment could not be present at the Chappell aforesayd, yet if they came to their owne Parish Church, and there sayd one Pater noster, and Aue Maria, they should enioy the same remission aboue specified: or whosoever came euery Friday to the same Chappell, should haue as much remission, as if he went to the Chappell of our Lady called Scala coeli.

Furthermore, that whatsoeuer Christē people,* of what estate or cōdition soeuer, either spirituall or tēporal, would ayde & support the chamberlaines or substitutes of y^e foresayd gylde, should haue fiue hundreth yeares of pardon.

Item, to all brothers and sisters of the same gylde was graunted free libertie to eate in time of Lent,* or other Fasting dayes, egges, milke, butter, cheese, and also fleshe, by the counsaile of their ghostly father and phisition, without any scruple of conscience.

Item, that all partakers of the same gylde, and beyng supporters thereof, which once a quarter, or euery Friday or Saterday, either in the said Chappell in S. Botulphes Church, or any other Chappell, of their deuotion shall say a Pater noster, Aue Maria, and Creede, or shall say or cause to be sayde Masses for soules departed in paynes of Purgatory, shall not onely haue the full remission due to them which visite the Chappell of Scala Coeli, or of S. Iohn Lateran, but also the soules in Purgatory shall enioy full remission, and be released of all their paynes.

Item, that all the soules departed of the brothers and sisters of the sayde gylde:* also the soules of their fathers and mothers shall be partakers of all the prayers, suffragies, almoses, fastings, masses, and mattens, pilgrimages, and of all other good deedes of all the holy Church militant for euer, &c.

These indulgencies, pardons, grauntes, and relaxations, were geuen and graunted by Pope Nicholas the fift,* Pope Pius 2. Pope Sixtus, and Pope Iulius the second, of which Pope Iulius it seemeth, that Cromwell obteyned this Pardon aforesaide about the yeare of oure Lorde 1510. Which Pardon againe afterward through the request of King Henry, an. 1526. was confirmed by Pope Clement the seuenth. And thus much concerning the pardon of Boston, renued by the meanes of Thomas Cromwell, of Pope Iulius the second.

All this while it appeareth, that Cromwell had yet no sound taste nor iudgement of Religion, but was wylde & youthfull, without sence or regard of God and his worde as he himselfe was wont oftentimes to declare vnto Cranmer Page 1179 Archbishop of Cant. shewing what a ruffine he was in his yong dayes,* and how he was in the warres of duke Bourbon at the siege of Rome, also what a great doer he was with Geffray Chambers in publishing and setting forth the pardon of Boston euery where in Churches as he went, and so continued, till at length by learnyng the texte of the newe Testament without booke, of Erasmus translation in his going and comming from Rome (as is aforesayd) he began to be touched and called to better vnderstanding.

In this meane tyme Thomas Woolsey Cardinall of Yorke began to beare a great port in England,* and almost to rule all vnder the King, or rather with the King, so that the freshest wittes, and of best towardnes, most commonly sought vnto him. Among whome was also Thomas Cromwell to his seruice aduaunced, where he continued a certayne space of yeares,* growing vp in office and authoritie, till at length he was preferred to be sollicitour to the Cardinall.

There was also about the same tyme, or not much different, in the houshold of the sayd Cardinall, Tho. More, afterward knight and Chauncelour of England: & Steuē Gardiner Byshop after of Wint. and of the Kings Coūsaile. All these three were brought vp in one houshold, and all of one standing almost together. Whose ages as they were not greatly discrepant, nor their wittes much vnequall: so neither was their fortune and aduauncementes greatly diuers,* albeit their dispositions and studies were most contrary. And though peraduenture in More and in Gardiner there was more arte of letters, and skill of learning: yet notw^tstanding there was in this mā a more heauenly light of minde, & more prompt & perfect iudgement, eloquence equall, and as may be supposed, in thys man more pregnant: and finally in him was wrought a more heroicall and princely dispositiō, borne to greater affayres in the common wealth, and to the singular helpe of many.

It happened that in this meane season, • Cromwell was placed in this office to be sollicitour to the Cardinall, the said Cardinal had then in hand the building of certeine Colledges,* namely his Colledge in Oxforde, called then Frideswide, now Christes Church. By reason whereof, certayne small monasteries and priories, in diuers places of the realme, were by the saide Cardinall suppressed, and the lands seased to the Cardinals hāds. The doing wherof was committed to the charge of Thomas Cromwell. In the expedition whereof he shewed himselfe very forward,* and industrious, in such sort as in y^e handling thereof, he procured to himselfe much grudge with diuers of the superstitious sorte, and with some also of noble calling about the King. And thus was Cromwell first set a worke by the Cardinall, to suppress religious houses. Which was about the yeare of our Lord 1525.

As this passed on, it was not long, but the Cardinall whiche had gotten vp so high, began to come downe as fast, first from the Chauncellorship (in whiche roome was placed Sir Tho. More, as is aforesayd) then he fell into a Premunire: So that his houshold being dissolued, Tho. Cromwell amongst other, laboured also to be retheyned into the Kings seruice.

There was at the same tyme one Syr Christopher Hales Knight, Maister of the Rolles, who notwithstanding was then a mightie Papist, yet bare he suche fauour and good liking to Cromwell, that he commended him to the King, as a man most fitte for his purpose, hauing then to do against the Pope. But heere before is to be vnderstand, that Cromwel had greatly bene complained of, and diffamed by certeine of authority about the King, for hys rude maner and homely dealing in defacing the Monkes houses, & in handling of their aultars, &c. Wherefore y^e king hearing of the name of Cromwell, began to detest y^t mention of him: neither lacked there some standers by, who w^t reuiling words ceased not to encrease and inflame y^e kings hatred against him. What their names were, it shall not neede heere to recite. Among other there present at the same hearing, was the Lorde Russell Earle of Bedforde, whose life Cromwell before had preserued at Bononye, through politicke conueyance, at what time, the said Earle comming secretly in the kings affaires, was there espyed, and therefore being in great daunger to be taken, through the meanes and pollicie of Cromwell escaped.

This Lord Russell therefore not forgetting the olde benefites past, & with like grauitie willing againe to requite that he had receaued, in a vehement boldnes stode forth, to take vpon him the defence of Thomas Cromwel, vttering before the king many commendable words in the behalfe of him, and declaring withall how by his singulare deuice and policie, he had done for him at Bononie, beyng there in the Kings affaires, in extreame perill. And for as much as now his Maiestie had to do with the Pope, his great enemy, there was (he thought) in all England none so apt for the kynges purpose, which could say or do more in that matter, then could Thomas Cromwell, and partly gaue the kyng to vnderstand wherein. The kyng hearyng this, & specially markyng the latter end of his talke, was contēted and willyng to talke with him, to heare and know what he could say.

This was not so priuily done, but Cromwell had knowledge incontinent, that the kyng would talke with him, & whereupon: & therefore prouidyng before hand for matter, had in a readynesse the copie of the Byshops othe, which they vse cōmonly to make to the Pope at their consecration: and so beyng called for, was brought to the king in his garden at Westminster, which was about the yeare of our Lord. 1530.

Cromwell after most loyall obeysaūce, doying his duetie to the kyng, accordyng as he was demaunded,* made his declaration in all pointes, this especially making manifest vnto his highnes, how his Princely authoritie was abused within his own Realme, by the Pope & his Clergy, who beyng sworne vnto him, were afterward dispensed from the same, & sworne a new vnto the Pope, so that he was but as halfe kyng, and they but halfe his subiectes in his owne land: which (sayd he) was derogatorie to his crowne,* and vtterly preiudiciall to the common lawes of his Realme: Declaryng therupō how his Maiestie might accumulate to himselfe great riches, so much as all y^e Clergy in his Realme was worth, if it so pleased him to take the occasion now offered. The kyng geuyng good eare to this, and likyng right well his aduice, required, if he could auouch that which he spake. All this he could (he sayd) auouch to be certaine, so well, as that he had the copie of their owne othe to the Pope, there present to shewe, and that no lesse also he could manifestly proue, if his highnesse would geue him leaue: & therewith shewed the Byshops othe vnto the kyng.

The kyng folowyng the veyne of his counsayle, tooke his ryng of his finger, & first admittynge him into his seruice,* sent him therewith to the Conuocation house among the Byshops. Cromwell commynge with the kynges signet boldly into the Clergy house, and there placynge himselfe among the Byshops (W. Warham beyng then Archbyshop) begā to make his Oration, declaryng to them the authoritie of a kyng, and the office of subiectes, and especially the obedience of Byshops & Churchmen vnder publicke lawes, necessarily prouided for the profite & quyet of the cōmon wealth. Which lawes notwithstanding they had all transgressed, & highly offended in derogation of the kynges royall estate, fallyng in the law of Premunire, in that not onely they had consented to the power Legatiue of the Cardinall,* but also in that they had all sworne to the Pope, contrary to the fealtie of their soueraigne Lord the kyng, & therefore had forfeited to the kyng all their goodes, cattels, landes, possessions, and whatsoever liuynge they had. The Byshops hearyng this, were not a litle amased, and first began to excuse and deny the fact. But after that Cromwell had shewed them the very copie of their othe made to the Pope at their cōsecration, and the matter was so playne, that they could not deny it, they begā to shrink, and to fall to entreatie, desirynge respite to pause vpon the matter. Notwithstanding the end thereof fell so out, that to be quite of that Premunire, by Act of Parliament, it cost them to the kyng for both the prouinces, Canterbury and Yorke, no lesse then .118840. poundes, whiche was about the yeare of our Lord. 1530. whereof before you may read more at large, pag. 1020.

After this. an. 1522. Syr Thomas Cromwell growynge in great fauour with the kyng,* was made Knight & Maister of the kynges Iewel house, & shortly after was admitted also into the kynges Coūsaile, which was about the commynge in of Queene Anne Bullen. Furthermore, within two yeares after the same. an. 1524. he was made Maister of the Rolles, Doct. Taylor beyng discharged.

Thus Cromwel springynge vp in fauour and honour, after this, in the yeare .1527. a litle before the byrth of kyng Edward, was made Knight of the Garter,* & not long after, was aduanced to the Earledome of Essex, and made great Chamberlaine of England. Ouer and besides all which honours, he was constitute also Uicegerent to the kyng, representynge his person. Whiche office although it standeth well by the law, yet seldome hath there bene sene any besides this Cromwell alone, either to haue susteined it, or els to haue so furnished the same with counsayle and wisdom, as Cromwell did. And thus much hytherto cōcernynge the steppes and degrees of the Lord Cromwells risynge vp to dignitie and high estate.

Now somewhat would be sayd likewise of the noble Page 1180 Actes, the memorable examples, and worthy vertues not drowned by ease of honour in him, but encreased rather, & quickened by aduancemēt of authority & place, to work more abundantly in the common wealth. Among y^t which his woorthy actes and other manyfolde vertues, in this one chiefly aboue all other riseth his commendation,* for his singular zeale and laborious trauaile bestowed in restoring the true Church of Christ, and subuerting the Synagogue of Antichrist, the Abbeyes, I meane, and religious houses of Friars and Monkes. For so it pleased almighty God by the meanes of the said Lord Cromwell, to induce the King to suppress first the Chauntries, then the Friars houses and small Monasteries, till at length all the Abbeyes in England both great and lesse, were vtterly ouerthrowne and pluckt vp by the rootes. The which acte and enterprise of him, as it may geue a president of singular zeale to all Realmes christened, which no Prince yet to this day scarce dare folow: so to this Realme of Englande it wrought such benefit & commoditie, as the fruite thereof yet remayneth, and will remayne still in the Realme of Englande, though we seeme little to feele it. Rudely and simply I speake what I suppose, without preiudice of other which can inferre any better reason. In the meane time my reason is this: that if God had not raised vp thys Cromwell as he did, to be the instrument of rooting out of the Abbeyes and Celles of straunge religion,* what other men see, I know not: for my part I neuer yet saw in thys Realme any such Cromwell since Cromwells time, whose hart and courage might not sooner haue bene subuerted with the money and bribes of Abbots, then he to haue subuerted any Abbey in all England.

But heere I must of necessitie answeare the complaynt of certayne of our countrey men. For so I heare of many, the subuersion of these Monasteries to be reprehended,* as euill and wicked. The building (say they) mighte haue bene conuerted vnto schooles and houses of learning. The goodes and possessions might haue bene bestowed to much better and more godly vse of the poore, and mainteining of hospitalitie. Neyther do I denie, but that these thyngs are well and godly spoken of them, and could willingly embrace their opinion with my whole hart, if I did not consider heerein a more secret and deeper meaning of Gods holy prouidence, then at the first blush peradventure to all men doth appeare.

And first to omit the wicked and execrable life of these religious orders,* ful of al feditie, & found out by the Kings visitours, and in their Registers also recorded, so horrible to be heard, so incredible to be beleueed, so stinking before the face of God and man, that no maruayle it is if Gods vengeance from heauen prouoked, woulde not suffer anye stone or monument of these abhominable houses to be vnplucked vp. But (as I sayd) letting these things passe vnder chaste silence, whiche for very shame will abhorre any storie to disclose: let vs now come to the first institution of these orders and houses of Monkerie, and consider howe and to what end they were first instituted and erected here among the Saxons, at the first foundation of them, about the time 666.

In the former parte of thys Hystorie, declaration was made before,* page 133.134. first by whome, and at what time these Monkish houses heere in England among the Saxons (flowing no doubt out of the order of Saint Benet,* and brought in by Augustine) began first to be founded, as by Augustine the Monke, Furseus, Medulphus, Aidanus, Ceadda, king Ulferus, Oswius, Elfreda, King Oswys daughter, Kineburga, Hilda, Botulphus, Edeldreda, King Oswald, Edgar, Erkenewaldus Bishop, Ethelwoldus Bishop of Winchester, Osketellus Archbishop of Yorke, Oswaldus Bishop of Worcester, Leswinus Byshop of Dorcester, Dunstane, and diuers other.

The end and final cause why they were builded, appeareth in stories to be,* pro remissione & redemptione peccatorum: pro remedio & liberatione animae: pro amore coelestis patriae: in eleemosinam animae: in remissionem criminum: pro salute Regnorum: pro salute & requie animarum patrum & matrum, fratrum, & sororum nostrarum parentum, & omnium benefactorum: in honorem gloriosae Virginis, &c. As may appeare in auncient histories, in olde Charters and donations vnto religious houses, and in the Chronicle of Ingulphus, as also all other stories be full of the same.

So King Ethelstane for killing his brother Edwyne, builded two Monasteries,* Midleton, and Michelneye, for his soule, page. 152. Which doctrine and institution, for so much as it tendeth and soundeth directly against the foundation of Christian religion, against the Testamēt of God, the Gospel of Iesus Christ, the freedome of our redemption, and free iustification by fayth, it is therfore to be condēned as execrable and horrible, as euil or worse then the life of the persons, and not only worthy to be suppressed to the foundation, but to be maruelled rather that God woulde suffer it to stand so long.* Albeit Gods mighty vengeance and scourge hath not ceased from time to time, to worke againste suche impious foundations from the time of theyr first setting vp. For besides the inuasions of the Danes, (whiche may seeme to be stirred vp of God, especially for the subuersion of Abbeyes) let old hystories be searched, what Monasterie almost in all this Realme, was eyther leaft by the Danes, or reedified agayne after the Danes, but by some notorious casualty of fire sent by Gods hand, it hath bene burnt vp.

First, the Monasterie of Caunterbury,* called the house of S. Gregory, was burnt, an. 1145. and afterward againe burnt, an. 1174. Ex hist. Geruasij.

The Abbey of Croyland also was twise burnt. Ex hist. Ingulphi.

The Abbey of Peterborow twise set on fire, an. 1070. Ex Chron. Peterb.

The Abbey of S. Maries in Yorke burnt, with the hospitall also.

The Abbey of Norwich burnt.

The Abbey of S. Edmunds Bury burnt and destroyed. Ex Chron. S. Edmund.

The Abbey of Worcester burnt.

The Abbey of Glocester was also burnt.

The Abbey of Chichester burnt.

The Abbey of Glastenbury burnt.

The Abbey of S. Mary in Southwarke burnt.

The Church of the Abbey at Beuerley burnt.

The steeple of the Abbey of Euesham burnt.

These, with many other monasteries mo,* God brought downe to the ground, so that few or none of all the Monasticall foundations in all England, either before the Conquest escaped the hands of the Danes and Scottes, or else after the Conquest escaped destruction of fire, and that not without ius•••use deserued:* for as the trade of their lyues was too too wretched and bestiall, so the profession of theyr doctrine was intollerable, fraught with all superstition, full of much Idolatrie, and vtterly contrary to the grace of the Gospell and doctrine of Christ.

Furthermore, the more these Abbeyes multiplied, and the longer they continued, in time the more corruption still they drew vnto them. And albeit we reade the name of Monkes to haue continued from the old auncient time, yet notwithstanding the Monkes of those dayes were not like to the Monkes of our time, nor their houses then, like to our Abbeyes now. So we reade of the Monkes of Bangor before the comming of Augustine: but those Monkes got their liuing with toyle and labour of theyr hands, and had no other lands nor lordships to liue vpō.* Againe, neither were they as Ministers then, but as Laye men: according as Hierome describeth the Monkes of his time, sayeng: Monachus non docentis, sed plangentis habet officium. And againe he sayeth: Alia causa est Monachi, alia Clerici. Clerici oues pascunt. Ego pascor. That is, A Monkes office is not to preache, but to mourne. The state of a Monke is one thing, and the state of a Priest is another. Priestes feede the flocke of Christ. I am fedde, &c.

Also in the storie of Ingulphus Abbot of Croylande,* thus I finde, an. 1075. In Croylandiam primum installatus inueni tunc in isto Monasterio Croylandési Monachos numero, 62. Quorum quatuor laici fratres erant, praeter aliorum Monasteriorum Monachos nostri capituli conprofessos, &c. That is,*Being installed in the Abbey of Croyland, I found there to the number of lxij. Monkes. Of which Monkes, foure of them were laye breethren, besides the Monkes of other Monasteries, which were also professed to our Chapter, &c.

The like matter also appeareth in the fourth Canon of the Councell of Chalcedon,* where it is prouided Ne Monachi se Ecclesiasticis negotijs immisceant, &c. Et Leo Epist. 62. Vetat Monachos & laicos etsi scientiae nomine glorientur, admitti ad officium docendi & concionandi. Whereof reade more page. 154.

Thus it appeareth about or before the time of Hierome, that Monkes in the firste persecutions of the Primitiue Church were lay men, and companies of Christians associating themselves together,* eyther for feare of persecution, or for eschewing the company of heathen Gentiles. Afterward in continuance of time, when the Gentiles began to be called to Christianitie, the monkes yet keeping theyr name, & growing in superstition, woulde not ioyne with other Christians, but keepe still their brotherhoodes, diuiding themselves from other Christians, and professing a kinde of life straunge and diuers from the common trade. Upō this diuersitie of life and profession, folowed also like diuersitie of garments and attire differing from their other breethren. After this moreouer came in the rule of S. Page 1181 Benedict, enioyning to them a prescribed forme of goyng, of wearing, of watching, sleeping, rising, praying, of silēce, sole life and diet, and all thinges almost differing from the vulgar sort of common Christians.

Whereby men seeing theyr austerity, beganne to haue them in great admiration.* And thus growing vp in opini|on of ho••nes, of lay men and laborers they came at length to be Clergy men, and greatest doers of all other in Christes religion: In so much that at last there was none reputed almost for a religious man or perfect christian vnles he were a monke: neither almost was any aduaūced to any dignity of the Church, but either he was a monke, or afterward he put on a monkes weede: According as in the stories of this Realme is to be seene, howe in the tyme of Dunstane Archbishop of Canterbury,* of Ethelwold Byshop of Worcester, and of Oswald Bishop of Winchester, Pope Iohn. 13. writing to king Edgar, willed him in hys letters, to see in his Cathedrall Churches none to be promoted to be Bishops, but such as were of the Monasticall religion, and willed him moreouer to exclude the secular prebendaries at Winchester, and to place in Monkes, and that none of the secular Clerkes there should be chosen bishop, but either taken out of the same Couent of that church, or of some other Abbey.

So was also king Henry the second commaūded to do in the house of Waltham,* where the secular Canons were remoued out, and regular Canons intruded. The same did Oswald Bishop with the Church of Worcester, likewise in their Sees did Dunstane Archbishop of Canterbury, Osketellus Archbishop of York, Ethelwold Bishop of Worcester (who in storye is reported to be Multorum fundator Monasteriorum,) Leswinus also Bishop of Dorchester, with other Bishops moe about the time and raig of king Edgar. •do Archbishop of Caunterbury before Dunstane, an. 934. after his election refused to take that dignity vpon him, before he had receiued the habite of a monk in the Abbey of Florence in Fraunce, because as the story telleth (if it be true) Nullus ad id tempus nisi monachali schemate indutus,* Archiepiscopus fuisset. &c. That is, Because all the Archbishops of Caunterbury before him, had bene Monkes. &c. In like maner Baldwinus also an. 1114. after he was elected Archb. of Canterbury, tooke vpon him the habite and profession of Mereton Abbey. And so did Reginaldus his next successor after him. &c.

As concerning therfore the origene of Monks, ye haue heard how first they began of lay mē onely, leading a straiter life from the society of other persons, who then folowing the rule of S Benet, were called regulars & votaries, and yet all this while had nothing to do with any Ecclesiasticall ministry, til the time of Pope Bonifacius y^e fourth an. 606. who then made a decree, that monkes might vse the office of preaching, of the christening, of hearing confessions and assoyling thē of their sinnes, differing from priestes onely in this, that they were called Regulares, and priestes were called Seculares, the monkes were votaries, the priestes had free liberty to haue wiues, til the time of Lanfranke and Anselme, as is aforesayd. Albeit Athanasius in his Epistle Ad Dracontium, witnesseth also, that he knewe Monkes in the olde time and Bishops, which were marryed and had children. Furthermore, as ignorance & superstition with time encreased, so the number and swarme of monkes still more and more multiplied, in such sort, as not onely they thrust out secular Priestes frō their houses, but also out of them were made, Popes, Cardinalles, Archbishops, and Bishops, to gouerne Churches. Of which nūber began Austen the first Archbishop of the See of Cant. and the most part of all other Archbishops after him, vntill the time of the Conquest, and after.

All this while the Friers were not yet come, neyther the discipline of S. Dominike,* nor the Testament of S. Fraunces, nor the order of the Austen brothers, nor of the Carmelites was yet heard of. Which last of all came in w^t theyr pageans, and played theyr part likewise, an. 1220. being much more full of hipocrisy, blindnesse, Idolatry, and superstition, then were the monkes: So that, what with monkes of y^e one side, & w^t the friers, of the other side while all thinges were ruled by the Rules of S. Benet, by y^e Canons of the Pope, by the doctrine of S. Dominike, and by the Testament of S. Fraunces, Christes Testament was trode vnder foote, the rule of Gods word neglected, true Christian religion defaced, fayth forgotten, the right way of saluation abolished, sound doctrine oppressed, Christes seruants persecuted, and the peoples soules vncomforted: yea and the true Church of Christ almost cleane extirped, had not almighty God (who can not forgette his promise, prouided remedy in time, in raysing vp this Cromwel his seruaunt, and other like champions, to cut vppe from the roote of the houses of them, which otherwise would vtterly haue rooted vp the house of the Lord, & had subuerted a great part already.

Wherefore, whosoeuer findeth himselfe agreeued with Cromwels doinges in suppressing these Monasteryes of Monkes and Fryers, let him wisely consider with hymselfe, first the doctrine, lawes and traditions of these men, which he shall find rebelling to the religion of Christ,* pernicious to our saluation, derogatory to Christes glory, full of much blasphemy and damnable idolatry. Secondly, let him likewise wel aduise the horrible and execrable liues of these Cloysterers, or at y^e least search out the rolles and registers of matters found out by inquisition in king Henry the eight his dayes, agaynst them: which here is not to be spoken of, vnles we will speake as Mathew Paris speaketh of the Court of Rome: Cuius foetor vsque ad nubes fumum teterrimum exhalabat: That is, Whose filthy stinch (saith he) did breath vp a most pestiferous fume, euen vnto the cloudes of heauen. &c.

All which thinges well considered,* what maruell is it then, if God of his iust iudgement did set vp the foresayde Lord Cromwell to destroy these sinfull houses, whō they owne corruptions could suffer no longer to stand? And as touching the dissipation of theyr landes and possessions to the handes of such as they were bestowed vpon: if it so pleased the king in bestowing those Abbey landes vpon his Nobles and Gentlemen,* either to restore them againe vnto them from whence they came, or els to gratifie hys nobility, by that meanes of pollicye not to mislike his doings, what is that to Cromwel? But they might (say you) haue bene much better employed to other more fruitfull vses. Briefely to aunswere thereunto, what may be done presently in a common wealth, is not enough to say: but what may also folow must be considered. If thys throwing downe of Abbeyes had happened in such free and reformed cities or cuntryes, as are amongst the Germanes, where the state gouerned & directed by lawes, rather then by rulers, remayneth alwayes alike and vnmutable, who doubteth but such houses there standing still, y^e possessions might well be transposed to such vses abouesayd, without any feare or perill? But in suche Realmes and Kingdomes as this, wher Lawes and Parliamentes be not alwayes one, but are subiect to the disposition of the prince: neither is it certayne alwayes what Princes maye come: y^e surest way therfore to send Monkerie & Popery packing out of the realme, is to doe with their houses and possessions as king Henry here did, through y^t motion of y^e counsell of Cromwell. For els who seeth not in Queene Maries time, if either the houses of monkes had stand or their landes had bene otherwise disposed then into the handes of such as they were, how many of them had bene restored & replenished agayn w^t monkes & fryers, in as ample wise as euer they were? And if Dukes, Barons and the Nobilities scarce were able to retayne the landes and possessions of Abbeyes distributed to them by king Henry, from the deuotion of Queene Mary, seeking to build agayne the walles of Hierico, what then shoulde the meaner sorte haue done, let other men coniecture. Wherefore it is not vnlike, but that Gods heauenly prouidence did well foresee and dispose these thinges before by this man,* in workyng the destruction of these Abbeyes: whereupon, as often as he sent out any men to suppress any monasterie, hee vsed commonly to send them with this charge, that they shuld throw downe those houses euen to the foundation.

Which wordes although may seeme percase to some to be cruelly spoken of hym: yet contrariwise doe I suppose the doing thereof not to be without Gods speciall prouidence and secret guiding: Or els we might peraduenture haue had suche swarmes of fryers and monkes possessed in theyr nestes agayne, before this day in England, in so great a number, that tenne Cromwels afterward vnneth should haue suffered to haue vnoused them.

Wherefore, if the plantation which the Lord God neuer planted, be pluckt vp by the rootes,* let God alone wyth his working, and let the monasteries goe.

Now that you haue seene, what this Malleus Monachorum hath done in defacing the Sinagogue of the pope:* let vs see how the sayd Cromwell againe did trauayle in setting vp Christes church and congregation.

After that the bishop of Romes power and authoritye was banished out of England, the bishops of his sect neuer ceased to seeke all occasion, how eyther to restore hys head agayne, being broken and wounded,* or at the least to keepe vpriht those thinges which yet remayned: wherein although theyr labours were not altogether frustrate, yet had they brought much more to passe, if Cromwell (as a mighty wall and defence of the church) had not resisted con|tinually theyr enterprises.

It happened, that after the abolishing of the Pope, Page 1182 certayne tumultes began to rise about religion. Wherupō it seemed good vnto king Henry, to appoynt an assemblie of learned men and Bishops,* which should soberly & modestly entreat and determine those thinges which perteyned vnto Religion. Briefely, at the kinges pleasure all the learned men, but specially the Bishops assembled, to whō this matter seemed chiefly to belong. Cromwell thought also to be present himselfe with the Byshoppes, who by chaunce meeting with Alexander Alesius by the way, a Scottish man, brought him with him to the conuocation house, where all the Bishoppes were assembled together. Which was in the yeare .1537. The Bishops and Prelates attending vppon the comming of Cromwell, as he was come in, rose vp, and did obeysaunce to him as to their vicar generall, and he agayn saluted euery one in theyr degree, and sate downe in the highest place at the table, according to his degree and office, and after him euery bishop in his order, and Doctours. First ouer agaynst him sate the Archb. of Canterbury, then the Archbishop of Yorke, the bishops of London, Lincolne, Salisbury, Bath, Ely, Herford, Chychester, Norwich, Rochester and Worcester. &c. There Cromwel in y^e name of the king (whose most deare and secret Counsellour at that present he was, and Lorde priuy Seale, and vicar generall of the realme) spake these wordes in maner folowing.

RIght reuerend fathers in Christe: The kinges maiesty geueth you high thanks that ye haue so diligently without any excuse,* assembled hither according to his commaūdemēt. And ye be not ignoraunt that ye be called hither to determine certayne controuersies, which at this time be moued concerning the christian Religion and fayth, not onely in this Realme, but also in all nations through the world. For the king studyeth day and nyght to set a quietnesse in the Church, and he can not rest, vntill all such controuersies be fully debated and ended, through the determination of you & of his whole Parliament. For although his speciall desire is to set a stay for the vnlearned people, whose cōsciēces are in doubt what they may beleue: and he himselfe by his excellent learning, knoweth these controuersies wel enough, yet he will suffer no common alteration, but by the consent of you and of his whole Parliamēt. By the which thing ye may perceiue both his high wisdom, and also his great loue toward you. And he desireth you for Christes sake, that all malice obstinacy, and carnall respecte set apart ye will frendly and louingly dispute among your selues, of the controuersies moued in the Church,* and that ye will conclude all thinges by the woord of God, without all brawling or scolding: neither will his maiesty suffer the Scripture to be wrasted and defaced by any Gloses, any papisticall Lawes, or by any authority of Doctours or Counsellors, and much lesse will he admitte any articles or doctrine, not conteyned in the Scripture, but approued onely by continuaunce of time and olde custome, and by vnwritten verities, as ye were wont to do. Ye know wel enough that ye be bound to shew this seruice to Christ and to his Church, and yet notwithstanding his maiestye will geue you high thanks, if ye will sette and conclude a godly and a perfect vnity: whereunto this is the onely way and meane, if ye wil determine all thinges by the Scripture, as God commaundeth you in Deuteronomie, whiche thing hys maiesty exhorteth and desireth you to do.

When Cromwel had ended this his Oration, the Byshops rose vp altogether, geuing thanks vnto the kings maiesty, not for his great zeale toward the church of christ and also for his most godly exhortation, worthy so Christian a prince.

Immediately they rose vp to disputation, where as Stokesly Bishop of London, first of all, being the moste earnest champion & maynteyner of the Romish Decrees, (whō Cromwel a litle before had checked by name, for defending vnwritten verities) endeuoured himselfe with all his labour and industry, out of the olde Schole Gloses, to maynteyne the seuen Sacramentes of the Church.* The Archb. of Yorke, Lincolne, Bath, Chichester, & Norwiche also fauoured his part and sect. On the contrary part, was the Archb. of Canterbury, the Bishops of Salisbury, Ely, Harford, and Worcester, with many other.

After much communication had on either part, & that they had long contended about the testimonies of the Doctors, which as it seemed vnto them, dissented & disagreed among themselues, the Archbishop of Caunterbury at the last spake and sayd thus vnto them.

IT besemeth not men of learning and grauity to make much babling and brawling,*about bare wordes, so that we agree in the very substance & effect of the matter. For to brawle about words is the property of Sophisters & such as meane deceit & subtlety, which delight in the debate and dissension of the world, & in the miserable state of the Church: and not of them whiche shoulde seeke the glory of Christ,*and should study for the vnitie & quietnes of the Church. There be waighy controuersies nowe •oued and put forth not of ceremonies and light thinges, but of the true vnderstanding, and of the right difference of the lawe and of the Gospell: of the maner and waye how sinnes bee forgeuen of comforting doubtfull and wauering consciences, by what meanes they may be certified, that they please God,*seeing they feele the strength of the lawe, accusing them of sinne: of the true vse of the Sacramentes, whether the outward worke of thē doth iustifie man, or whether we receaue our iustification by fayth. Item, which be the good workes, and the true seruice and honour which pleaseth God: and whether the choyse of meates, the difference of garmentes, the vowes of Monkes and priestes, and other traditions which haue no worde of God to confirme the•: whether these (I say) be right good workes, and suche as make a perfect Christian man or no. Item, whether vayne seruice, and false honouring of God, and mans traditions, doe binde mens consciences, or no? Finally, whether the ceremony of confirmation, of orders, and of annealing,*and such other (whiche cannot be proued to be institute of Christ, nor haue anye worde in them to certifie vs of remission of sinnes) ought to be called Sacraments, and to be compared with Baptisme and the supper of the Lord or no?

These be no light matters, but euen the principall poyntes of our Christian religion. Wherefore we contēd not about words and titles, but about high and earnest matters. Christ saith. Blessed be the peacemakers,* for they shalbe called the sonnes of God. And Paule writing vnto Timothie, commaunded Byshops to auoyde brawling and contention about wordes, whych be profitable to nothing but vnto the subuersion and destructiō of the hearers: and monisheth him specially, that he should resist with the scriptures whē any man disputeth with him of the fayth: and he addeth a cause wheras he sayth: Doing this thou shalt preserue both thy selfe, & also them which heare thee: Now if ye will folow these Counsellors, Christ and Paul, all contentiō and brawling about words must be set apart, and ye must stablish a godly and a perfecte vnity and concorde out of the Scripture. Wherefore in this disputatiō, we must first agree of the number of the Sacramentes, and what a Sacrament doth signify in the holye scripture, & when we call Baptisme & the Supper of the lord,* Sacramentes of the Gospell, what we meane thereby. I know right well, that S. Ambrose and other Authors call the washing of the Disciples feete and other thinges, Sacramentes: which I am sure you your selues woulde not suffer to be numbred among the other Sacramentes.

When he had ended his Oration, Cromwel commaunded Alesius which stode by (whome he perceiued to geue attentiuē eare to that which was spokē) to shew his mind and opinion, declaring to the Bishops before, that he was the kinges scholer, and therefore desired them to be contented to heare him indifferently.

Alesius after he had first done his duety vnto the Lord Cromwell, and to the other Prelates of the Church, sayde in this wise.

Right honorable & noble Lord, and you most reuerend Fathers and Prelates of the Church,* although I come vnprepared vnto this disputatiō yet trusting in the ayd of Christ which promiseth to geue both mouth and wisdom vnto vs when we be required of our fayth, I wil vtter my sentence and iudgement of this disputation. And I thinke that my Lord Archbishop hath geuen you a profitable exhortation, that ye should first agree of the signification of a Sacrament, whether ye will call a sacrament, a ceremony institute of Christ in the gospell, to signify a special or a singuler vertue of the gospell, and of godlines (as Paule nameth remission of sinnes to be) or whether ye meane,* euery ceremony generally, which may be a tokē or a signification of an holy thing, to be a sacrament. For after this latter signification, I will not sticke to graunt you that there be seuen Sacramentes and more too, if ye wyll. But yet Paul seemeth to describe a sacrament after the iust signification, where as he sayth: That Circumcision is a token & a seale of the righteousness of fayth. This definitiō of one particular sacrament, must be vnderstand to pertain vnto all sacramentes generally,* for the Iewes had but one Sacrament onely, as all the sophistical writers do graūt. And he described Baptisme after the same maner, in the fiftē to the Ephesians, whereas he sayth. That Christ doth sanctify the Church (that is to say,* all that be baptised through the bath of water in the word of life. For here also he addeth the word & promise of God vnto the ceremonye. And Christ also requireth fayth, where he sayth: Who so euer beleueth, and is baptised, shalbe saued.

And S. Augustine describeth a Sacrament thus: The word of God comming vnto the element, maketh the sacrament. And in an other place he sayth: A sacrament is a thing wherin Page 1183 the power of God,* vnder the forme of visible thinges, doth worke secretly saluation. And the Mayster of the Sentences doth describe a Sacrament no otherwyse. A Sacrament (sayth he) is an inuisible grace, and hath a visible forme: and by this inuisible grace, I meane (sayth he) remission of sinnes. Finally Saynt Thomas denyeth that any man hath authority to institute a Sacrament. Now if ye agree vnto this definition of a Sacrament, it is an easie thing to iudge of the number of those Sacraments which haue the manifest word of God, and be institute by Christ to signify vnto vs the remission of our sinnes.

S. Augustine sayth, that there be but two such Sacramentes, in the cxviij. Epistle to Ianuarius. His wordes be these: *First, I would haue thee to vnderstand the summe and effect of this disputation, which is this: that our Lord Iesus Christ (as he he himselfe sayth in the Gospell) hath ladē vs, but with a light and easy yoke or burden. Wherefo•e he hath knit together the felowship of his new people with Sacraments, *very few in nūber, very easy to be kept: & very excellent in signification, which be Baptisme, and the Supper of the Lord, and such other, if there be any moe commaunded in the holye Scripture, those excepte which were burdens for the seruitude of the people in the olde law, for the hardnes of theyr hartes. &c. And agayne in the iij. book of the learning of a Christian man, *he sayth: The Scripture hath taught vs but few signes, as be the Sacrament of Baptisme, and the solemne celebration and remembraunce of the body and bloud of the Lord. &c.

Then the Bishop of London which could scarsly refrayne himselfe all this while, and now could forbear no longer, *brake out in this maner. First of al (saith he) where you alledge, that all the Sacramēts which are in y^e church instituted by Christ himselfe, haue eyther some manyfest ground in the Scriptures, or ought to shew forth some sig'nification of remission of sinnes, it is false and not to be allowed.

Then sayd Alesius, that he would proue it, not only by manifest authority of scriptures, but also by euident testimonies of auncient Doctors and scholewriters.

*But the Bishop of Herford which was then lately returned out of Germany (where he had bene Ambassadour for the king to the Protestantes) being moued with the bishop of Londons frowardnes, turning himselfe first to Alexander Alesius, *willed him not to contend with the Byshop in such maner, by the testimonies of Doctors & schole men, forsomuch as they doe not all agree in like matters, neither are they stedfast among themselues in all poyntes, but do vary and in many poyntes are vtterly repugnant. Wherefore if this disputation shalbe decided by their minds and verdites, there shalbe nothing established neither shal appeare any way of agrement to follow. Furthermore we be cōmaunded by the king that these controuersies should be determined onely by the rule and iudgement of y^e scripture. This he spake vnto Alesius. Then he turning himselfe vnto the Bishops, likewise admonished them with a graue and sharpe Oration, which we thought not good to omit in this place.

Thinke ye not (sayd he) that we can by any Sophisticall subtilties steale out of the world agayne, *the light which euery man doth see. Christ hath so lightned the worlde at this time, that the light of the Gospell hath put to flight all misty darckenesse, and it wil shortly haue the higher hand of all clouds, though we resist in vayn neuer so much. The lay people do now know the holy scripture better then many of vs. *And the Germanes haue made the text of the Bible so playne and easie by the Hebrue and Greeke tongue that now many thinges may be better vnderstand without any gloses at all, then by all the commentaries of the Doctours. *And moreouer they haue so opened these controuersyes by theyr writings, that women and children may wonder at the blindnesse and falsehood that hath bene hitherto. Wherefore ye must consider earnestly, what ye will determine of these controuersies, that ye make not your selues to be mocked and laughed to scorne of al the world, and that ye bring them not to haue this opinion of you,*to thinke euer more hereafter, that ye haue neyther one sparke of learning, nor yet of godlines in you. And thus shall ye loose all your estimation and authority with them, which before tooke you for learned men, and profitable members vnto the common wealth of Christendome. For that whiche you doe hope vpon, that there was neuer heresy in the Church so great, but that processe of time with the power and authority of the Pope hath quenched it,*it is nothing to the purpose. But ye must turne your opinion, and thinke this surely, that there is nothing so feeble and weake, so that it be true, but it shall finde place, and be able to stand agaynst all falshood.

Truth is the daughter of time, & time is the mother of trueth. And whatsoever is besieged of truth,*cannot long continue, and vpon whose side truth doth stand, that ought not to be thought trāsitory, or that it will euer fall.*All things cōsist not in paynted eloquence and strength or authority. For the trueth is of so great power, strength & efficacy, that it can neither be defended wyth wordes, not to be ouercome with any strength,but after she hath hidden her selfe long, at length she putteth vp her head and appeareth, as it is written in Esdras: A king is strong, wine is stronger, yet women be more strong, but truth excelleth all.

To this effect in a maner, & much more, did he speake and vtter in that conuocation, both copiously and discretly Through whose Oration, Alesius being encouraged, proceded further, to vrge the Bishop with this argument.

The Argument in forme.

- Ba- Sacramentes bē seales ascerteyning vs of Gods good wil:*
- ro- Without the word there is no certaynty of Gods good will:
- co. Ergo, without the word there be no Sacraments.

The first part of this reason is S. Paules owne saying, the fourth to the Romanes, where he sayth: That circumcision is a token and a seale of the righteousnes of fayth. Ergo, it requireth faith to certify mans hart of the will of god.* But the word of God is the foundation of fayth as Saint Paule witnesseth. Rom. 10. Fayth commeth by hearing, and hearing commeth by the worde of God.* For the minde must be taught & instructed to y^e will of God by the word, like as the eye is taught and instructed by the outward ceremony. And so Paule by that saying confuteth this opinion,* that the Sacramentes should make men righteous & iust before God, for y^e very outward work, without faith of them that receiue them.

And after this manner doth Paule speake vnto the Ephesians:* that Christ doth sanctify his church through the bath of water in the word of life. And for as much as he ioyⁿeth the word vnto the ceremony, and declareth the vertue and power of the word of God,* that it bringeth with it life, he doth manifestly teach that the word of God is the principall thing, and euen as it were the very substaunce & body of the Sacrament: and the outward ceremony to be nothing els then a token of that liuely inflammation whych we receiue through fayth in the word and promise. Saint Paule also in ministring the sacrament of the Lordes supper, doth manifestly adde the woordes of Christ: He tooke bread (sayth he) and when he had geuen thanks, he brake it and sayd, take ye this, and eate ye this, for it is my body. Item, Do ye this in my remembrance.* Beside this he teacheth euidently y^e onely Christ and none but he had power to institute a sacrament: & that neither the Apostles, nor the Church hath any authority to alter or to adde any thing vnto his ordynauce, whereas he saith: For I haue receiued of the Lord that which I deliuered vnto you. &c. To what purpose shoulde he go about to mooue the people to beleue him and to winne theyr hartes with this protestation, if it had bene lawefull for him to haue made any sacramentes, or to haue altered the forme and maner of ministring this sacramēt, as some men both wickedly and shamelesly do affirme, that the Apostles did alter the forme of Baptisme.

When he had spoken thus much,* the B. of Londō dyd interrupt him, and sayd: Let vs graūt that the sacraments may be gathered out of the word of God, yet are you farre deceiued, if ye think that there is none other word of God, but that which euery sowter and cobler doe reade in theyr mother tongue. And if ye thinke that nothing pertayneth vnto the Christian fayth, but that onely that is written in the Bible, then erre ye playnely with the Lutherans.* For S. Iohn sayth: that Iesus did many thinges which be not written. And S. Paul commaundeth the Thess. to obserue and keep certeine vnwritten traditions & ceremonies.* 2. Thes. 2. Moreouer he himselfe did preach not the scripture onely but euen also the traditions of the Elders. Act. xvj. Finally we haue receiued many things of the Doctors & Councels by times, which although they be not written in the Bible, yet for as much as the olde Doctors of the Churche do make mention of them, we ought to graunt that we re'ceiued them of the Apostles, and that they be of like authority with the Scripture, and finally that they may worthi'ly be called the word of God vnwritten.

Now when the right noble Lord Cromwell,* the Archbishop, with the other Bishops, which did defend the pure doctrine of the gospel, heard this, they smiled a litle one vpō another, forasmuch as they saw him flee euen in y^e very beginning of the disputation, vnto his old rusty sophistry and vnwritten verities. Then Alesius would haue proceded further with the Bishop to haue confuted this blasphemous lye, but the Lord Cromwell bade him be cōtent, for Page 1184 the time began to go away, and it was xij. of the clock, and thus he made an end w^t his protestation. Right reuerend mayster Bishop, you deny that our christen fayth and religion doth leane only vpō the word of God which is written in the Bible, which thing if I can proue and declare, then you will graunt me that there be no sacramentes, but those that haue the manifest word of God to confirme thē. Unto this he did consent, and then immediatly that assemble was dissolved for that day.

The next day when the Bishops were set agayne, the Archbishop of Canterbury sending his Archdeacon, commaunded Alesius to abstayne from disputation, wherupon he wrote his minde, and deliuered it vnto Cromwell, who afterward shewed the same vnto the Bishops. Thus through the industry of Cromwell, the colloquies were brought to this end, that albeit religiō could not wholly be reformed, yet at that time there was some reformation had throughout all England.

How desirous and studious this good Cromwel was in y^e cause of Christs religiō,* exāples need not to be broght. His whole life was nothing els, but a continuall care and trauell how to aduaunce and further the right knowledge of the Gospell, and reforme the house of God: As by so many Proclamations aboue specified by his meanes set forth, may well appeare, wherein first he caused the people to be instructed in the Lordes Prayer, and Creede in English, then procured the Scripture also to be read and set forth in the same language, for euery English man to vnderstand: after that to rescue the vulgar people from damnable Idolatry, caused certaine of the most grossest pilgrimages to be destroyed. And further for the more commodity of the poore sort, which get their liuing with their dayly labor & worke of their handes, he prouided that diuers idle holidayes were diminished. Item he procured for thē liberty to eate egges and whitmeat in Lent. Furthermore by him it was also prouided for y^e better instruction of the people, that beneficed•mē should be resident in their Cures and parishes, there to teach and to keepe Hospitality, with many other thinges els most fruitfully redressed for the reformation of Religion and behoofe of Christes Church: as by the Proclamatīōs,* Iniunctions, and necessary articles of Christian doctrine aboue specified, set forth in the kings name, by his meanes, may more aboundantly appeare. pag. 1069.1070. &c.

Now to adioyne withall his priuate benefites in helping diuers good men and women at sundry times out of troubles and great distresses, it would require a long discourse. Briefly his whole life was ful of such examples, being a man to that intent ordeined of God (as his deedes well proued) to do many men good, and especially such as were in daunger of persecutiō for religions sake. Amongst other infinite stories, one or two examples shall suffice for a testimony of his worthy doinges.

IN the yeare of our Lord. 1538. Syr William Formā being Maior of the citey of London, three weekes before Easter, the wyfe of one Tho. Frebarn dwel|ling in Pater noster row, being w^t childe, lōged after a morsell of a pigge, and told her minde vnto a Mayde dwelling in Abchurch lane, desiring her, if it were possible, to helpe her vnto a piece. The mayd perceiuing her earnest desire, shewed vnto her husbād, what his wife had sayd vnto her, telling him that it might chaunce to cost her her life and the childes too whiche she went withall, if she had it not. Uppon this Thomas Frebarne her husbāde spake to a butter wife which he knew, y^t dwelled at Harnsey, named goodwife Fisher, to helpe him vnto a pigge for his wife, for she was with childe, & longed sore to eate of a pigge. Unto whome the sayde goodwife Fisher promised that she would bring him one the Friday folowing, and so she did, being ready dressed and scalded before. But when she had deliuered him the pigge, she craftily conueyed one of the pigge•feete, & caried it vnto Doctor Cockes, at that time being Deane of Caunterbury, dwelling in I•y lane, who at that time of his dinner, before certain gestes which he had bidden, shewed his pigs foot, declaring who had the body therof: and after that they had talked theyr pleasure, & dinner was done,* one of his gestes being landlord vnto Frebarne aforesayd, called M. Garter, & by his office king of Armes, sent his man vnto the sayd Frebarne, demaunding if there were no body sicke in his house. Unto whom he aunswered, that they were all in good health, he gaue God thanks. Then sayde he agayne, it was tolde hys Mayster that some body was sicke, or els they would not eate flesh in Lent. Unto whom Frebarne made aunswere, that his wife was with childe, and longed for a piece of a pigge, and if he could get some for her, he would. Then departed his Landlordes man home agayne.

And shortly after his Landlord sent for him. But before that he sent for him, he had sent for the bishop of Londons Sumner, whose name was Hollōd, & whē this Frebarne was come, he demaunded of him, if he had not a pig in his house, which he denyed not. Then commaunded Mayster Garter the sayde Sumner called Hollond, to take him, and goe home to hys house,* and to take the Pygge, and carry both him and the Pigge vnto Doctour Stokesley his Mayster, being then Bishop of London, & so he did. Then the Bishop being in his chamber, with diuers other of the Clergy, called this Frebarne before him, and had him in examination for his pigge, laying also vnto his charge, that he had eaten in his house that lent, poudred beefe and Calues heades.* Unto whom Frebarne answered. My Lord, if the heades were eaten in my house, in whose houses were the bodyes eaten? Also if there be eyther man or woman that can proue, that either I, or any in my house hath done as your Lordship sayth, let me suffer death therfore. You speake (sayd he) agaynst pilgrimages, and will not take holy bread, holy water, nor yet goe on Procession on Palme Sondag: Thou art no Christian man. My Lord, sayd Frebarne, I trust I am a true Christen man, & haue done nothing neither agaynst Gods law nor my princes.

In the time of this his examination, which was during the space of two hours, diuers came vnto the bishop, some to haue theyr childrē confirmed, & some for other causes. Unto whom as they came, hauing the pig before hym couered, he would lift vp the cloth and shew it them,* saying: How thinke you of such a felow as this is? is not this good meate, I pray you, to be eaten in this blessed time of Lent, yea and also poudred Beefe and Calues heades too beside this?

After this the Bishoppe called his Sumner vnto him, and commaunded him to go and carry this Thomas Frebarne and the pig openly thorow the stre•tes, into the olde Bayly, vnto Syr Roger Chomley, for the Bishop sayd, he had nothing to do to punish him,* for that belonged vnto y^e ciuill magistrates, and so was Frebarne caryed w^t the pyg before him, to sir Roger Chomleis house in the old Baily, & he being not at home at that time, Frebarne was broght likewise back agayne vnto the bishops place with the pig, and there lay in the porters lodge till it was 9. a clocke at night. Then the bishop sent him vnto the Counter in the Poultry by the Sumner and other of his seruauntes.

The next day being Saturday, he was brought before the Maior of London & his brethren, vnto Guild hall, but before his comming, they had the pig deliuered vnto them by the Bishops officer.

Then the Maior and the Benche layd vnto his charge (as they were informed from the Bishop) that he had eaten poudred beefe and Calues heades in his house the same Lent, but no man was able to come in that would iustify it, neither could any thing be found, saue onely the Pig, which (as is before sayd) was for the preseruacion of his wiues life, and that she went withall. Notwithstanding the Maior of London sayde, that the Monday next folowing, he should stand on the Pillary in Cheapeside, with the one halfe of the pig on the one shoulder, and the other halfe on the other.

Then spake the Wyfe of the sayd Frebarne vnto the Maior and the Benche, desiring that she myght stand there, and not he, for it was long of her and not of him. After this they tooke a satten list, & tide it fast about the pigs neck, and made Frebarne to cary it hanging on his shoulder vntill he came vnto the Counter of the Poultry, from whence he came.

After this was done, the Wyfe of this Prisoner tooke with her an honest woman, the Wyfe of one Michaell Loble, whiche was well acqwaynted with diuers in the Lord Cromwelles house, vnto whom the sayde woman Page 1185 resorted for some helpe for this prisoner, desiring them to speake vnto theyr Lord and Mayster for his deliuerance out of trouble.

It happened that the same time came in Doctour Barnes and Mayster Barlowe,* who vnderstandyng the matter by Lobleys wife, went vp to the Lord Cromwell, and certified him thereof: who vpon their request, sent for the Maior of the City of London: but what was sayd vnto the Lord Maior, is vnknowne, sauing that in the after noone of the same day, the wife of the person aforesayd resorted agayne vnto the Lord Maior, suyng to get her husband deliuered out of prison, declaring how that she had 2. small children, and had nothing to helpe her and them, but onely her husband, who laboured for theyr liuings. Vnto whom the Maior aunswered, what come ye to me? You are taken vp with the Kinges Counsell. I supposed that you had come to desire me that your husbände shoulde not stand vpon the Pillary in Cheapeside on Monday nexte, with the one halfe of the pyg on his one shoulder and the other halfe on the other. Also the Maior sayd vnto her, that he could not deliuer him without the consent of the rest of his brethren the Aldermen. Wherefore he bade her the next day folowing, which was Sondag, to re•ort vnto Paules to Saint Dunstones Chappell, and when he had spoken with his brethren, he woulde then tell her more. Other answere could she get none at that time. Wherefore she wēt vnto M. Wilkenson, then being Sheriffe of London, desiring him to be good vnto her, and that she might haue her poore husband out of prison. Vnto whom M. Wilkenson answered: O woman▪ Christ hath layd a piece of his crosse vpon thy necke,* to proue whether thou wilt helpe hym to beare it or no, saying moreouer to her, that if the Lord maior had sent him to his Counter, as he sent him to his brothers, he should not haue taryed there an houre, and so cōmaunded her to come the next day vnto him to dinner, and he would do y^e best for her he could. So the next day came, & this woman resorted again to M. Wilkensōs, according as he bad her, who also had biddē diuers gestes: vnto whō he spake in her behalfe But as they were set at dinner, and she also sitting at the table, whē she saw the hote fish come in, she felt downe in a swoond, so that for the space of two houres she could keepe no life in her. Wherefore they sent her home to her house in Pater noster row, and then they sent for the Midwife, supposing that she would haue bene deliuered incontinent of her childe that she went with, but after that she came somewhat agayn to herselfe, where she lay sicke and kept her bed the space of xv. weekes after, being not able to helpe her selfe, but as she was helped of others, during the time of xv. weekes.

Now to shew further what became of this Pig, wherof we haue spoken so much, it was carryed into Finsburye field by the Bishop of Londons Sumner,* at his maisters commaundement, and there buried. The Monday folowing, being the fourth day after that this prisoner aforesayd was apprehended, the Maior of London, with the residue of his brethren being at Guild hall, sent for the prisoner aforenamed, and demaunded sureties of him for his forth cōming, what so euer hereafter should or might be layd vnto his charge,* but for lacke of such suretyes as they required vpon his owne band, which was a Recognisaunce of twenty pound, he was deliuered out of theyr handes. But shortly after that he was deliuered out of this his trouble, mayster Garter, of whome we haue spoken before, beyng his landlord, warned him out of his house, so that in foure yeares after, he could not get an other, but was constrayned to be within other good folkes, to his great hindrance and vndoing.

Hard it were and almost out of number to rehearse the names and stories of all them, which felt the gentle helpe of this good man in some case or other. Where might be remembred the notable deliuerance of one Gray, a Smyth of Bishops Starford,* who being accused for denying y^e sacramēt of the aulter to be our Sauior, was sent vp for the same to Londō and there should haue bene condemned to be burnt, but that by the meanes of the L. Cromwell, he was sent home agayne and deliuered. One other example, though it be somewhat long with the circūstances and all, I will declare, how he helped the Secretary that thē was to Doctor Cranmer Archbishop of Caunterbury, whiche Secretary is yet aliue, and can beare present record of the same.

¶How the Lord Cromwell helped Cranmers Secretary.

MEntion was made before how king Henry in y^e yeare of his reigne 21. caused the 6. Articles to passe, much agaynst the mind and contrary to the consēt of the Archbishop of Canterbury Thomas Crāmer,* who had disputed three daies against the same in the Parliament house, with great reasons and authorities. Which Articles after they were graunted and past by the Parliamēt, the king for the singuler fauor which he euer bare to Cranmer, and reuerence to his learning, being desirous to know what he had sayd and obiected in the Parliamēt agaynst these Articles, or what could be alleged by learning agaynst the same, required a note of the Archbishop of his doings, what he had sayd and opposed in the Parliament touch••g that matter. And this word was sent to him from the king by Cromwell, and other Lordes of the Parliament whom the king then sent to dine with him at Lambeth, somewhat to comfort agayne his greued mind, and troubled spirits as hath bene aboue recited. pag, 1136.

Wherupon when his dinner was finished, the next day after the Archbishop collecting both his argumēts, authorities of scriptures, and Doctors together, caused his Secretary to write a fayre booke therof for the king, after this order. First the Scriptures were alleadged, then the Doctors, thirdly folowed the Arguments deducted from those authorities. This booke was written in his Secretaryes Chamber. Where, in a by Chamber lay the Archbishops Almosiner. When this booke was fayre writtē,* and whiles the Secretary was gone to deliuer the same vnto y^e Archbishop his maister, who was (as it then chaunced) rydde to Croydon: returning backe to his chamber, found hys doore shut, and the key caryed away to London by the Almosiner.

At this season also chaūced the father of the sayd Secre|tary to come to the Citty, by whose occasion it so •ell out, that he must nedes go to London. The booke he could not lay into his chamber, neither durst he commit it to any other person to keepe, being straitly charged in any cōditiō of the Archbishop his maister, to be circumspect thereof, so that he determined to go to his father and to keep the booke about him. And so thrusting the booke vnder his girdle, he went ouer vnto Westminster bridge with a sculler, where he entred into a whirry that went to London, wherein were 4. of the Garde, who ment to land at Paules wharfe and to passe by the kinges highnesse, who then was in hys Barge with a great number of Barges and boates about him, then baiting of Beares in the water ouer agaynst the banke.

These foresayd yeomen of the gard, when they came agaynst the kinges Barge, they durst not passe by towards Paules wharfe, least they should be espyed, & therfore entreated the Secretary to goe with them to the Bearebayting, and they would finde the meanes being of the garde to make rowme and to see all the pastime, the Secretary perceiuing no other remedy, assēted therto. Whē the whirry came nye the multitude of the boats,* they with pollaxes got in the whirry so farre, that being compassed with many other whirryes and boates there was no refuge if the Beare should breake loose and come vpon them, as in very deede within one pater noster while, the Beare brake lose and came in to the boate where the yeomen of the gard were and the sayd Secretary. The gard forsook the wherry and went into an other barge, one or two of them leaping short, and so fell into the water. The Beare and the dogs so shook the whirry wherin the Secretary was, that the boate being ful of water, soncke to the ground, & being also as it chaūced an ebbing tide, he there sate in the end of y^e whirry vp to y^e middle in water. To whō came the Beare and all the dogges. The Beare seking as it were aide and succor of him, came backe with his hinder parts vpon him and so rushing vpō him, the booke was losed frō his girdle and fell into the Thames out of his reach.

The flying of the people, after that the beare was lose, from one boat to an other, was so comberous, that diuers persons were throwne into the Thames, the king commaunding certayne men that could swimme, to strip them selues naked and to helpe to saue them that were in daunger. This pastime so displeased the king that he bad away away, with the Beare, and let vs all go hence.

The Secretary perceiuing his booke to fleete away in the Thames, called to the Beareward to take vp y^e booke,* When the Beareward had the booke in his custody, being an errant Papist, farre from the Religion of his Mystres (for he was the Lady Elizabethes Beareward, now the Que•nes maiesty) ere that the Secretary coulde come to land,* he had deliuered the booke to a Priest of his owne affinity in Religion standing on the bancke, who reading in the booke and perceiuing that it was a manifest refutation of the 6. Articles, made much a doe and tolde the Beareward that whosoeuer claymed the booke, should surely be hanged. Anone the Secretary came to the Beareward for his booke. What quoth the Beareward, dare you chalenge Page 1186 this booke? Whose seruaunt be you? I am seruaunt to one of the Coūsell, sayd the Secretary, and my Lord of Caunterbury is my maister. Yea mary, quoth the Beareward, I thought so much. You belike I trust, quoth the Beareward, to be both hanged for this booke. Well (sayd he) it is not so euill as you take it, and I warrant you my L. will auouch the booke to the kinges Maiesty. But I pray you let me haue my booke, and I will geue you a Crowne to drink. If you would geue me v.C. crownes, you shall not haue it, quoth the Beareward. With that y^e Secretary departed from him, & vnderstanding the malicious frowardnes of the Beareward, he learned that Blage the Grocer in Cheapeside might doe muche with the Beareward, to whom the Secretary brake this matter, requiring hym to send for the Beareward to supper, and he would pay for y^e whole charge therof, and besides that rather thē he would forgo his book after this sort, the Beareward should haue xx. shillinges to drinke. The supper was prepared. The Beareward was sent for, and came. After supper the matter was entreated of and xx. shillings offered for the book. But do what could be done, neither frendship, acquayntaunce, nor yet reward of mony could obtaine the book out of his handes, but that the same shoulde be deliuered vnto some of the Counsell that woulde not so sleightly looke on so waighty a matter, as to haue it redeemed for a supper or a piece of money. The honest man M. Blage with many good reasons would haue perswaded him not to be stiffe in his owne conceit, declaring that in the end he shoulde nothing at all preuayle of his purpose, but be laught to scorn, getting neither peny nor prayse for his trauel. He hearing that, rushed sodenly out of the doores from his friend M. Blage without any maner of thankes geuing for his supper, more like a Beareward then like an honest man. Whē the Secretary saw y^e matter so extremely to be vsed against him, he then thought it expedient to fall from any farther practising of entreaty with the Beareward, as with him that seemed rather to be a Beare himselfe then the Maister of the beast, determining the next morning to make the L. Cromwell priuy of the chaunce that happened.

So on the next day, as the Lord Cromwell went to y^e Court, the Secretary declared the whole matter vnto him & how he had offered him xx.s for the finding therof. Wher is the felow, quoth the Lord Cromwell? I suppose, sayd the Secretary, that he is now in the Court attēding to deliuer the booke vnto some of the Counsell. Well sayd the Lord Cromwell, it maketh no matter: go with me thether and I shall get you your booke agayne. When the Lorde Cromwell came into the hall of the Court, there stood the Beareward with the booke in his hand, wayting to haue deliuered the same vnto Syr Anthony Browne, or vnto the Bishop of Winchester,* as it was reported. To whom the Lord Cromwell sayd, come hither felow. What booke hast thou there in thy hand? and with that snatched the booke out of his hand, and looking in the booke, he sayd, I know this hand well enough. This is your hand, sayd he to the Secretary. But where haddest thou this booke, quoth the Lord Cromwel to the Beareward? This Gentleman lost it two dayes agoe in the Thames sayde the Beareward. Doest thou know whose seruauant he is, sayd the Lord Cromwell? He sayth, quoth the Beareward, that he is my Lord of Canterburies seruauant. Why then dyddest not thou deliuer to him the booke, whē he required it, sayd the L. Cromwell. Who made thee so bold as to detein and withhold any booke or writing from a Coūsellers seruauant, specially being his Secretary? It is more meter for thee to medle with thy Beares thē with such writing, & it were not for thy maisters sake, I would set thee fast by the feet, to teach such malepert knaues to meddle with Counsellers matters. Had not mony bene well bestowed vpon such a good felow as this is, that knoweth not a Councellers man frō a Coblers man? And with those wordes the Lord Cromwell went vp into the kinges chamber of presence and the Archbishops Secretary with him, where he found in the chamber the Lord of Caunterbury. To whō he sayde, my Lord I haue founde here good stuffe for you (shewing to him the paper booke that he had in his hand) ready to bring both you & this good felow your mā to the halter,* namely if the knaue Beareward now in the Hall, might haue well compassed it. At these wordes the Archbishop smiled and sayd, he that lost the booke is lyke to haue the worse bargayne, for besides that he was well washed in the Thames, he must write the booke fayre agayne: & at those wordes the Lord Cromwell cast the booke vnto the Secretary saying, I pray thee Morice go in hād therewith by & by with all expedition, for it must serue a turne. Sure^{ly} my Lord, it somewhat reioyseth me, quoth the L. Cromwell, that the verlet might haue had of your man xx. s. for the book, and now I haue discharged the matter with neuer a peny. And shaking him wel vp for his ouermuch malepar•nes, I know the felow wel enough (quoth he) there is not a rancker Papist within this realme, thē he is, most vnworthy to be seruaunt vnto so noble a Princesse. And so after hūble thanks geuen to the Lord Cromwell, the sayd Morice departed with his booke, which when he agayne had fayre written, was deliuered to the kinges Maiesty by the sayd Lord Cromwell, within 4. dayes after.

The Lord Cromwell not forgetting his olde frendes and benefactours.

IT is commonly sene, that men aduaūced once from base degree, to ample dignities do rise also with fortune into such insolency and exaltatiō of mind,* that not only they for'get themselues what they were, & from whence they came but also cast out of remembraunce al their old frendes and former acquayntance, which haue bene to them before beneficiall. Frō which sort of men, how farre the curteous cō'dition of this christen Earle did differ, by diuers examples it may appeare As by a certain poore woman keping some time a vitailing house about Hownsloe, to whom the said Lord Cromwell remayned in debt for certayne old reckonings, to y^e summe of xl.s. It happened that the L. Cromwel with Cranmer Archbishop of Cāterbury, riding thorow Cheapeside toward the Court, in turning his eye ouer the way, and there espying this poore woman, brought now in need & misery, eftsones caused her to be called vnto him. Who being come, after certayn questions asked of her if she were not such a womā, and dwelling in such a place. At last he demaunded, if he were not behind for a certayne payment of mony betwene him and her. To whō she with reuerent obeisance, confessed that he ought her money for a certayn old reckoning which was yet vnpayd, wherof she stode now in great necessity, but neuer durst call vpō him nor could come at him for to require her right. Thē the L. Cromwell sending the poore woman home to hys hou•e▪ and one of his seruants withall,* that the Porter should see her in, after his returne from the Court, not onely discharged the debte which he ought, but also gaue her a yearely pension of foure poundes, and a liuery euery yeare while she liued.

The like curtesy the said L. Cromwell shewed also to a certayne Italian, who in the city of Florence, had shewed him much kindnes in succoring and relieuing his necessity as in this story following may appeare. Which storie set forth and compiled in the Italian tong by Bandello, & imprinted at Luke by Busdrago, an. 1554.* I thought here to insert, with the whole order and circumstance therof, as it is reported.

Not many yeares past, sayth the author, there was in Florence a merchant whose name was Fraunces, descended from the noble & auncient family of the Frescobaldes:* this Gentleman was naturally indued with a noble & liberall minde, vnto whome also through prosperous successe and fortunate lucke in his affayres and doings, much aboundaunce of riches increased, so that he grew in great wealth, hauing his cofers replenished w^t many heapes of much treasure. He according to the custome Marchantes, vsed his trade into many countries, but chiefly into England, where long time he liued sojourning in London, keping house to his great commendation and prayse.

It happened, that Fraunces Frescobald being in Florence, there appeared before him a poore yong man,* asking his almes for Gods sake. Frescobald as he earnestly beheld this ragged stripling, who was not so disguised in his tottered attire, but that his countenaunce gaue signifiatiō of much towardnes & vertue in him, with cōformity of maners agreing to the same, being moued with pity, demaūded of what coūtry he was, & where he was borne. I am Syr (quoth he) of England,* & my name is Thomas Cromwell. My father is a poore man, & by his occupation a cloth sherer. I am straied from my country, and am now come into Italy with the campe of frenchmē, that were ouerthrowne at Gatilyon,* where I was the page to a footman, carying after him his pike and burganet. Frescobald partly considering the present state of this yong man, and partly for the loue he bare to the english natiō, of whom he had receiued in times past sondry pleasures, receiued hym into his house, & with such curtesy interteined his gest, as at his departure whē he was in mind to returne to his coū|try, he prouided such necessaries as he any way neded.* He gaue him both horse & new apparel, & 16. duckats of gold in his purse, to bring him into his coūtry. Cromwell rendering his harty thanks, tooke leaue of his host & returned into England. This Cromwell was a man of noble courage & heroicall spirite, geuen to enterprise great matters, very liberall, a graue Counseller, &c. But to our purpose.

Page 1187At what tyme Cromwell was so highly fauoured of his prince, and aduanced to such dignitie as is aforesaid, Frāces Frescobald (as it many tymes happeneth vnto Merchants) was by many misfortunes and great losses, cast backe and become very poore. For according to conscience and equitie, he payd whatsoeuer was due to any other frō himself, but such debts as were owing vnto him, he could by no meanes obtaine:* yet calling further to remembrance that in England by certaine merchants there was due to him the summe of 15000. ducates, he so purposed with him self, that if he could recouer that mony, he would well content himself, and no longer deale in the trade of merchants but quietly passe ouer the rest of his dayes.

All things prepared for his iourney, he setting forward towards England, at last arriued at London, hauyng vtterly forgotten what curtesie long before hee had shewed to Cromwel, which is the property alwayes of a good nature, for a man to forget what benefites he hath shewed to other, but to kepe in mind continually what he hath receiued of other. Frescobald thus being now ariued at Lōdon, and there traueilling earnestly about his businesse, it chanced him by the way to meete with this noble man, as he was riding toward the court. Whome, as soone as the sayd lord Cromwell had espied, and had earnestly beheld, he bethought with himselfe that he should be the man of Florence, at whose hands in tymes past he had receyued so gentle entertainment, and therupon sodenly alighting (to the great admiration of those that were with him) in hys armes he gently embraced the stranger, and with a broken voyce scarce able to refraine teares, he demanded if he wer not Frances Frescobald the Florētine. Yea sir (he answered) and your humble seruant. My seruant (quoth Cromwell?) no, as you haue not bene my seruant in times past, so will I not now account you otherways then my great and especiall frend, assuring you that I haue iust reason to be sory, that you knowing what I am (or at the least what I should be) will not let me vnderstand of your arriuyng in this land, which known vnto me, truely I should haue payd part of that debte which I confesse to owe you: but thanked be God I haue yet tyme. Well sir, in conclusion, you are hartilie welcome. But hauing now waightie affaires in my princes cause, you must hold me excused, that I can no longer tary with you. Therefore at this tyme I take my leaue, desiring you with the faithfull mynde of a friend, that you forget not this day to come to my house to dinner, and then in remounting on his horse, he passed to the Court. Frescobald greatly meruailing with himselfe who this Lord should be, at last after some pause, hys remembraunce better called home, he knewe hym to be the same, whome long before (as you haue heard) he had relieued in Florence, and thereat not a little ioyed, especially considering how that by his meanes he should the better recouer his duety.

The houre of dinner drawing neere, he repayed to the house of this honourable Counsellour, where walkyng a while in his base Court, he attended his commyng. The Lord shortly returned from the Court, and no sooner dismounted, but he agayne embraced this Gentleman with so frendly a countenance, that both the Lord Admirall and all the other noble men of the Court beyng then in his cōpany, did not a little maruell thereat.

Which thing when the Lord Cromwell perceyued, he turnyng towardes them,* and holding Frescobald fast by the hand: do ye not meruaile my Lordes (quoth he) that I seeme so glad of this man? This is he by whose meanes I haue atchieued the degre of this my present calling: and because ye shall not be ignoraunt of hys curtesie when I greatly neded, I shall tell it you: and so there declared vnto them euery thing in order, accordyng as before hath bene recited vnto you. His tale finished, holdyng him still by the hand, he entered his house, and commyng into the Chamber where his dinner was prepared, he sate hym downe to the Table, placing his best welcomed guest next vnto him.

The dinner ended, and the Lordes departed, he would know what occasion had brought Frescobald to London. Fraunces in few wordes opened his cause, truely tellyng, that from great wealth he was fallen into pouerty, and that his only portion to maintayne the rest of his life, was xv. thousand Ducates which were owyng him in england and two thousand in Spaine. Whereunto the lord Cromwell answeryng agayne, sayd, touching the things Maister Frescobald that be already past, although it can not now be vndone by mans power, nor by pollicye called agayne, which hath happened vnto you by the vnstable cōdition and mutabilitie of this world altering too and fro: yet is not your sorrow so peculiar to your selfe alone, but that by the bond of mutuall loue, I must also bewaile with you this your state and condition, which state and condition of yours, though it may worke in you matter of iust heauines, yet notwithstanding, to the intent you may receaue in this your heauy distresse some consolatiō for your old curtesie shewed to me in tymes past, the lyke curtesie now requireth of me agayne, that I likewise should repay some portion of that debt wherin I stand bound vnto you according as the part of a thankfull man byndeth me to do in requiting your benefites on my part heretofore receiued. And this further I auouch in the word of a true frend that during this life and state of myne. I will neuer fayle to do for you, wherein my authoritie may preuaile to supply your lacke and necessitie. And so let these fewe wordes suffice to giue you knowledge of my friendly meaning. But let me delay the tyme no longer.

Then taking him by the hand, he led him into his chamber, whence,* after that euery man by his commandement was departed, he locked fast the dore. Thē opening a coffer full heaped with treasure, he first tooke out sixtene Ducates, and deliuaryng them to Frescobald, he sayd: loe here (my friend) is your mony which you lent me at my departure from Florence, and here other tenne which you bestowed in my apparell, with ten more that you disbursed for the horse I rid away on. But cōsidering you are a merchant, it seemeth to me not honest to returne your money without some consideration for the long detainynge of it. Take you therefore these 4. bags,* and in euery of them is 400. ducates, these you shall receiue and enioy from the hands of your assured friend.

Frescobald, although from great welth he was brought to a lowe ebbe, and (almost) an vtter decay, yet expressyng the vertue of a modest mynde, after gentle thanks geuen to the Lord

Cromwell for his exceeding kyndnesse shewed, curteously would haue refused that which was offered, had not the other enforced him agaynst his will to receiue it.

This done, he caused Frescobald to geue him a note of the names of all his debtors, and the summe that from euery of them was owyng him.* This scedule he deliuered to one of his seruants, vnto whom he gaue charge diligētly to search out such men whose names therein was contened, if they were within anye part of the realme, & then straightly to charge them to make payment of those sums within fiftene dayes, or els to abide the hazard of hys displeasure. The seruant so well performed his maisters cōmandement, that in very short tyme they made payment of the whole summe: and if it had lyked Frescobald so to haue demanded, they should haue answered to the vttermost such commoditie, as the vse of his money in so many yeres would haue giuen him profit: but he contēted with his principall, would demaund no further.* By which meanes he gate both hartly loue and great estimation, and the more, for that he was so deare to the Lord Cromwell, and so highly esteemed of him.

And during all this tyme, Frescobald continually lodged in the house of the lord Cromwel, who euer gaue hym such entertainment as he had right well deserved,* and oftentimes mooued him to abide in England, offering him the lone of 60000. Ducates, for the space of 4. yeare, if he would continue and make his banke in Londō. But Frescobald, who desired to returne into his country, and there quietly to continue the rest of his lyfe, with the great fauor of the Lord Cromwell, after many thanks for his high and noble entertainment, departed towards hys desired home, where richly arriuing, he gaue himselfe quietly to lyue. But this wealth he small time enioyed, for in the first yeare of his returne he dyed.

So plentifull was the life of this man in such fruites full of singular gratitude and curtesie, that to rehearse all,* it would require too long a tractation. Yet one example amongst many other I may not ouerpasse, whereby we may euidently consider or rather maruell at the lowly mind of such a person, in so high a state and place of honor. For as he comming with other of the Lordes of the Counsayle and Commissioners, to the house of Shene, about the examination of certaine Monkes which there denied y^e kings supremacie, after the examination done was there sittynge at dinner, it chaunced him to spie a farre off, a certain poore man which there serued to sweepe their Sels and cloister, and to ring the bells. Whome when the Lord Cromwell had well aduised, he sent for the poore man to come vnto him, and before all the table most louingly and friendly, calling him by his name, tooke him by the hand, and asked how he did, with many other good wordes, and turnyng therewith to the Lordes: My Lordes (quoth he) see you this poore man. This mans father hath bene a great frend to mee in my necessitie, and hath giuen me many a meals meat. Then said he vnto the poore man, come vnto me and Page 1188 I will prouide for thee, and thou shalt not lacke so long as I liue. Such as were there present and saw and heard the same, report it to be true.

In this worthy and noble person, besides diuers other eminent vertues,* iij. things especially are to be considered to wit, flourishing authoritie, excelling wisdom and feruent zeale to Christ and to his Gospell. First, as touchyng his feruent zeale in setting forward the sinceritie of Christen faith, sufficient is to be seene before by the iniunctions proclamations, and articles aboue specified, that more can not almost be wished in a noble man, and scarce the lyke hath bene seene in any.

Secondlye, for his wisdom and pollicie no lesse singular, ioyned with his christen zeale, he brought great things to passe,* as well on this side the sea as in the other partes beyond. But especially his working was to nourish peace abroad with forreine realmes, as may well by the kings letters and instructions sent by his meanes to his Ambassadors resident both with the Emperour the French king and the king of Scots, and also with y^e Pope appeare. In all whose courtes, such watch and espiall he had, that nothing there was done, nor pretended, whereof he before had not intelligence. Neither was there anye sparke of mischiefe kindling neuer so little against y^e kyng and the realme,* which he by wit and pollicie did not quēch and keepe downe. And where pollicie would not serue to obteine peace, yet by mony he bought it out: so that during all the tyme of Cromwels prosperity, the king neuer had warre with any forreine nation: notwithstandyng, that both the Pope, the Emperour, the kings of Fraunce and Scotland were mightily bent and incensed agaynst hym.

Thus, as the prudent pollicie of this man was euer circumspect abroad,* to stay the Realm from foreine warres: so his authoritie was no lesse occupied in keeping good order and rule at home: First, in hampering the popish prelates and disappointing their subtile deuises: secondly, in brideling and keping other vnruly subiects vnder subiection and discipline of the lawes. Wherby, as he was a succour and refuge to all godly persons, so was he a terror to the euill doers: so that not the presence of him onely, but also the hearing of the comming of Cromwell brake many fraies, and much euill rule: as well appeared by a certeine notorious fray or riot, appointed to be fought by a company of ruffins in the streete of London called Pater noster rowe. Where cartes were set on both sides of purpose, prepared to enclose them, that none might breake in to part them. It happened, that as this desperate skirmish should begin,* the Lord Cromwell comming the same time from the Court through Paules churchyard, and entering into Chepe, had intelligence of the great fray toward, and because of the carts he could not come at them, but was forced to go about the little conduit, and so come vpon them through Pannier Alley.

Thus as the conflict began to waxe hote, and the people were standing by in great expectation to see them fight, sodenly at the noice of the Lord Cromwels commyng, the campe brake vp and the Ruffins to go, neither could the cartes kepe in those so couragious campers, but well was he that first could be gone. And so ceased this tumultuous outrage, without any other parting, only through the authoritie of the Lord Cromwels name.

*One example more of the like affinitie commeth here in mynd, which ought not to be omitted, concernyng a certaine seruing man of the like ruffenly order, who thinking to disc•uer himselfe from the common vsage of all other men in strange newfanglenes of fashions by himselfe (as many there be whom nothing doth please, which is dailie seene and receiued) vsed to go with his haire hangyng about his eares downe vnto his shoulders, after a strange monstrous maner, counterfeiting belyke the wyld Irish men, or els Crinitus Ioppas, which Uirgil speaketh of, as one wearie of his owne English fashion: or else as one ashamed to be seene lyke a man, would rather go like a woman, or lyke to one of the Gorgon sisters, but most of all lyke to hymselfe, that is, lyke to a Ruffin, that could not tell how to go.

As this Ruffin ruffling thus with his locks was walkyng in the streetes, as chance was, who should meet him but the Lord Cromwell,* who beholding the deforme and vnseemly maner of his disguised goyng, full of much vanitie and hurtfull example, called the man to question with him whose seruauant he was, which being declared, then was demanded, whether his maister or any of his felows vsed so to go with such haire about their shoulders as he did, or no? Which when he denied, and was not able to yeld any reason for refuge of that his monstrous disguising, at lēgth he fell to this excuse that he had made a vow. To this the Lord Cromwell answered agayne, that for so much as he had made himself a votarie, he would not force him to breake his vowe, but vntill his vow should be expired, he should lye the meane tyme in prison, and so se•te him immediately to the Marshalsey: where he endured, till at length this intonsus Cato beyng perswaded by hys maister to cut his haire, by sute and petition of frends, hee was brought agayne to the Lord Cromwell with his hed polled according to the accustomed sort of his other fellowes, and so was dismissed.

Hereunto also pertaineth the example of frier Bartley,* who wearing still his friers coule after the suppression of religious houses, Cromwell commyng thorough Paules churchyard, and espieng him in Rheines his shop, yea said he, will not that coule of yours be left of yet? And if I heare by one a clocke that this apparel be not changed, thou shalt be hanged immediatly for example to al other. And so putting his coule away, he neuer durst weare it after.

If the same Lorde Cromwell which could not abyde this seruyng man so disfigured in his haire, were now in these our dayes aliue with the same authoritie, which then he had, and saw these new fangled fashions of attire, vsed here amongst vs both of men and women, I suppose verily, that neither these monstrous ruffes, nor these prodigious hose, and prodigall or rather hyperbolicall barbarous breeches (which seeme rather lyke barels then breeches) would haue any place in England. In which vnmeasurable excesse of vesture, this I haue to maruell: first how these seruing men, which commonly haue nothyng els but their wages, and that so slender and bare, cā maintaine such slops, so huge and so sumptuous,* which cōmonly stand them in more, then their three yeares wages doe come vnto. Secondly I maruell, that their maisters and Lordes (who shall yeld to God account of their seruauants doings) do not search and trie out their seruants walkes, how they come by these expenses, wherewith to vpholde this brauerie, seing their stipendary wages, and all reuenues els they haue, will not extend thereunto. Thirdlye, this most of all is to be marueiled, that magistrates which haue in their hands the ordring and guiding of good laws do not prouide more seuerely for the needfull reformation of these enormities. But here we may well see, & truly this may say that England once had a Cromwell.

Long it were to recite what innumerable benefits this worthy Counsellour by his prudent pollicie, his graue authoritie and perfect zeale wrought and brought to passe in the publicke Realme, and especially in the Church of England, what good orders he established, what wickednes and vices he suppressed, what corruptions he reformed, what abuses he broght to light, what crafty iuglings what idolatrous deceptions, and superstitious illusiōs he detected and abolished out of the Church. What posteritie will euer thinke the Church of the Pope pretendyng such religion, to haue bene so wicked,* so long to abuse the peoples eyes, with an old rotten stocke (called the Roode of grace) wherein a man should stand inclosed with an hundreth wyers within the roode, to make the Image goggle with the eyes, to nod with his head, to hang the lippe, to mooue and shake his iawes according as the valew was of the gift which was offred? If it were a small piece of siluer, he would hang a frowning lippe, if it were a piece of gold, then should his iawes go merily. Thus miserablye was the people of Christ abused, their soules seduced, their senses beguiled, and their purses spoiled, till this Idolatrous forgerie at last, by Cromwels meanes was disclosed,* and the image with all his engines shewed openly at Paules crosse, and there torne in pieces by the people. The like was done by the bloud of Hales, which in like maner by Cromwell was brought to Paules crosse, & there prooued to be the bloud of a ducke.

Who would haue iudged, but that the mayd of Kent had bene an holy woman and a prophetesse inspired, had not Cromwell and Cranmer tried her at Paules crosse to bee a strong whore.

What should I speake of Daruel Gartheren, of the rood of Chester, of Thom. Becket, our Lady of Walsingham,* with an infinite multitude more of the like affinitie? All which stockes and blockes of cursed idolatrie, Cromwell stirred vp by the prouidence of God, remooued out of the peoples way, that they might walke more safely in the sincere seruice of almighty God.

While the Lord Cromwell was thus blessedly occupied in profiting the common wealth,* and purging y^e church of Christ, it happened to him, as commonly it doth to all good men, that where any excellency of vertue appeareth, there enuy creepeth in, and where true pietie seeketh most after Christ, there some persecution followeth withall.

Thus (I say) as he was labouring in the commō welth Page 1189 and doying good to the poore afflicted saintes, helping them out of trouble, the malice of his enimies so wrought, continually hunting for matter against him, that they neuer ceased, till in the end th•y by false traines and crafty surmises, brought him out of the kings fauour.

The chiefe and principall enimie against him, was Steuen Gardiner bishop of Winchester, who euer disdayning and enuieng the state and felicitie of the Lord Cromwell,* and now taking his occasion by the mariage of lady Anne of Cleue, beyng a stranger and forreiner, put in the Kings eares what a perfect thing it were for the quiet of y^e realm, and establishment of the kings succession, to haue an English Queene and Prince that were meere English: so that in conclusion the kings affection, the more it was diminished from the late married Anne of Cleue, the lesse fauour he bare vnto Cromwell. Besides this Gardiner, there lacked not other backe friends also and ilwillers in the court about the king, which little made for Cromwell both for his religion which they maligned, and for other priuate grudges also incident by the way.

Ouer and besides all which, it is moreouer supposed, that some part of displeasure might ryse agaynst hym, by reason of a certaine talke, which happened a little before at Lambeth, at what tyme the king after the making of the vi. Articles, sent the sayd Lord Cromwell his Uicegerēt, with the two Dukes of Northfolke & Suffolke, with all the Lordes of the Parliament to Lambeth, to dyne with the Archbishop (who mightily had disputed and alledged in the Parliament agaynst the said Articles) to cheare and comfort his daunted spirits agayne.

There the said Cromwell with the other noble Lordes sitting with the Archbishop at his table in talke,* as euerie lord brought forth his sentence in commendation of Cranmer, to signifie what good will both the kyng & they bare vnto him: among the rest one of the company entring into a comparison betweene the sayd Thomas Cranmer, and Thomas Wolsey late Cardinall of Yorke, declared in his iudgement, that Cranmer was much to bee preferred for his myld and gentle nature, where as the Cardinall was a stubburne and a churlish prelate, and one that could neuer abide any noble man, and that (sayd he) knowe you well enough, my Lord Cromwell, for he was your Maister, &c. At these wordes the Lord Cromwell beyng somewhat touched to heare the Cardinals seruice cast in hys teeth, inferred agayne, saying: that he could not deny but he was seruant sometyme to Cardinall Wolsey, neyther did repent the same, for he receiued of hym both fee, meate, and drinke, and other commodities: but yet he was neuer so farre in loue with hym, as to haue wayted vpon him to Rome, if he had bene chosen Pope, as he vnderstoode that he would haue done if the case had so fallen out. Whiche when the other had denied to be true, Cromwell still persisted, affirmyng the same, and shewyng moreouer what number of Florens he should haue receyued, to be his Admirall, and to haue safe conducted hym to Rome, in case he had bene elected Bishop of Rome. The partie not a little mooued with these wordes, told hym, he lyed. The other agayne affirmed it to be true. Upon this, great and hygh wordes rose betwene them. Which contention although it was through intreatie of the Archbishop and other nobles somewhat pacified for the tyme, yet it might be, that some bitter roote of grudge remayned behynd, which afterward grew vnto him to some displeasure. And this was, an. 1540. in the moneth of Iuly. Ex testimonio, Secretarij. Cantuar.

After this, the next yeare followyng, which was 1541. in the month of Aprill was holden a Parliament,* which after diuers prorogations was continued till the moneth of Iuly the sayd yeare.* In the which month of Iuly, the Lord Cromwell beyng in the counsaile chamber, was sodenly apprehended, and committed to the tower of London. Whereat, as many good men which knewe nothyng but truth by him did lament,* and prayed hartily for him, so moe there were on the contrary side that reioyced, especially of the religious sort, and of the clergy, such as had bene in some dignitie before in the Church, and nowe by hys meanes were put from it. For in deed, such was hys nature, that in all his doyngs he could not abyde any kynde of Poperie, nor of false religion creepyng vnder hypocrisie, and lesse could abyde the ambitious pryde of Popishe Prelacie, which professing all humilitie, was so elated in pride, that kinges coulde not rule in their owne Realmes for them. These snuffing Prelates as he could neuer abide so they agayne hated him as much, whiche was the cause of shortnyng his dayes, and to bryng him to his ende: So that the xix. day of the moneth aforesaid, he was attainted by Parliament.

In the which Atteinder diuers and sondry crimes surmises, obiections and accusations were brought against hym but chiefly and aboue all other,* he was charged and accused of heresie, for that he was a supporter of them (whō they recounted for heretikes) as Barnes, Clarke, and many other, whom he by his authoritie and letters written to Shiriffes and Iustices in diuers Shires rescued and discharged out of prison. Also that he did euulgate & disperse abroad amongst the Kings subiects, great numbers of bookes, conteming (as they said) manifest matter of much heresie, diffidence, and misbeliefe. Item, that he caused to be translated into our English tongue, bookes comprising matter expresly against the Sacrament of the aulter, & that after the translation thereof, he commended and mainteyned the same for good and christian doctrine.

Ouer and besides all this, they brought in certaine witnesses (what they were, the atteinder expresseth not) which most especially pressed (or rather oppressed) him with heinous wordes spoken agaynst the king in the Church of s. Peter the poore, in the moneth of March, in the xxx. yeare of the kings raigne. Which wordes if they be true, as the Atteinder doth purport three things I haue here much to meruaile at. First, if his aduersaries had so sure holde and matter against hym,* then what would mooue thē to make such hastie speede in all post haste, to haue him dispatched and rid out of the way, and in no case could abyde hym to come to his purgation?

Which if he might haue done, it is not otherwise to be thought, but he would easily haue clered himselfe thereof.

Secondly, this I maruell,* that if the wordes had bene so hainous against the kyng, as his enemies did pretend, why then did those witnesses which heard those words in S. Peters Church, in the xxx. yeare of the kyngs raigne, conceale the sayd wordes of such treason so long, the space almost of ij. yeares,* and now vttered the same in the xxxij. yeare of the kings reigne, in the moneth of Iuly.

Thirdly, here is agayne to be marueled, if the king had known or beleued these words to be true, and that Cromwell had bene in deede such a traytour to his person, why then did the kyng so shortly after lamēt his death, wishing to haue his Cromwell aliue agayne? What Prince will wish the lyfe of hym whom he suspecteth vndoubtedly to be a traitor to his life and person? wherby it may appeare what iudgement the King had of Cromwell in himselfe, howsoeuer the parliament by sinister information was otherwise incensed to iudge vpon him.

Such malicious makebates about Princes and parliaments, neuer lacked in common weales. By such kyng Ethelstane was incensed to kill his brother Edwine, pag. 159. So was king Edward 2. deposed. So likewise when king Richard 2. was once brought into the Tower, what crimes and accusations were layd against him in the Parlament? So was Humfrey the good Duke of Gloucester, the kings vncler, by Henry Beauford bishop of Winchester and other in the Parliament holden at Bery, arrested as a traitour, and falsly made away, pag. 160. What great treason was in the words of him, who dwelling in Chepe side at the signe of the Crowne, sayd merily to hys sonne, that if he liued, he would make him heyre of the crowne: & yet was he therefore atteinted and iudged for a Traytor? pag. 701. In the tyme of king Henry the 8. how was that Parliament incensed, wherein both Queene Anne was falsly condemned, and Queene Elizabeth her daughter, as falsly disherited? To omit here the Attainder of the Duke of Buckingham wrought by the Cardinall of Yorke: Of the lord Cobham likewise, and sir Roger Acton, pag. 150 If the cause of the lord Henry late Earle of Surrey were well tried out, peradventure no such hainous purpose of any treasō shuld be found therein as than was made. Who incensed y^e late Duke of Somerset to behead his own brother, but such makebates as these? And afterward whē the sayd Duke himselfe was atteinted for a traytor and condēned for a felon, a briber and extorcioner: how was the parliament then incensed? Adam Damlip receyued of Cardinall Poole at Rome, but a sely crowne in way of almes, and therefore by meanes of Steuen Gardiner was atteinted for a traytor. George Egles did but read some tyme in woods and by the said Gardiner was also condemned and suffered as a traytor.

Not that I here speake or meane agaynst the hygh courtes of Parliamentes of thys our Realme,* necessariye assembled for the common wealth, to whom I always attribute their due reuerence and authoritie. But as it hapneth sometimes in generall Councels, which though they be neuer so generall, yet notwithstanding sometimes they may and do erre in waightie matters of religion: so lykewise they that say, that Princes and Parliaments may be misinformed sometimes, by some sinister heds, in matters Page 1190 ciuill and politike, do not therein derogate or empaire the high estate of parliaments, but rather geue wholsome admonition to princes and parliament men, to be more circumspect and vigilant what counsell they shall admit, and what witnesses they do credit. For priuate affection which commonly beareth a great stroke in all societies & doings of men, creepeth sometymes into such generall Councels, and into Princes Courtes also, either to much amplifying things that be but small, makyng mountaynes of molehills, or els to much extenuating thyngs that be of themselues great and waightie, according as it is truely said of the Poete Iuuenal: Dat veniam cornis, vexat censura columbas, or as our English Prouerbe sheweth: As a man is friended, so is his matter ended: And where the hedge, is lowe,* a man may lightly make large leapes: or rather to speake after the Frenche phrase: Qui son chien veult tuer, la rage luy met sus. That is: He that is disposed to haue hys dogge killed, first maketh men beleeeue that he is madde. And thus much hauing declared touching the matter of his accusation, the rest I referre to the high Parliament of that mightie king, who shall one day bring all things to perfect light.

In the meane season, howsoeuer the cause of the Lorde Cromwell standeth, true or false, this is certain, that Steuen Gardiner lacked not an head, nor yet priue assisters, which cunningly could fetch this matter about, and watch their tyme, when as the kyng being disposed to marrie an other wyfe,* which was the Lady Katherine Hawarde, immediately after the beheading of the Lord Cromwell, did repudiate Lady Anne of Cleue, which otherwise is to be thought during the lyfe of Cromwell, could not so well be brought to passe.

But these things beyng now done and past, let vs passe them ouer and returne agayne from whence we digressed, that is to the lord Cromwell beyng now atteinted & committed to the Tower. Who so long as he went with full sayle of fortune, how moderately, and how temperatly he did euer beare himselfe in his estate, before hath ben declared.* So now the said lord Cromwell, always one man, by the contrary wynd of aduersitie being ouerblowne, receiued the same with no lesse constancie, and patiēce of a christian hart. Neither yet was he so vnprovided of counsaile and forecast, but that he did foresee this tempest long before it fell,* and also prepared for the same for two yeares before smelling the cōspiracie of his aduersaries, & fearing what might happen, he called vnto him his seruants, and there shewing vnto them in what a slippery state hee stood, and also perceiuing some stormy weather already to gather, required them to looke diligently to their order and doings, least through their default any occasion might rise agaynst him.* And furthermore, before the tyme of his apprehension, such order he tooke for his seruants, that many of them, especially the yonger brethren which had little els to take vnto, had honestly left for thē in their frends hands to relieue them, whatsoeuer should him befall.

Briefly, such a louyng and kynd maister he was to his seruantes, that he provided aforehand almost for them all: In so much, that he gaue to twelue children which were his Musitians, twenty pound a peece, and so cōmitted them to their friends. Of whom some yet remayne aliue, who both enioyed the same, and also geue recorde of this to be true.

Furthermore, beyng in the tower a prisoner, how quietly he bare it, how valiauntly he behaued hymselfe, how grauely and discretely he aunswered and entertayned the commissioners sent vnto him, it is worthy noting. Whatsoeuer articles and interrogatories they propounded, they could put nothing vnto him, either concerning matters ecclesiasticall or temporall, wherein he was not more ripened, and more furnished in euery condition then they them selues.

Amongst the rest of those Commissioners which came vnto him: one there was, whom the Lord Cromwell desired to cary for him a letter to the kyng, which when he refused, sayeng that he would cary no letter to the king from a traytor: then the Lord Cromwell desired him at least to do from him a message to the king. To that the other was contented, and granted, so that it were not agaynst his alleageance. Then the Lord Cromwell taking wisse of the other Lordes, what he had promised: You shall commend me (sayd he) to the Kyng, and tell hym: By that he hath so well tryed, and throughly prooued you as I haue done, hee shall finde you as false a man as euer came about hym.

*Besides this, he wrote also a letter from the Tower to the kyng, whereof when none durst take the cariage vpon him, sir Rafe Sadler (whom he also had preferred to the kyng before, beyng euer trusty & faythfull vnto hym) went to the king to vnderstand his pleasure, whether he would permit him to bring the letter or not. Which, when y^e kyng had graunted, the sayd M. Sadler as he was required, presented the letter vnto the king, which he commaunded thrise to be red vnto him, in so much the kyng seemed to be mooued therewith.

Notwithstanding, by reason of the Acte of parliament afore passed, the worthy and noble Lorde Cromwell oppressed by his enemies, and condemned in the Tower, and not comming to his answer, the 28. day of Iuly, an. 1541. was brought to the scaffold on Tower hill, where he sayd these words followyng.

I am come hither to die, and not to purge my selfe,* as some thinke peradventure that I will. For if I should so do, I were a very wretch and a miser. I am by the law cōdemned to die, and thanke my lord God that hath appointed me this death for myne offence. For sithens the tyme y^t I haue had yeares of discretion. I haue lyued a sinner, and offended my Lord God, for the which I aske him hartelie forgiuenes. And it is not vnknowne to many of you, that I haue bene a great traoueller in this world, & being but of a base degree, was called to high estate, and sithens the tyme I came thereunto, I haue offended my Prince, for the which I aske him hartily forgiuenes, and beseech you all to pray to God with me, that he will forgiue me. And now I pray you that be here, to beare me record. I dye in the catholike fayth, not doubting in any Article of my faith no, nor doubting in any sacrament of the church. Manye haue slaundered me, and reported that I haue bene a bearer of such as haue mainteined euill opinions, which is vntrue. But I confesse, that like as God by his holy spirit doth instruct vs in the truth, so the deuill is ready to seduce vs, & I haue bene seduced,* but beare me witnes that I die in the catholike faith of the holy church. And I hartily desire you to pray for the kings grace, that he may long lyue with you in health and prosperitie: and that after him his sonne prince Edward that goodly impe, may long raigne ouer you. And once again I desire you to pray for me, that so long as life remaineth in this flesh, I wauer nothing in my faith. And so making his prayer, kneeling on his knees he spake these words, the effect whereof here followeth.

A prayer that the Lord Cromwell sayd at the houre of his death.

O Lord Iesu, which art the onely health of all men liuing,* and the euerlasting life of them which die in thee: I wretched sinner do submit my selfe wholly vnto thy most blessed will, and being sure that the thing cannot perish which is committed vnto thy mercy, willingly now I leaue this fraile and wicked fleshe in sure hope that thou wilt in better wise restore it to me agayne at the last day in the resurrection of the iust. I beseech thee, moste merciful lord Iesus Christ, that thou wilt by thy grace make strōg my soule against all temptations, and defend me with the buckler of thy mercy against all the assaults of the deuill. I see and knowledge that there is in my selfe no hope of saluation, but all my cōfidence, hope and trust, is in thy most mercifull goodnesse. I haue no merites nor good works, which I may alledge before thee. Of sinnes and euill workes (alas) I see a great heape: but yet thorough thy mercy I trust to be in the number of them to whome thou wilt not impute their sinnes: but wilt take and accept me for righteous and iust, and to be the inheritour of euerlasting lyfe. Thou mercifull lord wast borne for my sake, thou didst suffer both hunger and thirst for my sake: thou didst teach, pray, and fast for my sake all thy holy actions and workes thou wroughtest for my sake: thou suffredst most grieuous paines and tormentes for my sake: finally, thou gauest thy most precious body and thy bloud to be shed on the crosse for my sake. Nowe most mercifull Sauior, let al these things profit me, that thou frely hast done for me, which hast geuen thy selfe al so for me. Let thy bloud cleanse and wash away the spots and foulenes of my sinnes Let thy righteousness hide and couer my vnrighteousnes. Let the merites of thy passion and bloudshedding be satisfaction for my sinnes. Geue me Lord thy grace that the faith of my saluation in thy bloud wauer not in me, but may euer be firme and constant. That the hope of thy mercy and life euerlasting neuer decay in me, that loue waxe not cold in me. Finally, that the weaknes of my fleshe be not ouercome with the feare of death. Graunt me mercifull Sauior, that when death hath shut vp the eyes of my body, yet the eyes of my soule may still behold and looke vpon thee, and when death hath taken away the vse of my tongue, yet my heart may cry and say vnto thee: Lord into thy hands I commend my soule, Lord Iesu receaue my spirit. Amen.

And thus his prayer made, after he had godly & louingly exhorted them that were about him on the scaffold,*he quietly committed his soule into the hands of God, and so paciently suffred the stroke of the axe, by a ragged and butcherly miser, which very vngodly performed the office.

¶Of the Bible in English printed in the large volume, and of Edmund Boner preferred to the Bishoprike of London, by the meanes of the Lord Cromwell.

ABout the time and yere, when Edmund Boner bishop of Hereford, & ambassadour resident in Fraunce, begā first to be nominate & preferred by the meanes of the lord Cromwel to the bishoprike of London:,* which was, anno. 1540. it happened that the said Thomas Lord Cromwell and Erle of Essex, procured of y^e king of england his gracious letters to the French king to permitte and licence a subiect of his to imprint the Bible in English within the vniuersitie of Paris because paper was there more meete and apt to be had for the doing therof, then in the realme of England, & also that there were more store of good workmen for the readie dispatch of y^e same.* And in like maner at the same time the said king wrote vnto his ambassadour, who then was Edmund Boner Bishop of Herford lying in Paris, that he should ayde and assist the doers thereof in all their reasonable sutes. The which Bishop outwardly shewed great friendship to y^e merchants that were the imprinters of the same, and moreouer did diuers and sundrie times call and commande the said persons, to be in maner daily at his table both dinner and supper,* and so much reioyced in the workemanship of the said Bible, that he himselfe would visite the imprinters house, where the same bibles were printed, & also would take part of such dinners as the Englishmen there had, and that to his cost, which, as it seemed he little wayed. And further the sayd Boner was so feruent that he caused the said Englishmen to put in print a new testament in english & latine,* and himselfe took, a great many of them and payd for them & gaue them to his friends. And it chaunced the meane time, while the said Bible was in printing, the king Henry the 8. preferred the said Boner from the said bishopricke of Herford, to be bishop of Londō, at which time y^e said Boner according to the statute law of England, tooke his othe to the king, knowledging his supremacie, and called one of y^e aforesaid Englishmen that printed y^e bible, whom he then loued, although afterward vpon the change of the worlde he did hate him as much, whose name was Richard Grafton: to whom the said Boner saide when he tooke his othe, maister Grafton, so it is, that the kings most excellent maiestie hath by his gracious gift presented me to the Bishopricke of London,* for the which I am sory, for if it would haue pleased his grace, I could haue bene well content to haue kept mine old bishopricke of Herford. Then said Grafton I am right glad to heare of it, and so I am sure will bee a great number of the Citie of London: for though they yet know you not, yet they haue heard so much goodnes of you frō hence,* as no doubt they wil hartily reioyce of your placing. Then said Boner, I pray God I may doe that may content them, and to tel you M. Grafton. Before god (for that was commonly his othe) the greatest fault that. I euer found in Stokesley, was for vexing and troubling of poore men, as Loblely the bookebinder and other, for hauing the scripture in english, and God willing he did not so much hinder it, but I wil as much further it, and I wil haue of your Bibles set vp in the Church of Paules, at the least in sundrie places sixe of them,* and I will pay you honestly for them and giue you hartie thanks. Which wordes hee then spake in the hearing of diuers credible persons, as Edmund Stile Grocer, and other. But now M Grafton at this time I haue specially called you to be a witnes with me that vpon this translation of Bishops Sees, I must according to the statute take an othe vnto the kings maiestie knowledging his Supremacie, which before God I take with my heart and so thinke him to be,* and beseech almightie God to saue him, and long to prosper his grace: holde the booke sirah, and reade you the oth (said he) to one of his chapleins, & he layd his hand on the booke and so he tooke his othe. And after this he shewed great friendship to the saide Grafton, and to his partener Edward Whitchurch, but specially to Myles Couerdail, who was the corrector of the great Bible.

Now after that the foresaid letters were deliuered, the French kyng gaue very good wordes, and was well content to permit the doing therof. And so the printer went for'ward and printed forth the booke euen to the last part, and then was the quarell picked to the printer, and he was sent for to the inquisitors of the fayth,* and there charged with certaine articles of heresie. Then were sent for the Englishmen that were at the cost and charge thereof, and also such as had the correction of the same, which was Myles Couerdale, but hauing some warning what would folow the said Englishmē posted away as fast they could to saue themselues, leauing behynd them all their Bibles, which were to the number of 2500. called the Bibles of the great volume, and neuer recouered any of them, sauing that the Lieftenaunt criminal hauing them deliuered vnto hym to burne in a place of Paris (like Smithfield) called Mauibert place, was somewhat mooued with couetousnes,* and sold 4. great dry fattes of them to a Haberdasher to lap in caps, and those were bought againe, but the rest were burned, to the great and importunate losse of those that bare the charge of them. But notwithstanding the sayd losse after they had recouered some part of the foresayde bookes, and were comforted and encouraged by the Lord Cromwell, the said Englishmen went agayne to Paris, & there got the presses, letters, and seruants of the aforesayd Printer, and brought them to London, and there they became printers themselues (which before they neuer entended) and printed out the said Bible in London,* and after that printed sundry impressions of them: but yet not without great trouble and losse, for the hatred of the bishops namely, Steuen Gardiner, and his fellowes, who mightily did stomacke and maligne the printing thereof.

Here by the way, for the more direction to the story, thou hast louyng Reader, to note and vnderstand that in those daies there were ij. sundry Bibles in English, printed and set forth, bearing diuers titles, and printed in diuers places. The first was called Thomas Mathews Bible, printed at Hambrough, about the yeare of our Lord, 1532. the corrector of which print was then Iohn Rogers, of whom ye shall heare more Christ willing hereafter. The Printers were Richard Grafton, and Whitchurch. In the translation of this Bible, the greatest doer was in deede William Tyndall, who with the helpe of Miles Coue[•]ale had translated all the bookes thereof, except onely the Apocrypha, and certaine notes in the margent which were added after. But because the said William Tyndall in the meane tyme was apprehended before this Bible was fully perfected,* it was thought good to thē which had the doing therof, to chaunge the name of William Tyndall, because that name then was odious, and to farther it by a strāge name of Thomas Mathew, Iohn Rogers the same time beyng corrector to the print, who had then translated the residue of the Apocripha, and added also certaine notes thereto in the margent,* and therof came it to be called Thomas Mathewes Bible. Which Bible of Thomas Mathew, after it was imprinted and presented to the Lord Cromwell, & the Lord Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, who liked very well of it, the sayd Cromwell presented it to y^e kyng, and obtained that the same might freely passe to be read of hys subiectes with hys graces licence: So that there was Printed vpon the same booke, one lyue in red letters with these wordes: Set forth with the Kings most gracious licence.

The setting forth of this booke did not a little offend the Clergy, namely, the Bishop aforesayd, both for the Prologues, & specially because in the same booke was one special table collected of the common places in the Bible, and the scriptures for the approbation of the same, & chiefly about the supper of the lord and mariage of priests, and the masse, which there was said not to be found in Scripture.

Furthermore, after the restraint of this foresayde Bible of Mathew,* another Bible began to be printed at Paris, an. 1540. Which was called the Bible of the large Uolume. The Printers whereof were the foresayde Richard Grafton, and Whitchurche which bare the charges. A great helper thereto was the lord Cromwell. The chieffest ouerseer was Myles Couerdale, who taking the translation of Tyndall, conferred the same with the Hebrue, and amended many things.

In this Bible, although the former notes of Thomas Mathew was omitted,* yet sondry markes & handes were annexed in the sides, which ment that in those places shuld be made certeine notes, wherwith also the clergy was offended, though the notes were not made.

After this, the bishops bringing their purpose to passe, brought the Lord Cromwell out of fauour, and shortly to his death: and not long after, great complaint was made to the king of the translation of the Bible, and of y^e preface of the same,* and then was the sale of the Bible commaunded to be stayed, the B. promising to amend & correct it, but neuer performing the same: Then Grafton was called, & first charged with the printing of Mathewes Bible, but he being feareful of trouble, made excuses for himselfe in all things. Then was he examined of the great Bible, and what notes he was purposed to make. To the which he aunswered, that he knewe none. For his purpose was to haue retayned learned men to haue made the notes,* but when he perceyued the kynges maiestie, and his Clergye not willing to haue any, he proceded no further. But for al these excuses, Grafton was sent to the Fleet, and there remayned Page 1192 vi. wekes, and before he came out, was bound in CCC.li that he should neither sell, nor imprint, or cause to be imprinted any moe Bibles, vntill the king & the clergy should agree vpon a translation. And thus was the Bible from that tyme stayed, during the raigne of Kyng Henry the viij.

But yet one thing more is to be noted, that after the imprinters had lost their Bibles, they continued suiters to Boner, as is aforesaid, to be a meane for to obteyne of the French king their bookes againe: but so long they continued suters, and Boner euer fed them with faire wordes, promising them much, but did nothing for them, till at the last Boner was discharged of his ambassade, and returned home, where he was right ioyfully welcomed home by the lord Cromwell, who loued him dearely, and had a maruelous good opinion of him.* And so long as Cromwell remained in autoritie, so long was Boner at his beck and friend to his friends, and enemy to his enimies: as namely, at that tyme to Gardmer B. of Winchester, who neuer fauoured Cromwell, & therefore Boner could not fauour him, but that he and Winchester were the greatest enemies that might be.* But so soone as Cromwell fel, immediatly Boner and Winchester pretended to be the greatest men that liued, and no good word could Boner speake of Cromwell, but the lewdest, vilest, and bitterest that he could speake, calling him the rankest heretike that euer liued: and then such as the sayd Boner knew to be in good fauour with Cromwell,* he could neuer abide their sight. Insomuch, as the next day after that Cromwell was apprehēded, the abouenamed Grafton, who before had bene very fam•liar• with Boner, met with the sayd Boner sodenly, and sayd vnto hym, that he was sory to heare of the newes that then was abroad. What are they, sayd he? Of the apprehension of the L. Cromwell, sayd Grafton. Are ye sory for that (sayd he?) It had bene good that he had bene dispatched long ago. With that Grafton looked vpon hym and knew not what to say, but came no more to Boner. Howbeit afterward the sayd Grafton beyng charged for the imprinting of a ballet made in the fauour of Cromwel was called before the Councel,* where Boner was present and there Boner charged hym with the wordes that hee spake to hym of Cromwell, and told out a great long tale. But the lord Awdeley, who then was Lord Chauncellor, right discretly and honourably, cut of the matter, and entered into other talke.

The history of Robert Barnes, Thomas Garret, and William Hierome, diuines.

Like as in forreine battails the chiefe poynt of victorie consisteth in the safetie of the Generall or captayne:* euen so when the valiaunt standerd bearer and stay of the church of England, Tho. Cromwell I meane, was made away, pitie it is to behold, what miserable slaughter of good men and good women ensued thereupon, wherof we haue now (Christ willing) to entreat. For Winchester hauyng now gotten his full purpose & free swinge to exercise his cruelty, wonder it was to see that Aper Calydonius, or (as the scripture speaketh) that Ferus singularis,* what troubles he raised in the Lordes vineyard. And least by delayes he might loose the occasion presently offered, he straight wais made his first assaultes vpon Robert Barnes, Thomas Garret and William Hierome, whom in y^e very same moneth within ij. dayes after Cromwels death, he caused to be put to execution. Whose histories seuerally to comprehend, first of all we will somewhat speake of Barnes D. of diuinitie, whose perticular story here followeth.

This Barnes, after he came from the Uniuersitie of Louaine,* went to Cambridge, where he was made Prior and maister of the house of the Augustines. At that tyme the knowledge of good letters was scarcely entred into the Uniuersitie, all things beyng full of rudenes and barbaritie, sauing in very few, which wer priuy and secret. Wherupon Barnes hauing some feeling of better learning and authors, began in his house to read Terence, Plautus, & Cicero,* so that what with his industry, paines & labours, and with the helpe of Tho. Parnell his scholer, whom he brought from Louane with him, reading Copia verborum & rerum, he caused the house shortly to flourish with good letters, and made a great part of the house learned (which before were drowned in barbarous rudenesse) as M. Cambridge, maister Felde, M. Colman, M. Burley, M. Couerdall, with diuers other of the Uniuersitie, that sojourned there for learnings sake. After these foundations laid, then did he read openly in the house, Paules Epistles, and put by Duns and Dorbel, and ye• he was a questionarye himselfe: and onely because he would haue Christ there taught and his holy word, he turned their vnsauory Problemes and fruitles disputations to other better matter of the holy scripture, & thereby in short space he made diuers good diuines. The same order of disputatiō which he kept in his house, he obserued likewise in the vniuersitie abroad whē he shuld dispute with any man in the commō scholes. And the first man that answered Doctor Barnes in the Scriptures, was Maister Stafford for his forme to bee Bachelor of diuinitie, which disputation was maruelous in the sight of the great blynde Doctors, and ioyfull to the godly spirited.

Thus Barnes what with his reading, disputation and preaching, became famous and mighty in the Scriptures, preaching euer against bishops and hypocrites, and yet did not see his inward & outward idolatry, which he both taught and mainteined, till that good M. Bilney, with other (as is aforesayd in the lyfe of M. Bilney) conuerted him wholly vnto Christ.

The first sermon that euer he preached of this truth, was the Sonday before Christmas day, at S. Edwardes church longing to Trinitie hall in Cambridge,* by y^e Pease marker: whose theame was the epistle of the same sonday, Gaudete in domino, &c. and so postilled the whole epistle, folowyng the scripture and Luthers postill, and for that sermon he was immediatly accused of heresie by ij. fellowes of the kings hall. Then the godly learned in Christ both of Penbroke hall, S. Iohns, Peter house, Queenes colledge the Kings colledge, Gunwell hall, & Benet college, sh•wed themselues & flocked together in open sight, both in the scholes, and at open Sermons at S. Maries, and at the Austens, and at other disputations, and then they conferred continually together.

The house that they resorted most commonly vnto, was the white horse, which for despite of them to bryng Gods word into contempt was called Germany. This house especially was chosen because of them of S. Iohns. The kings colledge, and the Queenes colledge, came in on the backe side. At this tyme much trouble began to ensue. The aduersaries of D. Barnes accused him in the Regēt house before the Uicechancelor, where as his articles were presented with him & receyued, he promising to make answer at the next conuocation, and so it was done. Then Doctor Nottoris a ranke enemy to Christ, mooued Doct. Barnes to recant, but he refused so to do: which appeareth in hys booke that he made to king Henry the 8. in English, confuting the iudgement of cardinall Wolsey, and the residue of the Bishops papisticall,* and so for the tyme stode stedfast. And this tragedy continued in Cambridge, one preachyng agaynst another, in trying out of Gods truth, vntil within vj. dayes of Shrouetyde. Then sodenly was sent downe to Cambridge a sergeaunt of armes called maister Gibson, dwelling in s. Thomas Apostles in Londō,* who sodēly arested D. Barnes openly in the conuocatiō house, to make all other afraid: and priuily they had determined to make search for Luthers bookes, and all the Germaines workes sodenly.

But good D. Farman of the Queenes Colledge, sent word incontinently thereof,* to the chambers of those that were suspected, which were in number xxx. persons. But God be praysed they were conueied, by that tyme that the sergeant at armes, the Uicechauncelor and the Proctours were at euery mans chamber,* goyng directly to the place where the bookes lay (wherby it was perceiued that there were some priuy spies amongst that small company) and that night they studied together and gaue him his answer, which answer he caried with him to Londō the next morning, which was Tuesday before Shrouesonday,* & came on the Wednesday to London, & lay at M. Parnels house by the stockes. In the morning he was caried by the Sergeant at armes to cardinal Wolsey to Westminster, waytyng there all day, and could not speak with him til night.* Then by the reason of D. Gardiner Secretary to the cardinall (of whose familiar acquaintance he had bene, before) and M. Foxe M. of the Wardes, he spake the same nyght with the cardinal in his chamber of estate, kneeling on his knees. Then sayd the cardinall to them, is this D. Barnes your man that is accused of heresie? Yea, and please your grace, and we trust you shall find him reformable, for he is both well learned and wise.

What M. doctor (sayd the cardinal) had you not a sufficient scope in the scriptures to teach the people,* but that my golden shewes, my pollaxes, my pillers, my goldē cusshiōs, my crosses did so sore offēd you, that you must make vs Ridiculum caput amongst the people. We were iolily y^t day laughed to scorne. Uerily it was a sermon more fitter to be preached on a stage, thē in a pulpit: for at the last you sayd, I weare a payre of red gloues, I should say bloudye gloues (quoth you) that I should not be cold in the midst of my ceremonies, And he answered. I spake nothing but Page 1193 the truth out of the scriptures, according to my conscience and according to the old Doctors: and then did hee deliuer him vi. sheetes of paper written to confirme and corroborate his sayinges.

He receaued them smiling on him, and saying, we perceiue then that you intend to stand to your Articles and to shew your learning.

Yea sayde Barnes that I doe intend by Gods grace, with your Lordships fauour.

He answered, such as you are do beare vs litle fauour & the catholicke church. I will aske you a question. Whether do you thinke it more necessary that I should haue al this royaltie, because I represent the kings maiesties person in all the hie courtes of this realme, to the terrour & keeping downe of all rebellions, treasons, traytors, all the wicked and corrupt members of this common wealth, or to be as simple as you would haue vs,* to sell al these foresayd thinges, and to geue it to the poore, whiche shortly will pisse it agaynst the walles, and to pull awaye this maiestie of a princely dignitie, which is a terrour to all the wicked, and to follow your counsell in this behalfe.

He answered I thinke it necessary to be sold and geuen to the poore. For this is not comely for your calling, nor y^e kinges maiestie is not mayntayned by your pompe & pollaxes, but by God, who sayth: Per me reges regnant. Kinges and theyr maiesties raigne and stand by me.

Then answered he: Lo M. Doctors, here is the learned the wise man that you told me of. Then they kneeled down and said: we desire your grace to be good vnto him, for hee will be reformable.

*Then sayd he, stand you vp, for your sakes & the Uniuersitie we wil be good vnto him. How say you M. doctor do you not knowe that I am Legatus de latere, and that I am able to dispense in all matters concerning religion wⁱn this realme, as much as the pope may? He sayd, I knowe it to be so.

Will you then be ruled by vs, & we will do al thinges for your honesty, and for the honesty of the Uniuersitie?

He answered, I thanke your grace for your good wil, I will sticke to the holy scripture and to Gods booke, according to the simple talent that God hath lent me.

Aunswere well sayd he, thou shalt haue thy learnyng tryed to the vttermost, and thou shalt haue the law.

Then he required him that he might haue iustice wyth equitye, and forthwyth he shoulde haue gone to the tower, but that Gardiner & Foxe became his sureties that nyght, and so he came home to M. Parnels house again, and that night fell to wryting againe and slepte not, M. Couerdale, M. Goodwin & M. Feld being his wryters: and in y^e morning he came to Yorke place to Gardiner and Fox, and by & by he was committed to the Sergeant of armes to bring hym into the chapter house at Westminster before the Byshops, and the Abbot of Westminster called Islip.

The same time when D. Barnes should appeare before the cardinall,* there were 5. Stilliard mē to be examined for Luthers bookes and Lollardy, but after they spied Barns they set the other aside, and asked the Sergeaunt of armes what was his errand. He sayd he had brought one Doctor Barnes to be examined of heresie, and presented both hys Articles and hys accusers. Then immediatly after a little talke, they sware him & laid his articles to him. Who lyke as he answered the cardinal before, so sayd he vnto them, & then he offred the booke of his probations vnto them. Who asked hym whether he had another for himself, and he said, yea, shewing it vnto them. Who then tooke it from him, & said they should haue no laisure to dispute with him at that present for other affaires of the kings maiestie, which they had to do, and therfore had him stand aside. Then they called the Stilliarde men againe one by one, and when they were examined,* they called forth the M. of the Fleete, and they were committed al to the Fleete. Then they called D. Barnes again, and asked him whether he would subscribe to his Articles or no, and he subscribed willingly: and then they committed him and yong M. Parnel to the Flete also wyth the other.* There they remayned till Saterdaye in the morning, and the Warden of the Fleete was commanded that no man should speake with hym.

On the saterday he came againe afore them into y^e chapter house,* and there with the stilliard men remained till 5. a clocke at nyght. And after long disputations, threatnings, & scornings, about 5. a clocke at nyghte, they called hym, to know whether he would abiure or burne. He was then in a great agony, & thought rather to burn thē to abiure. But thē was he sent again to haue y^e counsel of Gard. and Fox, & they persuaded him rather to abiure thē to burn, because (they said) he shuld do more in time to come, & with diuers other perswasions that were mighty in the sight of reason & foolish flesh. Upon that, kneeling vpon his knees, he cōsented to abiure, and the abiuration put in hys hande, hee abiured as it was there wrytten, and then hee subscribed wyth hys owne hand:*, and yet they would scarcely receyue hym into the bosome of the Church, as they termed it. Then they put hym to an oth, and charged him to execute, doe, and fulfill all that they commaunded him, and he promised so to doe.

Then they commaunded the Warden of the Fleete to carye hym with his fellowes to the place from whence he came, and to be kept in close pryson, and in the morning to prouide 5. fagots for D. Barnes, and the 4. Stilliard men. The 5. Stilliard man was commanded to haue a taper of 5. poūd waight to be prouided for him, to offer to the roode of Northen in Paules, and all these things to be ready by 8. of the clocke in the morning, and that hee with all that he could make, with bils and gleaues, and y^e knight marshall withal his tipstaues that he could make, shuld bring them to Paules and conduct them home again. In the morning they were all readye by theyr houre appoynted in Paules church, the church being so full that no man coulde get in. The Cardinal had a scaffold made on the top of the staires for himselfe, with 36. Abbots, mitred Priors and byshops, and he in his whole pompe mitred (whiche Barnes spake against) sate there inthronized, his Chapleins and spirituall doctors in gownes of damaske and satine, and he hymselfe in purple, euen like a bloudye Antichriste. And there was a new pulpit erected on the top of the staires also, for the B. of Rochester to preache against Luther and Doctor Barnes:*, and great baskets full of bookes standing before them within the railes, which was commaunded after the great fire was made afore the roode of Northen there to be burned, and these heretikes after the sermon to goe thryse about the fire, and to cast in theyr fagots.

Now while the sermon was a doing, D. Barnes and the stilliard men were commanded to knele downe & aske God forgeuenes, the catholike church and cardinals grace and after that hee was commaunded at the ende of the sermon to declare that he was more charitablier hādled, then he deserued or was worthy (hys heresies were so horrible and so detestable) and once againe kneeled downe on hys knees, and desiring the people of forgeuenesse and to praye for him, and so the cardinal departed vnder a canapie with all his mitred men with him, till he came to the second gate of Paules, and then he tooke his mule, and the mitred men came backe againe. Then these poore men being commanded to come downe from the stage (whereon the sweepers vse to stande when they sweepe the Church) the Byshops sate them downe againe and commanded the knight marshall and the Warden of the Fleete with theyr company to carie them aboute the fire, and so were they brought to the bishops, and there for absolution kneeled downe. Where Rochester stode vp and declared vnto the people how many dayes of pardon and forgeuenes of sinnes they had for beyng at that Sermon,*, and there did assoyle D. Barnes wyth the other, and shewed the people that they were receiued into the church agayne.

This done, the Warden of the Fleete and the Knyght Marshall were commanded to haue them to the Fleete againe, and charged that they should haue the libertie of the Flete as other prisoners had, and that theyr frends myght resort vnto them, and there to remaine till the Lorde Cardinals pleasure was knowen.

After that Barnes there in the Fleete had cōtinued the space of halfe a yeare, at length beyng deliuered, was committed to be free prisoner at the Austen friers in London. When those Caterpillers and bloody beasts had there vndermined hym, they complained againe to their Lord cardinall. Wherupon he was remoued to the Austen Fryers of Northampton, there to be burned. Yet he himself vnder stāding nothing therof, but supposing still y^t he shuld there remaine and continue in free prison, at last one M. Horne, who had brought hym vp, and was his speciall frende, hauing intelligence of the writte which should shortly be sent downe to burne him, gaue him counsaile to faine him selfe to be desperate, and that hee shoulde wryte a letter to the Cardinal and leaue it on his table where he lay, and a paper by, to declare whether he was gone to drown hymself, & to leaue his clothes in the same place: * and there an other letter to be left to the Maior of the towne to search for hym in the water, because hee had a letter written in parchment about hys necke, closed in waxe, for the Cardinall, whyche would teach all men to beware by hym. Uppon thys, they were 7. dayes in searching for hym, but hee was conueyed to London in a pore mans apparel, and so taried not there but tooke shipping and went by long Seas to Antwerpe, and so to Luther, and there fell to studie till hee had made aunswere to all the Bishops of the Realme, and had made Page 1203 a Booke intituled, Acta Romanorum pontificum. And an other booke wyth a supplication to king Henrie. Immediatly it was tolde the Cardinall, that he was drowned, and he sayde, Perit memoria eius cum sonitu. But thys did lyghte vppon hymselfe shortly after, whyche wretchedly dyed at Leicester.

In the meane season D. Barnes was made strong in Christ, * and got fauour both of the learned in Christe, & forreine Princes in Germanye, and was great wyth Luther, Melancthon, Pomeran, Iustus Ionas, Hegendorphinus and Aepinus, and with the Duke of Saxon, and the king of Denmarke, which king of Denmarke in the time of More and Stokesley sent hym wyth the Lubeckes, as an Ambassadour, to king Henry the viij. He lay wyth the Lubeckes Chauncellor at the Stilliard.

Syr Tho. More then Chancelour, woulde fayne haue entrapped him,  but the king would not let him, for Cromwell was his great frende. And ere he went, the Lubeckes & he disputed wyth the Bishops of this realme in defence of the truth, and so he departed agayne wythout restraunte wyth the Lubeckes. After hys going againe to Wittemb. to the Duke of Saxon, and to Luther, hee remained there to set forwardes hys workes in Printe that he had begon, from whence hee returned againe in the beginning of the raigne of Queene Anne,  as other did, & continued a faythfull preacher in this Citie, being all her time wel entertained and promoted. After that, he was sent Ambassador by K. Henrye the 8. to the Duke of Cleue, for the marriage of y^e Lady Anne of Cleue, betwene the king and her, and was wel accepted in that Ambassade and in all hys doings, * vntil the time that Ste. Gardiner came out of Fraunce: but after he came, neither religion prospered, nor the Queenes maiestie, nor Cromwell, nor the preachers, who after the marryage of the Ladie Anne of Cleue, neuer ceased vntill hee had grafted the mariage in an other stocke, by the occasion wherof he began his bloody broyle.

For not long after, Doctor Barnes with hys brethren were apprehended and caryed before the kyngs maiestie to Hampton courte, and there he was examined. Where the kynges maiestie seeking the meanes of his safety, to bring Wintc. and hym agreed, at Wynchesters request, graunted him leaue to go home with the bishop to cōferre with him and so he did. But as it happened they not agreeing, Gardiner and his cōpartners sought by al subtil meanes, how to entangle and to entrappe them in further danger, which not long after was brought to passe. For by certaine complaintes made to the kinge of them, they were enioyned to preache 3. sermones the next Easter folowing at the Spittle. At the which sermones, besides other reporters which were thether sent, Ste. Gardiner also was there present sitting with the Maior, either to beare recorde of theyr recantation, or els as the Phariseis came to Christ, to trippe them in their talke, if they had spokē any thing awry. Whē these 3. had thus preached their Sermons, among whome Barnes preaching the first sermon, and seeing Ste. Gardiner there present, humbly desired him in the face of al the audience, if he forgaue hym, to holde vp hys hande, and the sayd Gardiner thereupon held vp his finger: yet notwithstanding shortly after by the meanes of the sayd reporters, they were sent for to Hampton Courte: who from thence were caryed to the tower by Syr Iohn Gostwike. From whence they neuer came out till they came to theyr death, as hereafter Christ willing shall more appeare.

And thus hetherto concerning the hystorye of Barnes. Nowe let vs likewise consider the storye and doinges of Thomas Garet.

The story of Tho. Garret or Garrerd, and of his trouble in Oxford, testified and recorded by Antony Dalaber, who was there present the same tyme.

ABout the yere of our Lord 1526. Maister Garret Curate of Hony Lane in London, came vnto Oxford, and brought with him sondry bookes in Latin,* treating of the Scripture, with the first parte of Vnio dissidentium, & Tindals first translation of the new Testament in English, the which bookes he sold to diuers scholers in Oxford.

After he had ben there a while, and had dispatched those bookes,* newes came from London that hee was searched for through al London to be apprehended and taken as an heretike, and to be imprisoned for selling of those hereticall bookes (as they termed them) because they spake agaynste the vsurped authority, and erroneous doctrine of the B. of Rome, and his no lesse impure and filthy Synagoge. For it was not vnknownen to Cardinall Wolsey, and to the B. of London, and to other of that vngodly generation, that M. Garret had a great number of those bookes, and that he was gone to Oxford to make sale of them there, to suche as he knew to be the louers of the Gospel.* Wherefore they determined forthwith to make a priuie searche through all Oxford to apprehende and imprison hym, and to burne all and euery hys foresayd bookes and him to, if they coule: so burning hote was their charitie. But yet at that time one of the foresayde Proctours,* called M. Cole of Magdalene colledge, who after was crosse bearer vnto Cardinal Wolsey, was wel acquainted with M. Garret, and therefore he gaue secret warning vnto a frende or two of M. Garret of this priuie search, and willed therefore that he shuld forthwith as secretly as he could, depart out of Oxford, for if he were taken in the same search, no remedy but he shoulde be forthwith sent vp vnto the Cardinall, and so should be cōmitted vnto the Tower.

The Christmas before that time, I Antonye Dalaber then Scholer of Alborne Hall,* who had bookes of maister Garrets, had bene in my countrey in Dorsetshire at Stalbridge, where I had a brother Person of that Parish, who was verye desirous to haue a Curate out of Oxforde, and willed me in any wise to gette him one there if I coule. Thys iust occasion offered, it was thoughte good amonge the brethren (for so did wee not onely call one an other, but were in deede one to an other) that maister Garret chaunging hys name, should be sent foorth wyth my letters into Dorsetshire vnto my brother, to serue him there for a time, vntill hee myghte secreately from thence conueye hymselfe some whether ouer the Sea. According hereunto I wrote my letters in all haste possible vnto my brother, for maister Garret to be hys Curate, but not declaring what hee was in dede, for my brother was a rancke papist,* and after was the most mortall ennemie that euer I had for the Gospels sake.

So the wedensday in the morning before Shroftyde, M. Garret departed out of Oxforde, toward Dorsetshyre, with his letters for his new seruice. How farre he went, & by what occasion he so soone returned, I know not. But the Friday next,* in the night time he came agayne to Rodleyes house, where he lay before, and so after midnight in the priuy search, whiche was then made for him, hee was apprehended and taken there in his bed by y^e 2. Proctours and on the saterday in y^e morning was deliuered vnto one D. Cotisford, M. of Lincolne Colledge, then being Comissary of the vniuersitie, who kept hym as prisoner in hys owne chamber. There was great ioy and reioysing amōg all the papistes for his apprehension, and specially wyth Doctor London: Warden of the new Colledge, and Doctour Higdon Deane of Frideswides, two Archpapistes. Who immediately sent theyr letters in post hast vnto the Cardinall to enforme him of y^e apprehēsiō of this notable Hereticke: for the whiche theyr doying, they were well assured to haue great thanks. But of all this sodayne hurly burley, was I vtterly ignoraunt, so that I knewe neither of maister Garrets so sodayne returne, neyther that hee was so taken, vntill that afterward he came vnto my chāber, being then in Glocester Colledge, as a man amased, & as soone as he saw me, he sayd he was vndone, for he was taken. Thus he spake vnaduisedly in the presence of a young man that came with him. When the yong man was departed, I asked him what hee was, and what acquayntaunce he had with hym. He sayd he knew hym not, but he had bene to seeke a Monke of his acquayntaunce in that Colledge, who was not in his chamber, and thereupon desired that his seruaunt (not knowing my chamber, for that I was newly remoued thether) to bring him to me: and so forth declared how he was returned and taken that night in the priuy search, as ye haue heard and that now when the Commissary & al his company were gone to Euensong, and had locked him alone in his chamber,* he hearing no body stirring in the Colledge, put backe the bar of the locke with his finger, and so came straight vnto Glocester Colledge, to speake with that monke, if he had bene within, who had also bought bookes of him.

Then sayd I vnto him: Alas M. Garret, by this your vncircumspect comming vnto me, and speaking so before this young man, you haue disclosed your selfe, and vtterly vndone me. I asked him why he went not vnto my brother wyth my letters accordingly. Hee sayde, after that hee was gone a dayes iourney and a halfe, he was so fearefull, that his heart would no other, but that he must needes returne againe vnto Oxford, and so came againe on Friday• at night, and then was takē, as ye heard before. But now wyth deepe sighes, and plentie of teares, hee prayed mee to helpe to conuey him away, and so he cast of his hooide & hys gowne, wherein he came vnto me, and desired me to geue him a coate with sleeues, if I had any,* and tolde me that he wold go into Wales, and thence conuey himself into Germany, if he might. Thē I put on him a sleued coat of mine. Page 1195 He woulde also haue had an other maner of cap of me, but I had none but priestlike, such as his owne was.

Then kneeled we both downe together on our knees, and lifting vp our hearts and hands to God our heauenly father, desiring him wyth plentie of teares, so to conducte and prosper him in his iourney, that he myght well escape the daunger of al his enemies, to y^e glory of his holy name. if his good pleasure and will so were, and then we embraced and kissed the one the other, the teares so abundantly flowing out from both our eies,* that we al bewet both our faces, and scarcely for sorrowe could we speake one to the other, and so he departed from me, apparelled in my coate, being committed vnto the tuition of oure almyghtye and mercifull father.

When he was gone downe the staires from my chamber, I straightwayes did shut my chamber doore, and wēt into my study, and tooke the new Testament in my hands, kneeled downe on my knees, and with many a deepe sigh and salt teare, I did wyth much deliberation read ouer the 10. chapter of S. Mathew his Gospell: and when I had so done,* with feruent prayer I did cōmit vnto God, that our dearely beloued brother Garret, earnestly beseeching him, in and for Iesus Christes sake, his onely begotten sonne our Lord, that he would vouchsafe, not only safely to conducte and keepe our saide deare brother, from the hands of all his ennemies, but also that he would endue hys tender and lately borne litle flock in Oxford, w^t heauenly strength by his holy spirite, that they might be well able therby valiauntly to wythstand to hys glory, al their fierce enemies, and also myght quietly, to theyr owne saluation, with all godly pacience, beare Christes heauy crosse, which I now •awe was presently to be laide on their young and weake backes, vnable to beare so huge a burden, w^tout the greate helpe of his holy spirite.

This done, I laide a side my bookes safe, folded vp M. Garrets gowne and hoode, and laide them into my presse among mine apparel, & so hauing put on my short gowne, shut vp my study and chamber doores, and went towards Friswides, to speake with that worthy martyr of God M. Clarke, and others, and to declare vnto them what hadde happened that after noone. But of purpose I went by S. Mary church,* to goe firste vnto Corpus Christi Colledge, to speake with Diet and Udall, my faithfull brethren and fellowes in the Lord there. But by chaunce I mette by the way wyth a brother of ours, one master Eeden, fellowe of Magdalene Colledge, who, assoone as hee sawe mee, came with a pitifull countenance vnto mee, saying that we were all vndone, for M. Garret was returned agayne to Oxforde, taken the last night in the priuie searche, and was in prison with the Commissary. I sayd it was not so. He sayd it was so. I tolde him it could not be so, for I was sure he was gone. He aunswered me and sayde, I knowe he was gone with your letters, but he came again yesterday in the euen, & was taken in his bed at Radleis this nyghte in the priuie search: for (quod he) I heard our Proctour M. Cole say and declare the same this day in our colledge, to diuers of the house. But I told him againe, that I was wel assured he was now gone, for I spake with him later thē either the Proctor or Commissarie did, and then I declared the whole matter vnto him, how and when he came vnto me, and howe hee went hys way, willinge hym to declare the same vnto other our brethren whom he should meete with all, and to geue God harty thanks for his wonderfull deliuerance, and to pray him also that he would graūt hym safely to passe away from al his enemies, and told him that I was goinge vnto mayster Clarke of Friswides, to declare vnto him this matter, for I knewe, & thought verely that he and diuers others there, were then in great sorrowe for this matter. Then went I straight to Friswides, and Euensong was begon, and the Deane and the other Canons were there in their gray Amices: they were almost at Magnificat before I came thether,* I stode at the quier doore and heard master Tauerner play, and others of the Chappell there sing, wyth and among whome I my selfe was wont to sing also, but now my singing and musicke was turned into sighing and musing.

As I thus and there stode, in commeth D. Cotisforde the Commissary,* as fast as euer he could goe, bare headed, as pale as ashes (I knewe his grieffe well inough) and to the Deane he goeth into the Quier, where he was sittinge in hys stall, and talked wyth him verely sorrowfully: what I know not, but whereof I might and did well and truely gesse. I went aside from the Quier doore:

to see & heare more. The Commissary and Deane came out of the Quier wonderfully troubled, as it seemed. Aboute the middle of the Church met them D. London, puffing, blustering and blowing like a hungry and gredy Lion seeking hys pray. They talked together a while, but the Commissarie was much blamed of them for keeping of hys prisoner so negligently, in so much that hee wepte for sorrowe: and it was knowen abroade, that master Garret was escaped, & gone out of the Commissaries chamber at Euensonge tune, but whether no man coulde tell. These doctours departed, and sent abrode their seruants and spies euery where. Maister Clarke aboute the middle of Compline,* came foorth of the Quier: I followed him to his chamber, and declared what was happened that after noone, of master Garrets escape. He was glad, for he knewe of his foretaking. Then he sent for one M. Sumner anst M. Bets,* fellowes and Canons there. In the mean• while he gaue me a very godly exhortation, praying God to geue me and all the rest of our brethren, prudentiam serpentini, & simplicitatē columbinam, for we shoulde haue shortly much neede thereof, as he ve•ely thought. When M. Sumner and M. Bets were come vnto him, hee caused mee to declare againe the whole matter vnto them two, and they were very glad, that M. Garret was so deliuered, trusting that he should escape al his enemies. Then desiring them to tell vnto our other brethren, what was happened (for there were diuers other in that Colledge) I went to Corpus Christi colledge to comfort our brethren, there being in like heauines. There I taried and supped wyth them. At whiche supper we were not very merie, considering our state and pearill at hand.

When we had ended our supper, and committed our whole cause with feruent sighes and hartly prayers vnto God our heauenly father, I went to Alborne hall, & there lay that night. In the morning I was vp very early, and as soone as I could get out at the dore, I went straight to^ward Gloucester Colledge to my chamber. It had rayned that morning, and with my goyng I had all to be sprinckled my hose and shoes with myre. And when I was come vnto Gloucester colledge, which was about 6. of the clock, I found the gates fast shut. Whereat I did much marueile for they were wont to be opened dayly long before y^e time. Then did I walke vp and downe by y^e wal there, a whole houre before the gates were opened. In the meane whyle my musing head being full of forecasting cares, & my sorowfull hart flowing with dolefull sighes, I fully determined in my conscience before God, that if I shuld chance to be taken & be examined, I would accuse no man nor declare any thing further then I did already perceauie was manifestly known before. And so when the gate was opened, thinking to shift my selfe & to put on a longer gowne, went in towards my chamber, & goyng vp the stayres would haue opened my dore, but I could not in a lōg season do it. Wherby I perceiued that my lock had ben medled w^tall, and therewith was somewhat altered. Yea at last with much ado I opened the locke and went in.* When I came in, I saw my bed all to tossed and tūbled, my clothes in my presse throwne down, & my study dore open. Wherof I was much amased, and thought verily y^t some searche was made there that night for M. Garret, and that it was knowne of his being with me, by the Monkes man that brought him to my chamber.

Now was there lying in the next chamber vnto me a Monke, who as soone as he had heard me in y^e chamber, came to me, and told howe M. Garret was sought in my chāber y^t night, and what ado there was made by the Cōmissary & the two proctors, with billes & swords thrust thorow my bedstraw, and how euery corner of my chāber was searched for M. Garret. And albeit his gowne and his hoode lay there in my presse with my clothes▪ yet they perceiued them not. Then he told me hee was commaunded to bring mee as soone as I came in, vnto the Priour of y^e students named Antony Dunstane a Monk of Westminster. This so troubled me that I forgot to make cleane my hose and shoes, & to shift me into an other gowne: and therefore, so all to be dirted as I was, & in my short gowne I went with him to the sayde Priors chamber, where I found the sayd Prior standing & looking for my comming.* He asked me where I hadde bene that night. I told him I lay at Alborne Hall with my old bedfellow Fitziamas, but he would not beleue me. He asked mee if M. Garret were with me yesterday, I told him yea. Then he would knowe where he was, and wherfore he came vnto me, I told hym I knew not where he was except he were at Woodstocke. For so (sayde I) hee had shewed me that he would goe thether, because one of the kepers there his frend, had promised him a peece of veneson to make mery withall the shroftide, and that he woulde haue borrowed a hatte and a payer of hygh shoes of me, but I had none in deede to lend hym. Thys tale I thought meetest, though it were nothyng so. Then hadde he spied on my forefinger a big ringe of siluer very well double gilted with 2. letters A. D. ingraued in it for my name: I suppose he thought it to be gold. He required to see it. I tooke it vnto hym. When hee hadde it in hys Page 1196 hand, he sayde it was hys ring, for therein was his name. an A. for Antonie,* and a D. for Dunstane. When I hearde hym so say, I wished in my heart to be as well delyuered from and out of hys company, as I was assured to be deliuered from my ryng for euer.

Then he called for pen, inke, and paper, and commāded me to wryte when & howe Garret came vnto me, & where he was become. I had not wrytten scarsly three woordes, but the chief bedle with ij. or iij. of the Commissaries men, were come, vnto Maister Prior, requiring hym strayghtwayes to bryng vs away vnto Lyncolne Colledge to the Commissarye, and to D. London. Whether when I was brought into the chapel, there I found D. Cotislorde commissarie, D. Higdon then Deane of the Cardinals Colledge, and D. London Warden of the new Colledge standinge together at the altare in the chappel. When I was brought vnto them, after salutations geuen and taken betweene them, they called for chaires and sate downe, & called for me to come to them. and fyrste they asked what my name was.* I told them that my name was Antonye Dalaber. Then they also asked me howe long I had bene student in the Uniuersitie, and I tolde them almost 3. yeares. And they asked mee what I studied. I tolde them that I had read sophistrie and logicke in Alborne Hal, and now was remoued vnto Glocester Colledge to study the Ciuil lawe, the which the foresayde Prior of the studentes affirmed to be true. Then they asked me whether I knew M. Garret, and how long I had knowen him. I told them I knew him wel, & had knowen him almost a tweluemōth. They asked me when he was with me. I told them yesterday at after noone.

Now by this time whiles they had me in this talke, one came vnto them which was sent for, w^t pen, inke and paper. I trowe it was the Clerke of the Uniuersitie. Assoone as he was come, there was a bourd & tres•es wyth a forme for him to sit on, set betweene the Doctours and me, and a great Masse booke layde before me, and I was commaunded to lay my right hand on it, and to sweare that I should truely aunswere vnto such articles and interrogatories as I should be by them examined vpon.* I made danger of it a while at first, but afterwarde being perswaded by them, partly by faire words, and partly by great threatens. I promised to do as they wold haue me, but in my hart nothyng so ment to do. So I layd my hand on the booke, and one of them gaue me my othe, and that done commaunded me to kisse the booke.* Then made they greate curtesie betweene them who should examine me, & minister interrogatoryes vnto me. At the last, the rankest Papistical Pharisey of thē all D. London tooke vpon hym to do it.

Then he asked me againe by my othe. where M. Garret was, and whether I had conueyed hym. I tolde him I had not conueyed hym, nor yet wist not where he was, nor whether he was gone, except he were gone to Wodstocke, (as I had before sayde) as he shewed me he woulde. Then he asked me agayne when he came to me, howe he came to me, what and howe long he talked with me, and whether he went from me, I tolde hym he came to me about euensong time, and that one brought hym vnto my Chamber doore, whome I knowe not, and that he told me he would goe to Woodstocke for some venison to make mery withall this Shroftide, and that he woulde haue borrowed a hatte, and a paire of high shoes of me, but I had none such to lēd hym, and then he straight went hys way frō me, but whether I knowe not. All these my sayings the scribe wrote in a paper booke.

Then they earnestly required me to tell them whether I had conueyed hym, for surely they sayde I brought hym going some whether this morning, for that thei might wel perceiue by my foule shoes and dirty hosen, that I had trauailed wyth hym the most part of this night. I aunswered plainly that I lay at Alborne Hall with sir Fitziamas, and that I had good witnes therof there. They asked me wher I was at Euensong. I tolde them at Friswides, and that I sawe firste M. Commissarie, and then maister D. London come thether at that time vnto M. Deane of Frisewides, and that I saw them talking together in y^e Church there. D. London and the Deane threatned mee, that if I would not tell the truthe where I had done hym, or whether he was gone, I should surely be sent vnto the Toure of London, and there be racked, and put into litle ease. But M. Commissary prayed me with gentle words to tell him where he was, that he might haue him againe, & he would be my very great frende, & deliuer me out of trouble straitway. I told hym I could not tel where he was, nor whether he was become. Thus did they occupie and tosse mee almost two houres in the chappel, sometimes with threatnings and foule wordes, and then wyth faire wordes and fayre promises flattering mee. Then was hee that brought M. Garret vnto my chamber, brought before me, and caused to declare what M. Garret sayde vnto me at hys comming to my chamber, but I saide plainely I heard him say no such thing, for I thoughte my nay to be as good as hys yea, seeing it was to rid and deliuer my Godly brother out of trouble and pearill of his life.

At the last, when they could get nothing of me whereby to hurt or accuse any mā, or to know any thyng of y^t which they sought, they al 3. together brought me vp a lōg staires into a great chamber ouer M. cōmissaries chamber,* wherin stode a great paire of very high stocks. Then M. Commissary asked me for my purse & girdie, toke away my mony and my kniues, and then they put both my legs into y^e stockes, and so locked me faste in them: in which I sate, my fete being almost as high as my head, and so departed they (I thinke to their abominable masse) locking fast y^e chamber doore, and leauing me alone. When all they were gone, then came vnto my remembrance the worthy forewarning and godly declaration of that most cōstant martyr of God, M. Iohn Clarke my father in Christ, who well nigh two yeres before that, whē I did earnestly desire hym to graūt me to be his scholler, & that I myght go w^t hym continually when and wheresoeuer he shoulde teache or preache (the whych he did daily) sayd vnto me much after this sort:* Dalaber, you desire you wot not what, & that you are, I feare me, vnable to take vpon you. For though nowe my preaching be swete and pleasaunt vnto you, because there is yet no persecution laide on you for it, yet the time will come, & that peraduenture shortly, if ye continue to liue godly ther'in, that God will lay on you the crosse of persecution to try you withall, whether you can as pure golde abide the fire, or as stubble and drosse be consumed therew^t. For the holy Ghoste plainely affirmeth by S. Paule, quod omnes qui pie volunt viuere in Christo Iesu, persecutionem patientur. Yea,* you shall be called and iudged an heretike, you shalbe abhorred of the world, your owne friends and kinsfolke wil forsake you, and also hate you, and you shalbe cast into prison, and no man shall dare to help or comfort you, and you shall be accused & brought before the bishops, to your reproche and shame, to the great sorow of all your faithfull friendes and kinsfolke. Then wil yee wish yee had neuer knowen thys doctrine. Then will ye curse Clarke,* and wish that yee had neuer knowen him, because he hath brought you to al these troubles. Therfore rather then that ye shuld do this, leaue of from medling of this doctrine, and desire not to be and continue in my company.

At which wordes I was so grieued, that I fell downe on my knees at his feete, & with aboundance of teares and sighes euen from the bottome of my heart, I earnestly besought him, y^t for the tender mercy of God shewed vnto vs in our Lord Iesus Christ, he would not refuse me, but receiue me into his company, as I had desired, saying that I trusted verily, that he which had begon this in me, woulde not forsake me, but geue me grace to continue therin vnto the ende. When he heard me say so, he came to me, and toke me vp in his armes, kissed me, the teares trickling downe from his eyes, & sayd vnto me: The Lorde almighty graūt you so to do, and from henceforth for euer take me for your father, and I will take you for my sonne in Christe. Nowe were there at that time in Oxforde, diuers Graduates and Scholers of sundry Colledges & Halles, whome God had called to the knowledge of his holy worde, which all resorted vnto M. Clarkes disputations & lectures in diuinitie at all times as they might: and when they might not come conueniently, I was by M. Clarke appoynted to resort to euery one of them wekely, and to know what doubts they had in any place of the scriptures, that by me frō hym they might haue the true vnderstanding of the same: which exercise did me most good and profite, to the vnderstandinge of the holy scriptures, which I most desired.

This foresaide forewarnyng and godly declaration (I say) of this most godly Martir of God M. Clarke, cōming to my remembrance, caused me wyth depe sighs to cry vnto God from my hart to assist me wyth his holy spirit, that I might be able paciently & quietly to beare & suffer whatsoever it shuld please him of his fatherly loue to lay on me,* to his glory & the comfort of my dearely beloued brethren, whom I thought now to be in great feare & anguish, least I would be an accuser of them all, for vnto me they al were well knowne, & all theyr doings in that matter. But God be blessed, I was fully bēt neuer to acuse any of thē, whatsoever should happen of me.* Before dinner M. Cotisforde came vp to me and requested me earnestly to tel him wher master Garret was, and if I would so do, he promised me straightwaies to deliuer me out of prison. But I told hym I could not tell where he was: no more in deede I coulde. Then hee departed to dinner, asking mee if I woulde eate any meate, and I tolde him, yea right gladly. He sayde hee Page 1197 would sende me some. When he was gone, hys seruauents asked me diuers questions, which I doe not now remember, and some of them spake me faire, and some threatened me, calling me hereticke, and so departed, locking the doore last vpon me.

Thus farre Anthonye Dalaber hath prosecuted thys storye, who before the finishing, departed the yeare 1562. in the Dioces of Salisburi: the residue thereof as we coulde gather it of auncient and credible persones, so haue we added heere vnto the same.

After this, Garret was apprehended or taken by maister Cole the Proctor or hys men, going Westwarde, at a place called Hinksey a little beyond Oxforde,* and so being brought back againe, was committed to ward, that done, he was conuented before the Commissary, Doctour London and Doctour Higdon Deane of Friswides (now called Christes Colledge) into S. Maries Church, where they sitting in iudgement,* conuicted him according to their law as an hereticke (as they said) and afterward compelled him to cary a fagot in open procession from Saint Maries Church to Friswides, and Dalaber likewise wyth hym, Garret hauing his red hoode on hys shoulders like a maister of Arte. After that, they were sent to Osney, there to be kept in prison till farther order was taken.

There were suspected beside, a great number to be infected with heresie, as they called it, for hauing such bookes of Gods truth, as Garret solde vnto them, as M. Clarke, which died in his chamber, and could not be suffered to receyue the Communion, being in prisone, and saying these woordes: Crede, & manducasti. Maister Somner, Maister Bettes, Tauerner the Musition, Radley, wyth other of Friswides Colledge,* of Corpus Christi Colledge, as Udall and Diet, wyth other of Magdalene Colledge one Eeden, w^t other of Glocester Colledge, and two blacke Monkes, one of S. Austines of Canterbury named Langporte, the other of S. Edmondes Burie monke, named Ioh. Salisbury, two white monkes of Barnard Colledge, two Canons of S. Maries Colledge, one of them named Robert Ferrar afterwarde Bishop of S. Dauies,* and burned in Queene Maries time. These two Canons, because they had no place in the Uniuersitie with the other, they wente on the contrarye side of the procession bare headed, and a Bedel before them, to be knowen from the other. Diuers other there were, whose names I cannot remēber, whych were forced and cōstrained to forsake theyr Colledges, and sought their frendes. Againste the Procession time, there was a great fire made vpon the toppe of Carfaxe, whereinto all such as were in the sayd Procession, either conuicte or suspect of heresie, were commaunded in token of repentaunce and renouncing of their errours, euery man to cast a booke into the fire as they passed by.

After this, M. Garret flying from place to place, escaped theyr tyrannie vntill thys present time, that he was againe apprehended and burned w^t D. Barnes. With whome also W. Hierome sometime vicare of Stepney,* was likewyse drawne into Smithfielde, and there together wyth them, constantly endured martyrdome in the fire.

Now let vs adde also to these, the storie of Hierome.

The life and storie of W. Hierome Vicare of Stepney and Martyr of Christ.

THE third companion which suffered wyth Barnes and Garret, was W. Hierome Uicare of Stepney. Thys Hierome being a diligent preacher of Gods worde,* for the comfort and edification of the people, had preached diuers and sondry sermons, wherein to the entent to plante in the consciences of men, the sincere truth of christen religion, he laboured as much as time then serued, to extirpe & weede out the rootes of mens traditions, doctrines, dreames, and fantasies. In so doing it coulde not otherwise be, but hee must needes prouoke much hatred against hym amongst the aduersaries of Christes gospell.

It so happened, that the sayde Hierome preaching at Paules in the 4. Sonday of Lent last past, made there a sermon,* wherin he recited and mētioned of Agar, and Sara, declaring what these ij. signified. In processe, wherof he shewed further, howe that Sara & her childe Isaac, and all they that were Isaacs, and borne of the free woman. Sara, were freely iustified: Contrary they that were borne of Agar the bondwoman, were boūd and vnder the law, and cannot be freely iustified. In these words, what was heere spoken, but that S. Paule himselfe vttereth and expoūdeth in his Epistle to the Galat. 4. Or what coulde heere be gathered of any reasonable or indifferēt hearer,* but cōsonant to sound doctrine, and veine of the Gospel? Now see what rancor and malice armed with crafty and subtile sophistry can do. This sermon finished, it was not long but he was charged and conuented before the kinge at Westminster, & there accused for erroneous doctrine.

Percase thou wilt muse (gentle reader) what erroneous doctrine here coulde be picked out. Note therefore for thy learning, & he that listeth to study how to play the Sicophant, let him here take exāple.* The knot found in thys rush was this, for that he preached erroneously at Paules crosse, teaching the people, that all that were borne of Sara, were freely iustified, speaking there absolutely without any condition eyther of Baptisme or of penaunce &c. Who doubteth here but if s. Paule hymselfe had bene at Paules crosse, and had preached the same wordes to the Englishe men, which he wrote to the Gal. in this behalfe, Ipso facto he had bene apprehended for an hereticke for preachyng agaynst the sacrament of Baptisme and repentaunce?

Furthermore it was objected agaynst him, touchyng matter agaynst magistrates, and lawes by them made. Wherunto he answered agayn and affirmed (as he had be'fore preached) that no Magistrate of himselfe coulde make any law or lawes, priuate or otherwise,* to binde the inferior people, vnles it were by the power, authority and commandement of his or their Princes to him or them geuen, but onely the Prince. And moreouer, to confirme the same he added, saying: that if the Prince make lawes consenting to Gods lawes, we are boūd to obey them. And if he make lawes repugnant to the lawes of God, and be an euill and wicked prince: yet are we bound humbly to suffer him, and not violently to resist or grudge against him.

Also concerning his sermons, one Doct. Wilson entred into disputation wyth him,* and defended that good works iustified before God, and were necessary and auailable to saluation. To whome Hierome answered agayne, that all workes whatsoever they were, were nothing worthe, nor no part of saluation of themselues, but only referred to the mercy and loue of God,* which mercy and loue of God directeth the workers therof, & yet it is at his mercy & goodnes to accept them. Which to be true doctor Wilson neither could, nor did denie.

And thus mucche concerning the seuerall storyes of these iij. good mē. Now let vs see the order of their martyrdome, ioyning them al together: what was the cause of their condemnation, and what were their protestations and words at theyr suffering.

Ye heard before howe Barnes, Hierome, and Garret, were caused to preach at Easter at the spittie.* The occasion whereof as I finde it reported by Steuen Gardiner wryting againste George Ioye, I thoughte heere to discourse more at large.

Steuen Gardiner hearing that the sayd Barnes, Hierome & Garret should preach the Lent folowing, an. 1541. at Paules crosse, to stoppe the course of theyr doctrine, sent his chaplaine to the B. of London, the Saterdag before the first Sondag in Lent, to haue a place for hym to preache at Paules. Which to him was graunted, and time appointed that he should preach the sonday following, whych should be on the morrowe: which Sondag was appoynted before for Barnes to occupie that roome. Gardiner therefore determining to declare the gospell of that sonday, containing the deuils 3. temptations, began amongst other things to note the abuse of scripture amongst some, as the deuil abused it to Christ, and so alluding to the temptation of the deuil, wherin he alledged the scripture against Christe, to cast himselfe downeward, and that he shoulde take no hurt, he inferred thereupon, saying:

Now a dayes (quoth he) the deuil tempteth the world, and biddeth them to cast themselues backwarde.* There is no forward in the new teaching, but all backwarde. Now the Deuill teacheth, come backe from fastinge, come backe from praying, come backe from confession, come back from weeping for thy sinnes, and all is backwarde: In so much that men must now learne to saye their Pater noster backwarde. For where we sayde, forgeue vs our debtes, as we forgeue our debtors; now it is, as thou forgeuest our debts, so I wil forgeue my debtors, and so God must forgeue first, and all I say, is turned backward. &c.

And amongst other things, moreouer he noted the deuils crafte and shifte in deceiuing man: who enuying hys felicitie, and therefore coueting to haue man idle, and voide of good workes, and to be led in that idlenesse, wyth a wan hope to liue merely at hys pleasure heere, and yet to haue heauen at the last,* hath for that purpose procured out pardons from Rome, wherin heauen was sold for a litle money, and for to retaile that marchaundise, the deuill vsed Friers for his ministers. Now they be gone withall theyr trumperie, but the deuill is not yet gone. &c. And now that Page 1198 the Deuill perceiueth that it can no longer be borne, to buy and sell heauen by the Friers, he hath excogitate to offerre heauen without workes for it,* so freely, that men shall not neede for heauen to worke at all, what so euer oportunitie they haue to work: mary if they wil haue any higher place in heauen, God wil leaue no worke vnrewarded, but as to be in heauen, needes no works at all, but onely belief, onely, onely, and nothing els. &c.

This sermone of Steuen Winchester finished, Doctor Barnes who was put of from that sonday,* had his day apoynted, which was the thirde Sondag next ensuinge, to make his sermon: who taking the same text of the Gospell which Gardiner had done before, was on the cōtrary side no lesse vehement in setting forwarde the true doctrine of Christian religion, thē Winchester had done before in plucking men backwarde from truth to lies, from sinceritie to hypocrisie, from religion to superstition from Christ to antichrist. In the processe of which sermon he proceeding, and calling out Steuen Gardiner by name to answer him, alluded in a pleasaunt allegorye, to a Cockfight, terming the sayd Gardiner to be a fighting Cocke, and hymselfe to an other, but the Garden Cock (he sayd) lacked good spurres, obiecting moreouer to the said Gardiner, & opposing hym in his Grammer rules, thus saying: that if he had answered hym in the Schooles, so as he had there preached at the crosse, he would haue geuen him 6. stripes: declaring furthermore what euill herbes this Gardiner had sette in the Garden of Gods scripture. &c.

Finally, with this sermon Gardiner was so tickled in the splene,* that he immediately went to y^e king to cōplain, shewing how he being a bishop and a prelate of the realm, was handled and reuiled at Paules crosse.

Wherupon the king geuing to much eare to Gardiners griefe, was earnestly incensed against Barnes, and w^t many high words rebuked his doings in his priuy closet, hauing with him the Erle of Southhampton which was the Lorde Wrisley,* and the master of the horse which was Anthony Browne, D. Cockes, and D. Robinson. Unto whō when Barnes had submitted himselfe: Nay said the king, yeld thee not to me, I am a mortall man, and therewith rising vp, and turning to the Sacrament, and putting of his bonet, sayd: yonder is the maister of vs al, author of truth, yeld in truth to him, and that truth will I defend, & otherwise yelde thee not vnto me. Much ado there was, & great matter layd against Barnes. In cōclusion this order was taken,* that Barnes should goe apart with Winchester, to conferre & common together of their doctrine, certain witnesses being therunto appoynted, to be as indifferent hearers, of whom the one was D. Cockes, the other was D. Robinson, with 2. other also to them assigned, which shuld be reporters to the king of the disputation. At the first entry of which talke, Gardiner forgeuing him (as he saith) al that was past, offred him the choice, whether he wold answer, or oppose, which was the Friday after that Barnes had preached.

The question betwene them propounded, by Gardiners narration was this: Whether a man coulde doe anye thyng good or acceptable, before the grace of iustificatiō or not? Which question rose vpon a certaine contētion which had beene betwene them before. For Barnes had affirmed, that albeit God requireth of vs to forgeue our neighbour, to obtaine forgeuenesse of hym: yet he sayd that God must forgeue vs first, before we forgeue our neighbour: For els to forgeue our neyghbour were sinne by the text that sayeth: All that is not of faith, is sinne, &c. Thus the matter being propounded, Gardiner to proue the contrary, came foorth wyth hys arguments two or three, to the which argumentes (sayeth Gardiner) Barnes coulde not aunswere, but desired to be spared that nyght,* and the next morning he would answer his arguments. In the morning Gardiner wyth the hearers being againe assembled, D. Barnes, according to the appoyntment, was present, who then went about to assoil his arguments. To his solutions Gardiner againe replied. And thus continued they in thys altercation by y^e space of two houres.* In the ende of thys Cockfight Winchester thus cōcludeth thys glorious tale, and croweth vp the triumph, declaring howe Barnes besought him to haue pitie of hym, to forgeue hym, and to take hym to be hys scholer, whome then the sayd Winchester (as he confesseth himself) receiuing, not as his scholer, but as hys companion, offred, to hym a portion oute of his liuing, to the summe of xl.li. a yere.* Which if it be true, as Steuen Gardiner himselfe reporteth, why then doth this glorious Cackatrice crowe so much against Barnes afterward, and cast him in the teeth bearing all the world in hand, that Barnes was his scholler, whereas he himselfe heere refuseth Barnes to be hys scholer, but receiueth hym as hys companion fellowlyke? But to the storie.

This done, the king being aduertised of the conclusion of this matter betweene Barnes and Winchester, was cōtent that Barnes shoulde repaire to the Bishoppes house at London, the mōday folowing. Which he did, with a certaine other cōpanion ioyned vnto him. Who he was, Winchester there doth not expresse, only he saith, y^t it was neyther Hierome nor Garret. In this next meeting betweene Barnes and the bishop vpon the foresaid monday the said bishop studying to instruct Barnes, vttered to him certain articles or conclusions, to the number of x. the effect wherof here followeth.

Winchesters Articles against Barnes.

The effect of Christes passion hath a condition.* The fulfilling of the condition diminisheth nothing the effecte of Christes passion.

They that wil enjoy the effect of Christes passion, must [1] fulfill the condition.

The fulfilling of the condition requireth firste knowledge of the cōdition, which knowledge we haue by faith. [2]

Faith commeth of God, and thys faith is a good gifte. It is good and profitable to me: it is profitable to me to do [3] well, and to exercise thys faith: Ergo, by the gifte of God I may do well before I am iustified.

Therefore I may do wel by the gift of God before I am [4] iustified, towards the attainment of iustification.

There is euer as much Charitie towards God, as [5] faith, And as faith encreaseth, so doth charitie encrease.

To the attainment of iustification is required faith and [6] charitie.

Euery thing is to be called freely done, wherof the beginning [7] is free and at liberty wythout any cause of prouocation. [8]

Faith muste be to me the assuraunce of the promyses of God made in Christ (if I fulfil the condition) & loue must [9] accomplish the condition: wherupon foloweth the attainment of the promise according to Gods truth.

A man being in deadly sinne, maye haue grace to do the [10] workes of penance, whereby he may attaine to hys iustification.

These Articles for somuch as they be sufficiently aunswered and replied vnto by George Ioy in his Ioynder,* & Reioynder agaynst Winchester, I shall not neede to cūber this work with any new adoe therewith, but onely referre the reader to the bookes aforesayd: where he may see matter enough to answeere to these popish articles.

I told you before how the king was contented y^e Barnes shuld resort to the house of the bishop of Winchester, to be traded and directed by the bishop, which Barnes then hearing the talk of y^e people, & hauing also conference with certayne learned men, within two dayes after his comming to y^e bishops house, waxed weary thereof, & so comming to the bish. signified vnto him,* that if he would take him as one y^t came to conferre, he would come still, but els he would come no more, & so cleane gaue ouer the bishop.

This beinge knowen vnto the king, thorough sinister complaints of popish Sycophantes, Barnes againe was sent for, and cōuented before the king, who grievously being incensed against him, enioyned both him, Hierom and Garret, at the solemne Easter sermons at S. Mary spittle, opēly in wryting to reuoke the doctrine whych they before had taught. At which sermons Ste. Gardiner also himself was present to heare theyr recantation.

First Doctor Barnes, according to hys promise made to the king, solempnely and formally beganne to make his recantation, whych done, he wyth much circumstance and obtestation called vpon the Byshop (as is aboue touched) and asking of hym forgeuenes,* required hym in token of a graunt to holde vp hys hand, to the entent that he there openly declaring his charitie before the worlde, the Byshop also would declare his charitie in like maner. Which when the bishoppe refused to doe at the first, as he was required, Barnes againe called for it, desiring him to shew his charitie, and to holde vp his hande. Which when he had done w^t much a do, wagging his finger a litle: then Barnes entring to his Sermon after his prayer made,* beginneth the processe of a matter, preaching contrarye to that, which before he had recanted. In so much, that the Maior, whē the Sermon was finished, sittinge wyth the Bishop of Winchester, asked him whether he should from the pulpit sende hym to warde, to be forth comming for that his bold preaching contrary to hys recantation. The like also did Hierome, and Garret after hym.

The king had appointed before certain to make report of the sermons. Besides them there was one who wryting to a frende of hys in the Court, in the fauour of these preachers, Page 1199 declared how gayly they had all handled the matter, both to satisfie the recantation, and also in the same Sermons to vtter out the truth, that it might spread without let of the world. Wherefore partly by these reporters, & partly by the negligent looking to this letter,* which came to the Lord Cromwels hands (sayeth Gardiner) Barnes wyth his other fellowes were apprehended, and committed to the Tower. Steuen Gardiner in his foresayde booke against George Ioye, woulde needes cleare himselfe, that he was in no part nor cause of their casting into the tower, and geueth this reason for him,* for that he had then no accesse, ne had not after, so long as Cromwels time lasted, to the Kings secret Counsayle: yet notwithstanding the sayd Gardiner can not persuaide vs to the contrary, but that his priuie complaing to the King, and his secrete whisperings in his frends eares, and his other workings by his factours about the King, was a great sparcle to set theyr fagots a fire.

Thus then Barnes, Hierome, and Garret being committed to the Tower, after Easter, there remayned till the xxx. day of Iuly, which was two dayes after the deathe of the Lord Cromwell. Then ensued processe againste them by the Kings Counsell in the Parliament,* to the whyche processe Gardiner confesseth himselfe that he was priuie amongst the rest. Whereupon all these three good saints of God, the xxx. day of Iuly, not comming to any aunswere, nor yet knowing any cause of their cōdemnation, without any publike hearing, were brought together from the Tower to Smithfield, where they preparing themselues to the fire, had there at the stake diuers and sundry exhortations, amongst whome D. Barnes first began wyth thys protestation following.

I am come hether to be burned as an hereticke, and you shal heare my beliefe,* whereby you shall perceiue what erroneous opinions I hold. God I take to record, I neuer (to my knowledge) taught any erroneous doctrine, but only those things which scripture leade me vnto, and that in my Sermons I neuer mainteined any errour, neyther moued nor gaue occasion of any insurrection. Although I haue bene sclaudered to preach that our Lady was but a saffron bag, which I vtterly protest before God that I neuer meant it nor preached it: but all my study and diligēce hath bene vtterly to confound and confute all men of that doctrine,* as are the Anabaptists, which deny that our Sauour Christ did take any flesh of the blessed virgin Mary, which sectes I detest and abhorre. And in this place there hath bene burned some of them, whome I neuer faouored nor mainteyned, but with all diligence euermore did I study to set forth the glory of God, the obedience to our soueraigne Lord the King, and the true and sincere religion of Christ. And now harken to my fayth.

I beleue in the holy and blessed Trinitie, three persons and one God,* that created and made al the world, and that this blessed Trinitie sent downe the seconde person Iesu Christ into the wombe of the most blessed & purest virgin Mary. And heere beare me record, that I do vtterly condemne that abhominable and detestable opinion of the Anabaptistes, which say that Christ tooke no flesh of the virgine. For I beleue that without mans will or power, hee was conceiued by the holy Ghost, and tooke flesh of her, & that he suffered hunger, thirst, cold, & other passions of our body (sinne except) according to the sayeng of S. Peter: He was made in all things like to his brethren, except sinne. And I beleue that this his death and passion was the sufficient raunsome for the sinne of all the world. And I beleue that through his death, he ouercame sinne, death, and hell, and that there is none other satisfaction vnto the Father, but this his death and passion only: and that no worke of man did deserue any thing of God, but only his passion, as touching our iustification. For I know the best worke that euer I did, is vnpure and vnperfite. And with this he cast abroade his handes, and desired God to forgiue hym hys trespasses.* For although perchaunce (sayd he) you knowe nothing by me, yet do I confesse that my thoughts and cogitations be innumerable: Wherefore I beseeche thee, O Lorde, not to enter into iudgement with me, according to the sayeng of the Prophete Dauid: Non intres in iudicium cum seruo tuo domine .i. Enter not into iudgement with thy seruaunt O Lord.* And in an other place: Si iniquitates obseruaueris domine quis sustinebit? Lorde, if thou straitely marke our iniquities,* who is able to abyde thy iudgement? Wherefore I trust in no good worke that euer I did, but onely in the death of Christ. I do not doubt, but through him to inherite the kingdome of heauen. Take me not heere that I speake against good woorkes,* for they are to be done, and verely they that do them not, shall neuer come in the kingdome of God. We must do them, because they are cōmanded vs of God to shew and set foorth our profession, not to deserue or merite, for that is onely the death of Christ.

I beleue that there is a holy Churche, & a company of all them that professe Christ: and that all that haue suffered & confessed his name, be Saintes, & that all they do prayse & laude God in heauen, more then I, or any mans tongue cā expresse, & that alwayes I haue spoken reuerently, and prayed them as much as Scripture willed me to do. And that our Lady (I say) was a Uirgin immaculate and vndefiled & that she is the most purest virgine that euer God created & a vessell elect of God of whom Christ should be borne. Then sayd M. Shiriffe,* you haue sayd well of her before. And beyng afrayde that Maister Shiriffe had bene or should be agreeued with any thyng that he should say, he sayd: Maister Shiriffe, if I speake any thyng that you will me not, do no more but beken me with your hand, & I will straight way hold my peace, for I will not be disobedient in any thyng, but will obey.

Thē there was one that asked him his opiniō of praying to Saintes. Then sayd he:* Now of Saintes you shall here my opinion. I haue sayd before somewhat I thinke of them, how that I beleue they are in heauen with God, and that they are worthy of all the honour that Scripture willeth thē to haue. But I say throughout all Scripture we are not commaūded to pray to any Saintes. Therefore I can not nor will not preach to you that Saintes ought to be prayed vnto: for then should I preache vnto you a doctrine of myne owne head. Notwithstandyng whether they pray for vs or no, that I referre to GOD. And if Saintes do pray for vs, then I trust to pray for you within this halfe houre Maister Shiriffe, and for euery Christian man liuyng in the fayth of Christ & dying in the same as a Saint. Wherefore if the dead may pray for the quicke, I will surely pray for you.

Wel, haue you any thing more to say? Thē spake he to Maister Shiriffe & sayd, haue ye any Articles agaynst me for the which I am condemned? * And the Shriffe aunswered, no. Then sayd he, is there here any mā els that knoweth wherfore I dye, or that by my preachyng hath takē any error? Let them now speake & I will make thē aunswere. And no man aunswered. Then sayd he, well I am condēned by the law to dye, & as I vnderstand, by an Acte of Parliamēt, but wherfore, I cānot tell, * but belike for heresie, for we are lyke to burne. But they that haue bene the occasiō of it. I pray God forgeue them, as I would be forgeuen my selfe. And Doct. Stephē Byshop of Winchester that now is, if he haue sought or wrought this my death either by word or deede, I pray God forgiue him as hartly, as freely, as charitably, and without faynyng, as euer Christ forgauē them that put him to death.

And if any of the Counsell, or any other haue sought or wrought it through malice or ignoraūce, I pray God forgiue their ignoraunce and illuminate their eyes that they may see and aske mercy for it. I beseeche you all to pray for the kynges grace, as I haue done euer since I was in prison, and do now, that God may geue him prosperitie, and that he may long raigne amōg you, * & after him that godly Prince Edward may so raigne, that he may finishe those thynges that his father hath begon. I haue bene reported a preacher of sedition & disobedience vnto the kyngs Maiestie, but heare I say to you, that you al are bound by the commaūdement of God to obey your Prince with all humilitie, & with all your hart, yea not so much as in a looke to shew your selues disobedient vnto him, & that not onely for feare of the sword, but also for conscience sake before God. Yea and I say further, if the kyng should cōmaunde you any thyng agaynst Gods law, if it be in your power to resist him, yet may you not do it.

Then spake he to the Shiriffe and sayd, M. Shiriffe I require you on Gods behalfe, * to haue me cōmēded vnto the kynges grace, & to shewe him that I require of his grace these fiue requestes: First that where his grace hath receaued into his handes, all the goodes and substaunce of the Abbeyes. Then the Shiriffe desired him to stop there. * He aunswered, Maister Shiriffe I warrant you I will speake no harme, for I know it is well done y^t all such superstition be cleane taken away, and the kyngs grace hath well done in takyng it away. But his grace is made a whole kyng, * and obeyed in his Realme as a kyng (which neither his father nor graūdfather, neither his aunceters that raigned before him euer had) & that through the preachyng of vs and such other wretches as we are, which alwayes haue applied our whole studies, and giuen our selues for the setting forth of the same, and this is now our reward. Well it maketh no matter. Now he raigneth among you: I pray God long may he liue and raigne among you. Would to God it might please his grace to bestow the sayd goodes or some of them, to the comfort of his poore subiectes, which surely haue great neede of them.

Page 1200The second that I desire his grace, is, that he will see that matrimonie be had in more reuerence then it is, and that men for euery light cause inuented,* cast not off theyr wiues, and liue in adultery and fornication, and that those that be not married, should not abhominably liue in whoredome, folowing the filthy lustes of the fleshe.

The third, that the abhominable swearers may be punished and straightly looked vpon: for the vengeance of God wil come on them for their mischieuous othes. Then desired he maister Pope to haue him commended to Maister Edgar,* and to desire him for the deare bloud of Iesu Christ, that he woulde leaue that abhominable swearing which he vsed, for surely except he did forsake it, he woulde come to some mischieuous ende.

The fourth, that his grace would set forth Christs true Religion,* and seeing he hath begon, that he would go forward and make an end, for many things haue bene done, but much more is to do: and that it would please his grace to looke on Gods word himselfe, for that it hath ben obscured with many traditions inuented of our owne braynes. Now said he, how many petitions haue I spoken of? And the people said foure. Well said he: euen these foure be sufficiente, whiche I desire you: that the Kinges grace may be certified of, and say that I most humbly desire him to looke earnestly vpon them: and that his grace take heede that he be not deceiued with false preachers and teachers and euill councell, for Christ sayth, that such false Prophets shal come in Lambes skinnes.

Then desired he all men to forgeue him, and if hee had sayd any euill at any time vnaduisedly, whereby he had offended any man, or geuen anye occasion of euill, that they would forgiue it him, and amende that euill they tooke of him,* and to beare him witnes, that he detested and abhorred all euill opinions and doctrines against the worde of God, and that he died in the faith of Iesu Christ, by whom he doubted not, but to be saued. And with those words he desired them all to pray for him, and then he turned him about, and put off his clothes, making him ready to the fire, patiently there to take his death.

The like confession made also Hierome and Garret, professing in like maner their beliefe, reciting all the articles of the Christian faith, briefly declaring their myndes vpon euery article,* as the time would suffer: whereby the people might vnderstand that there was no cause nor error in their fayth, wherefore iustly they ought to be condemned: Protesting moreouer that they denied nothyng that was eyther in the old or new Testament, set foorth by their soueraigne Lorde the King: whome they prayed the Lord long to continue amongst them, with his most deare sonne Prince Edward. Which done. Hierome addeth this exhortation in few words folowing.

I say vnto you good breethren, that God hath bought vs all with no small price, neyther with golde nor siluer,* or other such things of small value, but with his most precious bloud. Be not vnthankfull therefore to him againe, but do as much as to Christian men belongeth, to fulfill his commaundementes, that is, loue your brethren. Loue hurteth no man, loue fulfilleth all things. If God haue sent thee plentie, helpe thy neighbour that hathe neede. Giue him good councell. If ye lacke, consider if thou were in necessitie, thou wouldst gladly be refreshed. And againe, beare your crosse with Christ. Consider what reproofe, sclaunder, and reproch he suffered of his enemies, and how patiently he suffered all thinges. Consider that all that Christ did, was of his meere goodnesse, and not of our deseruing. For if we could merite our owne saluation, Christ woulde not haue dyed for vs. But for Adams breaking of Gods precept, we had bene all lost, if Christ had not redee^med vs againe. And like as Adam broke the precepts, and was driuen out of Paradise: so wee, if we breake Gods commaundements, shall haue damnation, if we do not repent and aske mercy. Now therefore let all Christians put no trust nor confidence in their workes, but in the bloud of Christ, to whome I commit my soule to guide, beseeching you all to pray to God for me, and for my breethren here present with me, that our soules leauing these wretched carcasses, may constantly depart in the true fayth of Christ.

In much like sort Garret also protesting and exhorting the people after his confession made, ended his protestation in maner as foloweth.

I also detest, abhorre, and refuse all heresies and errours,* and if eyther by negligence or ignoraunce I haue taught or maynteyned any, I am sory for it, and aske God mercie. Or if I haue bene so vehement or rash in preaching, whereby any person hath taken anye offence, errour, or euill opinion, I desire him, and all other persons which I haue any way offended, of forgeuenes. Notwithstanding to my remembraunce, I neuer preached wittinglye or willingly anye thing agaynste Gods holye worde, or contrary to the true fayth, to the maintenaunce of errours, heresies, or vitious liuing, but haue alwaye for my little learning and witte, set forth the honour of God, and the right obedience to his lawes, and also the Kinges accordingly. And if I coulde haue done better, I woulde. Wherefore Lorde if I haue taken in hande to Page 1201 do that thing which I could not perfectly perfourme, I desire thee pardon for my bolde presumption. And I pray God send the kings grace good and godly counsaile, to his glory, to the Kings honour, and the encrease of vertue in this his Realme. And thus now I yeelde vp my soule vnto almighty God,* trusting and beleuing that he of his infinite mercy for his promise made in the bloud of hys sonne our most mercifull Saueour Iesu Christ, will take it, and pardon me of all my sinnes, whereby I haue most greeuously from my youth offended hys Maiestie: wherefore I aske hym mercy, desiring you all to pray with me and for mee,* that I may pacientlye suffer thys payne, and dye stedfastly in true fayth, perfect hope and charitie.

And so after theyr prayer made, wherein most effectually they desired the Lord Iesus to be their comfort and consolation in this their affliction, and to stablishe them with perfect faith,* constancy and pacience thorough the holy Ghost, they taking themselues by the hands, and kissing one another, quietly and humbly offred themselues to the handes of the tormentors, and so tooke theyr deathe both Christianly and constantly with suche patience as mighte well testifie the goodnes of theyr cause, and quiet of theyr conscience.

Wherein is to be noted how mightely the Lord worketh with his grace and fortitude in the harts of his seruants, especially in such, which causelesse suffer with a giltles conscience for his religions sake, aboue other whiche suffer otherwise for their deserts.* For whereas they which suffer as malefactors, commonly are wont to goe heauie and pensieue to their death, so the other with heauenly alacritie and chearefulnes doe abide whatsoeuer it pleaseth the Lord to lay vpon them? Example whereof we haue right well to note, not only in these three godly Martirs, aboue mentioned, but also in the Lord Cromwell, who suffered but two dayes before, the same no lesse may appeare. Who although he was brought to his death, atteinted and condemned by the parliament,* yet what a giltles conscience he bare to his death, his Christian patience well declared. Who first calling for his breakefast: and cheerefully eating the same, and after that passing out of his prison downe the hill within the Tower, and meeting there by the waie the Lord Hungerford going likewise to his executiō (who for other matter heere not to be spoken of, was there also imprisoned) and perceiuing him to be all heauie and dolefull,* with cheerefull countenance, and comfortable words, asking why he was so heauie, he willed him to plucke vp his heart, and to be of good comfort: For, sayd he, there is no cause for you to feare. For if you repent, and be hartely sorry for that you haue done, there is for you mercy enough with the Lord, who for Christes sake wil forgeue you, and therefore be not dismayde. And though the breakefast which we are going to, be sharpe, yet trusting to the mercy of the Lord, we shall haue a ioyfull dinner. And so went they together to the place of execution, and tooke their death patiently.

¶A note of three Papistes executed the same tyme with Barnes, Hierome, and Garret.

THE same tyme and day and in the same place, where & when these three aboue mentioned did suffer,* three other also were executed, though not for the same cause, but rather the contrary: for denying the kynges supremacie, whose names were Powell, Fetherstone and Abell. The which spectacle so happenyng vpon one day, in two so cōtrary partes or factiōs, brought the people into a marueilous admiration & doubt of their Religion,* which part to follow and take: as might so well happen amongst ignoraunt and simple people, seeing two contrarye parts so to suffer, the one for Popery▪ the other against Popery, both at one time. In so much that a certaine straunger beeyng there present the same time, and seing three on the one side, and three on the other side to suffer, said in these wordes: Deus bone quomodo his viuunt gentes, hic suspenduntur Papistae, illic comburuntur Antipapistae? But to remoue and take away all doubt hereafter from the posterity,* whereby they shall the lesse maruel how this so hapned, here is to be vnderstande, howe the cause thereof did rise and proceede. Which happened, by reason of a certeine diuision and discord amongst the Kings Councell, which were so diuided amongst themselues in equall parts, that the one halfe seemed to hold with the one Religion, the other halfe with the contrary.

The names of whome, although it were not necessary to expresse, yet being compelled for the setting foorth of the truth of the story, we haue thought good heere to annexe, as the certaintie thereof came to our hands.

This diuision and separation of the Coūsell amongst themselues, caused both these partes aboue mentioned, the one for one religion, the other for an other, to suffer together.* For as the one part of the Counsell called vpō the execution of Barnes, Garret, & Hierome, so the other part likewise called vpō the execution of the law vpō Powell, Fetherstone, and Abell. Which sixe beyng condemned and drawen to the place of execution, two vpon an hyrdle, one being a Papist, the other a Protestant, thus after a straūge maner were brought into Smithfield, where all the sayd sixe together for contrary doctrine suffered death, three by the fire for the Gospell, the other three by hangyng, drawyng, and quarteryng for Popery.

Allen Cope in his worshypfull Dialogues, makyng mention of these three aforesaid, Powell, Fetherstone,* and Abell, amōgest other which dyed in kyng Hēries dayes in the like Popish quarell, that is, for the like treason agaynst their Prince (beyng in all to the number of 24.) extolletth thē not onely in wordes, but with miracles also, vp to the height of heauē, amōg the crowned Martyrs,* & Saints of God. Thus hauyng discoursed the order of the vi. Articles, with other matter likewise folowyng in the next Parliament, concernyng the condemnation of the Lord Cromwell, of Doct. Barnes, and his felowes. &c. Let vs now (proceedyng further in this history) cōsider what great disturbaunce and vexation ensued after the setting forth of the sayd Articles, through the whole Realme of Englād, especially amongst the godly sorte. Wherein first were to be mentioned the straite and seuer commissions sent forth by the kynges authoritie, to the Byshops, Chauncelors, Officials, to Iustices, Maiors, & Bailiffes in euery shyre,* and other Commissioners by name in the same commissions expressed, and amongst other, especially to Edmund Boner Byshop of London, to the Maior, Shiriffes, and Aldermen of the same, to enquire diligently vpon all hereticall bookes, and to burne them, also to enquire vpon such persons whatsoever culpable or suspected of such felonies, heresies, contemptes, or transgressions, or speakyng any wordes contrary the foresayd Act set forth of the sixe Articles.* The tenour of whiche Commissions beyng sufficiently expressed in auncient Recordes, and in the Bishoppes Registers, and also partly touched before, pag. 1101. therefore for tediousnesse I here omit, onely shewyng forth the Commission directed to Edmūd Boner Byshop of London, to take the othe of the Maior of London, and of others, for the execution of the Commission aforesayd. The tenour wherof here foloweth.

¶The Commission for takyng the othe of the Maior of London, and others, for the execution of the Acte aforesayd.

HENry the eight by the grace of God, kyng of England and of Fraunce, defender of the fayth, Lord of Ireland, and in Page 1202 earth supreme head of the Church of England, vnto the Reuerend father in Christ Edmund Boner Byshop of London,* and to his welbeloued the Byshops Chauncellour, health. Know ye that we haue geuen you ioyntly and seuerally power and authoritie to receaue the othes of William Roche Maior of London, Iohn Allen Knight, Raffe Warren Knight, Rich. Gresham Knight, Roger Chomley Knight, Sergeant at Law, Iohn Greshā, Michael Dormer Archdeacon of London, the Byshops Cōmissary and Officiall, Robert Chidley, Gwy Crayford, Edward Hall, Robert Broke, and Iohn Morgā, and euery of them our Cōmissioners for heresies and other offences done within our Citie of London, and Dioces of the same, accordyng to the tenour of a certaine schedule hereunto annexed. And therefore we commaūde that you receiue the othes aforesayd, and when you haue receaued them, to certifie vs into our Chauncery vnder your Seales, returnyng this our writ. T. meipso^m at Westminster the 29 of Ianuary in the 32. yeare of our reigne.

What the othe was of these Commissioners, whereunto they were bounde, read before, pag. 1101.

A note how Boner sat in the Guildhall in Commission for the vi. Articles. And of the condemnyng of Mekins.

Vpon this commission geuen vnto Edmūd Boner, he commyng to the Guildhall with other Cōmissioners,* to sit vpō the Statute of the vi. Articles, begā eftsoones to put in execution his authoritie after a rigorous sort, as ye shall heare. And first he charged certaine Iuries, to take their oth vpon y^e Statute aforesaid: who being sworne had a day appointed to geue their Uerdicte. At the which day they indited sundry persons, which shortly after were apprehended & brought to Ward, who after a while remaynyng there, were by the kyng & his Counsaile discharged at the Starre chāber, without any further punishment.

Not lōg after this, Syr Wil. Roche being Maior, Boner with other Cōmissioners, sat at the Guildhall aforesayd, before whom there were a certaine number of Citizens warned to appeare, and after the Commission read, the sayd parties were called to the booke, and when v. or vi. were sworne, one of the sayd persōs beyng called to the booke, Boner seemed to mislike, and sayd: Stay a while, my Maisters (quoth he) I would ye should consider this matter well that we haue in hand, whiche concerneth the glory of God, the honor of the kyng, and the wealth of the Realme, and if there be any here amōg you, that doth not consider the same, it were better that he were hence then here. Thē commoned the Commissioners with Boner about that man, so that at length he was called to the booke and sworne, not all together with his good will.

When the ij. Iuries were sworne, Boner taketh vpon him to geue the charge vnto the Iuries, and began with a tale of Anacarsis, by which example, he admonished the Iuries to spare no persons,* of what degree soeuer they were. And at the end of his charge he brought forth to the barre a boy, whose name was Mekins, declaryng how greuously he had offended by speaking of certaine wordes agaynst the state, and of the death of Doct. Barnes: & produced into the sayd Court ij. witnesses, which were there sworne in the face of y^e Court. So a day was assigned, vpō which the Iuries aforesayd should geue vp their Uerdicte: at which day both the Commissioners, & the sayd Iuries met at Guildhall aforesayd. Then the Clarke of the peace called on the Iuries by their names, & when their appearaunce was taken,* Boner bad them put in their presentmentes. Thē sayd the foreman, whose name was W. Robins of that Iury. My Lord (with a low curtesy) we haue found nothyng. At which wordes he fared as one in an agony, & sayd: Nothyng? haue ye fōūd nothyng? What nothyng? By the fayth I owe to God (quoth he) to the foremā, I would trust you vpon your obligatiō: but by your oth I will trust you nothyng. Thē sayd some of the Commissioners: My Lord, geue them a lōger day. No (quoth he) in Lōdon they euer finde nothyng. I pray you, what say you to Mekins? My Lord, quoth the foreman, we can say nothing to him, for we finde the witnesses to disagree. One affirmeth that he should say the Sacrament was nothyng but a ceremonie, & the other nothing but a signification. Why, quoth Boner, did he not say, that Barnes dyed holy? Thē pausing a while, he bad cal the other Iury. Put in your Uerdict, quoth he. My Lord sayd one, we haue foūd nothyng.* Iesus quoth he, is not this a straunge case.

Then spake one of the same Iury, whose name was Raph Foxley, & sayd: My Lord whē you gaue vs charge, we desired to haue the Persons & Curates of euery Parish to geue vs instructions,* and it was denyed vs. Then stode vp the Recorder and sayd, it was true in deede that he had spoken, and therewithall sayd, this last yeare were charged two Iuries, which did many thinges naughtely and foolishly, and did as much as in them lay,* to make an vprore among y^e Kings people, & therefore it was thought not meete, that they should geue information to you. Nay, nay, quoth Boner, this was the cause: I• the Person or Curate should geue information according to hys knowledge, then what will they say? I must tell my confession to a knaue priest, and he shal go by and by and open it. What, sayd my Lord Maior, there is no man (I trow) that wyll say so. Yes by my trouth, quoth Boner, knaue Priest, knaue Priest. Then sayde the Lorde Maior,* somewhat smiling, there be some of them slipper fellowes, and as men finde them, so will they oft times report. Boner not well contented with those wordes, said to the Iurie: My maisters, what say you to Mekins? They aunswered, the witnesses doe not agree, therefore we do not allow them. Why, quod Boner, this court hath alowed them. Thē said one of the Iurie to the Recorder: Is it sufficient for our discharge, if this court do allow them? Yea, sayd the Recorder, it is sufficiēt, & said: Go you aside together a while, & bring in your verdicte. After the Iury had talked together a litle while, they returned to the bar again with their inditement, which at Boners hand was frendly receaued: so both they and the other Iurie were discharged, & bidden take their ease. Thus ended the court for that day.* Shortly after they sate for life and death. Mekins being brought to the barre, and the inditement read. Boner sayd to him: Mekins confesse the truth, and submit thy selfe vnto the Kings law that thy death may be an example to all other.

This Rich. Mekins being a child, which passed not the age of fiteene yeares (as Halle reporteth) as he had heard some other folkes talke,* so chaunced he to speake against y^e sacrament of the altar. Which comming to Boners eares, he neuer left him (as afore doth plainly appeare) before he had brought him to the fire. During the time of his imprisonment, neither his poore father nor mother for feare durst ayde him with any reliefe: whereby he there indured in great misery. At what time he was brought vnto the stake, he was taught to speake much good of the Bishop of London, and of the great charitie he shewed to him, and to defie and detest all heretickes and heresies, but specially Doctor Barnes, vnto whome he imputed the learning of that heresie, which was the cause of his death. The poore ladde would for sauegard of his life,* haue gladly sayde that the xij. Apostles had taught it him: such was his childishe innocencie and feare. But for this deede many spake and sayd, it was great shame for the Bishop, whose parte and dutie it had bene rather to haue laboured to saue his life, then to procure that terrible execution, seeing that he was such an ignoraunt soule, that he knew not what the affirming of heresie was.

¶Richard Spenser, Ramsey, and one Hewet, suffered at Salisbury.

ABout the same time also a certeine Priest was burned at Salisbury, who leauing his Papistry, had married a wife, and became a player in enterludes,* with one Ramsey and Hewet, which three were all condemned and burned: Against whome, and specially against Spenser, was layd matter concerning the Sacramente of the altar. He suffered at Salisbury.

Although this Inquisition aboue mētioned was ment properly and especially concerning the vj. Articles,* yet so it fell out, that in short space doubts beganne to rise and to be moued by the Quest, whether they might enquire as well of all other opinions, articles, and cases of Lollardy, or for speaking against holy bread, holy water, or for fauoring the cause of Barnes, of Frier Warde,* Sir Thomas Rose, &c. Whereupon great perturbation followed in all Parishes almost through London in the yeare aforesayd, which was 1541. as heere ensueth in a brieft summary Table to be seene.

W. Tolwine, Person of S.
Anthonies.

Presented and examined before Edm. Boner, for permitting Alexand. Seton to preach in his church hauing no licence of his ordinary, & also for alow^ding the Sermons of the sayde Alexander Seton, whiche hee preached agaynst D. Smith.

To the sayd Tolwine moreouer it was obiected, that he vsed y^e space of ij. yeares, to make holy water, leauing out the general exorcisme, beginning Exorciso te. &c. vsing these words for y^e same: Benedicite: Dominus. Ab eo fit benedicta, a cuius latere fluxit sanguis & aqua: Adioining therto,*commixio salis & aquae fiat in nomine patris, & filij, & spiritus Sancti.

The like vsage of making holy water was also vsed in Aldermay Church where Doct. Crome was, & in Hony lane.

Agaynst this obiection thus Tolwine defended himself saying: that he tooke occasion so to do by the kinges Iniunctions, whyche say, that ceremonyes should be vsed, all ignorance & superstition set apart.

In y^e end this Tolwyne was forced to stand at paules crosse to recāt his doctrine & doings.

- Rob. Wisedome.
- Tho. Becon, Preacher.

The same time also Robert Wisedome,* parish Priest of S. Katherines in Lothbery, and Tho. Becon, were brought to Paules crosse, to recant and to reuoke theyr doctrine, and to burne theyr bookes.

Sir Iohn Birch Priest.

I. Byrch priest of S. Botolphes lane was complayned of by one M. Wilson, for being a busy reasoner in certayne opinions, which agreed not wyth the popes church.

Alexander Seton a Scottishman and a worthy Preacher.

Alexander Seton was denounced, detected, & presented by 3. priestes,* of whō one was felow of Whittington colledge called Rich. Taylor. An other was Ioh. Smith. The thyrd was Ioh. Huntingdon, who after was conuertened to y^e same doctrine himselfe.

This Seton was Chaplayne to the duke of Suffolke and by him was made free Denison. In his sermon preached at S. Anthonies, his aduersaries picked agaynst him matter cōteining 15. obiectiōs, or rather cauillatiōs which for example I thought here to exhibite to the reader, to the intent that men may see, not only what true doctrine Seton then preached, consonant to the Scriptures: but also what wrāgling cauillers cā do, in deprauing that is right, or in wrasting that is wel mēt, or in carping that they vnderstand not, or in seking out faults where none is, as by these theyr sinister cauillations may appeare.

Certayne places or Articles, gathered out of Setons Sermons by his aduersaryes.

THE sayings and wordes of Alexander Seton spoken & preached by him in his sermon,* made the xiiij. day of No'uember, at afternoone in the Parish Church of S. A. in London, Paule saith, of our selues we can do nothing I pray thee then where is thy will? Art thou any better thē Paul, Iames, Peter, and all the Apostles? Hast thou any more grace then they? Tell me now if thy will be any thing or nothing. If it be any thing, tel me whether it be to do good, or ill? If thou say to do ill, I will graunt thou hast a greater deale. If thou say to doe good, I aske whether is more somewhat, or nothing? For Paul said he could do nothing and I am sure thou hast no more grace, then Paul and his companions.

Scripture speaketh of three thinges in man: the fyrst is will: the other two are consent and deed. The first (that Page 1206 is will) God worketh without vs,* and besides vs. The other two he worketh in vs, and wyth vs. And here he alledged S. Augustine, to proue that we can will nothing y^t is good. Moreouer he said, thou hast not one iot, no not one title to do any good.

There is nothing in heauen, nor earth, creature nor other, that can be any meane towards our iustification nor can or may satisfy God the father for our sinne, saue onely Christ, and the shedding of his blood.

He that preacheth that workes doe merite, or be any meane to our saluation, or any part of our iustificatiō preacheth a doctrine of the deuill.*

If any thing els saue onely Christ, be any meane towards our iustificatiō, then did not Christ only iustify vs.

I say that thy good woorkes, nor any thing that thou canst do, can be one iot or title towards thy iustificatiō. For if they be, then is not Christ a full iustifier, and that I will proue hy a familier example. Be it in case that I haue .2. seruantes, the one is called Iohn, and the other Robert, & I promise to send you such a day xx.l. by Iohn my seruant and at my day I send you by Iohn my seruant xix.l.xix. s. xi. d. ob. q. and there lacketh but one farthing, which Robert doth bring thee, and so thou hast thy xx.l. euery penye and farthing. Yet will I aske if I be true of my promise, or no, and thou mayst say nay. And why? because I promised to send thee that whole, xx. pound by Iohn and did not, for there lacked a farthing, which Robert brought. Wherefore I say, if thy workes do merite or bring one litle iot or title toward thy iustification, then is Christ false of his promise, which sayd that he would do altogether.

One Scripture I will bring you (which they can not writhe) to proue that Christ was onely promised to be our onely Iustifier, our onely meane, and that is in the xxij. of Genesis, where it is written: In thy seede shall all people bee blessed, meaning therby onely Christ: and he said not in thy seedes, nor in the workes of thy seedes. Wherefore all they that preach, that workes be any part or meane toward our iustification, do make God false of his promise.

They that preach that works do merit, do make works the tree, which are but the fruits of iustice, wrought by him that is already a iust man, which can not chuse but brynge forth good fruit.

I would aske a question, whether he that worketh be a good mā,* or bad, for he must be one of them. If he be a good man, he can not chuse but bring forth good fruites: if he be an ill mā, he can bring forth no fruit, but ill fruit, for a good tree cannot bring forth ill fruit.

He that sayth that works do merit any thing towards our saluation, doth make workes checke mate with Christ & plucketh from Christ that is his, & geueth it to workes. Some will aske, wherefore then should I do good workes? I aunswere, good workes are to be done for no cause els, but onely for the glory of God, and not that they do merite any thing at all. And he that sayth that workes are to bee done for any other cause, thē for the glory of God only and will haue thē to merite, or be any meane towards our iustification, I say he lyeth, and beleue him not.

He that cā shew me in any scripture, that works do me'rite, or by any meane to our iustification: for the first scripture I will (without any further iudgemēt) lose both mine eares, for the second, my tounge, and for the third my necke. For I dare say he cannot prooue in all the whole scripture one title: wherefore beleue them not.

Men say that we deny good workes, and fasting, and prayer.* They lye on vs, we deny nothing but popish workes, and popish fasting, and popish prayer, & he that preacheth that works do merite, or fasting doth merite, or pray^rer doth merite, doth preach a popish doctrine.

If you aske when we will leaue preaching of workes, euen when they do leaue to preach that works do merite, & suffer Christ to be a whole satisfier, & only mean to our iustification, & till thē, we will not cease in Gods cause to set forth onely Christ to be a ful & perfect, & onely satisfaction.

If you aske, if good works shalbe rewarded, I say yea, and with no lesse then eternall glory,* but for no merit that they deserue, for they deserue nothing: but only because god hath promised, not for the merite of the worke, but for hys promise sake, and he will not breake his promise.

Other articles gathered out of Setons Sermons.

TOuching reconciliation spoken of by D. Smith, preaching in the forenoone at Paules crosse,* Alexander Seton preaching at afternoone, at S. Anthonies, & recityng his sayings & scriptures, reprobued him for alledging thys saying, Recōciliamini deo, & englishing the same thus, recōcile your selues to God: because it is there spoken passiuely, & not actiuely, so that there should be nothing in man pertaining to reconciliation, but all in God.

Also reprobuing the sayd D. Smith, for that the said D. said, that man by his good works might merite. Which sayⁱng of D. Smith, the sayd Alexander Setō reprobued in the pulpit at S. Anthonies, the 13. day of Nouember, the yere of our Lord 1541. as noughtely spoken.

Moreouer the sayd Alexander Seton sayd in the same place, that it was shame that any such preacher shoulde be suffered so openly to preach such erroneous doctrine, as to say that workes should merite, adducing: non sunt condignae passionēs, &c. Et postquam feceritis omnia. &c.

Finally Seton said, peraduenture ye will say the church hath determined this matter touching workes. And I say (quoth he) that it is Ecclesia malignantium, so determining any thing agaynst scripture.

To these pretēsed obiectiōs of his aduersaries, he made his answer again by writing, first denying many thinges there presented, taking vpon his conscience, that he neuer spake diuers of those words: and again many things, that he neuer ment to such end nor purpose, as in y^e said register may appeare. But all this notwithstanding, for all that he could say for himself, the ordinary proceded in his cōsistory iudgement, ministring to him certain Interogatories (after the popish course) to y^e number of x. articles The greatest matter laid against him was for preaching free iustificatiō by fayth in Christ Iesu,* agaynst false cōfīdēce in good works, & mans fre wil. Also it was layd vnto him, for affir^ming y^e priuate masses & diriges, & other prayers profited not y^e soules departed: so that in the end, he with Tolwing aforesaid was caused to recant at paules crosse. an. 1541.

To be short, such a number out of all parishes in Lōdō & out of Calice: and diuers other quarters,* were thē apprehended through the sayd Inquisitiō, that al prisons in Lōdon were to litle to hold thē, in so much that they were fain to lay thē in the Halles. At the last by the meanes of good L. Audley, such pardō was obtained of the king, that y^e said L. Audley, thē L. Chancellor, being contēt that one should be bound for another, they were all discharged, being boūd onely to appere in the starre chamber the next day after Al soules, there to answer if they were called: but neither was there any person called, neither did there any appeare.

¶The story of Iohn Porter, cruelly Martyred for reading the Bible in Paules.

IN the number of these afore named, commeth the remēbraunce of Iohn Porter,* who in the same yeare 1541. for reading the Bible in Paules Church, was cruelly handled and that vnto death, as you shall heare. It was declared in this history aboue, pag. 1162. how Edm. Boner Bishop of London (in the dayes of the L. Cromwell) beyng then Ambassador at Paris,* was a great Doer in setting forward the Printing of the Bible in the great volume: promising moreouer, that he would for his part haue 6. of those Bibles set vp in the Church of S. Paule in London. Which also at his comming home, he no lesse performed, ac|cording to the kinges proclamation set foorth for y^e same, whereof read before, pag. 1069.

The bibles thus standing in Paules by the commaūdement of the king, and the appointment of Boner the bishop, many well disposed people vsed much to resort to the hearing therof, especially whē they could get any that had an audible voyce to read vnto thē, misdoubting therein no daunger toward them: and no more there was, so long as the dayes of Cromwell lasted. After he was gone, it happened amongst diuers and sondry godly disposed persōs, which frequented there the reading of the foresayd Bible. that one Iohn Porter vsed sometimes to be occupied in that godly exercise, to the edefying as well of himselfe, as of other. This Porter was a freshe young man, and of a bigge stature. Who by diligent reading of the Scripture, and by hearing of such Sermons as then were preached by them that were the setters forth of Gods truth,* became very expert. The Bible then being set vppe by Boners commaundement vpon diuers pillars in Paules Church fixed vnto the same with cheines for all men to read in thē y^t would,* great multitudes woulde resort thither to heare this Porter, because he could read well and had an audible voyce. Boner & his chappeleines being greued withall (& the world beginning then to frowne vppon the Gospellers) Page 1207 sent for the sayd Porter, and rebuked him very sharpe|ly,* for his reading. But Porter answered hym that he trusted he had done nothing contrary to the law, neither contrary to his aduertisementes which he had fixed in print ouer euery Bible.

Boner thē •ayd vnto his charge, that he had made expositions vpon the text, and gathered great multitudes about him to make tumultes. He answered: he trusted that should not be proued by him. But in fine Boner sent him to Newgate, where he was miserably fettred in irōs both legges and armes,* with a collar of iron about his necke fastened to the wall in the dungeon, being there so cruellye handled, that he was compelled to send for a kinsmā of his whose name is also Porter, and yet alieue and canne testify that is true,* & dwelleth yet without Newgate. Who seing his kinsman in this miserable case entreated Iewet, then keeper of Newgate, that he might be released out of those cruel yrons, and so through frendship and mony, had him vp among other prisoners, which lay there for felony and murther: where Porter being amongst them, hearing and seing their wickednes and blasphemy exhorted thē to amendmēt of life,* and gaue vnto them such instructiōs as he had learned of the Scriptures: for which his so doying he was complayned on and so caryed downe, and layd in the lower dungeon of al, oppressed with boltes and yrons, where within 6. or 8. dayes after, he was found dead.

It is signified vnto vs by credible information, that the same night before he was found dead, they that dwelt nere to the same place of the prison where Porter lay,* did heare him pitiously to grone and make a lamētable noise, where some suppose y^t he was put in certayne strait yrons which be there in the house, called The deuill on the necke, being after an horrible sort deuised, straying & wrinching the necke of a man with his legges together, in such sort as y^e more he styrreth in it, the strayer it presseth him, so that within 3. or 4. houres, it breaketh & crussbeth a mans backe and body in pieces. In which Deuillish torment, whether Iohn Porter was slayne or no, it is not certaine. But how so euer it was, this is knowne, that he was found dead (as is aforesayd) in the dungeon, with such groning and piteous noyse heard the night before in the sayd dungeō, as is declared.

A note of one Thomas Sommers imprisoned for the Gospell.

AMongst these Londiners thus troubled by the clergie we will adde also (although a little out of place) an other note of a Marchaunt called Tho. Sommers,* who died in the Tower of London for confessing of the Gospell. Which Tho. being a very honest Marchant and wealthy, was sent for by the Lord Cardinall and committed to the Tower, for that he had Luthers bookes (as they termed them) and after a great sute made for him to the sayd Cardinall, his iudgement was that he should ride from the tower into Cheapeside carying a new booke in his hand and be hanged with bookes round about him, with three or iiij, other Marchaunts after the same order: which was done. And when M. Sommers should be set on a colliers nagg as the rest of his fellow prisoners were, a frend of his called M. Copland brought him a very good gelding, fayre dressed with bridle and sadle, and when the Bishops Officers came to dresse him with bookes, as they had trimmed the other, and would haue made holes in his garment to haue thrust the stringes of the books therein, nay sayd Sōmers, I haue alwayes loued to goe hansomely in my apparell, and taking the bookes and opening them, he bound them together by the stringes and cast them about his necke (the leaues being al opē) like a collar,* and being on horse backe, rode formost thorow the streetes, till they came about the standard in Cheapeside, where a great fire was made to burne their bookes in, and a Pillary set vp there for 4. persons in token that they had deserued it.

In the meane time, by the way as they should come it was appoynted, that one should go before them with a ba'son. At the noyse whereof, M. Sommers horse beyng a lofty gelding and fierce, was in such a rage, that he which ronge the bason beyng afeard of himselfe, was fayne to go alone a great space before that any horseman did folow after. At length when they came to the fire, euery of them ha'uing a booke in his hand, they were commaunded to caste their bookes into the fire. But when M. Sommers saw that his new Testament should be burned,* he threw it ouer the fire: which was seene by some of Gods enemies, and brought to him agayne, commaunding him to cast it into the fire: which he would not do, but cast it thorow the fire. Which thing was done iij. times. But at last a stander by tooke it vp, and saued it from burning. But not long after,* the sayd M. Sommers was cast agayne into the Tower by the Cardinall, through the cruelty of the Bishops and theyr adherentes, who soone after dyed in the sayd prison for the testimony of his fayth.

What trouble & vexatiō happened amongst the godly brethren in London, for the 6. Articles, hitherto we haue discoursed. Albeit neither haue I cōprehended all, which were molested through all the Parishes of London: neyther agayne did this rigorous Inquisition so cease within the precinctes of this Citty onely, but also extended further to Salisbury, Northfolke, Lincolne, and through all other Shyres and quarters of the realme: so that whereas any popish Prelate most bare stroke, there most persecution encreased. The Bishop of Lincolne the same time was Iohn Longland, and Doct. Dracotte his Chauncellour. Of whose rigorous doyinges ye haue heard enough and to much before. His ready diligence in all popish quarels as it neuer lacked before: so now in the execution of these 6 Articles, it was not farre behinde in whose dioces diuers good men and women,* namely about Buckingham and A'mersham, and quarters there aboutes, were grieuously dis'quieted, appearing yet in the same Register: as one ¶Thomas Bernard, and Iames Morton Martyrs.

ABout the same time Iohn Longland Byshop of Lincolne, burned two vpon one day,* the one named Tho. Bernard, and the other Iames Morton: The one for teaching the Lordes prayer in English, and the other for keeping the Epistle of S. Iames translated into English.

In Oxford also the same time or much thereabout, recāted one M. Barber maister of Arte of that Uniuersitie,* a man excellently learned. Who being called vp to Lambeth before the Archbishop Thomas Cranmer, was in his examination so stout in the cause of the sacrament, & so learnedly defended himselfe therein, that (as it is credible affirmed of them, which yet be aliue, and were present thereat) neyther Cranmer himselfe, nor all they could well answer to his allegations brought out of Austen. Wherin he was so prompe and rype of himselfe, that the Archbishop with the residue of his company, were brought in great admiration of him. Notwithstanding by compulsion of y^e time and daunger of the vi. articles, at last hee relented, and returning agayne to Oxford, was there caused to recant. After which the good man long prospered not, but ware away. Ex testimonio Rad. Moris.

A mery, and pleasaunt narration, touching a false fearfull imagination of fire, rayseed among the Doctors and Maisters of Oxford in S. Maries church at the recantation of M. Mallary M. of Arte of Cambridge.

THis recantatiō of M. Barbar aforesayd in the Uniuersitie of Oxford, bringeth me in remembrance of an other Page 1208 recantation likewise happening not long before,* in y^e sayd Uniuersity, which I thought here not to ouerpasse, and namely for that the same caryeth withall, a mery rydiculous spectacle, not vnworthy to be remembred, & here to be inserted, somewhat to recreate & refreshe by the way the wery mind of the reader, after so many bloudy and lamentable storyes, executions, recantatiōs, and tragedyes aboue passed. The story is this.

There was one M. Malary, mayster of Arte of Cambridge, scholer of Christes Colledge, who for the like opinions to those aboue rehearsed, holden contrary to the catholicke determination of holy mother church of Rome, y^t is, for the right truth of Christes Gospell, was conuented before the Bishops, and in the end, sent to Oxford, there openly to recant,* and to beare his fagot, to the terror of the Studentes of that Uniuersi•y. The time and place was appointed, that he should be brought solely into S. Maryes church vpon a Sondag: where a great number of the head Doctors and Diuines, and other of the Uniuersity, were together assembled: beside a great multitude of Citizens and towne dwellers which came to behold the sight. Furthermore,* because that solemnity should not passe w^t out some effectuall Sermon, for the holding vp of the mother Church of Rome, D. Smith reader then of the Diuinity lecture, was appoynted, to make the Sermon at this recantation. Briefly at the preaching of this Sermō there was assembled a mighty audience of all sorts and degrees as well of Studentes as other. Few almost were absent, which loued to heare or see any newes. In so much y^t ther was no place almost in the whole Church which was not fully replenished with concourse and throng of people.

All thinges thus being prepared and set in a readines, commeth forth poore Mallary with his fagotte vpon hys shoulder.* Not long after also procedeth the doctor into the pulpite to make his Sermon: the purpose and argument wherof was wholly vpon the Sacramēt. The which Doctor for the more confirmation and credite to his wordes, had prouided the holy catholick cake, and the Sacrament of the aulter, there to hang by a string before him in y^e pulpit. Thus the Doctor with his God almighty entring his godly Sermon, had scarce proceded into the middest therof (the people geuing great silence with all reuerence vnto his doctrine) but soddenly was heard into the Church the voyce of one crying in the street, fire, fire. The party which first cryed thus in the street, was called Heuster. The occasion was this, for that he comming from Allhallowes Parish, saw a Chimney on fire, and so passing in the street by S. Maryes Church, cryed fire, fire, as the fashion is, meaning no hurt.

This sound of fire being heard into the Church, fyrst of them which stode outtermost next to the Church doore so encreased and went from one to an other,* that at length it came vnto the eares of the Doctors, & at last to the preacher himselfe. Who as soone as they heard the matter, being amazed with soddeine feare, and maruelling what the matter should meane, beganne to look vp into the toppe of the Church, and to behold the walles. The residue seeyng them look vp, looked vp also. Then began they in the middest of the audience to crye out with a loud voyce, fire, fire. Where sayth one? where sayth on other? In the Church, sayth one. The mention of the Church was scarcely pronouced, when as in one moment there was a common cry amongst thē, the Church is on fire, the Church is sette on fire by heretickes.* &c. And albeit no man did see any fire at all, yet forsomuch as al mē cried out so, euery man thought it true that they heard. Then was there such feare, cōcourse and tumult of people, through the whole church, that it cā not be declared in wordes, as it was in deed.

And as in a great fire (where fire is indeed) we see many times how one litle sparke geueth matter of a mighty flame, setting whole stackes and piles on burning, so here vpon a small occasion of one mans worde, kindled first a general cry, then a strong opinion running in euery mans head within the Church,* thinking the Church to be on fire, where no fire was at all. Thus it pleased almighty God to delude these deluders, that is, that these great Doctors and wise men of the Scholes,* which thinke themselues so wise in Gods matters as though they coulde not erre, should see by theyr own senses and iudgements, how blind and infatuated they were in these so small matters & sensible trifles.

Thus this strong imaginatiō of fire being fixed in their heades, as nothing could remoue them to thinke contrary but that the Church was on fire: so euery thing that they saw or heard,* encreased this suspition in them, to make it seme most true, which was in deede most false. The first & chieft occasion that augmēted this suspition, was the hereticke there bearing his fagot, which gaue them to imagine, that all other heretickes, had conspired with him, to set the Church on fire.

After this, through the rage of the people & running too and fro, the dust was so raysed, that it shewed as it hadde bene the smoke of fire. Which thing together with the outcry of the people, made all men so afayd, that leauing the Sermon, they began altogether to runne away. But such was the preasse of the multitude running in heapes together, that the more they laboured, the lesse they could geue out. For whilst they ranne all headlong vnto the doores euery man struing to get out first, the thrust one another in such sort, and stucke so fast, that they which were without, neither could get into the Church, agayn, neither they that were within could get out by any meanes. So the one dore being stopped, the ran to an other litle wicket on the North side, towardes the Colledge called Brason nose,* thinking so to passe out. But there agayne was the like or greater throng. So the people clustring & thronging together, it put many in daunger and broughte many vnto theyr end, by brusing of their bones or sides. There was yet an other dore towardes the West, which albeit it was shut and seldom opened: yet now ranne they to it with such sway, that the great barre of iron (which is incredible to be spoken) being pulled out and broken by force of mens handes, the dore notwithstanding could not be opened, for the preasse or multitude of people.

At the last, when they were there also past all hope to get out then they were all exceedingly amazed and ran vp and downe, crying out vpon the heretickes which had cōspired theyr death. The more they ranne about & cried out the more smoke & dust rose in the Church, euen as though all thinges now had bene on a flaming fire. I thinke there was neuer such a tumultuous hurly burly rising so of nothing heard of before, nor so great a feare where was no cause to feare, nor peril at all: so y^t if Democritus the mery philosopher sitting in y^e top of the church,* & seing al things in such safety as they were, hadde looked downe vpon the multitude, and beholden so great a number some howling and weeping, running vppe and downe, and playing the madde men, now hither, now thither, as beyng tossed too and fro with waues or tempestes, trembling and quaking raging and faring, without any manifest cause, specially i• he had sene those great Rabbines the Doctors laden with so many badges or cognisaunces of wisdom, so foolishly and ridiculously seeking holes and corners to hide themselues in, gasping, breathing, and sweating, and for very horror, being almost beside themselues, I thinke he would haue satisfied himself with this one laughter, for all his life time, or elles rather woulde haue laughed his hart out of his belly, whilst one sayd that he playnely heard he noice of the fire, an other affirmed that he sawe it with his eyes, and an other sware that he felt the molten leade dropping downe vpon his head and shoulders. Such is the force of imagination, when it is once graffed in mennes hartes through feare.* In all the whole company there was none that behaued himselfe more modestly then the Hereticke that was there to do penance, who casting his Fagot of frō his shoulders vpon a Monkes head that stood by kept himselfe quiet, minding to take such part as the other did.

All the other being careful for themselues, neuer made an end of running vp and downe & crying out. None cried not more earnestly then the Doctor that preached (who was as I sayd, D. Smith) who in a maner first of all cryed out in the pulpit, saying: These are the traines and subtleties of the heretickes agaynst me. Lord haue mercy vpō me: Lord haue mercy vpon me. But might not God, as it had bene (to speake with Iob) out of a whyrle winde haue aunswered agayne vnto this Preacher thus:* Thou doest now implore my mercy but thou thy self shewest no mercy vnto thy felowes and brethren.* How doth thy flesh trēbell now at the mention of fire, but you thinke it a sport to burne other simple innocents, neither do you any thing at all regard it? If burning seme so grieuous a matter vnto you, and to suffer the torment of fire: then you should also haue the like consideration in other mens perils and daūgers, when as you do burne your felowes and brethren.

Or if you thinke it but a light or trifling matter in thē go to now, do you also with like courage, cōtemne,* & with like patience suffer now the same tormentes your selues. And if so be it I shoulde nowe suffer you with the whole Church to be burned to ashes, what other thing shoulde I do vnto you, then you do dayly vnto your felowes and brethren? Wherefore since you so litle esteeme the death of others, be now content that other men shoulde also litle regard the death of you. With this (I say) or with some other like aunswere, if that either God, or humane charity, either the common sense of nature would expostulate with them, yea if there had bene a fire indeed (as they were more Page 1209 feared then hurt) who would haue doubted but that it had happened vnto them according to their deserts? But now worthy it is the noting, how the vayne feare and folly of those catholicks either was deluded, either how theyr cruelty was reprobued, whereby they being better taught by theyr owne example, might hereafter learne what is to put other poore men to the fire which they themselues here so much abhorred.*

But to returne agayn to the descriptiō of this pageant• wherein (as I sayd before) there was no daunger at all, yet were they all in such feare, as if present death had ben ouer their heades.

In all this great maze and garboyle there was nothing mor• feared then the melting of the lead, which many affir|med that they felt dropping vpō their bodies: Now in this sodein terror and feare, which tooke from them all reason & counsell out of theyr mindes: to beholde what practises & sondry shiftes euery man made for himselfe, it would make not onely Democritus, and Heraclitus also to laugh but rather an horse weluere to breake his halter. But none vsed themselues more ridiculously, then such as semed greatest wise men, sauing that in one or ij. peradventure some what more quietnes of minde appeared. Amongest whom was one Claymund President of Corpus Christi Colledge (whom for reuerence and learnings sake I do here name) and a few other aged persons with him,* which for theyr age and weakenesse, durst not thrust themselues into the throng amongst the rest, but kneled downe quietly before the high aulter, committing themselues & theyr liues vnto the sacrament. The other which were yonger and stron|ger, ran vp and downe through the preasse maruelling at the vnciuility of mē, and waxt angry with the vnmanerly multitude that would geue no rowme vnto the Doctors, Bachelers, Maisters, and other graduates & regent maisters. But as the terror and feare was common vnto all men, so was there no differēce made, of persōs or degrees euery man scamling for himselfe. The violet cap or purple gowne, did there nothing auayle the Doctour, neyther the masters hood nor the monkes coule was there respected.

Yea if the king or queene had bene there at that present and in that perplexity, they had bene no better then a common man. After they had long striuen and assayed all maner of wayes and saw no remedy, neither by force neither authority to preuayle: the fell to entreating and offering of rewardes, one offering xx. poūd, an other his scarlet gown so that any man would pull him out though it were by the eares.

Some stood close vnto the pillers, thinking themselues safe vnder the voutes of stone for the dropping of the lead. Othersome being without mony & vnprouided of al shift, knew not which way to turne them. One being a presidēt of a certaine Colledge (whose name I need not here to vtter) pulling a bourd out from the pues, couered his head & shoulders therwith agaynst y^e scalding lead, which they fea|red much more then the fall of the Church. Now what a laughter would this haue ministred vnto Democritus amongst other thinges, to behold there a certayne ground paūch, who seing the dores stopped and euery way closed vp, thought by an other compendious meanes to get out through a glasse window if it might be by any shift. But here the icō grates letted him: notwithstanding his gredy mind would needes attempt if he could happely bring hys purpose to passe. Whē he had brokē the glasse, & was come to the space betwene y^e grates where he should creepe out, first he thrust in his head w^t the one shoulder, & it wēt thorow wel enough. Thē he labored to get the other shoulder after, but there was great labor about y^t, & lōg he stuck by y^e shoulders with much adoe. For what doth not importune labor ouercome? Thus farreforth he was now gottē. But by what part of his bodye he did sticke fast, I am not certayne, neither may I fayne, forsomuch as there be yet witnesses which did see these thinges, which woulde correcte me if I should so doe. Notwithstanding this is most certayne that he did stick fast betwene the grates, and coulde neither get out nor in.

Thus this good man being in deed a Monke, and hauing but short hose, by the which way he supposed soonest to escape, by the same he fel into further incōuenience making of one danger two. For if the fire or lead had fallen on the outside, those parts which did hang out of the window had bene in danger: & contrariwise if the slaine had raged within the Church, all his other parts had lyen opē to the fire. And as this man did sticke fast in the windowe, so dyd the rest sticke as fast in the dores, that sooner they myght haue bene burned, then they could once styrre or moue one foot. Through the which prese at the last there was a way found, that some going ouer their heads gat out.

Here also happened an other pageaunt in a certayne Monke (if I be not misadvised) of Glocester Colledge, whereat Calphurnius mighte well laugh with an open mouth.* So it happened that there was a young lad in this tumult, who seing the dores fast stopped with the prese or multitude, & that he had no way to get out, climed vp vpō the dore, and there staying vpon the top of the doore, was forced to tary still▪ For to come downe into the Church agayne, he durst not for feare of the fire, and to leape downe toward the street he could not without daunger of falling. When he had taryed there a while, he aduised himself what to do: neither did occasion want to serue his purpose. For by chaunce, amongst them that gat out ouer mens heads, he saw a Monke comming towards him, which had a great wide Coule hanging at his backe. This the Boye thought to be a good occasion for him to escape by. When the Monke came neare vnto him, the Boy which was in the toppe of the doore, came downe, and pretily conueyed himselfe into the Monkes Coule,* thinking (as it came to passe in deed) that if the Monke did escape, he should also get out with him. To be brieve, at the last the Monke gat out ouer mens heads, with the boy in his Coule, and for a great while felt no wayght or burden.

At the last, when he was somewhat more come to himselfe, and did shake his shoulders, •eling his Coule heuyer thē it was accustomed to be, & also hearing y^e voyce of one speaking behinde his Coule, he was more afrayd then he was before, when he was in the throng, thinking in very deed, that the euill spirit which had set the Church on fire, had flyen into his Coule. By and by he began to play the Exorcist: In the name of God (sayd he) and all sayntes, I commaund thee to declare what thou art that art behinde at my backe. To whom the boy aunswered: I am Bertrames boy, sayd he (for that was his name.) But I, sayd the monke, adiure thee in the name of the vnseparable trinity, that thou wicked spirit do tell me who thou art, from whence thou comest, and that thou get thee hence. I am Bertrames boy, sayd he, good mayster let me go: and with that his Coule began with the wayt to cracke vppon hys shoulders. The monke when he perceiued the matter, took the boy out and discharged his Coule. The boy tooke his legges and ranne away as fast as he could.

Among other, one wiser then the rest, ranne wyth the Church dore key, beating vpon the stone walles, thinking therewith to breake an hole thorough to escape out.

In the meane time those that were in the streate looking diligently about them, and perceyuing all thynges to be without feare, maruelled at this soddayne outrage, & made signes and tokēs to them that were in the church, to keepe themselues quyet, crying to them that there was no daunger.

But for so much as no word could be heard by reason of the noyse that was within the Churche, those signes made them much more afrayd then they were before, interpreting the matter, as though all had bene on fire without the Church, and for the dropping of the lead and falling of other things, they should rather tary still within y^e church, and not to venter out. This trouble continued in this maner by the space of certayne houres.

The next day, and also all the weeke following there was an incredible number of bills set vp vpon the Church dores, to enquire for thinges that were lost, in such variety and number, as Domocritus might here agayne haue had iust cause to laugh. If any man haue foūd a payre of shoes yesterday in S. Mary Church, or knoweth any man that hath found them. &c. An other bill was set vp for a gowne that was lost. An other intreateth to haue his cappe restored. One lost his purse and gyrdle with certeyne mony: an other his sword. One enquireth for a ring, and one for one thing, an other for an other. To be short, there was few in this ga•boyle, but that either through negligence lost, or through obliuion left something behind him.

Thus haue you hitherto heard a tragicall story of a terrible fire which did no hurt. The description whereof although it be not so perfectly expressed according to the wor^thines of the matter, yet because it was not to be passed with silence, we haue superficially set foorth some shadow therof, wherby the wise & discreet may sufficiently consider the rest, if any thing els be lacking in setting forth the full narration therof. As touching the heretick, because he had not done his sufficient penance there by occasion of thys hurly burly, therefore the next day folowing he was reclaimed into the Church of S. Frideswide, where he supplied the rest that lacked of his plenary penance.

The 4. and 5. Mariage of K. Henry the 8.

THE same yeare and month next folowing, after the apprehension of the Lord Cromwell, which was an. 1541. Page 1210 the king immediately was diuorced from the Lady Anne of Cleue. The cause of which seperation being whollye committed to the Clergy of the Conuocation,* it was by them defined, concluded, and graunted, that the kyng being freed frō that pretended matrimony (as they called it) might mary wher he would,* & so might she likewise: whō also consenting to the same diuorcement her selfe, by her owne letters, was after that taken no more for Queene, but onely called Lady Anne of Cleue. Whych thinges thus discussed by the Parliament and Conuocation house▪ the king thesame moneth was marryed to his fifte Wyfe▪ which was the Lady Katherine Haward, Niece to the Duke of Northfolke, and daughter to the Lord Edmund Haward the Dukes brother. But this marryage likewise continued not long.

In the same moneth of August, and the same yeare, I finde moreouer in some records, beside the xxiiij. Chapter-house monks aboue recited, whom Cope doth sanctify for holy martyrs, for suffering in the Popes deuotion, against the kinges supremacy, other sixe which were also brought to Tiborne and there executed in the like case of rebellion. Of whom, the first was the Prior of Dancaster, the second a monk of the Charterhouse of Lōdō, called Giles Horne, some call him William Horne: the third one Tho. Epsam a Monke of Westminster, who had his Monkes garment pluckt from his backe, being the last monke in K. Henries dayes that did weare that monkish weede: the fourth one Philpot: the fift one Carewe: the sixt was a Fryer. See what a difficulty it is to plucke vp blind superstition once rooted in mans hart by a litle custome.

Now as touching the late maryage betwene the king and the Lady Haward ye heard how this matrimony endured not long: for in the yere next folowing 1542. the sayd Lady Katherine was accused to the king of incontinent liuing, not onely before her mariage with Fraūces Direham, but also of spousebreach sith her maryage, with Tho. Culpeper. For the which both the men aforesayd, by acte of Parliament were atteinted and executed for high treason, and also the sayd Lady Katherine late quene, with the Lady Iane Rochford widow, late Wyfe to George Boleyne Lord Rochford, brother to Queene Anne Boleyne, were beheaded for theyr desertes within the Tower. Ex Hallo & alijs.

After the death and punishment of this Lady his fifth wife, the king calling to remembraunce the wordes of the Lord Cromwell, and missing now more and more his old Counsellor, and partly also smelling somewhat the wayes of Winchester, beganne a litle to set his foote agayne in the cause of Religion. And although he euer bare a speciall fauor to Thomas Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury (as you shall heare more hereafter, God willing, in the lyfe of Cranmer) yet now the more he missed the Lord Cromwel the more he inclined to the Archbishop, & also to the right cause of Religion. And therefore in the same yeare and in the month of October, after the execution of this Queene, the king vnderstanding some abuses yet to remayne vnreformed, namely about pilgrimages and Idolatry, and other thinges moe besides to be corrected within his dominions, directed his letters vnto the foresaid Archbishop of Canterbury, for the speedy redresse and reformation of the same. The tenor of which letters hereafter fully ensueth, in these wordes.

¶The kinges letters to the Archbishop, for the abolishing of Idolatry.

*Right reuerend father in God, right trusty and welbeloued, we greet you well letting you to wit, that whereas hertofore vpon the zeale and remembraunce whiche we had to our bounden duety towardes almighty God, perceiuing sundry superstitions and abuses to be vsed and embraced by our people, wherby they grievously offended him and his word: we did not onely cause the Images and bones of such as they resorted and offered vnto, with the ornamentes of the same, and all such writings and monumentes of fayned myracles, wherewith they were illuded, to be taken away, in all places of our Realme, but also by our Iniunctions commaunded, that no offering or setting vp of lightes or candles should be suffered in any Church, but onely to the blessed Sacramentes of the aulter: it is lately come to our knoweledge, that this our good intent and purpose, notwithstandinge the shrines, coueringes of shrines, and monumentes of those thinges do yet remayne in sundry places of this Realme, muche to the sclander of our doinges, and to the greate displeasure of almighty God, the same being meanes to allure our subiectes to theyr former hipocrisye and superstition: and also that our Iniunctions be not kept as appertayneth. For the due and speedye reformation whereof, we haue thought meete, by these our letters, expressly to will and commaund you, that incontinent vpon the receite hereof▪ you shall not onely cause due search to be made in the Cathedrall Church for those thinges, and if any shrine couering of shrine, table, monument of myracles, or other pilgrimages, do th•e continue, to cause it to be so taken awaye, as there remayne no memory of it, but also that you shall take order with all the Curates, and other hauing charge within your Dioces, to doe the semblable, and to see that our Iniunctions be duely kept, as apperteyneth without fayling, as we trust you▪ and as you will aunswere for the contrary.

Geu•n vnder our Signet at our towne of Hull▪ the fourth day of October in the 33: yeare of our raigne.

Furthermore, the next yeare after this ensuing, which was 1543. in the moneth of February, followed an other Proclamation geuen out by the kinges authority, wherein the Popes Lawe forbidding white meates to be eaten in Lent, was repealed, and the eating of such meates set at liberty, for the behoofe of the kinges subiectes. The copy of which Proclamation I thought here good also to be remembred.

¶A Proclamation concerning eating of white meates made the 9. of February, the 34. yeare of the reigne of the kinges most Royall maiesty.

FOr as much as by diuers and sundrye occasions, as well Heringes, Linges, Saltfish, Samond, Stockefish,* as other kindes of fishe bene this yeare scant, and also enhaunced in prices aboue the olde rate and common estimation of theyr valour, so that if the kinges louing subiectes should be enforced onely to buy and prouide Hering and other salt store of fish,* for the necessary and sufficient sustentation and maynteynaunce of theyr householdes and families all this holye time of Lent, according as they haue bene wont in times past to do, and should not be by some other conuenient meanes relieued therein, the same might and should vndoubtedly redound to their importable charge and detrimēt: and for so much as his highnes considereth howe this kinde and maner of fasting, (that is to say) to absteyne from mylke, butter egges, cheese, and other white meates, is but a meere positiue Law of the Church, and vsed by a custome within this Realme, and of none other force or necessitie, but the same may be vpon considerations and groundes altered and dispensed with from time to time, by the publicke authoritye of kinges and princes, when so euer they shall perceiue the same to tend to the hurt and damage of their people: The kinges highnesse therefore most graciously considering and tendering the wealth and commoditie of his people, hath thought good for the consideratiōs oboue rehearsed, to release and dispense with the sayd law and custome of absteyning from white meates this holy time of Lent, and of his especiall grace and mere motion geueth and graunteth vnto all and singuler his subiectes within this his Realme of Englande, Wales, Callis, Cuisnes, & Hammes, and in all other his graces dominions, free liberty faculty and licence to eat all maner of white meates, as milke, Egges, butter, Cheese and such like, during the time of this Lent, without any scruple or grudge of conscience, any Law, Constitution, vse, or custome to the contrary notwithstanding.

Wherein neuerthelesse his highnesse exhorteth, and in the name of God requireth all suche his faythfull subiectes, as may, will, or shall enioy this his sayde graunt or faculty, that they be in no wise scrupulous or doubtfull thereof, •or abuse or turne the same into a fleshly or carnall liberty, bu• rather endeuour themselues to theyr possible powers, with this libertye of eating of white meates, to obserue also that fast which God most specially requireth of them, that is to say, to renounce the world and the deuill, with all theyr pompes and workes, and also to subdue and repress the carnall affections & the corrupt works of the flesh, according to theyr vow and profession made at the Font stone, for in these poyntes specially consisteth the very true and perfect abstinence or fasting of a Christian man: thus to endure and cōtinue from yeare to yeare, till the kinges highnesse pleasure shall by his maiestyes proclamation be published to the contrary.

The trouble and persecution of foure windsore men, Robert Testwood, Henry, Filmer, Anthony Person, apd Iohn Marbecke, persecuted for righteousnesse sake, and for the Gospell.

COMming nowe to the Storye and tyme of the foure Windsore men troubled and persecuted for the true testimony of Gods word,* whereof three were martyred and sacrificed in fire, the fourth (which was Marbecke) had his pardon: first I haue to sh•w the original of their troubles in seuerall partes: secondly the maner and order of theyr death, as they suffered together, which was, an. 1544. thirdly to answere partly in purgation of my selfe, against certayne clatterers, which haue hitherto taken theyr pleasure Page 1211 in railing against my former edition of Acts and monuments, for mistaking y^e name of Marbecke, whō in one place I reported to haue ben burned, albeit in the ende of the story, correcting my selfe agayne, I declare hym not to haue bene burned. Wherefore to stoppe the brawlyng mouthes of such quarellers, I thought here to set forth the ful narration, both of the said Marbecke, and of his fellows, in truth as I trust none of them shal haue iust cause to quarel thereat.

Whereupon they informed D. Sampson (beeyng then their Deane) of him. But for so much as some of the Canons at that tyme hadde heard of Testwood, howe that he smelled of the newe learning (as they called it) it would not be consented vnto at the first.

Notwithstanding, with often sute of the foresayd Musitions made to one Doctor Tare (who beyng halfe a Musition himselfe, bare a great stroke in such matters) a rounge beyng voyd, Testwoode was sent for to bee heard. And beyng there foure or fiue dayes among the quier men, he was so well lyked both for hys voyce and cunningg, that he was admitted, and after settled in Windsore, wyth hys houshold, and had in good estimation wyth the Deane and canons a great while. But when they had perceyued him by hys often talke at theyr tables (for he could not well dissemble his religion) that he leaned to Luthers sect, they began to mislike him. And so passing forth amōg them it was his chaunce one day to bee at dinner with one of the Canons, named D. Rawson. At the which dinner amongst all other, was one of Kyng Edwardes 4. Chauntrie priests, named M. Ely, an old Bachelor of Diuinitie. Which Ely in his talke at the boord, began to raile against lay men, which took vpon them to mell with the Scriptures, and to be better learned (knowing no more but the English tongue) then they which had bene students in the Uniuersities of Oxford and Cambridge all the dayes of their lyues.* Then Testwood perceiuing he ment that by him, could forbear his railyng no longer, but said: M. Ely, by your pacience I thinke it be no hurt for lay men, as I am, to read and to know the scriptures.

Which of you (quoth Ely) that be vnlearned, knoweth them, or vnderstandeth them? S. Paul saith: If thine enemy hunger, feed him: if he thirst, geue hym drinke, and in so doynge, thou shalt heape coales of fire vpon hys head. Now sir (quoth Elye) what meaneth Sainte Paule by these coales of fire? Marry sir (quoth Testwoode) hee meaneth nothing els by them (as I haue learned) but burning charitie, that with doynge good to our enemies, wee shoulde therby win them. A sirah, quoth he, you are an old scholer in deed.

After this, they fell into further communication of the Pope, whose supremacy was much spokē of at that tyme, but not knowen to be so farre in question in the parliamēt house as it was. And in their talk Ely demanded of Testwood, whether the Pope ought to be head of the church or no. Agaynst the which,* Testwoode durst not saye hys full mynd, but reasoned within his boūds a great while. But when they were both well stricken in an heate, Testwoode forgetting himselfe, chaunced to say, that euery king in his own realme & dominion, ought to be the hed of the church vnder Christ▪ At the which words Ely was so chafed, that he rose vp from the table in a great fume, calling him heretike, and all that nought was, and so went brawling & chiding away, to the great disquieting of al the company that weee there. Then was Testwood very sory to see the olde man take it so greuously. Wherupon after dinner he went and sought M. Ely, and found him walking in the bodye of the church, thinking to haue talked with him charitably, & so to haue bene at one againe: but euer as Testwood preased towardes him, the other shunned him, and would not come ni• him, but spit at him, saieng to other that walked by: beware of this fellow, for he is the greatest heretike and schismatike, that euer came in Windsore.

Now began the matter to brew. For after that Elye had made his complaint to the Deanes deputie, and other of the canons, they were all against Testwood, purposing surely at the Deanes comming home (if all thynges had chaunced euen) to haue put hym to hys trumpe. But see the fortune. It was not twelue dayes after, •re that the kings supremacie passed in the Parliament house Whereupon the Deane (D. Sampson) came home sodainly in the night late,* and forthwithall sent his Uerger about to all the Canons and ministers of the colledge, from the highest to the lowest, commaunding them to be in the Chapter house by eight of the clocke in the mornynge. Then Ely cōsulted with the Canons ouer night (as late as it was) and thought on the next day to haue put Testwood to a great plunge. But he that layeth a snare for another man (sayth Salomon) shall be taken in it himselfe. And so was Elye. For when the Deane and euery man were come and placed in the Chapter house, and that the Deane had commended the ministers of the Church for their diligence in tendyng the Quire, exhortyng them also to continue in the same: he began (contrary to euery mans expectation) to inuey agaynst the Bishop of Romes supremacie and vsurped authoritie, confoundyng the same by manifest Scriptures and probable reasons, so earnestly, that it was a woonder to heare: and at length declared openly, that by the whole consent of the Parliament house, the Popes supremacie was vtterly abolished out of this Realme of England for euer, and so commanded euery man there, vpon his allegiance, to call hym Pope no more, but bishop of Rome, & whatsoever he were that would not so do, or did from that day forth maintaine or fauour his cause by any manner of meanes, he should not only loose the benefit of that house, but be reputed as an vtter enemy to God and to the king. The Canons hearing this, were all stricken in a dumpe. Yet notwithstanding Elies hart was so great, y^t he would faine haue vttred his cankerd stomack agaynst Testwood:* but the Deane (breaking his tale) called him old foole, and tooke him vp so sharply, that he was fain to hold his peace. Then the Deane commanded all the popes pardōs which hanged about the Church to be brought into the Chapterhouse, and cast into the chimney, and burnt before all their faces, and so departed.

Another cause of Testwoods trouble.

AS it chanced Testwood one day to walke in the church at after noone,* & beheld the pilgrimes (specially of Deuonshire & Cornwall) how they came in by plumpes with candles & images of waxe in their hands, to offer to good king Henry of Windsore (as they called hym) it pitied hys hart to see so great idolatry committed,* & how vainly the people had spent their goods in comming so farre to kisse a spur, & to haue an old hat set vpon their heds. In so much, that he could not refraine, but (seing a certaine company which had done their offering stand gasing about y^e church) went vnto them, & with al gentlenes began to exhort them to leaue such fals worshipping of dombe creatures, and to learne to worship the true liuing God aright, putting thē in remembrance what those things were which they worshipped, & how God many times had plagued his people for running a whoring to such stocks & stones, & so would plage them and their posteritie if they would not leaue it.

Page 1212After this sort he admonished them so long, till at the last, his words (as God would) tooke such place in some of them,* that they said, they would neuer goe a pilgrimage more. Then he went further, & found another sort licking & kissing a white Lady made of Alabaster, which Image was mortrest in a wall behind the hie altar, and bordred about with a prety border, which was made like branches with hanging apples & floures. And when he sawe them so superstitiously vse the Image (as to wipe their handes vpon it, & then to stroke them ouer their hands & faces, as though there had ben great vertue in touching y^e picture) he vp with his hand in the which he had a key, and smote a peece of the border about the image, downe, and with the glaunce of the stroke chanced to breake of the images nose.* Lo, good people, quoth he, ye see what it is, nothyng but earth & dust, and cannot helpe it selfe, & how will you then haue it to helpe you? For Gods sake brethren, be no more deceyued: and so he gate him home to his house, for the rumor was so great, that many came to see the Image, how it was defaced. And among all other came one Williā Symons (a Lawyer) who seyng the image so berayed, and to lacke her nose,* tooke the matter greuously, & looking down vpon the pauement, he spied the images nose where it lay, which he tooke vp and put in his purse, saying, it should be a deare nose to Testwood one day.

Now were many offended with Testwood, the canons for speaking against their profit, the waxe sellers for hyndring their market, & Symons for the Images nose. And more then that, there were of the canons men that threatned to kill him. Whereupon Testwood kept his house, and durst not come forth, minding to haue sent the whole matter in writing by his wife, to M. Cromwell the kings secretary who was his special frend. The Canons hearyng that Testwood would send to Cromwel, they send y^e Uerger vnto him, to will him to come to the church: who sent them word agayne, that he was in feare of his lyfe, & therfore would not come. Then sent they two of y^e eldest Peticanons to entreat him, & to assure him that no man should do him harme. He made them a plaine answer, that he had no such trust to their promises, but would complain to his frendes.* Then wist they not what shift to make (for of all men they feared Cromwel) but sent in post hast for old M. Ward, a iustice of peace dwelling 3. or 4. myles of, who being come & hearing the matter, was very loth to meddle in it.* But notwithstanding, through their entreaty he wēt to Testwood & had much ado to perswade him, but at the last, he did so faithfully promise him by the oth he had made to God & the king, to defend him from all daungers and harmes, that Testwood was content to go with him.

And when M. Ward and Testwood were come into the Church, and were goyng toward the Chapter house, where the Canons abode their commyng,* one of the Canons men drew his dagger at Testwood, and would haue bene vpon him, but M. Ward with his men resisted, and gat Testwood into the Chapter house, causing the seruing men to be called in, and sharply rebuked of their maisters, who straitly commanded them vpon paine of loosing their seruice, & further displeasure, not to touch him nor to geue him an euill worde. Nowe Testwood being alone, in the Chapter house with the Canons and M. Ward was gētly intreated, & the matter so pacified, that Testwood might quietly come and go to the Church, and do his duety as he had done before.

An other cause of Testwoods trouble.

*Vpon a Relique sonday (as they named it) when euery Minister after their olde custome should haue borne a relique in his hand about a procession, one was brought to Testwood. Which relique (as they said) was a Ratchet of bishop Becketts. And as the Sexten would haue put the Ratchet in Testwoods hands, he pushed it from hym, sayeng, if he did geue it to him, he would wipe his taile withall, & so the Ratchet was geuen to another. Then came the Uerger down from the hie altar with S. Georges dagger in his hand, demāding who lacked a relique. Mary (quoth Testwood geue it to M. Hake (who stood next him) for hee is a prety man of his hands, & so the dagger was geuē vnto him. Now Testwood perceiuing the dagger in maister Hakes hand, and being merily disposed (as he was a mery conceited man) stepped forth out of his place to D. Clifton standing directly before him in the midst of the quire, with a glorious golden Cope vpon his backe, hauing the Pixe in his hand, and said: Sir, M. Hake hath Saint Georges dagger. Now if he had his horse, and S. Martins cloke, and maister Iohn Shornes bootes, with king Henries spurres, and his hat, he might ride when he would, and so stepped into his place againe. Whereat the other chaunged colour, and wist not what to say.

Another cause of Testwoods trouble.

IN the dayes of M. Franklen, who succeeded D. Sampson in the Deanry of Windsore,* there was on a tyme set vp at the Quire dore, a certaine foolishe printed paper in Meter, all to the prayse and commendation of our Ladye, ascribing vnto her our iustification, our saluation,* our redemption, the forgeuenes of sinnes, &c. to the great derogation of Christ. Which paper, one of the Canons called M. Magnus (as it was reported) caused to be set vp in despite of Testwood and his sect. When Testwood sawe this paper, he pluckt it downe secretly. The next day after was another set vp in the same place. Then Testwood cōming into the Church, and seyng another paper set vp, and also the Deane commyng a little way of, made haste to be in at the Quire dore, while the Deane stayd to take holy water, and reaching vp his hand as he went, pluckt away y^t paper with hym. The Deane beyng come to hys stall,* called Testwood vnto him, and sayd, that he maruelled greatlye how he durst be so bolde to take downe the paper in hys presence? Testwood aunswered agayne, that he maruelled much more, that his maistership would suffer suche a blasphemous paper to be set vp, beseeching hym not to be offended with that he had done, for he woulde stand vnto it. So M. Deane being a timerous man, made no more ado with him. After this were no mo papers set vp, but poore Testwood was eaten and drunken among them at euery meale, and an heretike he was, and would rost a fagot for this geare one day.

Now maister Magnus being sore offended with Testwood for pluckyng downe his papers,* to be reuenged on him, deuised with the Deane and the rest of the Canons, to send their letters to D. Chamber, one of their brethren, and the Kings Phisition, who lay (for the most part) at the Court, to see what he would do against Testwood. Which letters being made, were sent with speede. But whatsoeuer the cause was,* whether he durst not meddle for feare of Cromwell, or what els I cannot tell, their suite came to none effect. Then wyst they not what to do, but determined to let the matter sleepe, till S. Georges feast, whiche was not farre of.

Now in the meane tyme there chaunced a prety storye, betweene one Robert Phillips Gentleman of the Kings Chappel, and Testwood. Which story, though it was but a mery pranke of a singing man, yet it greeued his aduersary wonderfully. The matter was this. Robert Phillips was so notable a singing man (wherein he gloried) that wheresoeuer he came, the best and longest song, with most counteruurses in it, shuld be set vp at his commyng.* And so his chaunce beyng now to be at Windsore, agaynst hys comming to the Antheme, a long song was set vp, called Lauda viui. In which song there was one counteruurse toward the end, that began on this wise, O redemptrix & saluatrix. Which verse of all other, Robert Phillips woulde sing, because he knew that Testwood could not abide that dittie. Now Testwood knowing his mynd well enough, ioyned with him at the other part:* and when he heard Robert Phillips begin to fetch his flourish with O redemptrix & saluatrix: repeating the same one in anothers neck. Testwood was as quicke on the other side to answer hym agayne with Non redemptrix, nec saluatrix, and so striuyng there with O and Non, who should haue the maistrie, they made an ende of the verse. Whereat was good laughyng in sleeues of some, but Robert Phillips with other of Testwoods enimies were sore offended.

Within 14. dayes after this, the Lordes of the Garter (as their custome is yearly to doe) came to Wyndsore to keepe S. Georges feast: at which feast the Duke of Norfolke was President:* vnto whom the Deane and canons made a greeuous complaint on Testwood. Who being called before the Duke, he shooke hym vp and all to reuiled hym, as though he would haue sent him to hangyng by & by. Yet neuerthelesse Testwood so behaued himselfe to the Duke, that in the ende he let hym go without any further molestyng of hym, to the great discomfort of the Deane and Canons.

Here haue ye heard the causes which moued Testwoods enemies to seeke his destruction, and coulde not attayne their purpose, till that wicked Aman D. London came, as shall be shewed in the processe followyng.

The originall of Henry Filmers trouble.

ABout the yeare of our Lord, 1541. after all the orders of superstitious and beggyng Friers were suppressed and put downe, there chaunced one Sir Thomas Melster, Page 1213 which had bene a Frier before,* and changed his Friers coat (but not his Friers hart) to be Uicare of Wyndsore. This priest on a tyme made a Sermon to his Parishioners, in the which he declared so many fond and Frierish tales,* as that our Lady should hold out her brests to S. Bernard, and spout her milke into his eyes, with such like festiuall tales, that many honest men were offended therwith, and specially this Henry Filmer then one of the Church wardens:* who was so zelous to gods word, that he could not abide to heare the glory of Christ so defaced with superstitious fables. Whereupon he tooke an honest man or two with him, and went to the priest, with whom he talked so honestly and so charitably, that in the ende the Priest gaue him hartie thanks, and was content at hys gentle admonition, to reforme himselfe without any more ado, and so departed frendly the one from the other.

Now was there one in the towne, called W. Symons a Lawyer (as is aforesayd) who hearyng that Filmer had bene with the Priest, and reprobued him for his Sermon, tooke pepper in the nose, and gat him to the Uicar, and did so animate him in his doings, that he slipped quite away from the promise he had made to Filmer, and followed the mynd of Symons: who meeting with Filmer afterward all to reuiled him,* saying he would bring him before the bishop, to teach him to be so malapert. Then Filmer hearing the matter renewed, which he had thought had bene suppressed, stood against Symons, and said, that the Uicar had preached false and vnsound doctrine, and so would he say to the Bishop whensoever he came before hym. Then Symons slipt not the matter, but went to the Mayor, and procured of him and his brethren a letter, signed with their own hands in the priests fauour,* as much as could be deuised, and so prepared himselfe with other his frendes to go to the bishop (whose name was D. Capon) and to take the priest with them: which was a paynfull iourney for the sely poore man, by reason he had a sore leg.

Now Filmer hearing how Simons went about to put him to a foile, consulted with his frends what was best to do: who concluded to draw out certain notes of the vicars Sermon, and to prepare themselves to be at Salisbury as soone as Symons or before hym, if it might bee possible. Thus both the parties being in a readines, it chanced thē to set forth of Windsore all in one day. But by reason the Priest (beyng an impotent man) could not endure to ride very fast, Filmer and his company gate to the towne an houre and more before Symons, and went to the Bishop and deliuered vp their Bill vnto hym. Which Byll when the bishop had sene and perused well,* he gaue them great thanks for their paines, saying it did behooue him to looke vpon it, for the Priest had preached heresie, and should bee punished.

Then Filmer declared vnto the Bishop, the fourme of his talke he had with the Priest, and the ende thereof: and how the matter being renued agayne by Symons, forced him and his company to trouble his Lordship therewith. Well, said the bishop, ye haue done like honest men. Come to me soone againe, and ye shal know more, and so they departed from the Bishop to their Inne. And while they were there reposing themselves,* Symons with his company came to the town, and (not knowing the other to be come) gate them vp to the bishop in all post haste, takyng the priest with them.

The bishop hearing of mo Windsore men, demaunded what they were, & being informed how it was the vicar of the towne with other moe,* he caused y^e vicar to be brought in. To whom he said: Are you the vicar of Windsore? Yea forsooth my Lord, quoth he. How chaunceth it quoth y^e B. that you are complained on? for here hath bene with mee certaine honest men of your towne, which haue deliuered vp a bill of erroneous doctrine against you. If it be so, I must nedes punish you, & opening the bill he red it vnto him. How say you quoth the B. is this true or no? The vicar could not deny it, but humbly submitted himselfe to the bishops correction. Then was his company called in, and when the B. saw Symons, he knew him well, and said: Wherefore come you M. Symons?* Pleaseth it your Lordship (quoth he) we are come to speake in our vicars cause, which is a man of good conuersation & honestie, and doth his dutie so well in euery poynt, that no man can find fault with him, except a lewd fellow we haue in our towne called Filmer, which is so corrupt with heresie, that he is able to poison a whole countrey: and truely my Lord (quoth Symons) there is no man y^t can preach or teach any thyng that is good and godly, but he is ready to controll it, and to say it is starke nought. Wherefore we shal besech your lordship he may be punished, to the ensample of other, that our vicar may do his dutie quietly, as he hath done before this busie fellow troubled him. And that your Lordship shall the better credite my saiengs, I haue broght with me these honest men of the towne, and beside all that, a testimoniall from the Mayor and his brethren to confirme the same, & so he held out the writing in his hand.

Then said the B. So God helpe me M. Symons ye are greatly to blame,* and most worthy to be punished of all men, that will so impudently goe about to maintayne your priest in his error, which hath preached heresie, & hath confessed it: wherefore I may not nor will not see it vnpunished. And as for that honest mā Filmer on whō ye haue complained, I tel you plainly he hath in this point shewed himself a great deale more honest man thē you. But in hope you will no more beare out your vicar in his euill doings, I will remit all things at this tyme: sauynge that he shall the next Sondag recant his sermon openly before all his parishioners in Windsore Church.* & so the B. called in Filmer and his company which waited without, & deliuered the priests recantation vnto them, with a great charge to see it truely obserued in all poyntes. Then Symons tooke his leaue of the B. and departed with a flea in his eare, disappointed of his purpose,* & sore ashamed of the foile. For this cause Symons could neuer brooke Filmer, but when he met him at any time after, would hold vp his finger (as his maner was where he ought displeasure) and say: I will be euen with you one day, trust me.

The originall of Anthony Persons trouble.

There was a certain priest named Anth. Person, which frequented much to Windsore, about the yeare of our Lord,* 1540. and vsing the talent that God had giuen hym in preaching, was greatly esteemed among the people, who flocked so much to his sermons which he made both in the town and country, that the great priests of the castle, with other papists in the towne (specially Symons) were sore offended.* In so much that Symons at the last begā to gather of his sermons, & to marke his auditors: whereof ensued the death of diuers, and trouble of many honest men. For about a yeare & more after, a minister of Satan called D. London, Warden of the new Colledge in Oxford, was admitted one of the Prebendaries of Windsore, who at his first comming to Windsore, began to vtter his stomacke, & to shew his affection. For at his first Residēce diner which he made to the clerkes (which company for the most parte at that time fauoured the Gospell) all his whole talke to two Gentlemen strangers at his boord (till the table was a taking vp) was nothing els but of heretikes, and what a desolation they would bring the realm vnto,* if they might be so suffered. And by S. Mary masters (quoth he to the clerkes at the last) I cannot tel, but there goeth a shrewde report abroad of this house. Some made aunswer, it was vnderdeserued. I pray God it be, quoth he. I am but a stranger & haue small experience amōg you: but I haue heard it said before I came hither, that there be some in this house, that will neither haue prayer nor fasting.

Then spake Testwood:* By my troth sir (quoth he) I thinke that was spoken but of malice, for prayer (as your mastership knoweth better then I) is one of the first lessōs that Christ taught vs. Yea mary sir, quoth he, but the heretikes will haue no inuocation to saints, which all the olde fathers do allow. What the olde fathers do allowe,* quoth Testwood, I cannot tel, but Christ doth appoint vs to goe to his father, and to aske our petitions of him in Christes name. Then you will haue no meane betwene you & god, quoth D. London. Yes sir, quoth Testwood, our mean is Christ, as S. Paul saith: There is one Mediator betwene god and man, euen Iesus Christ. Geue vs water quoth D. Londō. Which being set on the boorde, he said grace and washed, & so falling into other communication with the straungers, the clerkes tooke their leaue and departed.

When D. London had ben in Windsore a while among his catholike brethren, & learned what Testwood was,* & also of Symons, who shewed him our Ladies nose (as he called it) what a sort of heretikes were in the towne and about the same, and how they increased daily by reason of a naughty priest, called Anth. Person, he was so maliciously bent against thē, that he gaue himselfe wholy to the deuill to do mischief. And to bring his wicked purpose about, he conspired w^t the foresaid Symōs (a meet clerk to serue such a curate) and other of like sore, how they might cōpasse the matter, first to haue all the Archheretikes (as they termed thē) in Windsore & thereabout, indicted of heresie,* and so to proceed further. They had a good ground to worke vpon, (as they thought) which was the sixe articles, whereupon they began to build and practise thus. First they drew out certaine notes of Antho. Persons sermons, whiche he had preached against the sacrament of the altar, & their popish Page 1214 Masse.* That done, they put in sir Phillip Hobby with the good Lady his wife, sir Thomas Cardine, M. Edmund Harman, M. Tho. Weldon, with Snowbal and his wife, as chiefe aiders, helpers, & mainteiners of Anth. Person. Also they noted D. Haines Deane of Exceter and a Prebendary of Windsore, to be a common receiuer of all suspected persons. They wrote also the names of all such as cōmonly haunted Anthony Persons sermons, & of all such as had the Testament, and faoured the Gospell, or dyd but smell thereof.

Then had they priuy spies to walke vp and down the Church, to harken and heare what men said, and to marke who did not reuerence the sacrament at the leuation tyme, and to bring his name to D. London. And of these spies some were Chantrie priests: among the which there was one notable spie, whose name was called sir Will. Bowes such a fleering priest as would be in euery corner of the Church pattering to himselfe, with his Portuous in hys hand, to heare and to note the gesture of men towards the sacrament. Thus whē they had gathered as much as they could,* and made a perfect booke thereof, D. London with two of his catholike brethren moe, gaue them vp to the B. of Winchester Steuen Gardiner, with a great complaynt against the heretikes that were in Windsor, declaring vnto him how the towne was sore disquieted through theyr doctrine and euill example.* Wherefore they besought hys lordships helpe, in purging the towne and castle of suche wicked persons. The B. hearing their complaynt, and seying their booke, praised their doings, and bade them make frends and go forward,* and they should not lack his help. Then they applied the matter with tooth and nayle, sparing for no money nor paynes taking: as Marbecke saith that he himselfe heard one of them say, who was a great doer therin, and afterward sorry for that he had done, that the sute therof cost him that yeare for his part only an hūdred markes,* beside the death of iij. good geldings.

Now B. Gardiner, which had conceiued a further fetch in his brayne then D. London had, made Wrisley & other of the Counsaile on his side, and spieng a tyme conueniēt, went to the king, complainyng what a sort of heretiques his grace had in his Realme, and how they were not only crept into euery corner of his court,* but euen into his priuie chamber, beseching therfore his maiesty, that his laws might be prosecuted: the king geuing credite to the counsaile words, was content his lawes should be executed on such as were offenders. Then had the B. that he desired, & forthwith procured a commission for a priuy search to bee had in Windsore for bookes and letters that Anth. Person should send abroad,* which commission the king granted to take place in the towne of Windsore, but not in the castle.

At this time the canons of Excester (specially Sutharn, Treasurer of the church, and D. Brurewood the Chancellor) had accused D. Haynes their Deane, to the counsell, for preaching agaynst holy bread and holy water, and that he should say in one of his Sermons (hauing occasion to speake of Matrimony) that mariage and hangyng were destinie:* vpon the which they gathered treason agaynst hym, because of the kings mariage. The B. of Winchester (at the same tyme) had also enformed the counsaile of M. Hobby, how he was a bearer of Anthony Person, and a great mainteyner of heretikes. Whereupon both he and D. Heynes were apprehended and sent to the fleete. But it was not very long after, ere that by mediation of frends, they were both deliuered.*

Nowe, as touching the Commission for searchyng of bookes, M. Warde and Fachel of Reading, were appointed commissioners, who came to Windsore the Thursday before Palme sonday, in the yeare of our Lord, 1543. and began their search about xi. of the clocke at night. In the which search were apprehended Robert Bennet, Henry Filmer, Iohn Marbecke, and Robert Testwood, for certaine bookes and writings found in their houses agaynst the vj. articles, and kept in ward til monday after, and thē fet vp to the Counsaile all saue Testwood, with whom the Bailifs of the towne were charged, because he lay sore diseased on the Goute. The other three being examined before the Counsaile, were committed to prison, Filmer and Bennet to the bishop of Londons Gaole, and Marbecke to the Marshalsey: whose examination is here set out, to declare the great goodnes of the Counsaile, and the crueltie of the bishop.

The first examination of Iohn Marbecke, before the Counsaile, on the Monday after Palme Sonday. 1544.

THIS Marbecke had begun a great woorke in English, called The Concordaunce of the Bible. Which booke being not halfe finished, was among his other bookes taken in the search, and had vp to the Counsaile.* And when he came before them to be examined, the whole worke laye before the bishop of Winchester Steuen Gardiner, at the vpper end of the boord. Who beholding the poore man a while▪ sayd: Marbecke, doest thou knowe wherefore thou art sent for? No, my Lord quoth he. No, quoth the Byshop.* That is a meruailous thing. Forsooth my Lord quoth he, vnles it be for a certaine search made of late in Windsore. I cannot tell wherefore it should be. Then thou knowest the matter well enough quoth the Bishop, and takyng vp a quire of the Concordance in his hand, sayd: Understandest thou the Latine tongue? No, my Lord, quoth he, but simply. No, quoth the Bishop? And with that spake M. Wrisley (then secretary to the king) he saith but simply, I cannot tell quoth the B. but the booke is translated worde for word out of the Latin Concordaunce, and so began to declare to the rest of the Counsaile,* the nature of a Concordance, and how it was first compiled in Latin by the great diligence of the learned men for the ease of preachers, concluding with this reason, that if such a booke should goe foorth in English, it would destroy the Latin tongue. And so casting down the quire again, he reached another booke, which was the booke of Esay the prophet,* and turnyng to the last chap. gaue the booke to Marbecke, and asked hym who had written the note in the margent. The other looking vpon it, said: forsooth my Lord, I wrote it. Read it quoth the B. Then he read it thus, Heauen is my seate, and the earth is my footestoolle. Nay, quoth the B. read it as thou hadst written it. Then shall I read it wrong quoth he, for I had written it false. How hadst thou written it, quoth y^e bishop? I had written it quoth he, thus: Heauen is my seat and the earth is not my footestoolle. Yea mary quoth the Bishop, that was thy meanyng. No, my Lord quoth he, it was but an ouersight in writyng, for as your Lordshippe seeth, this worde (Not) is blotted out. At this tyme came other matters into the Counsaile, so that Marbecke was had out to the next chamber. And when he had stood there a while, one of the Counsaile (named sir Anthony Wingfield Captaine of the Garde) came foorth, and callyng for Marbecke, committed him to one Belson of the gard, saying vnto him on this wise: Take this man and haue him to the Marshalsey,* and tell the keeper that it is the Counsailes pleasure that he shall entreat him gently. And if hee haue any mony in his purse (as I think he hath not much) take you it from him, left the prisoners do take it, and minister it vnto him as he shall haue need. And so the messenger departed with Marbecke to the Marshalsey, and dyd his commission most faithfully and truly, both to the keper and to the prisoner, as he was commanded.

The second examination of Marbecke, before the Bishops Gentleman in the Marshalsey.

ON the next day (which was Tuesday) by 8. of the clock in the morning,* there came one of the B. of Winchesters Gentlemen into the Marshalsey, whose mā brought after him two great books vnder his arme, & finding Marbecke walking vp and downe in the Chappell, demanded of the keeper why he was not in irons. I had no such cōmaundement quoth he: for the messenger, which brought hym yesternight from the Counsaile, sayd: It was theyr pleasure he should he gētly vsed. My Lord quoth the gentleman will not be content with you, and so takyng the bookes of his man, called for a chamber,* vp to the which he caried the prisoner, and casting the bookes from him vpon a bed, sate him downe and said: Marbecke, my Lord doth fauour thee well for certaine good qualities thou hast, and hath sent me hither to admonish thee to beware and take heed least thou cast away thy selfe wilfully. If thou wylt be plaine, thou shalt doe thy selfe much good: if not, thou shalt do thy selfe much harme. I assure thee, my Lord lamenteth thy case, for as much as he hath alwayes hearde good report of thee: wherfore now see to thy selfe, and play the wise man.* Thou art acquainted with a great sort of heretikes (as Hobby and Heynes, with other mo) & knowest much of their secrets: if thou wilt nowe open them at my Lords request, he will procure thy deliuerance out of hand, and preferre thee to better liuing.

Alas sir, quoth he, what secretes doe I knowe? I am but a poore man, and was neuer worthy to be so conuersant eyther with M. Hobby, or M. Heynes, to know any part of their myndes. Wel, quoth the Gentleman, make it not so strange, for my lord doth know wel inough in what estimation they had both thee and Anth. Person, for your religion. Of Anth. Person, quoth he, I can say nothyng, for I neuer saw him with them in all my lyfe. And as for my selfe, I can not denye, but that they haue alwayes (I Page 1215 thanke them) taken me for an honest poore man, and shewed me much kindnes: but as for their secrets, they were to wise to commit them to any such as I am.

Peraduenture quoth the Gentleman, thou fearest to vtter any thing of them,* because they were thy frends, lest they hearing therof, might hereafter withdraw their frendship from thee, which thou nedeest not to feare, I warrant thee, for they are sure enough, and neuer like to pleasure thee more, ner no man els.

With that the water stooode in Marbeckes eyes. Why weepest thou quoth the Gentleman? Oh sir, quoth he, I pray you pardon me, these men haue done me good, wherfore I beseech the liuing God to comfort them as I would be comforted my selfe.

Well quoth the Gentleman, I perceiue thou wilt play the foole: and then he opened one of the bookes, and asked him if he vnderstood any Latine. But a little sir, quoth he. How is it then, quoth the gentleman, that thou hast translated thy booke out of the latin Concordance, & yet vnderstandest not the tongue? I will tell you quoth he. In my youth I learned the principles of my Grammar, wherby I haue some vnderstāding therin, though it be very smal. Then the gentleman began to try him in the latin Concor'dance & English Bible which he had brought: and when he had so done, & was satisfied, he called vp his man to fet away the bookes, & so departed, leauing Marbecke alone in the chamber, the dore fast shut vnto him.

About two houres after, the Gentleman came againe, with a sheet of paper folded in his hand,* & sate him down vpon the beds side (as before) & sayd: by my troth Marbecke, my lord seeth so much wilfulnes in thee, that he saith it is pity to do thee good. When wast thou last w^t Haynes? Forsooth, quoth he, about a three weekes agoe, I was at dinner with him. And what talke, quoth the Gentleman, had he at his boord? I cā not tel now, quoth he. No, quoth y^e gentleman, thou art not so dull witted, to forget a thyng in so short space. Yes sir, quoth he, such familiar talk as mē do vse at their boordes, is most commonly by the next day forgotten,* and so it was with me. Didst thou neuer, quoth the Gentleman talke with him, nor with none of thy fellowes, of the Masse, or of the blessed Sacrament? No, forsooth, quoth he. Now forsooth, quoth the Gentleman, thou liest, for thou hast bene sene to talke with Testwood, and other of thy fellowes, an houre together in the church, whē honest men haue walked vp and downe beside you, & as euer they haue drawen neare you, ye haue staid your talk till they haue bene past you, because they should not heare wherof you talked. I deny not, quoth he, but I haue talked with Testwood and other of my felowes, I cannot tel how oft, which maketh not that we talked eyther of the Masse, or of the sacrament: for men may common & talke of many matters, that they would not y^t euery man should heare, and yet far from any such thyng: therefore it is good to iudge the best. Well quoth the Gentleman, thou must be playner with my Lord then this, or els it wyll bee wrong with thee, and that sooner then thou weenest. How playne will his Lordship haue me to be Sir, quoth he? There is nothing that I can do and say with a safe consciēce, but I am ready to do it at his Lordships pleasure. What tellest thou me quoth the gentleman of thy consciēce? Thou maist with a sate conscience vtter those that be heretikes, and so doying thou canst do God and the king no greater seruice. If I knew sir, quoth he, who were an heretike in deede, it were a thing:* but if I should accuse him to be an heretike that is none, what a worme would that be in my consciēce so long as I liued: yea it were a great deale better for me to be out of this lyfe, then to lyue in such torment. In faith quoth the Gentleman, thou knowst as well who be heretikes of thy fellowes at home, and who be none, as I doo know this paper to be in my hand: but it maketh no matter, for they shall al be sent for and examined: and thinkest thou that they will not vtter and tell of thee all that they can? yes I warrant thee. And what a folish dolt art thou, that wilt not vtter aforehand what they be, seeyng it standeth vpon thy deliuerance to tell the truth? Whatsoeuer quoth he, they shall say of me, let thē doe it in the name of God,* for I will say no more of thē, nor of no man els, then I know. Mary quoth the Gentleman if thou wilt doe so, my L. requireth no more. And for as much as now peraduenture, thy wits are troubled, so that thou canst not call things euen by & by to remembrance, I haue brought thee inke & paper, that thou mayest excogitate with thy selfe, & write such things as shal come to thy mynd.* O lord, quoth Marbecke, what will my L. do? Will his lordship compell me to accuse men, and wot not whereof? No, quoth the Gentleman, my L. compelleth thee not, but gently entreated thee to say the truth. Therefore make no more adoe, but write, for my Lord will haue it so, and so layd downe the ynke and paper and went his way.

Now was Marbecke so full of heauines and wo, that he wyst not what to do, nor how to set the pen to the booke to satisfie the Byshops mynd,* vnlesse he did accuse men to the woundyng of his owne soule. And thus beyng compassed about with nothing but sorrow and care, he cryed out to God in his hart, fallyng downe with weping tears and sayd:

O most mercifull father of heauen, thou that knowest the secret doyngs of all men,*haue mercy vppon thy poore prisoner which is destitute of all helpe and comfort. Assist me (O Lorde) with thy speciall grace, that to saue this frayle and vile bodye, which shall turne to corruption at his tyme, I haue no power to say or to write any thing, that may be to the casting awaye of my christen brother: but rather (O Lord) let this vile flesh suffer at thy will and pleasure. Grant this, O most mercifull father, for thy deare sonne Iesus Christes sake.

Then he rose vp and beganne to search his conscience what he might write, and at last framed out these wordes: Where as your Lordship will haue me write such thyngs as I knowe of my fellowes at home:* pleaseth it your lordship to vnderstand, that I cannot call to remembraunce any maner of thing whereby I might iustly accuse any one of them, vnlesse it be that the readyng of the new testament (which is common to all men) be an offence: more thē this I know not.

Now the Gentleman about his houre appointed, came agayne, and found Marbecke walking vp and downe the chamber. How now, quoth he, hast thou written nothing?* yes Sir, quoth he, as much as I know. Well sayd, quoth the Gentleman, and tooke vp the paper. Which when hee had read, he cast it from him in a great fume, swearyng by our lordes body, that he would not for xx. pound, cary it to his L. and maister. Therefore quoth he, go to it againe, and aduise thy selfe better, or els thou wilt set my Lord against thee, and then art thou vtterly vndone. By my troth Sir,* quoth Marbecke, if hys Lordshyppe shall keepe me here these seuen yeares, I can say no more then I haue sayde. Then wilt thou repent it, quoth the Gentleman, and so putting vp hys penner and inkehorne, departed wyth the paper in hys hand.

The third examination of Marbecke, before the Byshop of Winchester hymselfe in his owne house.

THE next day, which was Wednesday, by viij. of the clocke in the morning,* the bishop sent for Marbecke to his house at S. Mary Oueries, and as he was entring into the bishops hall, he sawe the bishop hymselfe commyng out at a doore in y^e vpper end therof, with a rolle in his hād, and goyng toward the great wyndow, he called the poore man vnto him and sayd: Marbecke, wilt thou cast awaye thy selfe? No my Lord quoth he, I trust. Yes, quoth the B. thou goest about it, for thou wilt vtter nothing. What a deuill made thee to meddle with the scriptures? Thy vocation was an other way, wherein thou hast a goodly gyft,* if thou didst esteeme it? Yes my Lord, quoth he, I doe esteeme it and haue done my part therin, accordyng to that litle knowlege that God hath geuen me. And why the deuill quoth the Byshop, dydst thou not holde thee there? and with that he flang away from the wyndow out of the Hall, the poore man following him from place to place, til he had brought him into a long gallery, and being there, y^e bishop began on this wise: A sirha, quoth he, the neast of you is brokē I trow. And vnfolding his roll (which was about an elne long) he said: Behold, here be your captains both Hobby and Haynes, with all the whole pacte of thy secte about Windsore, & yet wilt thou vtter none of them. Alas my lord quoth he, how shuld I accuse them, by whō I know nothing? Well, quoth the bish. if thou wilt needes cast away thy selfe, who can let thee?* What helpers haddest thou in setting forth thy booke: Forsooth my lord, quoth he none. Now quoth the bishop? how can that be? It is not possible that thou shouldest do it without helpe. Truly my L. quoth he, I can not tel in what part your lordship doth take it, but how soeuer it be, I will not deny but I did it without the helpe of any man saue God alone. Nay quoth the B. I do not discōmend thy dilligēce, but what shuldest thou meddle with that thing which pertayned not to thee?

And in speaking these words, one of his Chaplaynes, (called M. Medow) came vp and stayd himselfe at a window, to whō the bishop sayd, here is a marueilous thinge. This fellow hath taken vppon him to set out the Concordance in english, which book whē it was set out in latyn was not done without the helpe and dilligence of a dosen learned men at the least, and yet will he beare me in hand that he hath done it alone. But say what thou wilt, quoth Page 1216 the B. except God himselfe would come downe from heauen and tell me so, I will not beleue it: and so going forth to a window, where two great Bibles lay vpon a cusshion, the one in Latine, and the other in English, he called Marbecke vnto him, and pointing his finger to a place in the Latin Bible, sayd: Canst thou English this sentence? Nay my L. quoth he, I trow I be not so cunning to geue it a perfect English, but I can set out the English thereof in the English Bible. Let see, quoth the B. Then Marbecke turning the English Bible, found out the place by and by, and read it to the Bishop. So he tried hym a three or foure tymes, till one of his men came vp and tolde hym the Priest was ready to go to Masse.

And as the B. was goyng, sayd the Gentleman whiche had examined Marbecke in the Marshalsey the day before: * Shall this fellow write nothyng whyle your Lordship is at masse, for he passeth not on it. It maketh no matter quoth the Bishop, for he will tell nothing, and so went downe to heare Masse, leauing Marbecke alone in y^e gallery. The B. was no sooner downe, but the Gentleman came vp agayne with inke and paper. * Come sirha quoth he, my Lord will haue you occupied till Masse bee done, perswadyng hym with fayre wordes, that he shoulde bee soone dispatched out of trouble, if he would vse truth and plainenes. Alas sir, quoth he, what will my Lorde haue me to do? for more then I wrote to his Lordship yesterday, I can not? Well, well, goe to quoth the Gentleman, & make speed, and so went his way. There was no remedie but Marbecke must nowe write some thyng: wherefore he calling to God againe in his mind, wrote a few words as nye as he could frame them, to those he had written the day before. When the B. was come from Masse, and had looked on the writing, he pusht it from him, saying: what shall this do? It hath neither head nor foote. There is a maruelous sect of them (quoth the B. to hys men) for the deuill cannot make one of them to bewray another. Then was there nothyng among the Bishops Gentlemen, as they were making him ready to go to the court, but Crucisige vpon the poore man. And when the bishops white ratchet was on him and all: well Marbecke, quoth he, I am now going to the Court, and was purposed, if I had foūd thee tractable, to haue spoken to the kings maiesty for thee and to haue geuen thee thy meat, drinke, & lodging here in myne house: but seyng thou art so wilful and so stubburne, thou shalt go to the deuill for me.

Then was he caried downe by the B. men, with many railing words. * And comming through the great chamber, there stood D. London, with two mo of hys fellows, waiting the bishops comming: and passing by them into the Hall, he was there receiued of his keper, and caried to prison againe. It was not halfe an houre after, ere that the B. sent one of his Gentlemen to the vnder keeper called Stokes, commanding him to put irons vpon Marbecke, and to keepe him fast shut in a chamber alone, and when he should bring him downe to dinner or supper, to see that he spake to no man, nor no man to him: & furthermore, y^t he should suffer no maner of person (not his owne wife) to come & see him or minister any thing vnto him. When the porter (who was the cruellest man that might be, to al such as were laid in for any matter of religion, and yet as God would,* fauorable to this poore man) had receyued this cōmandement from the B. he clapt irons vpon him & shutte him vp, geuing warning to all the house, y^t no man should speake or talke to Marbecke, whensoever he was brought downe, and so he continued the space of iij. wekes & more, till his wife was suffered to come vnto him.

The sute of Marbeckes wife to the Bishop of Winchester.

MArbeckes wife, at the tyme of her husbands apprehēſion,* had a yong child of a quarter old, sucking vppon her brest: & when her husband was taken from her, & had away to the Counsaile, not knowing what should be come of him, she left the child and all, and gate her vp to Londō, and hearing her husband to be in the Marshalsey, goeth thether. But when she came there, she could in no wise bee suffred to see him, which greatly augmented her sorrowe. Then by counsaile of frends, she gate her to the B. of Winchester (for other helpe was there none to be had at y^t time) making great sute to haue his licence to go & see her husband, and to helpe him with such things as he lacked. Nay quoth the B. thy husband is acquainted with all the heretikes that be in the Realme,* both on this side the Sea and beyond, and yet will he vtter none of them. Alas my Lord quoth she, my husband was neuer beyond the seas, nor no great trauailer in the Realme to be so acquainted, therfore good my Lord let me goe see him. But all her earnest sute from day to day would not help, but still he put her of, harping always vpon this string: thy husband wil vtter nothing. At the last, she finding him in the court at s. Iames going toward his chamber, was so bold to take him by y^e ratchet and say: O my Lord, these 18. dayes I haue troubled your Lordship: now for the loue of God, and as euer ye came of a woman, put me of no longer, but let me go to my husband.* And as she was standing with the Bishop & his men, in a blynd corner goyng to his chamber, one of the kings seruantes called Henry Carrike, and her nexte neighbor, chanced to be by: & hearing the talke betweene the B. and her, desired his Lordship to be good Lord vnto the poore woman, which had her owne mother lying bedred vpon her hands, beside 5. or 6. children. I promise you quoth the B. her husband is a great heretike, & hath reade more scripture then any man in the Realme hath done. I cannot tel my Lord, quoth Carrike, what he is inwardly, but outwardly he is as honest a quiet neighbour as euer I dwelt by. He will tell nothing quoth the B. He knoweth a great sort of false harlots, and will not vtter thē. Yes my Lord quoth Carrike, he will tell, I dare say, for hee is an honest man. Well, quoth the B. (speaking to the wyfe) thou seemest to be an honest woman, and if thou loue thy husband well, go to him, and geue him good counsaile, to vtter such naughty felowes as he knoweth, and I promise thee he shall haue what I can doe for him: for I doe fansie him well for his Art, wherin he had pleased me as well as any man: and so stepping into his chamber, said she shold haue his letter to the keper.* But his mynd being changed he sent out his ring by a Gentleman, which Gentleman deliuered the ring to his man, charging him with the Bishops message. And so his man went with the woman to the water side, & tooke boat, who neuer rested rayling on her husband all the way, till they came to y^e prison: which was no small crosse vnto the poore woman.

And when they were come to the Marshalsey: the messenger shewed the B. ring to the Porter, saying: Maister Stokes, my Lord willeth you by this token, that ye suffer this woman to haue recourse to her husband: but he straitly chargeth you, that ye search her both comming & going least she bring or cary any letters to or fro, & that she bryng no body vnto him, nor no word from no mā. Gods bloud quoth the Porter (who was a foule swearer) what wil my Lord haue me to do? Can I let her to bring word from any man? Either let her go to her husband, or let her not go for I see nothyng by him but an honest man. The poore woman fearing to be repulsed, spake the Porter faire, saying: Good maister be content, for I haue found my Lorde very good Lord vnto me. This yong man is but the Gentlemans seruant which brought the ring from my Lord, & I thinke doth his message a great deale more straiter then my Lord commanded the Gentleman, or that the Gentleman his maister commanded him. But neuerthelesse good M. quoth she, I shal be content to strip my selfe before you both commyng and goyng, so farre as any honest woman may do with honesty. For I entend no such thyng, but only to comfort and helpe my husband. Then the Messenger sayd no more, but went his way, leauing the womā there, who from that tyme forth, was suffered to come and go at her pleasure.

The fourth examination of Marbecke, before the Commissioners in the Bishop of Londons house.

ABout a three weekes before Whitsonday, was Marbecke sent for to the B. of Londons house, where sat in Commission Doctor Capon, Bishop of Salisbury, Doctor Skyp Bishop of Harford, Doct. Goodricke Bishop of Ely, Doct. Okyng, Doct. May, and the Bishop of Londons Scribe, hauyng before them all Marbeckes bookes. Then sayd the Byshop of Salisbury: Marbecke, we are here in commission sent frō the kings maiesty, to examine thee of certaine things wherof thou must be sworne to answer vs faithfully & truly. I am content my lord quoth he, to tell you the truth so far as I can, and so tooke hys othe. Then the Bishop of Salisbury layd forth before hym, hys 3. bookes of notes, demaunding whose hand they were. He answered they were his owne hand, & notes which he had gathered out of other mens works, 6. yeres ago. For what cause quoth the Byshop of Salisbury diddest thou gather them? For none other cause my Lorde, quoth he, but to come by knowledge. For I being vnlearned & desirous to vnderstād some part of scripture, thought by readyng of lerned mens works to come the sooner therby, & where as I found any place of Scripture opened and expounded by thē, that I noted as ye see, with a letter of his name in the margent, that had set out the worke. So me thinke quoth Page 1217 the Byshop of Ely (who had one of the bookes of notes in his hand al y^e time of their sitting) thou hast read of al sorts of bookes both good and bad, as seemeth by the notes. So I haue my Lorde, quoth he. And to what purpose, quoth the Byshop of Salis. by my trouth, quoth he, for no other purpose but to see euery mans minde. Then the B. of Salis. drew out a quire of the Concordance, and layd it before the B. of Harford, who looking vppon it a while, lifted vp hys eyes to D. Oking (standing next him) and sayd: Thys man hath ben better occupied, then a great sort of our priestes. To the which he made no answer.

Then sayd the Byshop of Salisbury, whose helpe hadst thou in setting forth this booke? Truely my Lorde, quoth he, no helpe at al. How couldest thou, quoth the bishop, inuent such a booke, or know what a Concordance meant, w^tout an instructor. I wil tell your Lordship, quoth he, what instructor I had to begin it. When Thomas Mathewes bible came first out in print, I was much desirous to haue one of them: and being a poore man not able to buye one of them, determined wyth my selfe to borrow one among my frends, & to wryte it forth. And when I had wrytten oute the 5. bookes of Moises in faire greate paper, & was entred into the booke of Iosua, my frende M. Turner chaunced to steale vpon me vnwares, & seeing me wryting out the Bible, asked me what I meant therby. And when I had told him the cause: Tush, quoth he, thou goest about a vain and tedious labour. But this were a profitable worke for thee, to set out a Concordance in English. A Concordance sayde I? what is that? Then he tolde me it was a booke to finde out any word in the whole Bible by the letter, & that there was such a one in Latin already. Then I tolde him I had no learning to goe about such a thing. Enough, quoth he, for that mater, for it requireth not so much learning, as diligence. And seeing thou art so painful a man, and one that cannot be vnoccupied, it wer a goodly exercise for thee. And this (my Lord) is all the instruction that euer I had before or after, of any man. What is that Turner, quoth the B. of Salis.? Mary, quoth D. May, an honest learned man, and a Bachelor of Diuinitie, and sometime a fellow in Magdalene colledge in Oxford. Howe couldest thou, quoth the B. of Salisb. with thys instruction, bring it to thys order and forme, as it is? I borrowed a Latine Concordance, quoth he, and began to practyse my wit, and at last wyth great labor and diligence, brought it into this order, as your lordship doth see. A good wit with diligence, quoth the bysh. of Harford, may bring hard things to passe. It is great pitie quoth the Bish. of Ely, he had not the Latine tounge. So it is, quoth D. May. Yet can not I beleue, quoth the Bishop of Salisb. that he hath done any more in thys worke, then wrytten it out after some other that is learned.

My Lordes, quoth Marbecke, I shall beseech you all to pardon me what I shall say,* and graunt to my request if it shall seeme good vnto you. Say what thou wilt, quoth the Byshops. I do maruaile greatly wherfore I should be so much examined for this booke, & whether I haue committed any offence in doing of it or no? If I haue, then were I loathe any other to be molested or punyshed for my faulte. Therefore to cleare all men in this matter, thys is my request, that ye wil trie me in the rest of the boke y^t is vndon. Ye see that I am yet but in the letter L. Beginning now at M. & take out what word ye wil of that letter, & so in euery letter folowing, and geue me the wordes in a pece of paper and set me in a place alone where it shall please you, wyth inke and paper, the English Bible, and the Latine concordance: and if I bring you not these wordes wrytten in the same order & forme that the rest before is, then was it not I that did it, but some other.

By my trouth Marbecke, quoth the Byshop of Elye, that is honestly spokē, and then shalt thou bring many out of suspition. That he shal, quoth they all. Then they badde Doct. Oking draw out such wordes as he thought best in a peece of paper, and so rose vp: and in the meane time, fel into other familiar talke with Marbecke (for the Byshop of Ely and Harford both, were acquainted w^t hym afore, and his frendes, so farre as they durst) who perceiuing the Bishops so pleasauntly disposed, besought them to tel hym in what daunger he stooode.* Shal I tell thee Marbecke, quoth the Byshop of Sarum? Thou art in better case then anye of thy felowes, of whom there be some would geue 40.li. to be in no worse case then thou art, whose sayinges the other affirmed. Then came D. Oking wyth the wordes hee had wrytten, & while the Byshops were perusing them ouer, Doctour Oking sayd to Marbecke (very frendly) on thys wise:* Good M. Marbecke make hast, for the sooner ye haue done, the sooner ye shall be deliuered. And as the Byshops were going away, the bishop of Harforde tooke Marbecke a litle aside, and enformed him of a word whych D. Oking had written false, and also to comfort him, sayd: Feare not, there can no law condemne you, for any thing that ye haue done, for if ye had wrytten a 1000. heresies, so longe as they be not your sayings nor your opiniōs, the law cānot hurt you. And so went they all with the Byshop of Sarum to dinner, who taking the pore man with them, who dined in the hall at the Stewardes borde: and beside that, had wine and meate sent downe from the bishops table.

When dinner was done, the Bishoppe of Sarum came downe into the Hall, commaunding inke and paper to be geuen to Marbecke, and the 2. bookes to one of his men to go with him, at whose going he demanded of the Byshop, what time hys Lordship would appoynt him to doe it in. Against to morrowe this time, quoth the Byshop, whyche was about 2. of the clocke, and so departed.

Marbecke now being in his prison chamber, fel to his busines, & so applied the thing, that by the nexte day when the Bishop sent for him againe, he had written so much, in the same order & forme hee had done the rest before,* as contened iij. sheetes of paper and more. The whych, when he had deliuered to the Bishop of Sarum (Doc. Oking standing by) he marueiled and sayd: Well Marbecke, thou hast now put me out of all doubt. I assure thee, quoth hee (putting vp the paper into his bosome) the king shal see this or I be 24. houres elder: but he dissembled euery worde, and thought nothing lesse then so. For afterwarde, the matter being come to light, and knownen to his grace what a boke the poore man had begon, which the Byshops woulde not suffer him to finish: the king saide he was better occupied then they that tooke it from him. So Marbecke departed from the byshop of Sarum to prison againe, and heard no more of hys booke.

The 5. examination of Marbecke, before D. Oking and M. Knight Secretary to the Bishop of Winchester, in S. Mary Ouers Church.

Vpon Whitsonday following, at after noone,* was Marbecke sent for once againe to S. Mary Ouers, where he found D. Oking with an other gentleman in a gowne of Damaske, with a cheyne of gold about his neck (no mo in all the church but they two) sitting together in one of the stalles, their backs toward the church dore, lookyng vpon an Epistle of M. Iohn Caluins, whiche Marbecke had written out. And when they sawe the prisoner come, they rose and had him vp to a side alter, leauing his keeper in the body of the church alone. Nowe as soone as Marbecke saw the face of a gentleman (which before he knewe not by reason of his apparell) he saw it was the same person that first examined him in the Marshalsey, and did also cause him to write in the Bishoppes gallery, but neuer knew his name, till now he heard Doct. Oking call hym M. Knight. This M. Knight helde forth the paper to Marbecke and sayd, looke vpon this, and tell me whose hand it is. When Marbecke had taken the paper,* & seene what it was, he confessed it to be all his hand sauing y^e first leafe, and the notes in the margent Thē I perceiue, quoth Knight, thou wilt not go from thine owne hand. No Sir quoth he, I will deny nothing that I haue done. Thou doest well in that, quoth Knight, for if thou shouldest, we haue testimonies enough besides, to trye out thy hand by: but I pray thee tell me, whose hand is the last leafe? That I cannot tell you, quoth Marbecke. Thē how camest thou by it, quoth Knight? Forsooth I will tell you quoth he. There was a prieste dwelling with vs vpon a v. or .vi. yeares ago, called Marshall: who sent it vnto me with the first leafe written, desiring mee to write it out with speede, because the copy could not be spared past an houre or twain and so I wrote it out, and sent him both the cotype and it agayne.

And howe came this hand in the margent, quoth hee, which is a contrary hand to both the other? That I wyll tell you, quoth Marbecke▪ When I wrote it out at the first, I made so much hast of it, that I vnderstoode not the matter: wherefore I was desirous to see it agayne, and to read it with more deliberation, and being sent to me the second tyme, it was thus coted in the margent as ye see. And shortly after this, it was his chaunce to go beyond the seas (where he liued not long) by reason whereof the Epistle remayneth with me: but whether the first leafe, or y^e notes in the margent were▪ his hand, or whose hand els,* that I cannot tell. Tush, quoth D. Oking to M. Knight, he knoweth well enough, that the notes be Heynes owne hande, If you know so much, quoth Marb. ye knowe more then I doe, for I tell you truely I knowe it not. By my faith Marbecke, quoth Knyghte, if thou wylt not tell by fayre meanes: those fingers of thine shall be made to tell.* By my trouthe Syr, quoth Marbecke, if ye do teare the whole body in peeces (I trust in God) yee shall neuer make me accuse Page 1218 man wrongfully. If thou be so stubburne, quoth D. O king, thou wilt die for it. Dye M. Okyng, quoth hee? Wherefore should I die. You told me the last day before the Byshops, that assoone as I had made an ende of the peece of Concordance they tooke me, I shoulde be deliuered, and shall I now die? This is a sodaine mutation. You seemed then to be my frend: but I know the cause, ye haue red the ballet I made of Moses chayre, and that hath sette you agaynst mee, but when soeuer yee shall putte me to death, I doubt not to dye Gods true man and the kyngs. How so, quoth Knight? howe canst thou die a true manne vnto the kyng, when thou hast offended his lawes? Is not this Epistle, and moste of thy notes thou hast wrytten, directly against the 6. articles? No syr quoth Marbecke: I haue not offended the kyngs lawes therein: for since the first time I began wyth the Concordance (whyche is almoste 6. yeares agoe) I haue bene occupied in nothing els:* So that bothe this Epistle, and al the notes I haue gathered, were wrytten a great while before the 6. Articles came foorth, and are clearely remitted by the kings generall pardon. Trust not to that, quoth Knight, for it wil not help thee. No I warrant hym, quoth Doct. Okyng, and so going downe to the body of the church, they committed him to his keeper, who had him away to prison againe.

The sute of Filmers wife, to the Bishops which sate in commission, for her husband.

IN lyke maner, y^e wife of Filmer knowing her husbands trouble to be only procured of malice by Simons his old ennemie, made great sute and labour vnto the Byshops which were commissioners, desiring no more of them, but that it would please their goodnes to examine her husband before them,* and to heare hym make his purgation. Thys was her only request to euery of the Byshops from day to day, wheresoeuer shee coulde finde them. In so muche that two of the Byshops (Ely and Harforde) were verie sorye (considering the importune and reasonable sute of the woman) that it lay not in them to help her. Thus traouailing long vp and downe from one to an other, to haue her husbände examined,* it was her chaunce at the last to finde the Byshops all three together in the Byshoppe of Elye hys place, vnto whom she sayd: O good my Lordes for the loue of God, let now my poore husbände be brought foorth before you, while yee be heere all togethers. For truely my Lordes, there can nothing be iustly laide against hym, but that of malicious enuie and spite, Simons hath wroughte him this trouble. And you my Lorde of Salisburie, quoth the poore woman, can testifie (if it woulde please your lordship to say the truth) what malice Simōs bare to my husband when they were both before you at Salisburie (litle more then a yeare agoe) for the Uicar of Wyndsors matter. For as your Lordship knoweth, when my husbände had certified you of the Priests sermone, which you sayde was plaine heresie: then came Symons (after the Prieste hymselfe had confessed it) and would haue defended the priestes error before your Lordship, and haue had my husband punished. At what time it pleased your Lordship to cōmend and praise my husband for his honesty, and to rebuke Symons for maintaining the Priest in his error, & thereupon commanded the priest to rekant his heresy at his comming home to Windsore. This (my Lord) you knowe to be true. And now my Lords, quoth the woman, it is most certain, that for thys cause only did Symons euermore afterward threaten my husband to be euen with him. Therefore good my Lordes, call my husbände before you, and heare hym speake: and if ye finde any other matter againste hym then this that I haue tolde you, let me suffer death. Is thys so my Lord, quoth the B. of Ely and Harforde? and the other could not deny it. Then they spake Latine to the B. of Salisbury, and he to them, & so departed. For the matter was so wrought betweene Doctor London and Symons, that Filmer could neuer be suffred to come before the Commissioners to be examined.*

The manner of their condemnations, and howe they dyed.

When the time drewe nie that the kings maiestie (who was newly married to that good and vertuous Ladie Katherine Parre) should make his progresse abroad, the foresayde Steuen Gardiner B. of Winchester had so compassed hys matters, that no man bare so great a swinge about the king, as he did. Wherewith the Gospellers were so quailed, that the best of them all looked euery houre to be clapt in the necke. For the saying went abroad, that the B. had bent his bowe to shoote at some of the head Deare: but in the meane time 3. or 4. of the poore rascals were caught, that is to saye, Anthony Person, Henry Filmer, and Iohn Marbecke, and sent to Wyndsore by the sheriffes men,* the Saterdag before S. Iames day, and laid fast in the towns Gaile: and Testwood (who had kept his bed) brought out of his house vpō crouches, and laide with them. But as for Bennet, (whych should haue bene the fift man) hys chance was to be sicke of the Pestilence, and hauing a greate sore vpon him, was left behinde in the bish. of Londons gaile, whereby he escaped the fire.

Now these men being brought to Wyndsore, there was a sessions speciall procured to be holdē the Thursday after, which was S. Annes day. Against the which Sessions (by the counsell of D. London and Symons) were all the farmers belonging to the Colledge of Wyndesore, warned to appeare: because they coulde not pike oute Papistes enough in the towne, to go vpon the iury. The iudges that day were these.

- Doctor Capon Bishop of Salisburie.
- Syr William Essex Knight,
- Syr Thomas Bridges Knight.*
- Syr Humfrey Foster Knight.
- Maister Franklen Deane of Wyndsore.
- And Fachel of Reading.

When these had taken theyr places, and the prisonners brought forth before them, then Robert Ockam occupying for that day the Clarke of peace his •oume, called Anthony Person, according to the maner of the Courte,* and red hys Inditement, which was this.

First, that he should preach two yeares before, in a place called Wyngfield, and there should say:* that like as Christe was hanged betwene two theeues, euen so whē the priest is at masse, and hath cōsecrated and lifted him vp ouer hys head, then he hangeth betweene 2. theeues, except he preach the word of God truely, as he hath taken vpon hym to do.

Also that he sayde to the people in the Pulpit: yee shall not eate the body of Christ, as it did hang vpon the Crosse, gnawing it with your teeth, that the bloude runne aboute your lippes, but you shall eate him thys day, as ye eat him to morow, the next day, and euey day: for it refresheth not the body, but the soule.

Also, after he had preached and commended the Scripture, calling it the word of God, he sayd as foloweth: This is the word, this is the bread, this is the body of Christ.

Also hee sayde, that Christ sittinge with hys Disciples, tooke bread, and blessed, and brake it, and gaue it to his disciples, saying: Take and eate it. This is my body. What is thys to vs, but to take the Scripture of God, and to breake it to the people.

To this, Anthony answered & sayde: I wil be tryed by God and his holy word, and by the true Church of Christ, whether thys be heresie or no, wherof ye haue Indited me this day. So long as I preached the Bishop of Rome and his filthy traditions, I was neuer troubled:  but since I haue taken vpon me to preach Christ and his Gospel, yee haue alwaies sought my life. But it maketh no matter, for when you haue taken your pleasure of my body, I trust it shal not lye in your powers to hurt my soule. Thou callest vs theeues, quoth the Byshop. I say, quoth Anthony, yee are not only theeues but murtherers, except ye preach and teach the worde of God purely and sincerely to the people, whych ye do not nor neuer did, but haue allured them to al Idolatry, superstition and hypocrisie, for your owne lucre & glory sake,  through the which ye are become rather bitesheepes then true byshops, biting and deuouring the poore sheepe of Christ like rauening wolues neuer satisfied with blood: which God wil require at your hāds one day, dout it not. Then spake Symons his accuser, standing wythin the barre, saying:  It is pitie this fellow had not bene burnt long agoe as he deserued. In faith (quoth Anthonie) if you had as you haue deserued, you were more worthy to stand in this place then I: but I trust in the last daye when wee shall both appeare before the tribunall seate of Christ, that then it wilbe known which of vs 2. hath best deserued this place. Shal I haue so long a day, quoth Symons,  holding vp hys finger? Nay, then I care not: and so the matter was iested out.

Robert Testwoode.

Then was Testwoode called, and his Inditement read, which was that he should say in the time that the priest was lifting vp the Sacrament: * what wilt thou lift hym so hie? What yet hier? Take heede, let him not fall.

To thys Testwoode aunswared, * sayinge it was but a thing maliciously forged of his enemies to bring him to his death. Yes (quoth the B.) thou hast bene sene, that whē the Page 1219 Priest shoulde lift vp the Sacrament ouer hys heade, then wouldest thou looke downe vpon thy booke, or some other way, because thou wouldest not abide to looke vpon y^e blessed Sacrament. I beseech you my Lord▪ quoth Testwood, whereon did he looke that marked me so wel? Mary quoth Bucklayer the Kynges Atturney, hee coulde not be better occupied, thē to marke suche heretickes that so despised the blessed Sacrament.

Henry Filmer.

Then was Filmer called and his Inditement read: that he should say that the Sacrament of the saultare is nothing els but a •imilitude and a ceremony: * and also if God be in the Sacrament of the aultare, I haue eaten twentie Gods in my dayes.

Here ye must vnderstand, that these wordes were gathered of certaine communication which shuld be betwene Filmer and his brother. The tale went thus.

This Henry Filmer comminge vpon a Sondag from Clewer his Parish church, in the company of one or two of his neighbors, chaunced in the way to meete his brother (whyche was a verie poore labouring man) and asked hym whether he went. To the Church sayd he. And what to do, quoth Filmer? To doe quoth hee, as other men doe. Nay, quoth Filmer, you go to heare masse and to see your God. What if I do so, quoth he? If that be God (should Filmer say) I haue eaten 20. Gods in my dayes. Tourne agayne foole and go home with me, and I wil read thee a Chapter out of the Bible, that shalbe better then all that thou shalt heare or see there.

This tale was no sooner brought to Doct. London by William Symons (Filmers vtter ennemie) but he sent for the poore man home to his house, * where he chearished hym with meat and money, telling him he shoulde neuer lacke, so long as he liued: that y^e seely poore man (thinking to haue had a daily frend of D. London) was content to do and say whatsoever he and Symons would haue hym say or do against his owne brother. And when D. London had thus won the pore man, he retained him as one of his houshold men, * vntill the court day was come, and then sent him vp to witnes this foresaid tale against his brother. Which •ale Filmer denied vtterly, saying that D. London (for a little meat and drinke sake) had set him on, and made him to say what his pleasure was: * wherefore my Lord (quoth Filmer to the bishop) I beseeche your Lordship weigh the matter indifferently, * for as muche as there is no man in all thys towne, y^t can or will testifie with him, that euer he heard any such talke betwene him and me: and if he can bring forth any that wil witnes the same with him, I refuse not to die. But say what he could, it would not preuaile.

Then Filmer seeing no remedy, but that hys brothers accusemēt shuld take place, he sayd: Ah brother, what cause hast thou to shew me this vnkindnes? I haue alwaies ben a naturall brother vnto thee and thine, and helped you all, to my power, from time to time, as thou thy selfe knowest: and is this a brotherly part, * thus to rewarde me nowe for my kindnesse? God forgeue it thee my brother, & geue thee grace to repent. Then Filmer looking ouer his shoulder, desired some good body to let him see the booke of statutes. Hys wife being at the end of the hall, and hearing her husband call for the booke of statutes, ran downe to the keper, and brought vp the booke, & gat it conueied to her husbād.

The Bishop seeing the booke in his hand, starte hym vp from the bench in a great sume, * demanding who had geuē the prisoner that booke, commaunding it to be taken from him, and to make searche who had brought it, swearing by the faith of hys body, he should go to prison. Some sayd it was his wife, some sayd the keeper. Like inough (my lord) quoth Symons, for he is one of the same sort, & as worthy to be heere as the best, if he were rightly serued. But howsoever it was, the truthe would not be knowen, and so the Bishop sate him downe againe.

Then sayd Filmer: O my Lord, I am this day iudged by a lawe, & why should not I see the lawe that I am iudged by? The law is, I should haue two lawfull witnesses and here is but one, which would not doe as he doeth, but that he is forced thereunto by the suggestion of mine ennemies. Nay, quoth Bucklayer the kynges attorney, thyne heresie is so heinous, and abhorteth thine owne brother so much, that it forceth him to witnesse against thee, which is more then two other witnesses.

Thus (as ye see) was Filmer brought vniustly to hys death, by the malice of Symons and D. London, who had enticed that wretched caitiffe his brother, to be their minister to worke his confusion. But God which is a iust reuēger of all falsehode & wrongs, would not suffer that wretch long to liue vppon earth, but the next yeare followyng, he beyng taken vp for a labourer to goe to Bullaine, had not bene there three daies, ere that (in exonerating of nature) a Gunne tooke him and tore him all to peeces: And so was these woordes of Salomon fulfilled: A false witnesse shall not remaine vnpunished.

Iohn Marbecke.

Then was Marbecke called, and hys Inditement read,* whiche was that he shoulde say: That the holy Masse, when the Priest doeth consecrate the body of our Lorde, is poluted, deformed, sinnefull, and open robbery of the glory of God, from the which a Christian hart ought both to abhorre and flee. And the eleuation of the Sacramente is the similitude of the setting vp of Images of the calues in the Temple builded by Ieroboam: and that it is more abomination then the sacrifices done by the Iewes in Ieroboams temple to those calues. And that certaine and sure it is that Christ himself is made in the masse, mans laughing stocke.

To thys hee aunswered and sayde,* that these woordes wherof they had indited him, were not his, but the wordes of a learned man called Iohn Caluine, and drawn out of a certaine Epistle which the sayd Caluine had made, whych Epistle he had but onely wrytten out, and that long before the 6. Articles came foorth: so that nowe he was discharged of that offence by the kings generall pardon, desiring that he might enioy the benefite thereof.

Then was the Iurye called, which were all Farmers belonging to the Colledge of Wyndsore,* whereof fewe or none had euer sene those men before, vppon whose life and death they went. Wherefore the prisoners (counting the farmers as partial) desired to haue the Townes men, or such as did know them, and had sene their daily conuersations, in the place of the Farmers, or els to be equally ioyned w^t them: but that would not be, for the matter was otherwise foreseeene and determined.

Now when the Iury had taken theyr oth and al, Bucklayer the kynges attorney began to speake:* and first he alledged many reasons against Anth. Person, to prooue him an hereticke. Whych when Anth. woulde haue disprooued, the Bishop sayd: let him alone, Syr, he speaketh for the K. & so went Bucklayer foorth with his matter, making euery mans cause as hainous to the hearers, as he coulde deuise. And when he had done and sayd what he would, then Sir Humfrey Foster spake to the Quest in the fauor of Marbecke on thys wise: Maisters quoth hee,* ye see there is no man here that accuseth or layeth any thyng to the charge of this poore man Marbecke, sauing he hath written certaine things of other mens sayings with his owne hand, wherof he is discharged by the kings generall pardon: therefore ye ought to haue a conscience therin. Then start vp Fachel at the lower ende of the benche, and sayd: * What can we tel whether they were wrytten before the pardone, or after? They may as well be wrytten since as afore, for any thing that we knowe. These wordes of Fachel (as euery man sayd) were the cause of Marbeckes casting that day.

Then went the Iury vp to the chamber ouer the place where the iudges sate, and in the meane time, went all the Knights and gentlemen abroad, * sauing the Byshop Syr William Essex, and Fachell, which three sate still vpon the Benche till all was done. * And when the Iurie hadde bene togethers aboue in the chamber, about the space of a quarter of an houre, vp goeth Symons (of hys owne brayne) vnto them▪ and taried there a prety while, and came down againe. After that, came one of the Iury downe to the byshop, and talked wyth hym and the other twaine a good while, whereby manye coniectured, that the Iurie coulde not agree of Marbecke. But whether it were so or no, it was not long after his going vp again, ere that they came downe to geue their verdit. * And being required according to the forme of the law to say their minds: one called Hyde dwelling beside Abyngton, in a lordshyp belonging to the Colledge of Wyndsore, speaking in the mouthe of the rest, sayd they were all giltye.

Then the Iudges beholding the prisoners a good while (some wyth watery eyes) made curtesie who should geue iudgement. Fachel requiring the byshop to doe it, he sayde he might not: the other also being required, said they wold not. Then said Fachel, it must be done: one must do it, * and if no man will, then will I. And so Fachell being lowest of al the bench, gaue iudgement. Then Marbeck being y^e last vpon whom sentence was geuen, cried to the bish. saying: Ah my Lorde, you tolde me otherwise when I was before you and the other two bishops. You said then, that I was in better case then any of my fellowes, and is your sayinge come to this? Ah my L. you haue deceiued me. Then the B. casting vp his hand, sayd he could not do withall.

Page 1220* Now the prisoners being condemned and had away, prepared themselues to die on the morow, comforting one an other in the deathe and passion of theyr maister Christe, who had ledde the way before them, trusting that the same lord which had made them worthy to suffer so farre for hys sake, would not nowe withdraw his strength from them, but geue them stedfast faith & power to ouercome those firie torments, and of his free mercy and goodnes (wythout theyr desertes) for hys promise sake, receiue theyr soules. Thus lay they all the night long (til very dead sleepe tooke them) calling to God for hys aide and strength, and praying for their persecuters, whiche of blinde zeale and ignoraunce had done they wist not what, that God of hys mercifull goodnes would forgeue them, * and turne theyr hearts to the loue and knowledge of his blessed and holy worde: Yea such heavenly talke was among them that night, that the hearers watching the prison without, wherof the Shiriffe hymselfe was one, with diuers gentlemen moe, were constrained to shed out plēty of teares, as they themselues confessed.

On the next morow, which was Friday, as the prysoners were all preparing themselues to go to suffer, worde was brought them that they should not dye that day. The cause was this. The Byshop of Sarum, and they among them had sent a letter by one of the Shiriffes Gentlemen, * called M. Frost, to the bishop of Winchester (the Court being then at Oking) in the fauour of Marbecke. At the sight of whych letter, the bishop straight way went to the kyng, and obtained hys pardon.

Which being graunted, he caused a warrante to be made out of hande for the sheriffes discharge, deliuering the same to the messenger, who with speede returned wyth great ioy (for the loue he bare to the partie) bringing good newes to the towne,* of Marbeckes pardon: wherat many reioysed. Of this pardon were diuers coniectures made. Some said it was by the sute of the good Shriffe syr William Barington, and syr Humffray Foster (with other Gentlemen moe that fauoured Marbeck) to the B. of Sarum and the other Commissioners, that the letter was sent.

Some sayde againe, that it came of the Byshop of Sarum and Fachels first motion,* being pricked in conscience, for that they had so slēderly cast him away. Other thought againe, that it was a policie purposed afore, by the Byshop of Winchester, of Sarum, and of D. London, because they would seeme to be mercifull. Which coniecture rose vppon thys occasion. There was one Sadocke dwellynge in the towne which was greate with D. London and Symons: and he shoulde say 4. dayes before the sessions began, that the prisoners should be all cast and condemned, but Marbecke should haue hys pardon.

Other there were that thought the foresayde Byshops with D. London, had done it for this purpose: that he now hauing his life, would rather vtter such mē as they would haue him to do, then to come in like daunger again. Which coniecture rose vpon thys: Symons meeting wyth Marbeckes wife, said thus vnto her: your husband may thanke God & good frendes: my Lord of Winchester is good Lord vnto him, which hath got his pardon. But shall I tel you, quoth he? * his pardon wilbe to none effect, except he tell the truth of things to my Lord & other of the counsel, when he shalbe demaunded, for vnto that purpose onely is he reserued. Alas sir, quoth she, what can he tel? Well womā quoth Symons, I tell thee plaine, if he doe not so, neuer looke to haue thy husband out of prisone, and so departed from her.

The like meaning did M. Arche make to Marbecke him selfe, on the saterday in y^e morning, that the men shoulde be brent, when he came to cōfesse them. I haue nothing, quoth he, to saye vnto you Marbecke at this time, but heereafter you must be cōtent to do as shalbe enioyned you: meaning he should be forced to do some vnlawful thing, or els to lie in perpetuall prisone.* And thys was moste likely to haue beene attempted, if they hadde proceeded in their purpose: whose intent was to haue gone thorow the whole realme, in the lyke sorte as they had begonne at Wyndsore, as the Byshop of Sarum confessed openly and sayde, that he trusted ere Christmasse daye following, to visite and cleanse a good part thereof. But moste commonly, God sendeth a shrewed Cowe short hornes, or else manye a thousande in England had smarted.

On saterday in the morning, that the prisoners shoulde go to execution, came into the prison two of the Canons of the Colledge, the one called Doctour Blithe, and the other maister Arche, whych two were sent to be their confessors, master Arche asked them, if they would be confest, and they sayde yea. Then hee demaunded if they would receyue the Sacramente. Yea sayde they wyth all our heartes. I am glad quoth Arche, to heare you say so, but the law is (quoth he) that it may not be ministred to none that are cōdemned of heresie. But it is inough for you that ye do desire it.* And so had them vp to the Hall to heare theyr confessions, because the prison was full of people. Doctor Blyth tooke Anthony Person to him to confesse, and mayster Arche the other two. But how soeuer the matter went between the Doctour & Anthony, he taryed not long w^t him but came downe agayne, saying he woulde no more of his doctrine. Do you call him Doct. Blith, quoth Anthony? He may be called Doct. Blind for his learning, as farre as I see. And soone after, the other two came downe also. Thē Anthony seeing much people in the prison, began to say y^e Lords prayer, whereof he made a maruelous godly declaration,* wherein hee continued til the Officers came to set them away, and so made an end. And taking theyr leaue of Marbecke (their prison fellow) they prayesd God for his delyueraunce, wishing to hym the increase of godlynnes & vertue, and last of all besought him hartily to helpe them with hys prayer vnto God, to make them strong in theyr afflictions, and so kissing him one after an other, departed.

Now as the prisoners passed thorough the people in y^e streetes,* they desired all the faythfull people to praye for them, & to stand fast in the truth of the gospell, & not to be moued at theyr afflictions, for it was the happyest thinge that euer came to them. And euer as Doctour Blithe and Arche (who rod on each side the prisoners) woulde perswade them to turne to their mother holy Church: away would Anthony cry, away with your Romishe doctryne and all your trompery, for we will no more of it. When Filmer was come to his brothers dore, he stayed and called for his brother, but he coulde not be seene, for Doctour London had kept him out of sight that day, for the nonce.

And when hee had called for him three or foure times, and saw he came not, he sayd: and will he not come? * Then God forgeue him and make him a good man. And so going forth they came to the place of execution, where Anthony Person with a cheerefull countenaunce, embraced y^e post in his armes, and kissing it, sayd: Nowe welcome myne owne sweete wife: for this day shalt thou and I be married together in the loue and peace of God.

And being all three bound to the post,* a certaine young man of Filmers acquayntaunce, brought him a pot of drinke, asking if he woulde drinke. Yea quoth Filmer, I thanke you. And nowe my brother quoth he, I shall desire you in the name of the liuing Lord, to stand fast in y^e truth of the gospell of Iesus Christe, whyche you haue receaued, and so taking the pot at hys hande, asked hys brother Anthony, if he would drinke. Yea brother Filmer quoth he, I pledge you in the Lord.

And when he had dronke, he gaue the pot to Anthonye & Anthony likewise gaue it to Testwoode. Of which drinking their aduersaries made a iesting stocke, reportyng abrode that they were all dronke & wist not what they said,* when as they were none otherwise dronke then as the Apostles were, when the people sayd they were full of newe wyne, as theyr deedes declared. For when Anthonye and Testwoode had both dronken, & geuen the pot from them, Filmer reioysing in the Lord, sayd: Be mery my brethren, & lift vp your hearts vnto God,* for after this sharp breakfast, I trust we shall haue a good dinner in the kingdom of Christ our Lord and redeemer. At the which words Testwood lifting vp his handes and eyes to heauen, desired the Lorde aboue to receiue his spirite. And Anthony Persone, pulling the straw vnto him, laid a good deale thereof vpon the top of hys head, saying: Thys is Gods hatte:* now am I dressed like a true souldiour of Christ, by whose merites onely, I trust this day to enter into his ioye.* And so yelded they vp their soules to the father of heauen, in the faythe of his deare sonne Iesus Christe, w^t suche humilitie and stedfastnesse, that many which saw their patient suffering, confessed that they coulde haue founde in their heartes (at that present to haue died with them.

How all their conspiracies were knowen.

YE haue hearde before of one Robert Bennet, howe hee was at the first apprehended wyth the other foure persons aforesayd, and committed to the B. of Londons pryson, and aboute the tyme hee shoulde haue gone to Wyndsore, fell sicke of the pestilence, by meane whereof he remained still in prison.

This Bennet, & Symons (ye shall vnderstād) were the greatest familiars and cōpany keepers y^t were in all Windsore, & neuer (lightly) swarued the one frō the other,* sauing in matters of religiō, wherein they could neuer agree. For Bennet the one Lawyer, was an earnest Gospeller, & Simons the other Lawyer, a cankered papist: but in al other worldly matters, they cleaued together like burres.

Thys Bennet had spoken certayne woordes agaynst theyr little rounde God, for the whych hee was as farre in Page 1221 as the best, and had suffered death wyth the other, if he had gone to Windsore when they went.* And now that the mater was al done and finished, it was determined by the bishop of Salisbury, that Robert Ockam on the Mondaye after the men were burnt shoulde goe to the Byshop of Winchester wyth the whole processe done at the Sessions the Thursday before.

Then Symons, at Bennets wiues request, procured of the byshop of Salisbury his fauourable letter to the byshop of Winchester for Bennets deliuerance. Which letter Bennets wife (for asmuche as her owne man was not at home, which should haue gone with the letter) desired Robert Ockam to deliuer it to y^e Bishop, & to bring her word againe: who sayde hee woulde. So foorth went Ockam toward the bishop of Winchester with his budget ful of wrytings, to declare and open all thyngs vnto hym that were done at Wyndsore Sessions:* but all theyr wicked intentes (as God wold haue it) were soone cut off, and their doings disclosed. For one of the Queenes menne (named Fulke) which had lien at Windsore all the time of the busines, and had got knowledge what a number were priuily indited, and of Ockams going to the bishop of Winchester, gate to the Court before Ockam, and told sir Thomas Cardine & other of the priuy chamber, how al the matter stode. Whereupon Ockam was layde for and had by the backe, as soone as he came to Oking, and kepte from the byshop.

On the next morrowe very early, Bennets wyfe sent her man to the Courte after Ockam, to see howe he spedde with her husbandes letter. And when hee came there, hee founde sir Thomas Cardine walking wyth Ockam vppe and downe the greene before the Courte gate: whereat he marueled, to see Ockam with him so early, mistrusting the matter: whereuppon he kept himselfe out of sight, till they had broken off theyr communication.

And assoone as he saw M. Cardine gone (leauing Ockam behinde) he went to Ockam and asked hym, if hee had deliuered hys maisters letter to the Bishop. No, sayd Ockam, the king remouueth thys day to Gilforde, and I must goe thether, and will deliuer it there. Mary, quoth hee, and I will goe with you, to see what aunswere you shall haue, and to carie woord to my mistres, and so they rode to Gilford together. Where Bennets man (being better acquainted in the towne then Ockam was) gat a lodging for them both, in a kinsmans house of hys.

That done, he asked Ockam, if he would goe and deliuer his mistres letter to the Byshop.* Nay (sayde Ockam) you shall go and deliuer it your selfe, and tooke him the letter. And as they were goyng in the strete together, and comming by the Earle of Bedfordes lodging (then Lorde priuie seale) Ockam was pulled in by the sleeue, & no more seene of Bennets man, till he sawe him in the Marshalsey. Then went Bennets man to the bishops lodging and deliuered hys letter. And when the Byshop had red the contentes thereof, he called for the man that brought it. Come Syrha, quoth he, you can tell me more by mouth, then the letter specifieth, & had hym into a litle garden. Now, quoth the Bishop, what say you to me? Forsoth my Lorde, quoth he, I haue nothing to say vnto your Lordshippe, for I did not bryng the letter to the Towne. No quoth the Byshop, where is he that brought it? Forsoth my Lorde quoth he, I left him busie at his lodging. Then he wil come, quoth the Byshop. Bid him be wyth me betimes in the mornynge. I wil quoth he,* do your lordships commandement, and so he departed home to hys lodging. And when hys kinsfolkes saw him come in, alas cosin, quoth they, we are all vndon. Why so, quoth he, what is the matter? Oh sayde they, heere hath bene since you went, M. Padget the kings secretary, with sir Tho. Cardine of the priuie chamber, and searched all our house for one that should come to the towne w^t Ockam: therfore make shift for your selfe assoone as you cā. Is that all the matter, quoth hee? then content your selfe, for I wil neuer flee one foote, happe what hap will. And as they were thus reasoning together, in came y^e foresaid searchers againe, & when M. Cardine saw Bennets man, he knewe him very well, & sayde: was it thou that came to the towne w^t Ockam? Yea sir, quoth he. Now who the deuill (quoth M. Cardine) brought thee in company w^t that false knaue? Then he tolde them hys busines, and the cause of his comming, whych being knowen, they were satisfied, and so departed. The nexte day had Bennets man a discharge, for hys master (procured by certaine of the priuie chamber) and so went home.

Nowe was Ockam all this while at my Lorde priuie Seales, where he was kept secret, til certaine of the Counsaile had perused all his wrytings, amonge the which they found certaine of the priuie Chamber indited, w^t other the kings Officers, with their wiues, that is to say, Sir Tho. Cardine, sir Phillip Hobby, wyth both theyr Ladies. M. Edmund Harman, M. Thomas Weldone, wyth Snowball and hys wife.* All these they had indited by the force of the 6. Articles, as aiders, helpers, and maintainers of Anthony Person. And beside them, they had indited of heresie (some for one thing, and some for an other) a great number moe of the Kings true and faithfull subiects. Whereof the kings Maiestie beyng certified, hys grace of hys speciall goodnes (without the sute of any man) gaue to the foresayd Gentlemen of his priuie Chamber, and other his seruants with theyr wiues, hys gracious pardō. And as God wold haue the matter further knowen vnto hys maiestie, as hee roade one day a huntinge in Gilforde Parke, and sawe the Sheriffe wyth syr Humfrey Foster sitting on theyr horse backes together, he called them vnto him, & asked of them, how hys lawes was executed at Windsore: Then they beseching hys grace of pardon, tolde hym plainely that in all theyr liues they neuer sate on matter vnder his graces authoritie, that went somuch against theyr consciences, as the death of these men did, and vp and told hys grace so pitiful a tale of the casting away of these poore men, that the King turning hys horsehead to departe from them, sayde: Alasse poore Innocents.

After thys,* the king withdrew hys fauour from the B. of Winchester, & being more and more enformed of the conspiracie of doctor London and Symons, he commaunded certaine of his counsaile, to search out the ground thereof.

Whereupon Doctour London and Symons were apprehended and brought before the Counsaile, and examined vpon their othe of allegeaunce. And for denying their mischeuous and traitorous purpose, whiche was manifestlye proued to theyr faces, they were both periured, and in fine, adiudged as periured persons, to weare papers in Wyndsore, and Ockam to stand vpon the pillerie in the towne of Newbery where he was borne•

The iudgemēt of all these 3. was to ride about Windsore, Reading and Newbery, with papers on their heads,* and theyr faces turned to the horse tales, & so to stand vpon the Pillerye in euery of these Townes, for false accusation of the forenamed Martyrs, and for periurie.

And thus much touching the persecution of these good Saintes of Windsore, according to the copie of their owne acts, receiued and wrytten by Iohn Marbecke, who is yet aliue, both a present witnes, and also was then a partye of the sayd doings, and can testifie the truth thereof.

Aunswere to the cauilling aduersaries touching Iohn Marbecke.

Wherefore against these crooked cauillers, which make so much ado against my former boke, because in a cer|taine place I chaunced to saye that Bennette and Filmer had their pardon (when in dede it was Bennet and Marbecke) be it therfore known, protested, denounced,* and notified, to al & singular such carpers, wranglers, exclamers, deprauers, with the whole broode of all such whisperers, railers, quarelpickers, corner creepers, fault finders & spidercatchers, or by what name els so euer they are to be titled that here I openly say, affirm, professe, hold, maintain & write the same as I sayde & wrote before in the latter castigations of my booke: that is, that Iohn Marbecke was with the other condemned, but not burned, cast by the law but by pardone sauēd, appoynted with the rest to die,* & yet not deade, but liueth (God be praised) & yet to thys present day singeth merely, and playeth on the Organes, not as a dead man, amōgst Foxes martyrs (as it hath pleased some in y^e court to encounter against me) but as one witnessed & testified truely in the booke of Foxes Martyrs to be a liue. And therefore such maner of persons, if y^e disposition of their nature be such; that they must needes finde faultes, then let them finde them where they are, and wher those faults by their finding may be corrected. But wheras they be corrected already, & found to their hands, & also amended before, let then these legend liers looke on their own legends, and there cry out of lies, where they may find inough, and cease their bitinge there, where they haue no iust cause to barke.

And admitte that I had not foresene and corrected thys escape before, touching the matter of Iohn Marbecke, but that the place stil had remained in the boke, as it was, that is, that the sayd Iohn Marbecke, whyche as yet aliue, had then died & suffred w^t the other 3. the same time at Wyndesore: yet what gētle or courteous reader, could haue therin any iust matter to triumph & insult against me, seing the iu|diciall acts, the records, & registers, yea & the bishops certificate, & also the write of execution remaining yet in Recorde, sent to the king, did lead me so to say and thinke? For what man wryting histories, who can not be in all places to se al things, but folowing his records & registers, wher in he seeth the said Marbecke to be iudged and condemned Page 1223 with the rest, would otherwise write or thinke, but that also he was executed and burned in the same company?

But nowe I correct and reforme the same agayne, and first of all other, I finde the fault, and yet am I found fault withall. I correct my selfe, and yet am I corrected of other. I warne the Reader of the truth,* and yet am I a liar. The booke it selfe sheweth the escape, and biddeth in steade of 4. to read 3. burned, and yet is the booke made a legēd of lies.

Briefly, where I preuent all occasion of cauilling to the vttermost of my diligence, yet can not I haue that law, which all other bookes haue, that is, to recognise & reforme mine owne errata.

Wherefore to conclude, these men, whosoeuer they are if they will be satisfied, I haue sayd inough: if they wil not, whatsoeuer I cā say, it wil not serue, and so I leaue them: I woulde I could better satisfie them. God hymself amend them.

The persecution in Calyce, with the Martyrdome of George Bucker, otherwise called Adam Damlyp, and others.

AT what time Iohn Marbecke was in the Marshalsey, which was about the yeare of our Lord. 1544. there was in the sayd prison with him one George Bucker,* named otherwise Adam Damlyp, who hauing continued in the sayd prison 3. or 4. yeres, at last by the commandement of Winchester, was had to Calice by Ihon Massie, the keeper of the Marshalsey,* and there hanged, drawen, & quartered for treason pretended, whiche was a little before the condemnation of the Windsore men aforesayd, as is by the letters of the sayd Iohn Marbecke to me signified.

Touching which story of Adam Damlyp, for somuche it includeth matter of much trouble and persecutiō that hapned in Calice,* to digest therefore and comprise the whole narration therefore in order, firste I will enter (the Lorde willing) the storie of Damlip, and so proceede in order to such as by the sayde occasion were afflicted and persecuted in the towne of Calice.

Whereupon the sayde Steuens at the opening of the gates, brought him vnto the Lord Lisle the kinges Deputie of the towne and marches of Calice,* vnto whome hee declared throughly what conference and talke had bene be'tweene Adam Damlip and him. Which knowne, the sayd Lord Deputie instauntly desired the sayd Damlip to stay there and to preach three or foure dayes or more at his pleasure, saying that he should haue both his licence & the Cōmissaries also (which then was sir Iohn Butler) so to doe. Where after he had preached three or fourt times, hee was so well lyked both for his learning, his vtteraunce and the truth of his doctrine, that not onely the souldiours & commoners, but also the Lord Deputy and a great part of the Counsell, gaue him maruelous great prayse and thanks for it,* and the sayd Lord Deputy offered vnto him a chamber in his owne house, and to dyne and sup euery meale at his owne messe, to haue a man or two of his to wayte vpon him & to haue what soeuer it were that he lacked, if it were to be had for mony, yea & what he would in his purse to buy bookes or otherwise, so as he would tary there among them, & preach onely so long as it should seeme good to himselfe. Who refusing his Lordships great offer, most hartily thanked him for the same, and besought him to be onely so good vnto him, as to appoynt him some quiet & honest place in the towne where he might not be disturbed nor molested, but haue oportunitie to geue himselfe to hys booke, and would dayly once in the forenoone, and agayn by one a clocke at after noone, by the grace of God, preach among them according vnto the talent that God had lent him.* At which aunswere the Lorde Deputy greatly reioysed and therupon sent for the foresayd W. Steuens, whom he earnestly required to receiue and lodge the sayde Damlip in his house, promising what soeuer hee shoulde commaund, to see it payd with the most: and moreouer would send euery meale frō his owne messe a dish of the best vnto them, and in deede so did: albeit the sayde Damlip refused that offer, shewing his Lordship that thinne dyet was most conuenient for Studentes. Yet could not that restrayne him but that euery meale he sent it.

This godly man by the space of xx. dayes or more, once euery day at vij. of the clocke preached very godly, learnedly & playnly,* the truth of the blessed sacrament of Christes body and bloud, mightely enueying agaynst all Papistrie and cōfuting the same, but especially those two most pernicious errours or heresies, trifling Transubstantiation, and the pestilent propitiatorie Sacrifice of the Romishe Masse, by true conference of the Scriptures, and applying of the auncient Doctours, earnestly therewith oftentimes exhorting the people to returne from theyr Popery, declaring how Popish he himselfe had bene, and how by the detestable wickednes that he did see vniuersally in Rome, he was returned so farre homeward, and now became an enemy through Gods grace, to all papistry: shewing therewith, that if gayne or ambition could haue mooued him to the contrary, he might haue bene enterteyned of Cardinall Page 1224 Poole (as you haue heard before) but for very conscience sake ioyned with true knowledge, grounded on Gods most holy word, he now vtterly abhorred all Papistry, and willed them most earnestly to do the same.

And thus he continued a while reading in the Chapter house of the White Friers, but the place beeyng not bigge enough, he was desired to reade in the Pulpit, and so proceeding in his Lectures (wherein hee declared howe the world was deceaued by the Romaine Bishops, which had set forth the damnable doctrine of Transubstantiation, and the reall presence in the Sacrament,* as is aforesayde) he came at length to speake against the Pageaunt or Picture set foorth of the Resurrection whiche was in Saint Nicholas Church, declaring the same to be but meere Idolatrie, and illusion of the Frenchmen before Calice was English.

Upon which Sermon or Lecture, there came a Commission from the King to the Lord Deputie, M. Grendfield,* sir Iohn Butler Commissary, the Kinges Mason, and Smith, with others, that they should searche whether there were (as was put in writing, and vnder Bull and Pardon) three hostes lyeng vpon a Marble stone, besprinkled with bloud, and if they found it not so, that immediatly it should be plucked downe, and so it was. For in searching therof, as they brake vp a stone in a corner of the Tumb, they in stead of the three hostes, founde souldered in the Crosse of Marble lyeng vnder the Sepulcher,* three playne white counters which they had paynted lyke vnto hostes, and a bone that is in the typ of a sheepes tayle. All which trumpery Damlip shewed vnto the people the next day folowing, which was Sondag, out of the Pulpit, and after that they were sent by the Lord Deputie to the King.*

Notwithstanding the Deuill stirred vp a Doue (hee might well be called a Cormorant) the Priour of the white Friers. Who with Syr Gregory Buttoll, Chapleyne to the Lord Lisle, began to barke agaynst him. Yet after the sayde Adam had in three or foure Sermons confuted the sayd Friers erroneous doctrine of transubstantiation, and of the propitiatorie Sacrifice of the Masse:* the sayd Frier outwardly seemed to geue place, ceasing openly to inuey, and secretly practised to peach him by letters sent vnto the Clergie here in England: so y^t within viij. or x. dayes after, the said Damlip was sent for to appeare before the Bishop of Canterbury,* with whome was assistant Steuen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, D. Sampson, Byshop of Chichester, and diuers other, before whome he most constantly affirmed and defended the doctrine which hee had taught, in such sort aunswering, confuting, & soluting the obiections, as his aduersaries, yea euen among other, the learned godly and blessed Martyr Cranmer then yet but a Lutheran, maruelled at it, & said plainly, that y^e Scripture knew no such terme of transubstantiation.* Then begā the other Bishops to threaten him, shortly to cōfute him with their accustomed argument, I meane fire and fagot, if hee should still stand to y^e defence of that he had spoken. Wherunto he constantly answered, that he would the nexte day deliuer vnto them fully so much in writing as he had said: whereto also he would stand, and so was dismissed.

The next day at the houre appointed to appeare, when they looked surely to haue apprehended hym, in the meane season he had secrete intimation from the Bishop of Canterbury,* that if he did any more personally appeare, he should be committed vnto Warde, not like to escape cruell death. Wherupon he (plaieng in deede then somewhat old Adams part, for such is man, left in his owne handes) had him commended vnto them, and sent them four sheetes of paper learnedly written in the Latin tounge, cōteining his faith with his argumentes conferences, of the Scriptures, and allegations of the Doctours, by a messenger or frend of his. Whiche done, he hauyng a little money giuen him in his purse by his frends, stepped aside, and went to the West cuntry, and there kept all the time, whyle great trouble kindled against Gods people in Calice, vpon the same, as ye shall heare, the Lord permitting.

After his departure, the Kings Maiestie was aduertised, that there was great dissention & diuersitie of pernicious opinions in his sayd towne of Calice, greatly tending to the daunger of the same. Wherupō, during yet the daies of the Lord Cromwell,* were sent ouer Doct. Champion Doctour of Diuinitie, & M. Garret, who after was burned, two godly and learned men, to preach and instruct the people, and to cōfute all pernicious errorrs, who in effect preached and maintained the same true doctrine which Adam Damlip had before set foorth, and by reason thereof, they left the Towne at their departure very quiet, and greatly purged of the sclaunder that had runne on it.

After the departure of the sayd Champion and Garret, one Sir William Smith Curate of our Lady Parishe in Calice, a man very zelous, though but meanely learned, did begin to preach, and earnestly to inuey against Papistrie and wilfull ignoraunce: exhorting men obediently to receaue the word, and no longer to contemne the same,* least Gods heaueie plagues and wrath should fall vpon them, which alwayes foloweth the contempt of his holy word. Which sir William Smith, for that sometime he would be very feruent & zelous, sharply inueying against the despisers of the word, was moued by some of y^e Counsell there, who would seeme to fauour Gods word, that he should not be so earnest against them that yet could not away with the same, willing him to beare with suche, for by bearing with them they might hap to be wonne.

Well, well, said the same Smith (openly in the Pulpit one day as he preached) some men say I am too earnest, and will me to beare with such as continue open enemies against Christes holy Gospell, and refuse, nay forbid that any should reade the Bible or holy scripture within their house: but let all such take heede, for before God, I feare that God for their contemning of his word, will not long beare with them, but make them in suche case as some of them shall not haue a head left them vpon their shoulders to beare vp their cap withal: which also after came to pas.

This Smyth continued in the diligente bestowing of his talent there, till shortly after the deuill got such hold in the harts of a number of Gods enemies, that he with diuers other godly men were called ouer into Englande, and charged with erroneous opinions worthy of great punishment, as hereafter more at large shall appeare.

First the Lord Lislie the Kings deputy there, whome we shewed to be the maintainer of Damlip (albeit he were himselfe of a most gentle nature, & of a right noble bloud,* the base sonne of that noble Prince King Edward the fourth) being fiercely set on, and incessantly entised by the wicked Lady Honor his wife, who was an vtter enemy to Gods honour, and in Idolatry, hypocrisie, & pride incomparably euill, she beeing dayly and houely thereunto incited and prouoked by Sir Thomas Palmer Knight, & Iohn Rookewood Esquire, two enemies to Gods word,* beginning now to flourish at Calice: these I say, with certayne other of the Counsell of the sayd Towne of Calice, to the number of vij. mo besides themselues, seeking occasion or rather a quarell, where no iust cause was geuē, begā to write very heinous letters and greuous complaints vnto the Lordes of the priuie Counsell, agaynst dyuers of the Towne of Calice, affirming that they were horribly infected with heresies and pernicious opinions: As first the foresaid Adam Damlip, who though he were for a time escaped their hands, yet stacke still in their remembraunce from time to time, vntill at last the innocent man was cruelly put to death as a traitor, as hereafter shal appeare.

Also besides this Damlip, they complained of Thomas Broke, Rafe Hare, likewise of Sir Iohn Butler then Commissarie, and Sir W. Smith, Iames Cocke, aliàs Coppen de Hane, Iames Barber & other, and the names of them all sente ouer. Of the wich persons, first the sayde Thomas Broke, and Rafe Hare, Coppen de Hane, and Iames Barber were apprehended and sent ouer, and cōmitted to prison in Westminster gate, and then commanded to appeare before the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bish. of Winchester, the Bishop of Chichester, and ten other appointed by the Kings maiesties commission, for the examination of them. And their accusers also were sent ouer with letters from the Counsell there, vnto his priuie Councell here, in the furtheraunce of their malicious sutes against those honest men, with certaine speciall letters directed vnto the Lord Fitzwilliams then Earle of Southhampton, & great Admirall of Englād, to the L. Sandes, Lord Chamberlayne of the Houshold, likewise also to sir William Kingstone Knight, Comptroller of y^e houshold, and to D. Sampson, then B. of Chichester, and other tending all to one effect, that is to say, to the vtter destruction of these godly men, if God after his wonted manner, had not mightely preserued them, and, as it were ouershadowed them with the wings of his mercy.

That the same may the better appeare, you shall vnderstand that first Rafe Hare, a man rude and so vnlearned, that scarce he could reade, yet through Gods grace,* was very zelous, and therewith lead so godly & temperate a life, as not one of his enemies coulde accuse or blame the same his sober lyfe and conuersation. Thys Rafe Hare was charged to be one, that had spoken against auriculare confession, against holy bread and holy water,* yea and beside that, he was one which would not lightly sweare an othe, nor vse almost any maner of pastime, nor good fellowship, as they terme it, but was alwaies in a corner by himselfe, looking on his booke. The poore simple man being charged by the Commissioners, y^t he was a naughty man & erroneous, Page 1225 and that he could not be otherwise, comming out of a towne so infected with pernicious errors & sects as that was, was willed by them to take good heede to himselfe, least through obstinacy he turned his erroneous opinions to playne heresie: for an error defended, is heresie.

My good Lordes sayde the poore man, I take God to recorde,* I woulde not willingly maintayne an errour or heresie, wherefore I beseech you, let my accusers come face to face before me. For if they charge me with that whyche I haue spoken, I will neuer denye it. Moreouer, if it be truth, I wil stand vnto it, and otherwise if it be an errour, I will with all my hart vtterly forsake it, I meane if it be against Gods holy worde. For the Lorde is my witnes, I seeke, and dayly pray to God, that I may know the truth, and flee from all errours, and I trust the Lorde will saue me, and preserue me from them.

Aha, quoth the Bishop of Winchester, do you not heare what he saith my Lord? I perceiue now thou art a naughty fellow. Alas my Lord, sayd Rafe Hare, what euill sayd I? Mary Syr, you sayd, the Lord, the Lord, and that is, Symbolum haereticorum, sayde Winchester. What is that my Lord,* for Gods sake tell me, sayde Hare? Thou art nought, thou art nought, sayd he. At which words y^e simple man began to tremble, and seemed much dismayde and driuen into a great agony and feare. Which thing Winchester wel perceiuing, said vnto him: Rafe Hare, Rafe Hare, by my trouth I pitie thee much. For in good faith, I thinke thee to be a good simple man, & of thy selfe wouldest meane well enough, but that thou hast had shrewd and subtile schoolemaisters, that haue seduced thee good poore simple soule, and therefore I pitie thee: and it were in deede pitie that thou shouldest be burnt, for thou art a good fellow, a tall man, and hast serued y^e King right well in his warres. I haue heard thee well commended, and thou art yet able to do the King as good seruice as euer thou wast, and we all will be a meane to his grace to be good and gracious Lord vnto thee, if thou wilt take pitie of thy selfe, and leaue thy errours. For I dare say for vs all, that be Commissioners, that we would be loth that thou should be cast away. For alas poore simple man, we perceiue thou hast bene seduced (I say) by others.

How sayest thou therefore? thou knowest my Lorde of Canterburies grace here is a good gentle Lord, and would be lothe thou shouldst be cast away. Tell me, canst thou be cōtent to submit thy selfe vnto him, and to stand vnto such order, as he and we shall take in this matter? How sayest thou man? speake. The poore man therewith falling vpon his knees, and sheeding teares, aunswered, speaking to the Archbishop of Canterbury in this wise: My good lord, for Christes sake be good vnto me, and I referre my selfe vnto your graces order, do with me what you please.

The Bishop of Canterbury, considering what daunger he was ready to fall in, & pitieng the same (though the simplicitie of y^e man was so great,* that he perceiued it not) sayd, nay Rafe Hare, stand vp, & aduise thy selfe, and commit not thy selfe to me, for I am but one man, and in Commission but as the other are, so that it lieth in me to do nothing. But if thou do commit thy selfe vnto all, then thou committest thy selfe vnto the law, and the law is ordained to do euery mā right. Go to Raph Hare, said Winchester, submit thy selfe to my Lord and vs: it is best for thee to doo so. Whereupon he fell vpon his knees again, and said: My Lordes and maisters all, I submitte my selfe wholly vnto you.* And therewithall a booke was holden him, and an oth geuen him to be obedient vnto them, and to all Ecclesiasticall lawes: and straightway he was enioyned to abiure, and to beare a fagot three seuerall dayes, & moreouer, the poore man lost the liuing that he had at Calice.

This simple man hearing his penance, piteously lamented, and earnestly at the firste denied to stande thereunto, with piteous exclamation, sayeng: O my Lord of Winchester, my Lorde of Winchester, haue you made me a logge ready to be layde vpon the fire, whensoever anye wicked man falsly of malice, by prouocation of the deuill, shall lay any small trifle to my charge? Or shall I be thus handled, nothing proued to my face against me? Alas, I haue alwayes hated errorrs and heresies. Content thy self Hare: there is now no remedy, thou must eyther do thy penance, or be burnt, sayd the Cōmissioners. Thus haue you heard how Ralph Hare did speede.

Then was Thomas Broke called for, against whome it was objected by some of the Counsels letters of Calice,* that he was a seditious fellow. Among these accusers besides the rest, was one Richard Long, an other Fraunces Hastings, men of armes, who charged y^e forenamed Tho. mas Broke, and one Geffray Loueday Esquire, for staying and mainteining the foresayde Adam Damlyp at Calice: as who had promised vnto him a stipend to preache such heresies and pernicious opinions, as afterwarde hee taught there: and that these two daily gathered many seuerall summes of money, for the entertainment of the said Adam. Howbeit, the foresaid Hastings failed in the prooffe thereof. For Loueday proued that he was viij. daies before Damlips comming to Calice, and during xiiij. daies continually after he began to preach, abiding at Paris, there occupied aboute necessary affaires of Charles Duke of Southfolke. And Broke during the sayde time, was at London daily attendant in the Parliament house, wherof he had enough to beare witnes, against y^e vntrue surmise.

After that, came three at once against the sayd Broke, well armed as they thought, who had not onely consulted together before of the matter,* and put it in writing at Calice, beside their conference and talke by the way keepyng company from thence hether, but also had obtained from the Lord Deputie and others of the Counsell, speciall letters as is aforesaid: and among other, one letter vnto the Bishop of Chichester, for the earnest and speedy furtherāce of the aduancement of their accusations against Brooke.

The first of these three was a young Gentleman lately brought vp vnder the said Brooke in the office of custome,* whose name was Edmund Payton.

The other was one Robert Poole, a man (as it was commonly reported) both base borne, and also such a one,* as in his youth for murthering a man with a clubbe in Bow lane in London, was faine by obtaining the Kings pardon, to saue his necke.

The third was one Tho. Boyse, who shewyng more honesty then the rest, affirmed not that he himselfe heard y^e sayd Broke speake any thing of that whiche was objected against him,* but iustified that either of the other two had stedfastly affirmed to him, that Broke had spoken vnto them those things heere vnder objected against him.

The yong man first objected againste the sayde Broke,* that he should say that the thing which the Priest vseth to hold vp ouer his head at Masse, is not the natural body of Iesu Christ: for if that were so, who so would, might haue their belly ful of Gods, their guts ful of Gods, and he that had lately receiued the Sacrament before he wente to the Sea, might happely vomit God vp againe on shypboord.

And thus much he brought ouer in writing wyth hym from Calice, and added thereto, as it should seeme, to exasperate the Commissioners and the rest of the Cleargy against him, certaine other heynous words spoken against Byshops and Priestes. Whiche wordes the sayd Broke there denied, confessing neuerthelesse that certaine priuate talke he had with him touching the Sacrament, wherein he shewed to the yong man the right vse of the same, concluding, that albeit with our mouthes we receyued very materiall bread and wine, yet by faith,* all Christian mē do receiue, eate, and drinke, to their great comfort and benefite, the very natural body and bloud of Christ, which was both borne of the virgine Mary, and suffered death on the Crosse for the remission of their sinnes: which most holye Sacrament, who so came vnworthely vnto, the same was so farre from the eating of Christes body and bloude, that all such (without hartie repentaunce) do eate their owne damnation. And to conclude with him in that priuate talk he told him, that if the grosse & vnlearned error of transubstantiation, were in deede matter of truth and sincere doctrine, then not only this should follow of it, that euery mā who would, might haue euerlasting life (for they might when they woulde receiue the outward Sacrament, seene with our eyes, whiche the Priestes call Christes naturall body, and who so eateth Christes body, and drinketh hys bloud, hath euerlasting lyfe, sayeth Christ) but also there should great absurdities follow therby, as whē a mā hapneth to go to the sea, hauing lately receiued the sacrament, he should put it ouer boorde, or do it on the hatches, & therfore exhorted the said Payton to leaue that grosse error.

The second accuser was Poole, who objected agaynste him, that about two yeares past, he himselfe dining wyth the sayd Brooke, with xv. or xvj. other honest men,* heard him thus say at the table, that the thing which the Priestes vse to hold vp ouer their heads, was not the very bodye and bloud of Christ, but a sacrament to put vs in remembrance thereof. Unto whose obiections the said Broke answered, that a man in mirth might well enough with charitie beshrewe suche a guest, as when he had dined wyth a man, could so lōg after remember to say him such a grace: and required of Poole, of whence the rest of the gwestes were. He aunswered they were of the towne all. Then inferred he, that he was sure Poole could as well remember some of their names which then were present, as freshly to keepe in mind (for so by oth vpon a booke he had af•irmed) euery word of the whole matter which he objected: but for that the matter was vtterly vntrue. Whereupon▪ Page 1226 the sayd Brooke desired their honours to consider the slendernes of his tale.

To be shorte, he with the rest of hys felowes, to witte, Rafe Hare, Coppen, and Iames the Barber, were for that time dismissed.

During the tyme while these four were thus in examination at London,* the other two, to witte, Syr William Smith preacher, and Iohn Butler, by commaundement were apprehended in Calyce, and bounde by suretie not to passe the gates of the towne of Calyce. In the whiche towne, the sayd Iohn Butler Commissary was accused by Rich. Thorpe and Ioh. Ford, souldiours of Calice, saiiing that he shoulde say,* that if the Sacrament of the aultar be fleshe, bloud, and bone, then there is good aqua vitae at Iohn Spisers. Upon which accusation the sayde Thorpe and Forde brought for recordes before the Counsaile of Calyce, Marraunt Haynes, Iohn Luckes, Harry Husson, and Harry Troste, all of the parish of Oye beside Calyce. Whereupon shortly after, the sayde Iohn Butler and Sir William Smith were sent for, and by one Swallow a purseuant, which set vp the other aforesaide, brought into England, vnto the house of the sayd Swallow, dwellyng by S. Iames, where the Kings maiestie lay at that tyme, and the next day being Thurseday, after dinner, Butler & Smith were brought to the starre chamber before the priuie Counsaile, where both sedition and heresie was objected against them: and after much talke, was sayde vnto them by the Lord Cromwell, that they should make theyr purgation by the lawe: And from thence by the foresayde Swallow they were sent to the Fleete.

The next day being Friday, after dinner, Butler and Smyth were sent for to come to Bathe place, where they were brought into the Chappell, there sitting D. Clarke, Byshop of Bathe, Doctour Sampson, then Byshop of Chichester, Doctour Repse, the Byshop of Norwich, who was a Monke, being fast a sleepe. Then was objected vnto Butler with great reuerence, the opprobrious wordes spoken against the blessed Sacramente, rehearsing (as is aforesayd) the articles.* Butler required to haue them in writing, and so woulde make aunswere in writing. The whiche they woulde not graunt him: and vpon that aunswere he stode. Then choler gathered in the Byshop of Chichester. The story were too long to write: yet part yee shall vnderstand.

Chichester found great fault that Butler made not lowe cursie, beeing stubborne and arrogant, as he said, and in fine, found fault with his shirt. Then turning him about, he called to his brother Bannester being present (that time dwelling in Pater noster Row) to make aunswere for the shirt. He said, I can make answeere for the shirt. No good aunswere saide Chichester. Forsooth, saide hee, the shirt is mine▪ I lent it him, because he brought none with him, for he was not permitted to haue any seruauant. A good aunswere sayd the Byshop of Bathe. Then Butler made lowe curtesie, and said, the shirt is answered. Then Chichester said, thou mockest vs. But he sayde no. And thus muche concerning that time.

¶The story of William Smyth.

Then after Butler, was Sir William Smith, Curate of our Lady Parish in Calice,* called before them, and charged in a manner with the same haynous errors and pernicious opinions, that were objected against the sayde Rafe Hare, and therto was added, that he had spoken and preached against our blessed Lady, against prayeng to Saints, against doing of good workes, and many other like things: and therewithall, one Richard Long, a man of armes of Calice, prooued against the said Sir Smyth, and y^e foresaid Brooke by an othe taken vpon a booke, that the sayd Smith and Brooke did eate flesh together in Lent in the sayd Brookes house. For a Millers boy, sayd hee, came into Brookes kitchen, and sawe halfe a Lambe lye a roasting at the fire. Where as the truth is, that the sayde Sir William Smith during all the Lent, came neuer once within the sayd Brookes house. And it is as true also, that the sayd Richard Long, vpon a displeasure taken with his wife, went shortly after out of his owne house, to the Iu•rie end of the hauen at Calice, where desperately he drowned himselfe,* not one boy, but many men, women, girles, and boyes seeing him miserably taken vp againe starke dead: all which lamented his pitifull ruine. A terrible example vnto all such as are ready to forswear themselves on a booke vpon malice, or whatsoever other cause it be: a thing in these dayes ouer rise euery where, and almost no where regarded as it ought to be.

¶The trouble of Iohn Butler.

There was also called before them sir Iohn Butler, then Commissary of Calice,* whom they would haue burdened with the maintenance, or (at y^e leastwise) sufferance, of the foresayd Adam Damlip, which preached so lōg time there, and was not by him punished. Who for his defence answered, that the Lord Deputie and the whole Counsell there so highly entertained, and so frendly vsed the said Damlyp, and with their owne presence & high commendations outwardly so allowed and cōmēded his doctrine, that it lay not in him to do otherwise thē he did: & therfore humbly besought their Lordships and other the Commissioners to be good vnto him. At whose handes, after long attendance geuen, he was discharged, & so returned home againe, being also dismissed of his Commissaryship.

The recantation of certayne Calyce men.

NOW to declare what order was taken with these foresayd Calycemen, it was appointed that sir W. Smith, Rafe Hare, Iames Cocke, and Iames Barber,* should be sent to Calice, there to abiure and to do penance. Where sir W. Smith was enioined to make the Sermon, Rafe Hare, Iames Cocke, and Iames Barber standyng wyth fagots vpō their shoulders. The Sermon was made in y^e market of Calice. Which being done, they went with their fagottes about the market place, the Drumme and Fife going before them, and then returning to the Commissioners with testimoniall of the same, they departed. Albeit in this recātation, the said W. Smith Curate of our Ladyes Church handled his Sermon after that sort, as in effect he denied nothing at all that he had before preached or taught, but yet it satisfied somewhat hys aduersaries malicious harts, in that it bare the name of a recantation, according to the Commissioners order, appointing him thus openly to preach, and so to depart the towne and marches.

As touching Iames Barber aforesayde, for so much as his dwelling was not at Calice,* but foure miles off from the towne, it was therfore enioyned him to beare his Fagot, not at Calice, but on the Saterday next following to stand in the market there, where he dwelled, with his Fagot vpon his shoulder, and the sayd Syr William Smyth likewise there preached as before.

And thus much concerning the firste Commission sente ouer to Calice to enquire vpon the heretickes there.

Another Commission sent ouer to Calice.

AFTER all these thynges done and past, the grudgyng mindes of the aduersaries yet were not satisfied, but still suggested new cōplaints to the Kings eares against the towne of Calice, making the king beleue,* that through new opinions the towne was so diuided, that it was in great daunger of the aduersary to be ouercome.

Whereupon shortly after, the weeke before Easter next folowing, other newe Commissioners were sent ouer by the King to Calice, to witte, the Earle of Sussex, Lorde great Chamberlaine, the Lord S. Iohn,* Sir Iohn Gage Knight, Sir Iohn Barker Knight, M. Layton, Clerke of the closet, and Doctor Currin, with speciall instructiōs besides signed by the Kings Maiesties owne hand: for his highnes had bene incensed once againe from the Counsell at Calice, that the towne was in perill through dissension,* and diuersitie of opinions. Upon their arriuall, M. Doct. Currin preached a notable Sermon, exhorting all men to charitie, hauing nothing in his mouth but charitie, charitie. But as it seemed afterwarde, such a burning charitie was in him and the rest of the Commissioners, that had not God pitied the innocencie of mens causes, there had a hundred bene burnt or hanged shortly after.

But it happened farre otherwise. For of the number of those accusers, four were by those Commissioners sent ouer into England, to witte, Clement Philpot, seruaunt to the Lorde Lisle, sir Edmund, Curate of our Ladyes Church, W. Touchet a Postmaister, Peter Bequet, of the which four,* Touchet and Bequet were sente to theyr places againe: the other two were drawne, hanged, and quartered at London. But contrary, of all them that were accused, there was not one that lost one heare of his head.

After the Sermon was done, on the morowe to witte, on Sherethurseday, all the Commissioners solemnely receiued the Sacramente. And at after noone, the Counsell were with the Commissioners, and after their consultation, tipped staues warned, aboue the number of foure score, so peruerse persons as the like were not in y^e towne Page 1227 or marches, to appeare on the morrow at viij. of the clocke before the Counsell at the Staple Inne, who at their appearance were commaunded vpon their allegiance, to present all such heretickes, schismatickes, and seditious persons, as they did know: and in no wise to doubt or dread so to do, for they shoulde haue great aduauntage thereby, yea they should haue eyther their linings,* or their goodes, and besides that, they shoulde haue greate thanks at the Kings Maiesties hand, and his honorable Counsell, and what frendship they of the Kings Counsell there coulde shew them. All that good Friday, euen till x. of the clocke at night, those wicked and malicious persons occupied their time in aunswering to diuers and sondry questions.

These things were not so secretly done, but they were bewrayed and came to honest mens knowledge. Whereupon such feare and distrust assaulted all men, that neighbour mistrusted neighbour, the maister the seruaunt, the seruaunt the maister, the husband the wife, the wife the husband,* and almost euery one the other, that lamentable it was to see how mourningly men and women went in the streetes, hanging downe their heads, shewing euident tokens of the anguish of their harts.

The second trouble of Thomas Brooke.

Vpon Easter Monday, one Hugh Councell an honest man, seruaunt to the sayd Brooke, was conuented before them, and by the space of xiiij. dayes, not suffered to returne to his maisters house, but kepte in custody, and many times examined vpon Articles and Interrogatories, in hope to haue found worthy matter, either of heresie or treason against the sayde Brooke: and the same daye that Brooke was committed to Warde, the sayde Hugh Councell was discharged.

The Wednesday in the Easter weeke, sundry Questes were charged by their othes to make inquisition for all maner of heresies, erroneous opinions and seditions, as a Quest of Aldermen, an other of men at armes, and an other of Constables and Uintners, an other of common Souldiours, and an other of Commoners.

And shortly after theyr presentments, on good Friday, there was conuented before the Commissioners, and straighte were sente to close prison,* Anthony Pickering Gentleman, Harry Tourney Gentleman, Syr George Darby Priest, Iohn Shepheard, William Pellam, William Keuerdale, Iohn Whitwoode, Iohn Boote, Roberte Clodder, Copen de Hane, & Mathew de Hound. Upon whome ran sundry brutes: Some said they should be hanged, some said burnt, some said hanged drawne and quartered, some said nailed to the Pillery: so that pitifull it was to see the lamentation that their wiues, their children, seruants, and frendes made secretly where they durst, for that they founde euery where words of discomfort, and no where of comfort, but still Inquisition was made.

The second trouble of William Steuens.

The foresayd William Steuens after hys returne from London aboue mētioned, besides many other Articles laid to him for religion, to y^e number of 40. or welnie, was by y^e Lord Deputie charged y^t he had stayed the foresaid Adam Damlip, hyred him to preache, and gaue him meate, drinke and lodging, cōming from the arrant traytor Cardinall Poole,* and suborned by him: and that he had receyued money of him, to the intent he should preach in Calice false & erroneous doctrine, wherby y^e towne being deuided & at contention within it selfe, might easely be ouercome & wonne by the Frenchmen. Whereunto the sayde Steuens aunswered, that whatsoeuer he had done vnto the sayd Adam Damlip, he had done it at the earnest request & commaundement of the sayd Lord Deputie. Whereupon, if it had bene treason in deede, he must haue bene more faultie.

Then the said William Steuens was againe the second time by the said Commissioners sent ouer into England, & clapt in the tower, & afterwarde, to wit, immediately after the said Commissioners repaire vnto the Kings highnes, y^e said Lord Deputy was sent for ouer, & likewise put into the Tower, where he continued a long time. And whē the Kings Maiestie minded to haue bene gracious vnto him, & to haue let him come forth, God tooke hym out of thys world, whose body resteth in y^e Tower, & his soule wth God, I trust,* in heauen, for he died very repentaunt. But y^e wicked Lady his wife immediately vpon his apprehensiō, fell distraught of minde, & so cōtinued many yeares after. God for his mercy, if she yet liue, geue her his grace to repent.

The second Monday after Easter, the foresayd Brooke was conuented before the Commissioners, and committed to close prison in the Mayors Gayle.

Then the Counsell of Calice, doubting lest there should not be any sedition or heresie proued against him, did call one George Bradway before them, who occupied y^e Contrrollers office in the custome house. This mā was kept in close prison, so as neither his wife then great with childe, nor any other his frends might repaire vnto him. Where, after y^t he had often times beene borne in hande, that there were diuers concealements come to light that were made by Brooke in the office of Custome, and y^t the said Bradway should be greeuously punished if he would acknowledge none of thē, nor burden y^e said Brooke with no kind of concealement: the poore simple man, hoping thereby to get release of his imprisonment, accused the sayd Brooke, that he had for a long time concealed foure grotes euery day for his Clarkes wages, & to that accusation they caused the simple man to set his owne hand before witnesses.

Wherevpon, after a day or two, the said Bradway greeued in his conscience for the same his most vntrue accusation, did with a knife enterprise to cut his own throte:* but God of his mercy so directed his wicked purpose, that the backe of his knife was towarde his wesande. Whereby though the wound were broad, yet he escaped with lyfe.* And as he gaue a grone with the sodaine paine that he felt, the Gayler came vp, and bereft him of the knife. But thorough the giltines of the false accusation, and shame of the world, the mā lost his wits, who then staring and dismaid was dismissed out of prison, and a long time after went in piteous case so dismayed about the streete, to the great impouerishing of him, his poore wife and familie.

This kynde of handling of the said Brooke, made all his frendes, but specially his wife, to be greatly afeard of the malice of his enemies: the rather also, for that all his goods and landes were ceised. And his wife thrust into the meanest place of all his house, with her children and family, the keyes of al y^e dores and chestes beside taken from her. Who for y^t she was rigorously entreated at sir Edward Ringleis hand, Controller of the Towne (an office of no small charge, though he knew not a B from a battledore, nor euer a letter of the booke) sayeng vnto her, that if she lyked not the roome, he woulde thrust her quite out of the dores: well Sir, sayd she, well, the Kings slaughter house had wrong when you were made a Gentleman, and with all speede she wrote a letter to the Lorde Cromwell,* therein discoursing how hardly and sore those poore mē were hādled, that were committed to ward and close prison, and that all men feared (what through the malice of their Papisticall enemies, and the great rigour and ignoraunt zeale of those that were in authoritie) they should shortly for their faith and consciences, being true men, and suche as reuerently feared God, be put to death, but chiefly her husband, who was yet more extremely handled then any other: So that, vnlesse his honour vouchsaued to be a meane to the Kings maiestie, that they with their causes might be sente ouer into England, they were but dead men.

Whereupon the said Lord Cromwell wrote speedely his letters vnto the Commissioners, declaring the kings maiesties pleasure and commaundement was, that the arrant traitour and hereticke Brooke,* with a dosen or twentye complices, should with their accusers be immediately sent ouer, that heere in Englād they might receiue their iudgement, and there at Calice to the great terrour of like offenders hereafter suffer according to their demerites.

Now by the tyme that the sayd Commissioners had receiued these letters, they had made out precepts for 8. or 9. score honest men more to be cast in prison. But these letters so appalled them, that they stayde, and afterwarde sent no moe to ward. But making then as diligent inquisition as was possible, to haue found some worthy matter againste those before named, whereby there might haue bene some colour, both of the Counsels greeuous complaintes, and of the Cōmissioners rigorous dealing, whē no such thing could fall out, because they would be assured y^t they should not go vnpunished, they first banished thē the towne and Marches of Calice with a Trumpet blowne, vnder paine of death, for a hundred yeare and a day if that one day had bene left out, all had bene marde, and then sent them backe to prison, staying them there vpon hope that the L. Cromwell should come into captiuitie sooner then he dyd.* But at last, to wit, on May day, they sente the xiiij. prisoners through the market, the sayd Brooke going before wyth yrons on his legges, as the chiefe captaine, the rest following him, two and two without yrons, vnto shipbord, & then were they all coupled in yrons two & two together. Where, because they were loth to go vnder the hatches. Sir Iohn Gage with a staffe smote some of them cruelly:.* Whereupon Anthony Pickering sayd vnto him, Syr, I besech you yet be as good vnto vs as you would be to your horses or dogs: let vs haue a litle aire that we be not smothered. Page 1228 Yet that request could not be obtained, but the hatches were put downe close, and they garded and kept with a great company of men, and so sailing forward, by Gods mercifull prouidence, were within 24. houres, at ancker before the Tower of London.

And when the Lord Cromwell vnderstoode they were come, he commaunded their yrons to be smit off at the Tower wharfe, and the prisoners to be brought vnto him.

When he saw them he smiled vpon them, stedfastly beholding each of them, and then sayde: Sirs, you must take payne for a time. Go your way to the Fleete, and submit your selues prisoners there,* and shortly you shall knowe more, so in deede they did, for that euening he sente them word they shoulde be of good cheere, for if God sent him life, they should shortly go home with as much honesty, as they came with shame.

Whilest these xiiij. persecuted men lay in the Fleete, and W. Steuens in the Tower, to wit, the xix. day of Iuly, an. 1541. the foresaid Lord Cromwell for treason layd agaynst him, was at Tower hill beheaded, as is before specified in his story, who made there a very Christian end. Then had the poore Calice men great cause to feare, if they had not altogether depēded on the mercifull prouidēce of their heauenly father, whose blessed will they knewe directed all things. But he in the midst of their deepe troubles and miseries so comforted them, that euen as the daungers and troubles increased, so likewise did their consolation & ioy in him, so farre forth, as Mathew de Hound, one of those xiiij. who was in trouble onely for that he heard Copen de Hall reade a Chapter of the new Testament,* and was as deepe in punishment, and in banishmente from his wife, children, and countrey, as the rest, got in shorte time suche instruction, that hauing therewith a soule and conscience fraughted ful of godly zeale vnto Gods glory, and the true doctrine of Christ, within a few monethes after his deliuerance out of the Fleete: for inueying constantly against the wicked honouring of images, & praying vnto Saints departed, was cruelly in a most cōstant faith and patience, burned in Flaunders.

Now therfore when all hope in man was past, the right honourable L. Audeley, lord Chancellor of Englād, without further examination,* discharged first the sayd 13. that were in the Fleete, and at length two yeares after, he deliuered W. Steuens also by the Kings owne motion, out of the Tower, saying at y^e discharging of those 13. sirs, pray for the Kings Maiestie, his pleasure is y^t you shall all bee presently discharged. And though your liuings be taken from you, yet despaire not: God wil not see you lacke. But for Gods sake sirs beware how you deale with popishe Priests: for, so God saue my soule, some of them be knaues all. Sirs, said he, I am commaunded by the counsaile to tell you,* that you are discharged by vertue of the kings generall pardon, but that pardon excepteth and forbiddeth all sacramentaries, and the most part, or all of you are called sacramentaries. Therefore I can not see how that pardon doth you any pleasure. But pray for the Kings highnesse, for his graces pleasure is, that I should dismisse you, and so I do, and pitie you all: Farewell sirs.

So geuing God most hartie thanks for his mightye and mercifull deliuering of them, they departed dismissed, as you haue heard,* being in deede in very poore estate: but not in so miserable state as all those eight Counsailours of Calice were within one yere and a halfe after. For wheras the other three Counsailers which semed more fauourable to them: to wit, the Lord Gray, sir George Carow, and sir Rich. Grinefield, which purged the towne of those sclaunders that vntruely were raysed vpon it,* and therfore for a time were in their princes high displeasure: within y^e yeare were al three in greater fauour then euer they were before, and that not without the reward of xx. pound by yeare to him & to his heires, who had least: the other eight Counsailours, vniustly charging them and the towne of sedition and heresie: to say, the Lord

Lisle, the Lord Sandes, Sir Iohn Wallop, sir Edward Rinsley, Rob. Fowler Esquier vice treasurer,* sir Tho. Palmer knight, called lōg Palmer, W. Simpson Esquier vndermarshall, & Ioh. Rockwod, were either greatly out of their Princes fauour, and in the Tower or els where prisoners, either els by very desperat deathes in outward appearance, taken out of this world: For tediousnes I will rehearse but only the horrible ende of the said Rockwood, the chiefe stirrer vp of all the afflictions afore spoken of: who euen to the last breath staring & raging, cried, he was vtterly damned: and being willed to aske God mercy,* who was ready to forgeue all that asked mercy of him, he braied & cried out, All too late, for I haue sought malitiously the deathes of a number of the honestest men in the towne, and though I so thought them in my hart, yet I did that lay in me to bring thē to an euil death: all too late therefore, all too late. Which same words he answered to one that at the departure of the xiiij. in yrons towards England, said: Sir, I neuer saw men of such honesty, so sharply corrected, & taking it so patiently and ioyfully. Rockwod thē fetching a friske or two, scoffingly answered: All too late. The vndermarshal sodenly fel downe in the Counsaile chamber, and neuer spake word after, nor shewed any token of remembrance. The plagues of the other also, as I am credibly infourmed, were little better.

The second apprehension and martyrdome of Adam Damlyp.

CONcerning Adam Damlip,* otherwise called George Bucker, ye heard before declared, page. 1223. how hee being conuented before the Bishops at Lambeth, and afterwarde secretly admonished, and hauing money geuen him by his freinds, to auoide, and not to appeare agayne before the Bishops: after hee had sente his allegations in writing vnto them, departed into the West cuntry, and there continued teaching a schoole a certaine space, about a yeare or two. After that, the good man was againe apprehended by the miserable inquisition of the sixe articles, and brought vp to London, where he was by Steuen Gardiner commaunded into the Marshalsey, and there lay the space of other two yeares or thereabout.

During the imprisonment of this George in the Marshalsey, Io. Marbecke (as partly ye heard before) also was cōmitted into the same prison, which was the morow after Palme sonday. The maner of that time so required, that at Easter euery person must nedes come to cōfessiō. Wherupon Marbecke with the rest of the prisoners there, was enforced to come vpō Easter day to sir George aforesaid,* to be confessed, who was then cōfessor to y^e whole house. By this occasion I. Marbecke, which had neuer sene him before, entring into cōference w^t him, perceiued what he was, what he had ben, what troubles he sustained, how long he had liue there in prison, by whō, & wherfore: who declared moreouer his mind to Marbecke, to y^e effect as foloweth: And now because, said he, I thinke they haue forgottē me,* I am fully minded to make my humble sute to the Bish. of Winchester, in an Epistle, declaring therein mine obediēce, humble submission, and earnest desire to come to examination. I know the woorst. I can but leese my life presente, which I had leuer do, then heere to remaine, and not to be suffered to vse my talent to Gods glory. Wherefore (God willing) I will surely put it in prooffe.

This Damlip for his honest and godly behauiour was beloued of all y^e whole house,* but specially of the keeper him selfe, whose name was Massy, whōe he always called master: and being suffred to go at liberty within y^e house whether he would, he did much good amōg the common & rascal sort of prisoners, in rebuking vice & sin, and kept them in such good order & awe, that the keeper thought himselfe to haue a great treasure of him. And no lesse also Marbeck himselſe confesseſeth, to haue found great cōfort by him. For notwithstanding y^e straight precept geuen by the Bish. of Winchester, that no man shoulde come to him,* nor hee to speake with any man: yet the sayde Adam manye tymes would finde the meanes to come and comfort him.

Now when he had made and drawne out hys Epistle, he deliuered the same to his maister the keeper,* vpō saterday in the morning, which was about the secōd weeke before Whitsonday folowing, desiring him to deliuer it at the Court to y^e B. of Winchester. The keeper said, he woulde, and so did. The Bish. what quicke speede he made for hys dispatch, I know not, but thus it fel out, as ye shall heare.

The keeper came home at night very late, and when the prisoners (which had taried supper for his comming) sawe him so sad and heauie, they deemed something to be amisse. At last the keeper casting vp his eyes vpon Syr George, sayd: O George, I can tell thee tidings. What is that maister, quoth he? Upon Monday next thou and I must goe to Calice. To Calice maister? What to do? I know not,* quoth the keeper, & pulled out of his purse a peece of waxe with a little labell of parchmēt hanging out thereat, which seemed to be a precept. And when Sir George saw it, hee sayde: well well Maister, nowe I knowe what the matter is, What, quoth the keeper? Truely maister I shall die in Calice. Nay, quoth the keeper, I trust it be not so. Yes, yes maister, it is most true, and I praise God for his goodnes therin. And so the keeper & they went together to supper with heauie cheere for sir George as they there called him. Who notwithstanding was mery himselſe,* & did eate his meate as well as euer he did in all his life: In so much that some at the boord sayd vnto him, that they marueyled how he could eate his meate so well, knowing hee was so neare his death. Ah maisters quoth he, do you thinke that Page 1229 I haue ben Gods prisoner so long in the Marshalsey, and haue not yet learned to dye? Yes, yes, and I doubt not but God will strengthen me therein. Ex litteris Ioa. Marbecki.

And so vpon Monday early in the morning before day, the keeper with in. other of the Knight Marshallles seruauents,* setting out of London, conueyed the sayde Adam Damlyp vnto Calice vpon the Ascension euen, and there committed him to the Maiors prison. Upon whiche daye Iohn Butler the Commissary aforesayd, and Syr Daniell his Curate of S. Peters, were also committed to the same prison, and commandement geuen no man to speake with Butler.

Upon Saterday next was the day of execution for Damlyp. The cause whiche firste they layd to his charge, was for heresie. But because by an acte of Parliamente, all suche offences done before a certayne daye, were pardoned (through which Acte he could not be burdened with anye thing that he had preached or taught before) yet for the receiuing of the foresayd French crowne of Cardinall Pole, (as you heard before) he was condemned of treason, and in Calice cruelly put to death, being drawne, hanged, and quartered.

[illustration]

The death and Martyrdome of Damlyp.

The daye before his execution, came vnto hym one M. Mote,* then person of our Lady Church of Calice, saying: your foure quarters shall be hanged at four partes of the towne. And where shall my head be, sayd Damlip? Upon the Lanterne gate, said Mote. Then Damlip answered,

Then shall I not neede to prouide for my buriall. At hys death, Sir Rafe Ellerker Knight, then knight Marshall there, would not suffer the innocent & godly mā, to declare either his faith, or the cause he died for, but sayd to the executioner, dispatch the knaue, haue done. For sir Wil. Mote appointed there to preache, declared to the people how he had bene a sower of seditious doctrine, and albeit he was for y^e pardoned by the generall pardon, yet he was cōdemned for being a traytor against the king. To the which whē Adam Damlip would haue replied & purged himselfe, the foresaid Sir Rafe Ellerker would not suffer him to speake a word, but commanded him to be had away. And so most meckely,* patiently, and ioyfully, the blessed and innocent Martyr tooke his death, sir Rafe Ellerker saying, that he would not away before he saw the traytors hart out. But shortly after the sayd Sir Rafe Ellerker in a skirmishe or roade betweene the Frenchmen and vs, at Bullayne was among other slayne.* Whose onely death sufficed not his enemies, but after they had stripped him starke naked, they cut off his priuie members, and cut the hart out of his bodye, and so leaft him a terrible example to all bloody and mercilesse men. For no cause was knowne, why they shewed such indignation against the saide sir Rafe Ellerker, more then against the rest, but that it is written: Faciens iustitias Dominus & iudicia omnibus iniuria pressis.

As touching Ioh. Butler, and sir Daniel his Curate, imprisoned (as ye heard) the same day with Damlip, vpon Sondag next following,* they were cōmitted to Io. Massy aforesayd, keeper of the Marshalsey, and his company, and brought to the Marshalsey, where he continued and his Curate nine moneths and more. At last being sore laid vnto by Sir George Gage, Sir Iohn Baker, and Sir Thomas Arundell knightes, but especially by Steuen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, for y^e reteining of Adam Damlip, yet by friendes soliciting the Kings highnes for him, (namely sir Leonard Musgraue, and his brother Baunster,* who were bounde for his appearance in a thousande pound) he at length by great labour and long time was discharged, and at last by licence permitted to returne to Calice againe. Ex scripto testimonio Caletiensium.

Furthermore, as touching William Steuens aboue mentioned, who remained all this while prisoner in the Tower,* the same was also condemned with Adam Damlip of treason, which was for note and crime of Popery, in lodging Adam Damlip, which came from Cardinal Poole the traytor, in his house, at the Lord Deputies commaundement. Notwithstanding the King afterwarde vnderstanding more of the said William Steuens, how innocent he was from that crime,* being knowne to all men to be an earnest and zelous Protestant, gaue him his pardon, and sent him home againe to Calice, and so likewise all the other thirteene aboue mentioned.

The story of a poore labouring man in Calyce.

BY the credible information & writing of the said Calyce men, which were then in trouble,* it is reported of a certaine poore laboring mā of Calice, who after the preaching of Adam Damlyp, being in certaine company, said, that he would neuer beleue, that a priest coulde make the Lordes body at his pleasure. Whereupon he was then accused, and also condemned by one Haruey Commissary there. Which Haruey in time of his iudgement inueying against hym, with opprobrious words, sayd, that he was an heretike, & should die a vile death. The poore man (whose name yet I haue not certainly learned) answering for himselfe againe, saide, that hee was no hereticke, but was in the fayth of Christ.* And where as thou sayest (said he) that I shall dye a vile death, thou thy selfe shalt dye a viler death, and that shortly, and so it came to passe: for within halfe a yeare after, the said Haruey was hanged, drawne, and quartered for treason in the sayd towne of Calice.

An other history of one Dodde a Scottish man, burned in Calice.

AFTER the burning of this poore man, there was also an other certayne scholer, counted to be a Scottish man,* named Dodde, who cōming out of Germany, was there taken with certayne Germane bookes about him, and being examined thereupon, and standing constantly to the truth that hee had learned, was therefore condemned to death, and there burned in the sayd towne of Calice, within the space of a yeare, or thereabout, after the other godly Martyr aboue mentioned.

And for so much as I am presently in hand wyth matters of Calice,* I can not passe from thence without memorie of an other certayne honest man of the same township, named William Button, aliâs Crosbowmaker, although the time of this story is a litle more anciēt in yeares: which story is this.

William Crosbowmaker, a souldier of Calice, and the kings seruant, being a man as some natures be,* somewhat pleasantly disposed, vsed when he met with Priests, to demaund of them certayne merry questions of pastyme, as these: Whether if a man were sodenly taken, and wanted an other thing, he might not without offence occupy one of the Popes pardons, in steede of a broken paper?

Another question was, whether in the world might better be wanting, dogs or priests. And if it were answered, that dogs might rather be spared: to that he woulde replie againe and inferre, that if there were no dogs, wee coulde make no moe, but if there lacked ignoraunt Priestes, we might soone, and too soone, make too many of them.

It happened that in the time of D. Darley, Parson of our Ladies Church in Calice, being Commissary there so: Archbishop Warham, there came a blacke Frier to Calice with the Popes pardons: who for iiij. d. would deliuer a soule out of Purgatory. The frier was full of romish vertues, for what money came for pardons by day, he bought no land with it at night. This foresayd William Button, aliâs Crosbowmaker, comming to the pardons, and pretending that he would deliuer his father & frends soules, Page 1230 asked if the holy father the Pope could deliuer soules out of purgatory? The frier said, there is no doubt of that. Why then, quoth Button, dooth he not of charitye deliuer all the soules thereout? Of which wordes he was accused to the Commissary, who at his appearing before the sayd Commissary, confessed to haue asked such questions. The Commissary being angrye thereat sayd: Doubtest thou thereof thou hereticke? There was standing by a blacke fryer named Capel, an English man, who sayd to the Commissary. There is Tenne thousand of these hereticke betwene Graueling and Trere. Button aunswered, Maister fryer of all men you may keepe silence. For your coat hath bene twice cut of from the fayth. The first time your order was enioyned to haue your blacke coat shorter thē your white, and for the second time your order must goe to the furthest part of their church,* and there sing an Antheme of our La'dy. The Commissarye at these wordes chafed, called Button hereticke, with many other opprobrious words. Thē sayd Button to the Commissary, if your holy father the Pope may deliuer soules out of purgatory, and wil not of charity deliuer them, thē I would to God the king would make me Pope, and I would surely deliuer all out without money.

At these wordes the Comissary raged, and reuiled Button exceedingly, causing him to beare a billet, & procured his wages (which was 6. d. a day) to be taken from him. Then went Button to the kinges maiesty, declaring all the whole matter to his grace, who sent him to Calice agayne, and gaue him after that 8, d. a day.

A notable example, wherin may appeare as well the despite of D. London, and other papistes agaynst the Gospellers, as also the fidelity of a matrone towards her husband.

FOR so much as mention was made a little before of D. London, we will somewhat more adde of him, because the matter seemeth neither impertinent nor vnfruitefull,* to the entent it maye more euidently appeare what trueth and trust is to be looked for of this cruell kinde of papists. This Doctor London was warden of the new Colledge in Oxford, where it happened that certayne plate was stolen and conueied,* and brought vp to London, and sold to a Goldsmith, named William Calaway. Thys Calaway was a man of good and honest name, and reputation amongst his neighbours,* but specially earnest and zelous towards the Gospell, and a great mayntainer therof. He had oftentimes before bought much plate of the same man without any peril or daunger, wherfore he doubted y^e lesse of his fidelity.

At the last the principall of the theft being taken, and the Goldsmith also that was the byer being knowne, D. London,* when he vnderstoode him to be a fauourer of the Gospel, wherof he was an extreme aduersary, began strait wayes to be in a rage, and to sweare grea• and deep othes that he woulde spare neither labour nor cost, but woulde bring the Goldsmith to the gallows, although it shoulde cost him fiue hundred pound. To be short this good goldsmith was arraigned as accessary, and an action of Felony brought agaynst him. He contrariwise alledged that they ought not to proceed agaynst him, the principall beyng alieue. D. London on the contrary part, affirmed that the principall was hanged: which was most false, for he was one of the same Colledge,* and was alieue, and but lately set at liberty. To be briefe, he being found gyilty, the Iudge asked him what he coulde alledge, why he should not dye? He required to haue the priuiledge of his booke, according to y^e aūcient custome and maner. But here it was objected agaynst him that he was Bigamus, and therfore he might not haue his booke by the lawe, notwithstanding that he neuer had two wiues,* but because his wife had two husbandes, it was imputed to him for Bigamia.

Thus this good Goldsmith being seclused from all hope of life, by the craftye spite of his malignant aduersaries: his wife beyng a woman of proued honesty and good fame,* came in before the Iudges, and perceiuing her former marriage to be hurtfull vnto her husband, to saue her husbandes life, she tooke an othe before the Iudges, that she was not Bigama, and that she was neuer married to moe men then to the sayd Goldsmith: and although she had children by her other husband, and continued diuers yeares with him, yet she sware that she was neuer married vnto him. Thus this woman by defaming of her selfe to her great praise,* and singuler example of loue, deliuered her innocent husband: thinking it better for her to lyue w^t ignominy and reproche, then for her husband to die, lesse esteming the losse of her good name, then of his life. Ez Ed. Hallo.

As touching the qualite of this facte or periury, I intermeddle not here to discusse, but leaue it at large to the iudgement of Lawyers to define vpon. Trueth it is, that periury neither in man nor woman is to be cōmmended, neither ought to be defended. But yet the true hart & faithfull loue betwene this man and his wife, counterpeasing agayne as much or more on the other side, the more rare & straūge I see it in many couples now a dayes, the more I thinke it worthy, not onely to be praised, but also for examples sake to be notified. But in the meane time, what shall we say to these priestes and aduersaries, who in such sorte violently do presse and force the poore sheepe of Christ with perill of theyr consciences vnto such periury, & that in such causes, where no such trueth is sought, but innocency oppressed, true religion persecuted, & only their spite & wrath agaynst Gods word wreaked.

During the time of these sixe articles aforesayd, which brought many good men vnto death: yet so it happened by another contrary acte sette forth before, for the kinges supremacy (as ye haue heard) that the contrary sect also of the Papistes was not all in quiet. For besides the death of Moore, and the Bishop of Rochester, and the other Charterhouse Monkes, Friers and Priestes aboue specified, about this year were also condemned and executed by the same law, two other,* of whom one was a Priest of Chelsey, named Larke, which was put to death at London for defending the B. of Romes supremacy, aboue the kynges authority. The other was Germaine Gardiner (nere kinsman to Steuen Gardiner, and yet more neare to his secret coūsell, as it is supposed) who likewise in practising for the Pope, agaynst the kings iurisdiction, was taken wyth the maner, and so brought vnto the Gibbet.

Upon the detection of this Germaine Gardiner being Secretary to Gardiner bishop of Winchester his kinsman it semed to some,* and so was also insinuated vnto the king not to be vnlike, but that the sayd Germain neither would nor durst euer attempt any such matter of popery, without some setting on, or consent of the Bishop, he being so nere vnto him, & to all his secrets as he was. Wherby the king began somewhat more to smell and misdoubt the doinges of the Bishop: but yet he so couertly and clearely conueyed his matters, playing vnder the boord, after his wonted fetches in such sort, as I can not tel how) still he kept in with the king, to the great inquietatiō of the publick state of the Realme, and especially of Christes Church.

In declaring the dreadfull lawe before set forthe of the sixe aycticles, which was, an. 1540. ye heard what penaltye was appoynted for the breach of the same, in like case as in treason & felony, so that no remedy of any recātatiō would serue.* This seueritye was a little mitigated by an other Parliament, holden afterward an. 1544. by the which parliament it was decreede, that such offenders which were conuict in the sayd articles, for the first time should be admitted to recant and renounce their opinions. And if the party refused to recant in such forme as should be layd vnto him by his Ordinary, or after his recantation,* if he eftsoones offended agayne, then for the second time he should be admitted to abiure, and beare a fagot. Which if he denyed to do or els being adiured, if he the third time offended, then he to susteine punishment according to the Lawe. &c. Although the straitnes & rigor of the former act was thus somewhat tempered, as ye see, and reformed by this presēt Parliament: yet notwithstanding the venome and poison of the errors and mischiefes of those articles remayned still behind not remoued, but rather confirmed by this Parliament aforesayd. By the which Parliament moreouer many thinges were prouided for the aduancement of Popery, vnder the coulour of religion: so that all maner of books of the old and new Testament, bearing the name of Will. Tindall, or any other hauing Prologues, or containing any matters, annotations, preambles, wordes, or sentēces contrary to the sixe articles, were debarred. In like maner all songs, playes, and Enterludes, with all other books in English, conteining matter of religion, tending any way agaynst the sayd articles were abolished.

In the which Parliament furthermore it was prouided, that the text of the new Testament or of the Bible, being prohibited to all women, artificers, prentises, iourneimen, seruimgmen, yeomen, husbandmen, and laborers, yet was permitted notwithstanding to noble men and gentle men, & gentlewomen to read and peruse, to their edifying so that they did it quietly without arguing, discussing, or expounding vpon the Scripture.

Ouer and besides,* wheras before the offender or defendaunt might not be suffered to bring in any witnesses to purge and try himself: In this Parliament it was permitted to the party detect, or complayned on, to try his cause by witnesses, as many, or mo in nūber, as the other which deposed agaynst him. &c.

Other qualifications of the acte of the sixe Articles.

AFTER this Parliament moreouer folowed an other parliament. an. 1545. wherein other qualifications▪ more speciall of the sixe articles were prouided: That where as before the cruell statute of the sixe articles was so strait, y^t if any of the kinges subiectes had bene cōplayned of by any maner of person, as wel being his enemy, as otherwise, he should be indicted presently vpon the same, without anye further examination or knowledge geuē to the party so ac^cused, & so thereupon to be attached, committed, and in fine to be condemned: it was therfore by this parliamēt prouided, that all such presentmentes and indictmentes shoulde not be brought before the Commissioners, otherwise then by the othes of xij. men or moe, of honesty and credit, without corruption or malice accordingly.

Item, that no such indictmentes or presentmentes should be taken, but within one yeare of the offences committed, eyther els the sayd indictmentes to stand voyd in the law.

Item, that no person accused vpon any such offence agaynst the sixe articles, should be attached, or committed to ward, before he were therof indicted, vnlesse by speciall warrant from the king &c.

Item, by the authority of the sayd Parliament it was considered and enacted, that if any preacher or reader, for any word spoken, supposed to be agaynst the sixe articles, shoulde be accused, not within the space of 40. dayes of the sayd his reading or preaching, then the partie accused to be acquitted.

Item, that the Iustices or inquirers of suche presentmentes should haue full power to alter and reforme all panelles of inquirie, returned before them, in like maner as the Iustices of peace may do in theyr Sessions, vpon any other inquiries-

Item, that the party so accused or indicted, vpon his tryall, may haue all manner of chalenges (peremptory onely excepted) as other persons arraigned for felony may haue, by the lawes of this realme.

*By these qualifications & moderatiōs of the 6. articles, it may appere that the king begā somewhat to grow out of fauor with Ste. Gardiner, & to discredit his doings, wherby he was y^e more forward to incline somewhat in furthering the desolate cause of religiō, as may appeare both by these premisses, & also by other prouisions & determinations of the foresayd parliament. an. 1545. wherein it was decreed by act of parliamēt, y^t the king should haue full power & authority to appoynt 32. persons, to wit 16. of y^e clergy, & 16. of the tēporalty, to peruse, ouersee, & examine the Canōs, cōstitutions & ordinaūces of y^e canon law, as well Prouinciall, as Synodall, & so, according to their discretions, to set & establish an order of ecclesiasticall lawes suche as should be thought by the king and them cōuenient to be receiued and vsed within this realm. Which statute as it is most needfull for the gouernement of the Church of England: so would God it had bene brought to perfection.

In this yere touching matters of histories, we read no great thing worthy of memory, but onely of two persons, Ioh, Athee, & I. Haywood. Of which two, we find first I. Athee to be indicted by the kings writ, for certayne words agaynst y^e sacramēt, which words in the indictmēt are specified to be these: that he would not beleue in y^e thing whiche y^e knaue priest made, neither in that which Longs wife selleth: but onely in God y^t is in heauen. And when it was told him that God through his word could make it flesh & bloud, he answered: so he might do if he would turne it into a chickens leg, meaning the sacrament of the aulter.

The same yere also folowed y^e recantation of Io. Heywood, who although he was tached for treasō, for denying the kings supremacy, yet vsing y^e clemency of y^e king, vpon his better reformatiō & amēdment, made an open & solēne recantation in y^e face of all the people, abandoning & renoūcing the Popes vsurped supremacy, & cōfessing of the king to be chiefe supreme head & gouernor of this church of England, al forein authority & iurisdiction being excluded. The tenor & effect of whose recantation here foloweth.

The recantation of Iohn Haywood.

I Am come hyther at this time, (good people) willing and of mine own disirous sute, to shew and declare vnto you briefly. First of all the great and inestimable clemency, and mercifulnesse of our moste soueraigne and redoubted Prince, the kinges Maiesty, the which his highnesse hath most graciously vsed towards me a wretch moste iustlye and worthely condemned to dye, for my manifolde and outrageous offences, haynously and trayterously committed agaynst his maiestye and his lawes. For wheras your maiestyes supremacy hath so often bene opened vnto me both by writing and speaking (if I had grace, either to open mine eies to see it, or mine eares to heare it) to be surely and certaynely grounded, and established vpon the very true worde of God. Yet for lacke of grace I haue moste wilfully and obstinately suffered my selfe to fall to suche blindnes, y^t I haue not onely thought y^t the bysh. of Rome hath bene and ought to be taken the chiefe and supream head of the vniuersall Church of Christ heare in earth, but also like no true subiect conceiled and fauored such as I haue knowne or thought to be of the opinion. For the which moste detestable treasons and vntruthes. I heare most humbly and with all my hart, first of all aske the kinges maiesty forgeuenesse, and secondarily of the world, beseeching all these that either now doe, or hereafter shall heare of these my great transgressions, to take this mine example for an instruction for them to call for grace, that they therby be stayd from falling at any time in such miserable blindnesse and folly.

Moreouer, here afore God and you (good Christian people) I do vtterly & withall my hart, recāt & reuoke all mine aforesayd erroneous and trayterous opinions. And (as my conscience now doth force) I protest that euē wyth my hart I firmly thinke and vndoubtedly beleue, that the Byshop of Rome neyther now hath, nor at any time hath had, or can haue by any law of God or man, any more authoritye without the precincte of his owne countrie about him, then any other Bishop hath within his owne dioces. Wherby I assuredly take the abolishing of the pretended and vsurped power or authority of the Byshop of Rome out of this Realme to be done iustly and truly by the law of God. And also I take our soueraigne Lord, the kinges highnesse to be supreme head immediatly next vnder Christ of the Church of England and Ireland, and all other his graces dominions, both of the spirituality & temporalty. And I confesse not onely that his maiesty so is by the law of God, but also his progenitours kinges of thys Realme so hath bene, and his highnesse heyres and sucessors kinges of this Realme so shall be.

Thus haue I shewed you my minde as well as I can but neither so well as I would, nor so full as I should, namely cōcerning the multitude of mercy which my most gracious prince hath shewed toward me, not onely for sauing my body after worthy cōdēnatiō to death as is aforesayd but also for sauing my soule frō perishing, if my body had perished before the receiuing of such wholesome councell as I had at his highnes most charitable assignement. And of this confession declared vnto you (I say as farre forth as I can.) I hartely pray you all to beare me record, and most entyrelly to pray almighty God, for the long and most prosperous estate of our soueraigne Lord the kinges Maiesty in all his affayres and procedings.

By me Iohn Heywood

Memorandū quod supra scripta assertio siue recātatio fuit fa|cta & publice emissa per prenommatum Iohannem Heiwood die dominica Sexto viz. die Iulij. An. Millessimo Quingentessimo Quadragesimo quarto, apud crucem paulinam tempore Concionis ibidem.

In this yeare of our Lord. 1545. as there was no other thing done in England worthy to be noted, so now the order of story here requireth by the course of yeares, next to infer the discourse of the troubles and persecutions which happened in Scotland, agaynst M. George Wysard, and diuers other good men of the same country, about the same yeare of our Lord. 1545. and somewhat before. But because now we are come to the latter ende almost of K. Henryes raygne, we will make an ende (the Lord willing) with a few other English storyes perteyning to that time: & that finished, so to set vpon those matters of Scotland, ioyning them whole together. The tractation whereof thou shalt see (good reader) in the latter end and closing vppe of this kinges raigne.

Kerby and Roger Clarke of Suffolke Martyrs.

COMming now to the yeare of our Lord.* 1546. first passing ouer the Priest, whose name was Saxye, which was hanged in the Porters lodge of Stephen Gardiner Bishoppe of Winchester, and that (as it is supposed) not without the consent of the sayd Bishop,* and the secret conspiracy of that bloody generation: to passe ouer also one Henry, with his seruauant burned at Colchester: I will now proceede to the story of Kerby and Roger Clarke of Mendessham, who were apprehended at Ipswiche. ann. 1546. the saterday before Gang monday, and brought before the Lord Wentworth, with other Commissioners appointed there to sit vpon theyr examinations, iudgemēts, Page 1232 and causes. The night before they were areyned, a bil was set vp vpon the townehouse doore (by whom,* it was vnknowne) and brought the next day vnto the Lord Wentworth: who aunswered, that it was good counsell. Whiche bill in the latter end shall appeare.

In the meane time Kerby & Roger beyng in the Gailers house, named I. Bird, an honest and a good man (who had checkes diuers times at the barre, that he was more meet to be kept, then to be a keeper) came in Mayster Robert Wingfielde, sonne and heyre of Humfrey Wingfielde knight) with M. Bruesse of Wennenham: who then hauing conference with Kerby (being then in a seuerall chāber separate frō the other) mayster Wingfeld sayd to Kerby:* Remember the fire is hot, take heed of thine enterprise that y^u take no more vpō thee thē thou shalt be able to performe. The terror is great, the payne will be extreme, and life is sweet. Better it were be time to stick to mercy, while there is hope of life, then rashly to begin, & then to shrink: with such like words of perswasion. To whom he answered agayne: Ah M. Wingfield, be at my burning, and you shall say,* there standeth a christen souldier in the fire. For I know that fire and water, sword, and all other thinges, are in the handes of God, and he will suffer no more to be layd vpon vs, then he will geue vs strength to beare. Ah Kerby, sayd mayster Wingfield, if thou be at that poynt, I will b••de thee farewell? For I promise thee I am not so strong, that I am able to burne. And so both the Gentlemen saying that they woulde pray for them, tooke handes with them, and so departed.

Now (first touching the behaiour of Kerby & Roger) when they came to the iudgement seate,* the Lorde Wentworth, with all the rest of the Iustices there readye, the Commissary also by vertue ex officio. sitting next to the L. Wentworth, but one betwene Kerby and Roger lifted vp theyr eyes and handes to heauen, with great deuotion in all mens eyes, making theyr prayers secretly to God for a space of time, whilst they might say the Lordes praier fiue or sixe times.

That done, theyr articles were declared vnto thē, with all circumstances of the law:* and then it was demaunded and enquired of them, whether they beleued, that after the wordes spoken by a priest (as Christ spake them to his Apostles) there were not the very body and bloud of Christ, flesh, bloud, and bone, as he was borne of the virgin Mary, and no bread after.

Unto the which wordes they answered and sayd, No, they did not so beleue: but that they did beleue the Sacrament which Christ Iesus did institute at his last supper,* on Maundy thursday at night to his disciples was onely to put all men in remembraunce of the precious death and bloud shedding for the remission of sinnes, and that there was neither flesh nor bloud to be eaten with the teeth, but bread and wine:* and yet more then bread and wine, for that it is consecrated to an holy vse. Then with much perswasions, both with fayre meanes and threatens besides (if it would haue serued) were these two poore men hardly layd to: but most at the handes of Foster an inferior Iustice, not being learned in such knowledge. But these two continued both saythful and content, chusing rather to dye then to liue, and so continued vnto the end.

Then sentence was geuen vpon them both, Kerby to be burned in the sayd towne the next Saterdag,* and Roger to be burned at Bury the Gang Monday after. Kerby when his iudgement was geuen by the Lord Wentworth, with most humble reuerēce holding vp his hands, and bowing himselfe deuoutly, sayd: Praysed be almighty God, and so stood still without any moe wordes.

Then did the Lord Wentworth talke secretly, putting his head behinde an other iustice that sate betweene them. The sayd Roger perceiuing that,* sayd with a loud voyce: Speake out my Lord, and if you haue done any thing contrary to your conscience, aske God mercy, and we for our partes do forgeue you: and speake not in secret, for ye shall come before a Iudge, and then make answere openly, euē he that shall iudge all men: with other like wordes.

The Lord Wentworth somewhat blushing, and chaūginge his countenaunce through remorse (as it was thought) sayd, I did speake nothing of you, nor I haue done nothing vnto you,* but as the Lawe is. Then was Kerby and Roger sent forth: Kerby to prison there, & Roger to saynt Edmundes Bury. The one of the two brusting out with a loud voyce (Roger as it is supposed) thus spake with a vehemency:*Fight (sayd he) for your God For he hath not long to continue.

The next day, which was Saterdag, about ten of the clocke, Kerby was brought to the market place, wheras a stake was ready,* wood, broome, and straw, and did of hys clothes vnto his shyrt, hauing a night cap vpon his dead, and so was fastened to the stake with yrons, there beyng in the galery, the Lord Wentworth, with the most part of all the Iustices of those quarters, where they might see his execution, how euery thing should be done, and also might heare what Kerby did say: and a great number of people, about two thousand by estimation.* There was also standing in the galery by the Lord Wentworth, D. Rugham, whiche was before a Monke of Burye and sexten of the house, hauing on a Surplis and a stoole about his necke. Then silence was proclaymed, and the sayd Doctour beganne to disable himselfe, as not meet to declare the holye Scriptures (being vnprouided because the time was so short) but that he hoped in Gods assistance it should come well to passe.

All this while Kerby was trimming with yrons and fagottes, broome, and straw,* as one that should be maryed with new garmentes, nothing chaunging cheare nor couētaunce, but with most meeke spirite gloryfied GOD: which was wonderfull to behold. Then Mayster Doctor at last entred into y^e sixt Chapter of S. Ioh. Who in handling that matter so oft as he alledged the Scriptures, and applyed them rightly. Kerby tolde the people, that he sayd true, and bade the people beleue him. But when he did otherwise, he tolde him agayne: You say not true: beleue him not good people.

Whereupon, as the voyce of the people was, they iudged Doctour Rugham a false Prophet. So when mayster Doctour had ended his collation, he sayde vnto Kerby: Thou good man, doest not thou beleue that the blessed sacrament of the aultar is the very flesh and bloud of Christ, and no bread euen as he was borne of the virgine Mary? Kerby aunswering boldly, sayd: I do not so beleue. How doest thou beleue, sayd the Doctour? Kerby sayd, I do beleue that in the Sacrament that Iesus Christ instituted at his last supper on Maundy Thursdaye to his Disciples (which ought of vs likewise to be done) is the death and passion, and his bloud shedding for the redemption of the world, to be remembred: and (as I sayde before) yet bread, and more then bread, for that it is cōsecrated to a holy vse.

Then was mayster Doctor in his dumpes, and spake not one word more to Kerby after.

Then sayd the vnder Shiriffe to Kerby, hast thou any thing more to say? Yea syr sayde he, if you wyll geue me leaue. Say on, sayd the Shiriffe.

Then Kerby taking his night cappe from hys head, put it vnder his arme, as though it should haue done him seruice agayne: but remembring him selfe,* he cast it from him, and lifting vp his handes, he sayd the Hymne, Te Deum, and the beliefe, with other prayers in the English tongue. The Lord Wentworth, whilest Kerby was thus doing, did shroude him selfe behinde one of the postes of the Gallery, and wept, and so did many other. Then said Kerby, I haue done: you may execute your office good Maister Shiriffe.

Then fire was set to the wood, and with loud voyce he called vnto God, knocking on his brest, and holding vppe

¶The burning and Martyrdome of Kerby.

*Page 1233 his handes so long as remembraunce would serue, and so ended his life, the people geuing shoutes, & praying God, with great admiration of his constancy, being so simple & vnlettered.

On the Gang Monday, an. 1546. about tenne of the clocke,* Roger Clarke of Mendelsham was brought out of prison and went on foote to the gate, called Southgate in Bury, and by the way the Procession mette with them, but he went on, and would not bow cap nor kne, but with most vehement words rebuked that idolatry and superstition,* the Officers being much offended. And without the gate, where as was the place of execution, the stake beyng ready, and the wood lying-by, he came and kneeled down, and sayd Magnificat in the English tongue, making as it were a Paraphrase vpon the same: Wherein he declared how that the blessed virgine Mary, who might as well reioyce in purenes, as any other, yet humbled her selfe to her Sauour.* And what sayst thou Iohn Baptist, sayd he, the greatest of all mens children? Behold the Lambe of God whiche taketh away the sinnes of the world. And thus with loude voyce he cried vnto the people while he was in fastning to the stake, & then the fire was set to him, wheras he suffered paines vnmercifully,* for the wood was greene and would not burne, so that he was choked with smoke: and moreouer being set in a pitch barrel, with some pitch sticking stil by the sides, was therewith sore payned, till he had got hys feet out of the barrell. And at length one standing by tooke a fagotte sticke, and striking at the ring of yron about hys necke, so pashed him, and stroke him belike vpon the head, that he shronk downe on the one side into the fire, & so was dissolved.

In the beginning of this story of Kerby and Roger, mention was made of a certayne Bill put vpon the towne house doore, and brought the nexte day to the Lord Wentworth: the wordes of which Bill were these.

¶The Byll set vpon the Townehouse dore in Ipswich.

IVstè iudicate filij hominum: yet when ye shall iudge, minister your iustice with mercy.*

A fearfull thing it is to fall into the hands of the liuing God: be ye learned therfore in true knowledge, ye y^t iudge the earth, least the Lord be agry with you.

The bloud of the righteous shall be required at your handes. What though the veile hanged before Moses face? yet at Christes death it fell downe.

The stones will speak, if these should hold theyr peace: therfore harden not your hartes agaynst the verity.

For fearefully shall the Lord appeare in the day of v̄geance to the troubled in conscience. No excuse shall there be of ignorance, but euery fat shall stand on his owne bottome. Therfore haue remorse to your conscience: feare him that may kill both body and soule.

Beware of innocent bloud shedding: take heed of iustice ignorantly ministred: worke discretely as the Scripture doth commaund: looke to it, that ye make not y^e trueth to be forsaken.

We beseech God to saue our king, king Henry the 8. that he be not lead into temptation. So be it.

This yeare also it was ordeined & decreed & solemnly geuen out in Proclamation by the kings name & authority and his Counsell, that the english Procession should be vsed throughout al England, according as it was set forth by his sayd counsell, and none other to be vsed throughout the whole Realme.

About the latter end of this yeare .1545. in the Moneth of Nouember, after that the king had subdued the Scots, and afterward ioyning together with the Emperour,* had inuaded France, and had got from them the town of Bollayn, he summoned his high Court of Parliament. In the which was graunted vnto him besides other subsidies of mony,* all Colledges, Chaūtries, free chappels, hospitals, fraternities, brotherhoodes, guildes, & perpetuities of stipēdary priestes, to be disposed at his wil & pleasure. Wher'vpon in the moneth of Decem. folowing,* the king after the wonted maner, came into the parliamēt house, to geue his roiall assent to such actes as were there passed: where after an eloquent Oration made to him by the Speaker,* he answering agayne vnto the same, not by the L. Chancellour (as the maner was) but by himselfe, vtred forth this oration word for word, as it is reported, and left in story.

In the contentes of whiche Oration, first eloquently and louingly he declared his gratefull hart to his louyng subiectes, for theyr grauntes and subuentions offered vnto him. In the second part, with no lesse vehemency he exhorteth them to concord, peace, and vnity. Whereunto if he had also ioyned the third part, that is, as in wordes he exhorted to vnity, so had begon in deed first himselfe to take away the occasion of deuision, disobedience, & disturbance frō his subiectes, that is, had remoued the stūbling blocke of the 6. articles out of the peoples way, which set brother agaynst brother, neighbour agaynst neighbor, the superior agaynst subiect, & the wolues to deuour the poore flocke of Christ: then had he not onely spoken, but also done like a worthy prince. But of this more shalbe sayd in the sequele hereof, God willing.

The kinges Oration in the Parliament house.

ALTHOUGH my Chauncellour for the time being,* hath before this time vsed, very eloquently and substantially to make answer to such Orations▪ as haue bene set forth in this high Court of Parliament: yet is he not so able to opē and set forth my mind and meaning, and the secretes of my hart, in so playne and ample maner, as I my selfe am and can doe. Wherefore I taking vpon me, to aunswere your eloquent Oration Mayster Speaker, say: that where you in the name of our welbeloued Commons, haue both praysed and extolled me, for the notable qualities that ye haue conceiued to be in me, I most hartely thanke you all, that you haue put mee in remembrance of my duety, which is to endeuer my selfe to obteine and get such excellent qualites, and necessary vertues, as a prince or gouernour should or ought to haue: of whiche giftes I recognise my selfe both bare and barayne.

But of such small qualities, as God hath endued me withall, I render to his goodnesse my most hūble thanks entending with all my wit and diligence, to gette and acquire to me such notable vertues and princely qualities as you haue alledged to be incorporate in my person.*

These thanks for your louing admonition and good counsell first remembred, I eftsoones thanke you agayne because that you considering our great charges (not for our pleasure, but for your defence, not for our gayne, but to our great cost) which we haue lately sustained, as well in defence of our & your enemies, as for the conquest of that Fortresse, whiche was to this Realme most displeasaunt and noysome, and shalbe by Gods grace hereafter, to our nation most profitable and pleasaunt, haue freely of your owne minde, graunted to vs a certayne subsidy here in an acte specified, which verely we take in good part, regarding more your kindnesse, then the profite therof as he that setteth more by your louing harts, then by your substance. Beside this harty kindnesse, I cannot a litle reioyce when I consider the perfect trust & sure confidence, which you haue put in me, as men hauing vndoubted hope, and vnfayned beliefe in my good doinges, & iust proceedings for that you, without my desire or request, haue cōmitted to mine order and disposition, all Chauntreys, Colledges, Hospitals, and other places specified, in a certayne acte, firmlye trusting that I will order them to the glory of God, & the profite of the common wealth. Surely,* if I contrary to your expectation, should suffer the Ministers of the Church to decay, or learning (which is so great a iewell) to be minished, or poore and miserable people to be vnrelieued you might say that I being put in so speciall a trust, as I am in this case, were no trusty frend to you, nor charitable man to mine euen Christen, neither a louer of the publique wealth, nor yet one that feared God, to whome account must be rendered of all our doinges. Doubte not I pray you but your expectation shalbe serued, more godly & goodly then you will wish or desire, as hereafter you shall playnely perceiue.

Now sithens I finde such kindnesse on your part toward me, I can not chuse, but loue and fauor you, affirming that no prince in the world more fauoureth his subiectes then I doe you, nor no subiectes or commons more loue and obey theyr soueraigne Lord, then I perceiue you doe me, for whose defence my treasure shall not be hidden, nor if necessitie require, my person shall not be vnaduentured. Yet although I with you, and you with me, be in this perfect loue and concord, this frendly amity can not cōtinue except both you my Lordes Temporall, and you my Lords Spirituall, and you my louing subiectes, studye and take payne to amend one thing, which is surely amisse and farre out of order, to the which I most hartely require you: which is, that charity & concord is not amongst you, but discord and dissention beareth rule in euery place. Saynt Paule sayth to the Corinthians, in the xiiij. Chapiter. Charity is gentle, Charity is not enuious, Charity is not proud, and so forth in the sayde Chapter. Beholde then what loue and * charitye is amongst you, when the one calleth the other Heretique and Anabaptist, and he calleth hym agayne Papist, Hypocrite, and Pharesey? Be these tokens of charity amongst you? Are these the signes of fraternall loue betweene you? No, no, I assure you, that this lacke of charitye amongst your selues, wil be the hinderaunce and asswaging the feruent loue betwene vs, as I sayd before, except this woud be <◇> , and clearely made whole. I must needes iudge the faulte and Page 1234 occasion of this discord,* to be partly by negligence of you the father, and preachers of the Spirituality. For if I know a man which liue•h in adultery, I must iudge him a lecherous & a carnall person. If I see a man boast and bragge himselfe, I can not but deeme him a proud man. I see and heare dayly, that you of the Clergye preach one agaynst an other, teach one contrary to an other, inueigh one agaynst an other, without charity or discretion. Some be to stiffe in their olde Mumpsimus, other be too busy and curious in their new Sumpsimus. Thus all men almost be in variety and discord, and few or none do preache truely and sincerely the word of GOD, according as they ought to doe. Shall I nowe iudge you charitable persons doing this? No, no: I can not so do. Alas how can the poore soules liue in concorde, when you preachers sowe amongst them in your Sermons, debate and discord? Of you they looke for light, and you bring them to darcknesse. Amend these crimes I exhort you, and set forth Gods * word, both by true preaching, and good example geuing, or els I whom God hath appoynted his Vicare, and high minister here, will see these diuisions extincte, and these enormities corrected, accordyng to my very duety, or els I am an vnprofitable seruant and vntrue officer.

Although (as I say) the Spirituall men be in some fault, that charity is not kept amongst you, yet you of the Temporalty bee not cleane and vnspotted of malice and enuye: for you rayle on Byshops, speake sclaunderously of Priestes, and rebuke and taunt preachers, both contrary to good order, and Christian fraternitie. If you know surely that a Bishop or preacher erreth, or teacheth peruerse doctrine, come and declare it to some of our Counsell, or to vs, to whom is committed by God the authority to reforme and order such causes and behauiors,* and be not iudges your selues, of your owne phantasticall opinions, and vayne expositions, for in such high causes ye may lightly erre. And although you be permitted to reade holy scripture, and to haue the worde of God in your mother tongue, you must vnderstand, that it is licenced you so to do, onely to informe your owne conscience, and to instruct your children and family, and not to dispute and make scripture a rayling and a taunting stocke agaynst priestes▪ and preachers as many light persons do. I am very sory to know and heare how vnreuerently that most precious iewel the word of God is disputed, rymed, * song & iangled in euery Alehouse and Tauerne, contrary to the true meaning and doctrine of the same. And yet I am euen as muche sory,* that the readers of the same folow it in doing so faintly & coldly. For of this I am sure, that charity was neuer so faynt amongst you, & vertuous & * godly liuing was neuer less vsed, nor god himselfe amongst Christians was neuer lesse reuerenced, honored, or serued▪ Therefore, as I sayde before, be in charitye one with an other, like brother and brother. Loue, dread, and serue God (to the which I as your supreme head and soueraigne Lord exhort and require you) and then I doubt not, but that loue and league that I spake of in the beginning, shall neuer be dissolved or broken betwene vs. And as touching the lawes, which be now made and concluded, I exhort you the makers, to be as diligent in putting them in execution, as you were in making & furthering the same, or els your labour shall be in vayne, & your cōmon wealth nothing relieued.

Notes vpon the foresayd exhortation.

*Princes which exhort to concorde and charitie, doe well, but Princes which seeke out the causes of discord, & reforme the same, do much better: The papist and protestant Hereticke, and Pharisee, the old Mumpsimus, and the newe Sumpsimus, be te•mes of variance and dissention, and be (I graunt) Symptomata, of a sore wound in the commō wealth but he that will amend this wound must first beginne to search out the causes, and to purge the occasion thereof: otherwise to cure the sore outwardlye, whiche inwardlye doth fester and ranckle still, it is but vayne.

The roote and ground of al this greeuance riseth here of the prelates and clergy of Rome, seeking as it seemeth altogether after riches, pompe, & honour of this world, to mayntayn y^e same vnder pretence of religion, doe in verye deed subuert religiō, vnder y^e title of the church, they bring into the churche manifest errours, & absurdities intollerable, who pretending to be fathers of the churche, if they transgressed but in maners and lightnes of life, or neglygence of gouernement, they might be borne withall for peace & concords sake, and here modesty, ciuillitie, quietnes vnitie, & charitie, might haue place amongst modest natures. But now they obscure the glory of the sonne of God, which in no case ought to be suffered: they extinct the light & grace of the Gospell: they clogge mens consciences: they set vp Idolatry, & mayntayn Idols, they bring in false inuocation, they restrayne lawfull matrimonye, whereby groweth filthy pollution, adultery, and whoredome in the Church vnspeakable, they corrupt the sacramentes: they wrast the scripture as worldly purposes, they kill and per'secute Gods people. Briefly theyr doctrine is damnable: theyr lawes be impious, their doinges are detestable. And yet after all this, they crept craftely into the hartes of princes vnder the title of the Church, & coulour of concord, making kinges and princes beleue that all be hereticke and schismaticke, which will not be subiect to their ordinary power. Now almighty God, who is a ielous God, & not suffering the glory of his sonne to be defaced, nor his truth to be troden vnder foot, stirreth vp againe the harts of his people to vnderstād his truth & to defend his cause. Whervpō of those two partes, as two mighty flintes thus smiting together cōmeth out the sparcke of this diuisiō, which by no wise can be quenched, but that one part must nedes yeld & geue ouer. There is no neutrality, nor mediatiō of peace, nor exhortation to agremēt that will serue betwene these two contrary doctrines, but either the Popes errors must geue place to Gods word, or els the veritye of God must geue place vnto them.

Wherefore, as the good intent and plausible Oration of the king in this behalf, was not to be discommended in exhorting his subiectes to charity: so had he much more deserued commendation if he hadde sought the right way to worke charity, & to helpe innocency amongst his subiects, by taking away the impious law of the 6. articles, the mother of all diuision and manslaughter. For what is this to the purpose, to exhort in wordes neuer so much to charity, and in deed to geue a knife to the murtherers hand, to run vpon his naked brother, which neither in conscience can leaue his cause, nor yet hath power to defend himselfe? As by experience here foloweth to be seene, what charity ensued after this exhortation of the king to charity, by the racking and burning of good Anne Askew, with 3. other poore subiectes of the king, within halfe a yeare after: whereof shortly you shall heare more declared.

When these Chauntries and colledges thus by Acte of Parliamēt wert geuen into the kings hands as is aboue remembred: which was about the moneth of Decēber, an. 1545. the next Lent following D. Crome preaching in the Mercers chappel, among other reasons and persuatiōs to rouse the people from the vayn opinion of Purgatory, inferred this grounding vpon the sayd act of parliamēt: that if Trentals and Chauntry masses could auayle the soules in Purgatory, then did the Parliament not wel in geuing away Monasteryes, Colledges, & chaūtries, which serued principally to that purpose. But if the parliament did wel (as no mā could deny) in dissolving them,* and bestowing the same vpon the king, then is it a playne case, that such Chauntries and priuate masses do nothing conferre to relieue them in Purgatory. This dilemma of D. Crome, no doubt, was insoluble.* But notwithstāding the charitable Prelates, for all the kinges late exhortation vnto charity, were so charitable to him, that on Easter next they broght him Coram nobis,* where they so handled him y^t they made him to recant. And if he had not, they would haue dissolved him & his argument in burning fire, so burning hote was theyr charity according as they burned Anne Askew and her fellowes in the moneth of Iulye the yeare folowing.* Whose tragickall story and cruell handling now consequētly (the Lord willing) you shall heare.

¶The first examination of Mistres Anne Askew, before the inquisitours. 1545.

TO satisfy your expectation:* good people (sayth she) this was my first examination in the yeare of our Lorde. 1545. and in the in the month of March.

First Christoph. Dare examined me at Sadlers Hall,* being one of the Quest, and asked if I did not beleeeue that the sacrament, hanging ouer the altar, was the very bodye of Christ really. Then I demaunded this question of hym:* wherfore S. Stephen was stoned to death, and he sayd, he could not tell. Then I answered, that no more woulde I assoyle his vayne question.

Secondly, he sayd that there was a woman,* which did testifie that I shoulde read, howe God was not in Temples made with handes. Then I shewed him the 7. and 17 chap. of the actes of the Apostles, what Stephen and paule had said therein. Wherupon he asked me how I took those sentences? I answered, I would not throw pearles amōg swine, for Acornes were good enough.*

Thirstly, he asked me wherfore I sayde that I had rather to read fiue lines in the Bible, then to heare 5. Masses in the temple? I confessed, that I sayd no lesse: not for the disprayse of either y^e epistle or the Gospel, but because y^e one Page 1235 did greatly edify me, and the other nothing at all. As S. Paul doth witnes in the 14. chap. of his first epistle to the Cor. where as he sayth.* I the trumpet geueth an vncertayne sound, who will prepare himselfe to the battell?

Fourthly: he sayd vnto my charge that I should say: if an ill priest ministred,* it was the deuill and not God.

My answeere was, that I neuer spake any such thyng. But this was my saying:* that whosoeuer he were that mi'nistred vnto me, his il cōditiōs could not hurt my faith, but in spirit I receiued neuertheles, y^e body & bloud of Christ.

He asked me what I said concerning confession? I answered him my meaning, which was as S. James sayth, that eu•ry man ought to knowledge his faultes to other, and the one to pray for the other.

Sixtly, he asked me what I sayd to the kinges booke? And I aunswered him, that I coulde say nothing to it, because I neuer saw it.

Seuēthly, he asked me if I had the spirit of God in me? I answered,* if I had not, I was but a reprobate or cast away. Then he sayd he had sent for a priest to examine me, which was here at hand.

The priest asked me what I sayd to the Sacrament of the aulter,* & required much to know therein my meaning. But I desired him againe, to hold me excused concerning that matter. None other answere would I make him, because I perceiued him to be a papist.

*Eightly he asked me, if I did not thinke that priuate masses did helpe soules departed? I sayd, it was great idolatry to beleue more in thē, then in the death which Christ dyed for vs.

*Then they had me thence vnto my L. Maior, and he ex'aminēd me, as they had before, and I answered him directly in all thinges as I aunswered the Quest before. Besides this my L. Maior layd one thing to my charge, whiche was neuer spokē of me, but of them: & that was, whether a mouse eating the host, receiued God or no? This question did I neuer ask, but in deede they asked it of me, whereunto I made them no aunswere but smiled.

Then the Bishops Chauncellor rebuked me and sayd, y^t I was much to blame for vttring the scriptures. For S. Paul (he sayd) for•ode women to speake,* or to talke of the word of God. I answered him that I knew Paules meaning as well as he, which is in the 1. Corin. 14. that a woman ought not to speak in the congregation by the way of teaching. And thē I asked him, how many women he had seene go into the Pulpit and preach? He sayd he neuer saw none. Then I sayd, he ought to finde no fault in poore women, except they had offended the law.

Then the L. Maior commaunded me to warde, I asked him if sureties would not serue me, and he made me short answere,* that he would take none. Then was I had to the Counter, and there remayned xi. dayes, no frend admitted to speak with me. But in the mean time there was a priest sent to me, which sayd that he was commaunded of the Bishop to examine me, and to geue me good counsell, which he did not.* But first he asked me for what cause I was put in the Counter, and I told him, I could not tell. Then he sayd it was great pity that I should be there w^tout cause, and concluded that he was very sory for me.

Secondly he sayd, it was told him, that I should deny the Sacrament of the aulter. And I aunswered agayne that, that I haue sayd, I haue sayd.

Thirdly he asked me if I were shriuen, I tolde him, so that I might haue one of these three, that is to say, Doctor Crome, Syr Gillam, or Huntington. I was contented be cause I knew them to be men of wisdomē, as for you or any other I will not dispraise, because I knowe you not. Then he sayd, I would not haue you thinke, but that I, or an other y^t shall be brought you, shall be as honest as they, for if we were not, you may be sure the king would not suffer vs to preach. Then I aunswered by the saying of Salomon. By communing with the wise, I may learne wisdomē,* But by talking with a foole, I shall take scathe. pro.

Fourthly he asked, if the host should fall, and a Beaste did eate it, whether the beast did receiue God or no? I answered,* seing you haue taken the paynes to aske y^e questiō I desire you also to assoyle it your selfe: for I will not doe it, because I perceiue you come to tempt me. And he said, it was agaynst the order of scholes, y^t he which asked the que'stion, should answeere it, I told him, I was but a woman, and knew not the course of scholes.

Fiftly he asked me, if I entended to receiue the Sacrament at Easter, or no? I aunswered, that els I were no Christen woman, and thereat I did reioyce, that the time was so neare at hand,* and then he departed thence wyth many fayre wordes.

The xxiiij. day of March, my coosin Britaine came into the Counter vnto me, and asked me whether I might bee put to bayle, or no? Thē went he immediately vnto my L. Mayor, desiring of him to be so good vnto me. That I might be bayled. My Lord aunswered him, and sayd that he would be glad to doe the best that in him say. How be it he could not bayle me, without the consent of a spiritual officer: requiring him to go & speak with the Chauncellor of London. For he sayde, like as he could not committe me to prison without the consent of a spirituall Officer, no more could he bayle me without the consent of the same.

So vpon that, he went to the Chaūcellor, requiring of him as he did before of my Lord Maior. He answered him the that matter was so haynous,* that he durst not of him selfe do it, without my Lord of London were made priuy thereunto. But he sayd he would speake vnto my Lord in it, & badde him repayre vnto him the nexte morow, and he should wel know my Lords pleasure: And vpon the morrow after, he came thither, and spake both with the Chaūcellor, & with the Bishop of Londō. The Bishop declared vnto him, that he was very well contented that I should come forth to a communication, & appoynted me to appere before him the next day after, at 3, of the clock at afternoone. Moreouer, he sayd vnto him, that he would, there shold be at the examination such learned men as I was affectioned to, that they might see, & also make report that I was hādled with no rigor. He answered him that he knew no man that I had more affection to, then to other. Then sayd the Byshop: yes as I vnderstand, she is affectioned to Doct. Crome, Syr Guillam, Whitehead, & Huntingtō that they might heare the matter:* for she did know thē to be learned & of a godly iudgemēt. Also he required my co•in Britayn, that he should earnestly perswade me to vtter euē the very bottome of my hart: and he sware by his fidelitie, that no man should take any aduantage of my words: neyther yet would he lay ought to my charge for any thing y^t I should there speake: but if I sayde any maner of thing amisse, he with other more would be glad to reforme me therin, with most godly counsell.

On the morow after, the Bishop of Londō sent for me, at one of the clocke, his houre being appoynted at three, & as I came before him,* he said he was very sory of my trouble, & desired to know my opiniō in such matters as were layd against me. He required me also in any wise boldly to vtter the secrets of my hart, bidding me not to feare in any poynt, for whatsoever I did say in his house, no mā should hurt me for it. I answered: forsomuch as your lordship appoynted three of the clocke, & my frendes shall not come til that houre, I desire you to pardō me of geuing answeere til they come. Thē sayd he, that he thought it meet to send for those 4. men which were afore named & appointed. Thē I desired him not to put them to the payne, for it should not need, because the two gentlemen which were my frendes were able enough to testify that I should say. Anone after he went into his gallery with M. Spilman, & willed him in any wise that he shoulde exhorte me to vtter all that I thought.* In the meane while he cōmaunded his Archdeacon to cōmon with me, who sayd vnto me: Mistres wherfore are you accused & thus troubled here before y^e Bishop? To whom I answered agayne and sayd: Syr, aske I pray you my accusers, for I know not as yet. Thē tooke he my booke out of my hand, and sayd: such bookes as this, haue brought you to the trouble you are in. Beware (sayth he) beware, for he that made this booke and was the author therof, was an hereticke I warrant you, & burnt in smithfield. Then I asked him, if he were certayne and sure, that it was true that he had spoken. And he sayd he knew well the booke was of I. Frithes making. Then I asked him if he were not ashamed for to iudge of the booke before he saw it within, or yet knew the truth therof. I said also,* that such vnaduised and hasty iudgement is a token apparant of a very slender wit. Then I opened the booke & shewed it him. He said he thought it had bene an other, for he could finde no fault therein. Then I desired him no more to bee so vnadvisedly rash & swift in iudgement, till he throughly knew the truth, and so he departed from me.

Immediately after came my cosin Britaine in with dyuers other, as M. Hall of Grayes Inne, & such other like. Then my Lord of London perswaded my cosine Britaine as he had done oft before, which was that I shoulde vtter y^e bottom of my hart in any wise.* My Lord said after y^t vnto me, that he would I should credite the counsaile of such as were my frendes and wel willers in this behalf, which was, that I should vtter all thinges that burdened my cōscience: for he ensured me that I shoulde not neede to stand in doubt to say any thing. For like as he promised them (he said) he promised me & would performe it: which was that neither he nor any man for him, should take me at aduauntage of any word I should speake: and therefore he had me say my minde without feare. I aunswered him that I had Page 1236 nought to say: for my conscience (I thanked God) was burdened with nothing.

Then brought he forth this vnsauery similitude: that if a man had a wound, no wise Surgeon would minister helpe vnto it before he had seene it vncovered.* In like case saith he, can I geue you no good counsaile, vnles I know wherwith your conscience is burdened. I answered, that my conscience was cleare in all things: & for to lay a plaister vnto the whole skin, it might appeare much folly.

Then you driue me (saith he) to lay to your charge your own report,* which is this: you did say, he that doth receue the Sacrament by the hands of an ill priest, or a sinner, receiueth the deuil and not God. To that I aunswered, that I neuer spake such words. But as I said afore, both to the Quest and to my Lord Mayor, so say I now agayne, that the wickednes of the priest should not hurt me, but in spirit and fayth, I receiued no lesse then the body and bloude of Christ. Then sayd the Byshop vnto me, what saying is this in spirite? I will not take you at the aduauntage. Then I answered: my Lord without fayth and spirite, I cannot receiue him worthily.

*Then he sayd vnto me, that I should say that the Sacrament remayning in the pixe, was but bread. I answered that I neuer said so, but in deede the Quest asked me such a question, whereunto I would not answer (I sayd) till such tyme as they had assoled me this questiō of mine, wherfore Stephen was stoned to death? They sayd they knew not. Then sayd I againe, no more would I tell thē, what it was.

Then said my Lord vnto me, that I had alledged a certain text of the scripture.* I answered that I alledged none other but S. Paules owne saieng to the Athenians in the xviiij. chap. in the Apostles acts, that God dwelleth not in Temples made with hands. Then asked he me what my fayth and beliefe was in that matter? I aunswered him, I beleue as the Scripture doth teach me.

Then inquired he of me, what if the Scripture doe say that it is the body of Christ? I beleue sayd I, as the scripture doth teach me.* Then asked he agayne, what if the scripture do say that it is not the body of Christ? My aunswer was still, I beleue as the scripture informeth me. And vpon this argument he taried a great while, to haue driuen me to make him an aunswere to his mynde. Howbeit I would not: but concluded this with him, that I beleue therin and in all other things as Christ and his holy apostles did leaue them.

Then he asked me why I had so few wordes? And I answered,* God hath geuen me the gift of knowledge, but not of vtterance. And Salomon saith: That a woman of few wordes is a gift of God. Prou. xix.

Fiftly, my Lord laid vnto my charge, that I should saye that the Masse was superstitious,* wicked, & no better then idolatry. I aunswered him no: I said not so. Howbeit I say the quest did aske me whether priuate masse did relieue soules departed or no? Unto whom then I answered: O Lord what idolatry is this, that we should rather beleue in priuate masses, then in the healthsome death of the dere sonne of God? Then said my Lord againe: what an aunswer is that? though it be but meane (sayd I) yet it is good enough for the question.

Then I told my Lord that there was a priest, which did heare what I said there before my L. Mayor & them. With that the Chancellor answered, which was the same Priest. So she spake it in very deede (sayth he) before my L. Maior and me.

Then were there certaine Priests, as D. Standish and other, which tempted me much to know my mind. And I answered them alwayes thus: that I sayd to my Lorde of London, I haue said. Then D. Standish desired my Lord to bid me say my mynd concernyng the same text of Saint Paules learning,* that I being a woman, should interpret the Scriptures, specially, where so many wise learned men were.

Then my L. of London sayd he was informed, that one should aske of me if I would receiue the sacrament at Easter, and I made a mocke of it. Then I desired that myne accuser might come forth,* which my L. would not. But he said agayne vnto me, I sent one to geue you good counsell, and at the first worde you called him Papist. That I denied not, for I perceiued he was no lesse: yet made I hym none answer vnto it.

Then he rebuked me, and sayd that I should reporte, that there were bent against me threescore priests at Lincolne.* In deed (quoth I) I sayd so. For my friendes tolde me, if I did come to Lincolne, the priests would assault me and put me to great trouble, as therof they had made their boast: and when I heard it, I went thither in deede, not being afraid, because I knew my matter to be good. More ouer, I remained there ix. dayes to see what would be said vnto me. And as I was in the Minster reading vpon the Bible, they resorted vnto me by ij. and by ij. by v. and by vj. minding to haue spoken vnto me, yet went they theyr wayes agayne without wordes speaking.

Then my L. asked, if there were not one that did speak vnto me. I told him yes, that there was one of them at the last, which did speake to me in deed. And my L. then asked me what he sayd? And I told him his words were of smal effect, so that I did not now remember them: Then sayde my L. there are many that read and know the scripture, & yet follow it not, nor liue thereafter. I said againe,* my L. I would wish that all men knew my conuersation & liuyng in all points, for I am sure of my selfe this houre y^t there are none able to proue any dishonesty by me. If you know any that can do it, I pray you bring them forth.

Then my L. went away, and said he would entitle some what of my meaning, and so he wrote a great circumstāce. But what it was, I haue not all in memory, for he would not suffer me to haue the copy therof. Onely do I remember this small portion of it.

Be it knowen (saith he) of all men,* that I Anne Askew do confesse this to be my faith and beliefe, notwithstanding my reportes made afore to the contrary. I beleue that they which are houseled at the hands of a Priest, whether hys conuersation be good or not, do receiue the body and bloud of Christ in substance really. Also I do beleue, that after the consecration, whether it be receiued or reserued, it is no lesse then the very body and bloud of Christ in substance. Finally I do beleue in this and in all other Sacraments of holy Church, in all pointes according to the old Catholike faith of the same. In witnes wherof I the sayde Anne haue subscribed my name.

There was somewhat more in it, which because I had not the copy, I cannot now remember. Then he read it to me and asked me if I did agree to it. And I sayd againe, I beleue so much therof, as the holy scripture doth agree vnto: wherefore I desire you, that ye will adde that therunto. Then he answered,* that I should not teach hym what he should write. With that, he went forth into his great chamber, and read the same Bil before the audience, which enueigled and willed me to set to my hād, saieng also, that I had fauour shewed me. Then sayd the B. I might thāke other, and not my selfe, of the fauour that I found at hys hand: for he considered (he sayd) that I had good frendes, and also that I was come of a worshipfull stocke.

Then answered one Christopher, a seruant to M. Dennie: Rather ought you (my L.) to haue done it in such case for Gods sake then for mans. Then my L. sate down, and tooke me the writing to set therto my hand, and I writ after this maner: I Anne Askew do beleue all maner things contained in the faith of the catholike church.

And for as much as mention here is made of the writyng of Boner,*which this godly woman sayd before she had not in memory, therefore I thought in this place to inferre the same, both with the whole circumstance of Boner, and with the title thereunto prefixed by the Register, and also with her owne subscription: to the intent the Reader seyng the same subscription, neyther to agree with the tyme of the title aboue prefixed, nor with the subscription after the writing annexed, might the better vnderstand thereby what credite is to be geuen hereafter to suche Byshops, and to such Registers. The tenour of Boners writyng proceedeth thus.

The true copy of the confession and beliefe of Anne Askew, otherwise called Anne Kime, made before the B. of London, the xx. day of March, in the yere of our lord God after the computation of the Church of England, 1545. and subscribed with her owne hand, in the presence of the •ayd B. and other, whose names hereafter are recited, set forth and published at this present, to the entent the world may see what credence is now to be geuen vnto the same woman, who in so short a tyme hath most damnably altered and changed her opinion and beliefe,* & therefore rightfully in open court arraigned and condemned, Ex Regist.

BE it known to all faythfull people, that as touching the blessed sacrament of the aultar, I do firmly & vndoubtedly beleue, that after the wordes of consecration be spoken by the Priest, according to the common vsage of thys Church of England,* there is present really the bodye and bloud of our Sauour Iesu Christ, whether the minister which doth consecrate, be a good man, or a bad man, & that also whensoever the sayd Sacrament is receiued, whether the receiuer be a good man or a bad man, he doth receiue it really & corporally. And moreouer, I do beleue, that whether the said Sacrament then receiued of the Minister, or Page 1237 els reserued to be put into the pixe, or to be brought to any person that is impotent or sicke, yet there is the very bodie and bloud of our sayd sauour: so that whether the Minister or the receiuer be good or bad, yea whether the Sacrament be receiued or reserued, alwayes there is the blessed body of Christ really.

And this thing with all other things touching the Sacrament & other sacraments of the Church, and all things els touching the christian beliefe, which are taught and declared in the kings Maiesties booke lately set forth for the erudition of the christiā people, I Anne Askew, otherwise called Anne Kyme, do truely and perfectly beleue, and so here presently confesse and knowledge. And here I do promise that henceforth I shall neuer say or doe any thyng agaynst the premisses, or against any of them. In witnesse whereof, I the sayd Anne haue subscribed my name vnto these presents.

Written the xx. day of March, in the yere of our Lord God. 1545.Ex Regist.

With diuers other mo beyng then present.

Here mayest thou note gentle Reader in this confession, both in the B. and his register: a double sleight of false conueiaunce. For although the confession porporteth the words of the bishops writing,* whereunto she did set her hand, ye• by the title prefixed before, mayest thou see that both she was arraigned & condemned before this was registred, and also that she is falsly reported to haue put to her hand, which in deed by this her owne booke appeareth not so to be, but after this maner and condition: I Anne Askew doe beleue all maner thinges conteyned in the fayth of the Catholike Church, and not otherwise. It followeth more in the story.

Then because I did adde vnto it the catholike church he •ang into his chamber in a great fury. With that my cosin Britaine followed him, desiring him for Gods sake to bee goo• L. vnto me.* He answered that I was a woman, and that •e was nothing deceiued in me. Then my cosine Britayne desired him to take me as a woman, and not to set my weake womans wit to his lordships great wisdome.

Then went in vnto him Doct. Westen, and sayd, that the cause why I did write there the catholike church,* was that I vnderstoode not the Church written afore. So with much adoe, they perswaded my Lord to come out agayne, and to take my name with y^e names of my sureties, which were my cosin Britaine, and Maister Spilman of Graies Inne.

This beyng done, we thought that I should haue bene put to bayle immediatly according to the order of the law. Howbeit, he would not suffer it, but committed me from thence to prison agayne,* vntill the next morrow, and then he willed me to appeare in the Guild hall, & so I did. Notwithstanding, they would not put me to bayle there neyther, but red the B. writing vnto me, as before, and so commanded me againe to prison.

Then were my sureties appointed to come before thē on the next morrow in Paules Church: which dyd so in deede. Notwithstanding they would once agayne haue brokē of with them because they would not be bound also for another woman at their plesure, whom they knew not nor yet what matter was laid vnto her charge.* Notwithstanding at the last, after much ado and reasoning to & fro, they toke a bond of them of recognisance for my forth comming. And thus I was at the last deliuered.

Written by me Anne Askew.

The latter apprehension and examination, of the worthy Martyr of God,* Mistres Anne Askew. Anno. 1546.*

I Do perceiue (deare friend in the Lord) that thou art not yet perswaded throughly in the truth,* concernyng the Lords supper, because Christ said vnto his Apostles: Take, eate, this is my body, which is geuen for you.

In geuing forth the bread as an outward signe or token to be receiued with the mouth, he mynded them in perfect beliefe, to receiue that body of his, which should dye for the people, and to thinke the death therof to be the only health and saluatiō of their soules. The bread and the wine were left vs for a sacramentall communion, or a mutuall parti'cipation of the inestimable benefites of his most precious death and bloudsheading, and that we should in the ende therof be thankfull together for that most necessarie grace of our redemption. For in y^e closing vp therof, he said thus: This doye in remembrance of me. Yea, so oft as ye shall eat it▪ or drinke it. Luke xi. and i. Cor. xi. Els should we haue bene forgetfull of that we ought to haue in daily remembraunce,* & also bene altogether vnthankful for it, therefore it is mee•• that in our prayers we call vnto God to graft in our foreheds, the true meaning of the holy Ghost concerning this Communion. For S. Paul sayth: The letter slayeth: the spirit is it onely that geueth lyfe. ij. Cor. iij. Marke well the sixt chap. of Iohn, where all is applied vnto fayth, note also y^e 4. chap. of S. Paules first Epistle to the Corin.* and in the end therof ye shall find that the things which are seene, are temporall, but they that are not seene, are euerlastyng. Yea looke in the 3. chap. to the Hebrues,* and ye shall finde that Christ as a sonne (and no seruant) ruleth ouer hys house, whose house are we (and not the dead temple) If we holde fast the confidence and reioysing of that hope to the end.* Wherefore, as sayd the holy Ghost: To day if ye shall heare his voice harden not your harts, &c. Psalm. 99.

The summe of my examination,* before the Kings Councill at Greenewich.

YOur request, as concerning my prison fellowes, I am not able to satisfie, because I heard not their examinations: but the effect of myne was this.* I beyng before the Councill, was asked of M. Kyme. I aunswered that my Lord Chauncellor knew already my mynd in that matter. They with that aunswer were not contented, but sayde it was the kings pleasure that I should open the matter to them. I answered them plainly I would not so doe. But if it were the Kinges pleasure to heare me, I would shew hym the truth. Then they sayde, it was not meete for the Kyng to be troubled with me. I answered that Salomon was reckoned the wysest kyng that euer lyued: yet misliked he not to heare two poore common womē, much more hys grace a simple woman, and hys faythfull subiect. So in Conclusion I made them none other aunswer in that matter.

Then my Lord Chancellour asked me of my opinion in the sacrament. My aunswer was this: I beleue that so oft as I in a christian congregation,* do receiue the breade in remembrance of Christes death, and with thanks geuyng, according to his holy institution. I receiue therwith the fruits also of his most glorious passion. The bishop of Winchester bad me make a direct answer. I said I would not sing a new song of the Lord in a strange lande. Then the B. said, I spake in parables. I aunswered,* it was best for him, for if I shew the open truth (quoth I) ye will not accept it. Then he sayde, I was a Parret. I told hym agayne: I was readie to suffer all thyngs at hys handes, not onely his rebukes, but all that should follow besides,* yea, and all that gladly.

Then had I diuers rebukes of the counsayle, because I woulde not expresse my mynde in all thynges as they would haue me. But they were not in the meane time vnanswered for all that, which now to reherse were to much, for I was with them there about fiue houres. Then the Clarke of the Counsaile conueyed me from thence to my Lady Garnish.

The next day I was brought againe before the Councill. Then would they needes know of me, what I sayd to the sacrament. I answered,* that I already had said that I could say. Then after diuers words, they bad me goe by. Then came my L. Lisle, my L. of Essex, and the B. of Winchester, requiring me earnestly that I should confesse the sacrament to be flesh, bloud and bone. Then sayd I to my L. Parre, and my L. Lisle, that it was great shame for thē to counsayle contrary to their knowledge. Whereunto in few words they did say, that they would gladly all things were well.

Then the B. sayd he would speake with me familiarlye. I sayde, so did Iudas when he vnfriendlye betrayed Christ. Then desired the Bishop to speake with me alone.* But that I refused. He asked me why? I sayde that in the mouth of two or three witnesses, euerye matter shoulde stand, after Christes and Paules doctrine. Mathew. xviij. ii. Cor. xiiij.*

Then my L. Chancellour began to examine me again of the sacrament. Then I asked hym how long he woulde halt on both sides? Then would he needes knowe where Page 1238 I found that. I sayd in the scripture▪ iij. Reg. xviij. Then he went his way.* Then the B. sayd I should be burnt. I answered that I had searched all the scriptures, yet coulde I neuer finde, that either Christ or his Apostles, put any creature to death. Well, well, sayd I, God will laugh▪ your threatnings to scorne. Psalm. i•. Then was I commanded to stand aside.* Then came to me D. Coxe, and D. Robinson. In conclusion, we could not agree.

Then they made me a bill of the Sacrament, willyng me to set my hand thereunto;* but I would not. Then on the sonday I was sore sicke, thinking no lesse then to dye. Therfore I desired to speake with Maister Latimer: but it would not be. Then was I sent to Newgate in my extremitie of sickenes: for in all my life afore was I neuer in such payne. Thus the Lord strengthen vs in the truth. Pray, pray, pray▪

The confession of me Anne Askew, for the tyme I was in Newgate, concerning my beliefe.

I Finde in the Scriptures (sayd she) that Christ tooke the bread and gaue it to his disciples▪* saying▪ Take, eate, this is my body which shall be broken for you, meaning in substāce, his owne very body, the bread being thereof an only signe or Sacrament. For after lyke maner of speaking, he sayde, he would breake down the temple, and in three days build it vp agayne, signifieng his owne body by the temple, as S. Iohn declareth it, Iohn. 2. and not the stony temple it selfe. So that the bread is but a remembrance of his death, or a Sacrament of thanks geuing for it,* whereby we are 〈◇〉 vnto him by a communiō of christian loue. Although there be many that cannot perceiue the true meaning therof, for the veile that Moises put ouer his face before y^e children of Israel, that they should not see the clearenes thereof, Exod. 24. and 2. Cor. 3. I perceyue the same veyle remayneth to this day. But when God shall take it away, then shall these blynd men see. For it is plainly expressed in the history of Bell in the Bible, that God dwelleth in no thyng materiall.* O kyng (sayth Daniel) be not deceiued, for God will be in nothing that is made with hands of men. Daniel, 14. Oh, what stifnecked people are these, that will alwayes resist the holy Ghost? But as their fathers haue done, so do they, because they haue stony hartes.

Written by me Anne Askew, that neyther wisheth death, nor yet feareth his might, and as mery as one that is bound towards heauen.

Truth is layd in prison, Luke. 21. The law is turned to wormewood, Amos. 6. And there can no right iudgement go forth,* Esay. 59.

Oh forgeue vs all our sinnes, and receiue vs graciously. As for the workes of our hands, we will no more call vppon them. For it is thou Lord that art our God. Thou shewest euer mercye vnto the fatherlesse.

Oh, if they would do this (sayth the Lord) I shoulde heale their sores, yea with all my hart would I loue them.

O Ephraim, what haue I to do with Idols any more? who so is wyse, shall vnderstand this. And he that is rightly instructed, will regard it, for the wayes of the Lord are righteous. Such as are godly,* will walke in them, and as for the wicked, they will stumble at them. Ose. 14.

Salomon (sayth S. Steuen) builded an house for the God of Iacob. Howbeit, the highest of all dwelleth not in Temples made with hands,* as sayth the Prophet: Heauen is my seat, & the earth is my footstool. What house will ye build for me, saith the Lord? or what place is it that I shall rest in? Hath not my handes made all things?* Act. 7.

Woman beleue me (sayth Christ to the Samaritane) the tyme is at hand, that ye shall neyther in this mountayne, nor yet at Ierusalem worship the father. Ye worshippe ye wotte not what, but we knowe what we worshippe. For saluation commeth of the Iewes. But the houre commeth, and is now when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirite and veritie. Iohn. 3.*

Labour not (sayth Christ) for the meate that perisheth, but for that that endureth into the lyfe euerlastyng, which the sonne of man shall geue you: For hym GOD the Father hath sealed, Iohn. 6.

The summe of the condemnation of me Anne Askew at the Guild hall.

They sayd to me there, that I was an heretike, and condemned by the law. If I would stand in mine opiniō. I answered, that I was no heretike, neither yet deserued I any death by the law of God. But as concerning y^e faith which I vttered and wrote to the counsell. I would not (I sayd) deny it, because I knew it true. Then would they needes know, if I would deny the Sacrament to be Christes body and bloud. I said yea. For the same sonne of God that was borne of the virgine Mary, is now glorious in heauen, and will come againe from thence at the latter day like as he went vp. Act. 1. And as for that ye call your god, it is a peece of bread. For a more prooffe thereof (marke it when ye list) let it lye in the boxe but iij. monethes, and it will be mouldy, & so turne to nothing that is good. Wherupon I am perswaded, that it cannot be God.

After that they willed me to haue a Priest:* and then I smiled. Then they asked me, if it were not good? I sayd, I would confesse my faults vnto God. For I was sure that he would heare me with fauour. And so we were condemned with a Quest,

My beliefe which I wrote to the Counsaile was this:* that the sacramental bread was left vs to be receiued with thankes geuyng, in remembraunce of Christes death, the onely remedy of our soules recouery: and that thereby we also receiue the whole benefits and fruits of his most glorious Passion. Then would they needes know whether the bread in the boxe were God or no? I sayd, God is a spirit, and will be worshipped in spirit and truth, Iohn. 4. Thē they demanded: will you plainly deny Christ to be in the Sacrament? I answered that I beleue faithfully the eternall sonne of God not to dwell there. In witnesse whereof, I recited agayne the history of Bell,* and the 19. chap. of Daniell, the 7. and 17. of the Acts, and the 24. of Mathew, cōcluding thus: I neither wish death, nor yet fear his might God haue the prayse thereof with thanks.

My letter sent to the L. Chauncellor.

The Lord God, by whom all creatures haue their being,* blesse you with the light of his knowledge, Amen.

My duety to your Lordship remembred, &c. It might please you to accept this my bold sute, as the sute of one, which vppon due considerations is moued to the same, and hopeth to obtaine. My request to your Lordship is onely: that it may please the same to be a meane for me to the kings maiesty, that his grace may be certified of these few lynes which I haue written concerning my beliefe. Which when it shall be truely conferred with the harde iudgement geuen me for the same, I thinke his grace shal wel perceiue me to be wayed in an vneuen paire of balance. But I remit my matter and cause to almighty God, which rightly iudgeth all secrets. And thus I commend your Lordship to the gouernaunce of him, and fellowship of all saints. Amen.

By your handmayd Anne Askew

My faith briefly written to the kings grace.

I Anne Askew, of good memory, although God hath geuen me the bread of aduersitie, and the water of trouble,* yet not so much as my sinnes haue deserued, desire this to be knowen vnto your grace, that forasmuch as I am by the law condemned for an euill doer: Here I take heauen and earth to record, that I shal die in my innocencie. And according to that I haue sayd first, & will say last, I vtterly abhorre and detest all heresies. And as concernyng the supper of the Lord, I beleue so much as Christ hath said therein, which he confirmed with hys most blessed blood. I beleue also so much as he willed me to follow and beleue so much as the catholike church of hym doth teach. For I will not forsake the commaundement of his holy lips. But looke what God hath charged me with his mouth, that haue I shut vp in my hart: and thus briefly I ende for lacke of learnyng.

Anne Askew.

The effect of my examination and handling since my departure from Newgate.

ON Tuesday I was sent from Newgate to the sign of the crowne,* where as M. Rich and the B. of London with all their power and flattering words, went about to persuaade me from God: but I did not esteeme their glosing pretences.

Then came there to me Nich. Shaxton, and counselled me to recant as he had done. I sayd to hym, that it had bene good for him, neuer to haue bene borne, with many other like wordes. Then M. Rich sent me to the Tower, where I remayned till three a clocke.

Then came Rich and one of the Counsell, charging me vpon my obedience,* to shew vnto them if I knew any mā or woman of my secte. My aunswere was, that I knewe none. Then they asked me of my Lady Suffolke, my Lady of Sussex, my Lady of Hertford, my Lady Denny, and my Lady Fitzwilliams. I said, if I should pronounce any thing against them, that I were not able to proue it. Then sayd they vnto me, that the kyng was informed, that I Page 1239 could name if I would, a great number of my secr. I aunswered, that the kyng was as well deceiued in that behalfe, as dissembled with in other matters.

Then commanded they me to shew how I was maintayned in the Counter, and who willed me to sticke to my opinion, I sayd that there was no creature that therin did strengthen me. And as for the help that I had in the counter, it was by the means of my mayde. For as she went abroad in the streetes, she made mone to the prentises, and they by her did send me money: but who they were I neuer knew.

Then they sayde, that there were diuers Gentlewomen that gaue me money,* but I knew not their names. Then they sayd that there were diuers Ladies that had sent me money. I aunswered, that there was a man in a blew coate, which deliuered me x. shillings, and sayd that my Lady of Hertford sent yt me. And an other in a violet coat gaue me viij. shillings, and sayd my lady Denny sen• it me. Whether it were true or no, I cannot tell. For I am not sure who sent it me, but as the mayd did say. Thē they sayd, there were of the Counsell that did maintayne me. And I sayd no.

Then they did put me on the racke, because I confessed no Ladies or Gentlewomen to be of my opinion, and thereon they kept me a long tyme. And because I lay still and did not cry, my Lord Chancellour and M. Rich, tooke paynes to racke me with theyr owne handes, tyll I was nigh dead.

Then the Lieftenaunt caused me to be loosed from the racke. Incontinently I swoounded, and then they recouered me agayne. After that I sate two long houres reasoning with my Lord Chauncellour vpon the bare floore, whereas he with many flattering wordes,* perswaded me to leaue my opinion. But my Lord God (I thanke his euerlasting goodnes) gaue me grace to perseuer, and wil do (I hope) to the very end.

Then was I brought to an house, and layd in a bedde, with as weary and paynefull bones, as euer had pacient Iob, I thanke my Lord God therefore. Then my Lorde Chauncellour sent me worde if I would leaue my opinion,* I should want nothing: If I would not, I shoulde forth to Newgate, and so be burned. I sent him agayne word, that I would rather die, then to breake my fayth.

Thus the Lord open the eyes of their blinde hartes, that the truth may take place. Farewell deare friend, and pray, pray, pray.

Touching the order of her racking in the Tower, thus it was.* First, she was led downe into a dungeon, where Syr Anthony Kneuet the Liuetenant commaunded hys Gaoler to pinche her with the racke. Which beyng done so much as he thought sufficient, went about to take her downe, supposing he had done enough. But Wrisley the Chauncellour not contented that she was loosed so soone confessing nothing, commaunded the Lieftenant to streine her on the racke agayne. Which because he denied to doe, tendering the weakenes of the woman, he was threatned therefore grieuously of the sayd Wrisley,* saying, that hee would signifie hys disobedience vnto the kyng: and so cōsequently vpon the same, he and M. Riche throwyng of their gownes, would needes play the tormenters themselues: first asking her if she were with child. To whome she aunswering agayne, sayd: ye shall not neede to spare for that, but do you willes vpon me: and so quietly and patiently prayeng vnto the Lord: she aboade their tyranny, till her bones and ioints almost were pluckt a sunder, in such sort, as she was caried away in a chaire. When the racking was past, Wrisley and his fellow tooke theyr horse toward the Court.

In the meane tyme, while they were making their way by land,* the good Lieftenant eftsoones taking boate, spedde hym in all hast to the Court, to speake with the kyng before the other, and so dyd. Who there makynge his humble sute to the Kyng, desired his pardon, and shewed hym the whole matter as it stode, and of the rackynge of Mistresse Askew, and how he was threatened by the Lord Chauncellour, because at his commaundement, not knowynge his highnesse pleasure, he refused to racke her: whiche he for compassion could not finde in his hart to do, and therefore hūbly craued his highnes pardō. Which when the K. had vnderstand,* seemed not very well to like of their so extreme handlynge of the woman, and also graunted to the Lieftenant his pardon, willing him to returne and see to hys charge.

Great expectation was in the meane season among the Warders and other officers of the Tower, waiting for his returne. Whom when they saw come so cheerefully, declaring vnto them how he had sped with the king, they were not a little ioyous, and gaue thanks to God therfore.

¶Anne Askews aunswer vnto Iohn Lacels letter.

OH friend most dearly beloued in God, I meruaile not a litle what should mooue you to iudge in me so slender a fayth as to feare death which is the ende of all misery in the Lord I desire you not to beleue of me such wickednes.* For I doubt it not▪ but God will performe his worke in me, like as he hath begun. I vnderstand the counsaile is not a litle displeased, that it should be reported abroad, that I was racked in the tower. They say now, that they did there, was but to feare me: whereby I perceyue, they are ashamed of their vncomely doyngs, and feare much, least the kings Maiestie should haue information thereof. Wherefore, they would no man to noyse it. Well, their crueltie God forgeue them.

Your hart in Christ Iesu. Farewel, and pray.

The purgation or aunswer of Anne Askew against the false surmises of her recantation.

I Haue read the processe whiche is reported of them that knowe not the truth, to be my recantation.* But as the Lord liueth, I neuer ment thing lesse then to recant. Notwithstanding this I confesse, that in my first troubles, I was examined of the Bishop of London about the Sacrament. Yet had they no graunt yf my mouth, but this, that I beleued therein as the word of God did bynd me to beleue, more had they neuer of me. Then he made a Copie whiche is now in print, and required me to set thereunto my hand. But I refused it. Then my ij. sureties did wyll me in no wise to sticke thereat, for it was no great matter, they sayd.

Then with much ado, at the last I wrote thus: I Anne Askew do beleue this, if Gods word do agree to the same, and the true catholike church. Then the B. beyng in great displeasure with me,* because I made doubtles in my writing, commaunded me to prison: where I was a whyle, but afterwards by the meanes of frendes, I came out againe. Here is the truth of that matter. And as concerning the thing that ye couet most to know, resort to the sixt of Iohn, and be ruled always thereby. Thus fareye well.

Anne Askew.

The confession of the faith which Anne Askew made in Newgate before she suffered.

I Anne Askew of good memory, although my merciful father hath geuen me the bread of aduersitie,* and the water of trouble: yet not so much as my sinnes haue deserued: confesse my selfe here a sinner before the throne of hys heauenly maiestie, desiring his forgeuenes and mercye. And for so much as I am by the law vnrighteously condemned for an euill doer concerning opinions, I take y^e same most mercifull God of myne, which hath made both heauen and earth, to record, that I hold no opinions contrary to hys most holy word. And I trust in my mercifull Lord, which is the geuer of all grace, that he will graciously assist me agaynst all euill opinions, which are contrary to his blessed veritie. For I take him to witnes, that I haue done & wil do vnto my lyues end, vtterly abhorre them to the vttermost of my power.

But this is the heresie which they report me to holde that after the Priest hath spoken the wordes of consecration, there remaineth bread still. They both say,* & also teach it for a necessary article of fayth, that after those wordes be once spoken, there remayneth no bread, but euen the selfesame body that hoong vpon the crosse on good Friday, both fleshe, bloud, and bone. To this belief of theirs, say I nay: For then were our common Crede false, which saith, that he sitteth on the right hand of God the father almighty, & from thence shall come to iudge the quicke and dead. Loe, this is the heresie that I holde, and for it must suffer the death. But as tou•hing the holy and blessed supper of the Lord, I beleue it to be a most necessary remembraunce of his glorious suffrings and death. Moreouer, I beleue as much therein, as my eternall and onely redeemer Iesus Christ would I should beleue.

Finally, I beleue al those scriptures to be true, which he hath confirmed with his most precious bloud. Yea,* & as s. Paul saith, those scriptures are sufficient for our •erning & saluatiō, that Christ hath left here with vs: so that I beleue, we nede no vnwritten verities to rule his church w^t. Therefore looke what he hath sayd vnto me with his owne mouth in his holy Gospell, that haue I with Gods grace closed vp in my hart,* and my full trust is (as Dauid saith) that it shalbe a lanterne to my footsteps. Psal. xxviii.

There be some do say that I deny the Eucharist or sacrament of thankes geuyng: but those people do vntruly report of me. For I both say and beleue it, that if it wer ordered Page 1240 lyke as Christ instituted it and left it, a most singular comfort it were vnto vs all. But as cōcerning your masse as it is now vsed in our daies, I do say and beleue it to be the most abhominable Idoll that is in the world: For my God will not be eaten with teeth, neyther yet dieth he agayne. And vpon these wordes that I haue now spoken, wyll I suffer death.

O Lord, I haue mo enemies now, then there be hairens on my head.* Yet Lord, let them neuer ouercome me with vaine words, but fight thou Lord in my stead, for on thee cast I my care. With all the spite they can imagine, they fall vpon me, which am thy poore creature. Yet sweete Lord, let me not set by them which are against me: for in thee is my whole delight. And Lord I hartily desire of thee, that thou wilt of thy most mercifull goodnes forgeue them that violence which they do and haue done vnto me. Open also thou their blynd hartes, that they may hereafter doe that thing in thy sight, which is only acceptable before thee, and to set forth thy veritie aright, without all vaine fantasies of sinnefull men. So be it. O Lord, so be it.

By me Anne Askew.

☛ The order and maner of the burning of Anne Askew, Iohn Lacels, Iohn Adams, Nicholas Belenian, with certayne of the Councill sitting in Smithfield.

Hetherto we haue entreated of this good woman. Now it remayneth that we touch somewhat as concernyng her ende and Martyrdome. After that she, beyng borne of such stocke and kynred, that she might haue liued in great wealth and prosperitie, if she would rather haue followed the world, then Christ, now had bene so tormented, that she could neyther lyue long in so great distresse,* neyther yet by her aduersaries be suffered to die in secret: the daye of her execution beyng appoynted, she was brought into Smithfield in a chayre, because she could not goe on her feete,* by meanes of her great tormentes. When she was brought vnto the stake, she was tyed by the middle with a chayne, that held vp her body. When all things were thus prepared to the fire, D. Shaxton who was then appoynted to preach,* began his Sermon. Anne Askew hearyng, and answering agayne vnto him, where he sayd wel, confirmed the same: where he sayd amisse, there sayde she he misseth, and speaketh without the booke.

The Sermon beyng finished, the Martyrs standyng there tyed at three seuerall Stakes ready to theyr Martirdome, beganne theyr prayers. The multitude and concourse of the people was exceedyng, the place where they stode beyng rayled about to keepe out the prease. Upon the Benche vnder Saint Bartlemewes Church, sate Wrisley Chauncellour of England, the old Duke of Norfolk, the olde Earle of Bedford, the Lord Mayor wyth dyuers other moe. Before the fire should be set vnto them, one of the Benche hearyng that they had gunnepouder about them, and beyng afrayde least the fagots by strength of the gunnepouder would come •lieng about their eares, began to be afraid, but the Erle of Bedford declaring vnto him how y^e gunpouder was not laid vnder the fagots, but onely about theyr bodies to rydde them out of their paine, which hauyng vente, there was no daunger to them of the fagottes, so diminished that feare.*

Then Wrisley Lord Chauncellour, sent to Anne Askew letters, offring to her the kyngs pardon, if she would recant. Who refusing once to looke vpon them, made this answer agayne: that she came not thether to deny her lord and Maister. Then were the letters likewise offered vnto the other, who in lyke manner followyng the constancie of the woman, denied not onely to receyue them,* but also to looke vpon them. Whereupon the Lord Mayor commaundyng fire to be put vnto them, cryed wyth a lowde voyce, Fiat iustitia.

And thus the good Anne Askew with these blessed Martyrs, beyng troubled so many maner of ways, and hauyng passed through so many tormentes, hauyng now ended the long course of her agonies, beyng cōpassed in with flames of fire, as a blessed sacrifice vnto God, she slept in the lord, an. 1546. leauyng behynd her a singular example of christian constancy for all men to follow.

John Lacels, Iohn Adams, and Nicholas Belenian.*

There was at the same time also burnt together wyth her, one Nicholas Belenian priest of Shropshire, I. Adams a Taylor, and Iohn Lacels Gentleman of the Page 1241 court and houshold of king Henry.

It happened well for them, that they dyed together with Anne Askew. For albeit that of themselues they wer strong and stout men, yet through the example and exhortation of her, they beyng the more boldened, receyued occasion of greater comfort in that so paynefull and dolefull kynd of death: who beholdyng her inuincible constancie, and also stirred vp thorough her perswasions, did set apart all kynd of feare.

Thus they confirming one another with mutual exhortations taried looking for the tormenter and fire, which at the last flaming round about them, consumed their blessed bodies in happy Martyrdome, in the yeare of our saluation. 1546. about the month of Iune.

There is also a certayne letter extant, which the sayd I. Lacels briefly wrote beyng in prison touchyng the sacrament of Christes body and bloud: wherein he doth both cōfute the error of them, which being not contented wyth the spirituall receyuing of the sacrament, wil leaue no substance of bread therin, and also confuteth the sinister interpretation of many therupon. The tenor of which letter is as here vnder followeth.

The copy of the letter of Iohn Lacels written out of prison.

Saint Paule because of sectes and dissention among the Corinthians,* wrote his epistle vnto them: and in lyke case pertaining to my conscience, I doe protest my whole hart in the blessed supper of the Lord, wherein I trust in God to bryng nothyng for me, but I shall be able wyth Gods holy worde, to declare and manifest the same. And herein I take occasion to recite the saying of saint Paule in the sayd Epistle the xi. chapter. That which I deliuered vnto you,* I receyued of the Lorde. For the Lorde Iesus, the same night in which he was betrayed, tooke breade, gaue thanks and brake it, and sayd, take ye, eate ye, this is my body, which is broken for you.

Here me seemeth S. Paule durst not take vpon hym hys Lord and maisters authoritie. Wherefore, as at Gods hand the breaking of the most innocent and immaculate body and bloud of Christ, is the quietnes of all mens consciences, the onely remedy of our sinnes, and the redemption of mankynd which is called in the scripture the dailye offering: so the Masse whiche is the inuention of man (whose author is the Pope of Rome, as it doth appeare in Polydore Virgill▪ and many others) is the vnquietnesse of all Christendome,* a blasphemy vnto Christes bloud, and (as Daniel calleth it) the abhominable desolation, as the Scripture shall hereafter more manifest it. S. Paule was belyke to learne of the Romaines church,* the manner of the consecration (as they call it) wyth the breathyng ouer the hoste, and other ceremonies besides, that he durst not take vpon him to say: Hoc est corpus meum.* But this I will admitte: it was the Lord Iesus that made the supper, which also did finish it, and made an end of the onely acte of our saluation, not onely here in this world, but with his father in heauen, as he declareth hym selfe: that he will drinke no more of this bitter cuppe, tyll he drinke it new in his fathers kingdom, where all bitternes shall be taken away.

Now if any man be able to finish the acte of our Sauour, in breakyng of hys body, and sheadyng of his bloude here, and also to finish it with the father in heauen, then let hym say it. But I thinke that if men will looke vpon saint Paules wordes well,* they shall be forced to say, as Saint Paule sayth: the Lord Iesus sayde it, and once for all, which onely was the fulfiller of it. For these wordes: Hoc est corpus meum, were spokē of his natural presence (which no man is able to deny) because the acte was finished on the crosse, as the story doth plainly manifest it to them that haue eyes. Now this bloody sacrifice is made an ende of, the supper is finished, forasmuch as Christ hath once suffered for sinnes,the iust for the vniust, to bring vs to God, and was killed as pertainyng to the fleshe, and hath entered in by hys owne blood once for all, into the holy place, and found eternall redemption.

Here now followeth the administration of the supper of the Lorde, which I will take at Christes handes after the resurrection, although other men will not bee ashamed to bryng the wicked Councels of foolish inuentions for them. And it came to passe as Christ sate at meate with them, he tooke bread,blessed, and brake it, and gaue it to them, and their eyes were opened and knewe hym, and he vanished out of their sight. And the Apostles did know him, in breakyng of breade.

Here also it seemeth to me the Apostles to follow their Maister Christ, and to take the right vse of the Sacrament, and also to teache it to those that were conuerted to Christ, as mention is made in the Actes of the Apostles: where as is sayd: They continued in the Apostles 〈◇〉 and fellowship in breakyng of bread and prayer, and they con•nued daylie with one accord in the temple,and brake bre•d 〈◇〉 euery house, and did eate there with gladnesse and singlenesse o• heart, praying God, and had fauour with all the people. And Saint Paule followyng the same doctrine, doth plainely shew the duetie of the Minister, and also of them that shal receiue it: As oft as you shall eate this bread, and drinke th•s cuppe, ye shall shewe the Lordes death vntill he come. Here I doe gather that the Minister hath no further power and authoritie,* then to preach and pronounce the lordes death, or els to say the Lord Iesus sayd it, which did fulfill it on the crosse.

Furthermore I doe stedfastly beleeeue, that where the bread is broken according to the ordinaunce of Christ, the blessed and immaculate Lambe is present to the eyes of our fayth, and so we eate his flesh, and drinke hys blood•, which is to dwell with God, and God with vs.* And in this we are sure we dwell with God, in that he geueth vs his holy spirite, euen as the forefathers that were before Christes commyng, did presently see the Lordes death, and did eate his body, and drinke his blood.

In this do I differ from the Popes Church, that the priestes haue authoritie to make Christes naturall presence in the bread,* for so doth he more then our Lorde and Sauour did: As the example is manifest in Iudas, which at Christes handes receyued the same wyne and bread, as the other Apostles did. But the Pope and his adherents, are euen they whom Daniel speaketh of, saying: He shall set men to vnhalloow the sanctuary, and to put downe the daylie offering, and to set vp the abhominable desolation. Yea,*he (of Rome) shall speake meruailous things against the God of heauen, and God of all Gods, wherin he shall prosper so long, till the wrath be fulfilled, for the conclusion is deuised already. He shall not regard the God of heauen, nor the God of his fathers, yea in his place shall he worship the mighty Idoll, and the God whome his fathers knew not, which is the God Maozim.

For lacke of tyme, I leaue the commemoration of the blessed supper of the Lord,* and the abhominable idoll the masse, which is it that Daniel meaneth by the God Maozim. Read the second and last chap. of Daniel, the ij. to the Thes. the 2. Epistle: where as they recite the abomination of desolation, which Mathew sayth, standeth in the holy place, which is the consciences of men. Marke sayeth, where it ought not to stand, which is a plaine denial of all the inuentions of men. Further Luke sayth, the tyme is at hand. Paule sayth, the mysterie of iniquitie worketh alredie, yea, and shall continue till the appearaunce of Christ, which in my iudgement is at hand.

Now for the supper of the Lord, I do protest to take it as reuerently as Christ left it, and as his apostles did vse it, according to the testimonies of the Prophets, the Apostles and our blessed sauour Christ, which accordingly S. Paule to the Ephesians doth recite.

Now with quietnes I commit the whole world to their pastor and heardman, Iesus Christ the onely Sauior and true Messias, and I commend my soueraigne Lorde and Maister, the Kings maiestie, King Henry the 8. to God the father, and to our Lord Iesus Christ: the Queene and my Lord the Prince, with this whole realme, euer to the innocent and immaculate lambe, that his blood may wash and purifie their hartes and soules from all iniquitie and sinne, to Gods glory, and to the saluation of their soules. I doe protest that the inward part of my hart doth gront for this, and I doubt not but to enter into the holy tabernacle which is aboue: yea and there to be with God for euer. Farewell in Christ Iesu.

Iohn Lacels seruaunt late to the king, and now I trust to serue the euerlasting king, with the testimony of my blood in Smithfield.

¶Rogers Martyr, burned in Northfolke.

Like as Winchester and other Bishops did set on kyng Henry against Anne Askew and her fellow martyrs* so D. Repse B. of Norwich did incite no lesse the old duke of Northfolke against one Rogers in the country of Northfolke: who much about the same yere and time, was there condemned and suffered Martyrdome for the vj. articles. After which tyme, it was not long, but within halfe a yere both the kyng himselfe, and the dukes house decayed:* albeit the Dukes house by Gods grace recouered againe afterward, and he hymselfe conuerted to a more moderation in this kind of dealyng.

The storie of Queene Katherine Parre late Queene, and wife to King Henry 8 Wherein appeareth in what daunger she was for the Gospell, by the meanes of Steuen Gardiner and other of his conspiracy: and how graciously she was preserued by her kind and louing husband the king.

After these stormye stories aboue recited, the course and order, as well of the time, as the matter of storie doeth require nowe somewhat to intreate likewise touching the troubles and afflictions of the vertuous and excellent lady Queene Katherine Parre,* the laste wife to king Henrye. The storie wherof is thys.

About the same time aboue noted, whych was about the yeare after the king returned from Bullein, he was informed that Queene Katherine Parre, at that time his wife, was very much geuen to the reading and study of the holy scriptures.* & that she for that purpose had retained diuers well learned and godly persons, to instruct her throughly in the same, w^t whom as at al times conuenient she vsed to haue priuate conference touching spiritual matters: so also of ordinarie, but especially in Lente euey day in the after noone for the space of an houre,* one of her sayd Chaplains in her priuie Chamber made some collation to her and to her Ladies and Gentlewomen of her priuie Chamber, or other that were disposed to heare: in which sermons, they oft times touched suche abuses as in the churche then were rife. Which things as they were not secretely done, so neyther were their preachings vnknownen vnto the Kynge. Wherof at the first, and for a great time, he semed very wel to like. Which made her y^e more bold (being in deed become very zealous toward the Gospell, and the professors therof) •ranckly to debate with the king, touching Religion, and therein flatly to discouer her selfe: oftentimes wishing, exhorting and perswading the king,* that as hee had to the glorye of God and hys eternall fame, begonne a good and a goolye woorke in banishinge that monstereous Idolle of Rome, so he would throughly perfite and finish the same, cleansing and purging hys Church of Englande, cleane from the dregges therof, wherin as yet remained great superstition.

And all be it the king grewe towardes hys latter ende, very sterne and opinionate, so that of fewe he could be content to be taught, but worst of all to be contended wyth all by argument: notwithstanding towardes her he refrained hys accustomed manner (vnto others in like case vsed) as appeared by great respectes, either for the reuerence of the cause, whereunto of hym selfe he seemed well inclined, if some others coulde haue ceased from seeking to peruert hym, or els for the singular affection which vntill a verye smal time before hys death, he alwayes bare vnto her. For neuer handmaide soughte wyth more carefull diligence to please her mistresse, then shee did with all painfull endeour apply her selfe by all vertuous meanes, in all thynges to please hys humour.

Moreouer, besides the vertues of the minde, shee was endued wyth very rare giftes of nature, as singular beautie, fauour, and comely personage▪ being thynges wherein the King was greatly delyghted: and so enioyed shee the kings fauour, to the great likelihoode of the setting at large of the Gospell within this Realme at that time, hadde not the malicious practise of certain enemies professed against the truth (which at that time also were very great) preuented y^e same, to the vtter alienating of the kings mind from Religion, and, almost to the extreme ruine of the Queene and certaine others with her, if God had not maruelously suc•oured her in that distresse.* The conspirers and practisers of her death, were Gardiner B. of Winchester, Wrisley then Lord

Chauncellor, and others more aswell of the kings priuie chamber, as of his priuie councell. These seeking (for the furtheraunce of theyr vngodly purpose) to reuiue, stirre vp and kindle euil and pernicious humours in their Prince and soueraigne Lord, to the intent to depryue her of thys great fauour, which then she stode in wyth the king, (which they not a litle feared would turne to the vtter ruine, of their Antichristian secte, if it shoulde continue) and thereby to stoppe the passage of the Gospell: and consequently,* hauing taken away her, who was the only Patronesse of the professours of the trueth, openlye wythout feare of checke or controlment, wyth fire and sworde, after theyr accustomed maner, to inuade the small remainder (as they hoped) of that poore flocke, made theyr wicked entrie vnto this theyr mischieuous enterprise, after thys manner following.

The kinges Maiestie (as you haue hearde) misliked to be contended with all in any kinde of argument. This humour of hys, although not in smaller matters, yet in causes of Religion as occasion serued, the Queene would not sticke in reuerent termes and humble talke, entring wyth him into discourse with sound reasons of Scripture, now and then to contrary. The whych the Kyng was so well accustomed vnto in those matters, that at her handes he tooke all in good part, or at the least did neuer shew countenance of offence thereat:* which did not a litle appall her aduersaries, to heare and see. During which tyme, perceyuing her so thoroughly grounded in the kings fauour, they durst not for theyr liues once opē their lips vnto the king in any respect to touch her, either in her presence, or behind her backe: And so long shee continued this her accustomed vsage; not onely of hearing priuate sermons (as is sayde) but also of her free conference with the king in matters of Religion, without all perill,* vntill at the last by reason of his sore leg (the anguish whereof began more and more to encrease) he waxed sickly, and therewithall, froward, and difficult to be pleased.

In the tyme of this his sicknes, he had left his accustomed maner of comming and visiting the Queene, & therefore she, according as she vnderstoode him by such assured intelligence as shee had about him, to be disposed to haue her company, sometimes being sent for, other sometymes of her selfe would come to visite him, either at after dinner or after supper, as was most fit for her purpose. At whiche tymes shee woulde not fayle to vse all occasions to moue him, according to her maner, zelously to proceede in the reformation of the Church.* The sharpenes of the disease had sharpened the kinges accustomed pacience, so that he began to shew some tokens of misliking: and contrary vnto his maner, vpon a day, breaking of that matter, hee tooke occasion to enter into other talke, which somewhat amazed the Queene. To whome notwithstanding in her presence, he gaue neither euill word nor countenance, but knit vp al arguments w^t gentle wordes and louinge countenaunce: and after other pleasant talke, shee for that time tooke her leaue of his maiesty. Who after his maner, bidding her fare'well sweete hearte (for that was his vsuall terme to the Queene) licenced her to depart.

At this visitation chaunced the Bishop of Winchester aforenamed to be present,* as also at the Queenes takynge her leaue (who verry well had printed in his memorie the kings sodaine interrupting of the Queene in her tale, and falling into other matter) and thoughte y^t if the yron were beaten whilst it was hotte, and that the kynges humoure were holpen, suche misliking might followe towards the Queene, as might both ouerthrow her & all her endeours: and only awaited some accasion to renewe into the kings memory, the former misliked argument. Hys expectatiō in that behalfe did nothing faile him. For the king at y^t time shewed himselfe no lesse prompt and ready to receiue any information, then the bishop was maliciously bent to stir vp the kings indignation against her. The king immediately vpon her departure from him, vsed these or like wordes: A good hearing (quoth he) it is when women become such Clerkes, and a thing much to my comfort, to come in mine olde dayes to be taught by my wife.

The Bishop hearing this,* seemed to mislike that the Queene shoulde so much forget her selfe, as to take vpon her to stand in any argument wyth his maiestie, whom he to his face extold for his rare vertues, and especially for his learned iudgement in matters of religion, aboue, not only Princes of that and other ages, but also aboue Doctours professed in Diuinitie, and sayde that it was an vnseemely thing for any of his maiesties subiects to reason and argue with him so malaparty, and greuous to him for hys parte and other of his Maiesties Councillours and seruantes, to heare y^e same: and that they all by prooffe knew his wisdom to be such, that it was not nedeful for any to put him in mind of any such matters: inferring moreouer how dāgerous and perillous a matter it is, and euer hath bene for a Prince to suffer suche insolent wordes at hys subiectes hands: who as they take boldnesse to contrary their soueraigne in wordes, so want they no will, but onely power and strength to ouerthwart them in deedes.

Besides thys,* that the Religion by the Queene so stifly maintained, did not onely disallow and dissolue the pollicie and politicke gouernment of Princes, but also taught the people that all thynges oughte to be in cōmon, so that what colour so euer they pretended, theyr opinions were in deede so odious, and for the Princes estate so perillous, that (sauing the reuerence they bare vnto her for hys Maiesties sake) they durst be bolde to affirme that the greatest subiect in this lande, speaking those wordes that shee dyd speake, and defending those argumēts that she did defend, had with indifferent iustice, by law deserued death.

Howbeit for his part he would not nor durst not, without good warrante from his Maiestie, speake hys knowledge Page 1243 in the Queenes case, althoughe very apparaunt reasons made for hym, and suche as his duetifull affection towards his Maiestie, and the zeale and preseruatiō of hys estate, would scarcely geue hym leaue to conceyue, though the vttering thereof might thorowe her, and her faction, be the vtter destruction of hym, and of suche as in deede dyd chiefly tender the Princes safetie, wythout hys Maiestie would take vpon him to be their Protector, and as it were theyr Buckler. Whych if he would doe (as in respect of hys owne safetie hee ought not to refuse) he with others of hys faithfull Counsailours, coulde wythin shorte time disclose such treasōs, cloked with this cloke of heresy, that his maiestie should easily perceiue how perillous a matter it is to cherish a Serpent within hys owne bosome. Howbeit he would not for his parte willingly deale in the matter, both for reuerent respect aforesaid, and also for feare lest the faction was growen already too great, there with the princes safetie to discouer the same. And therewithall with heauie countenance and whispering together with them of y^e secte there present, he helde his peace.

*These and such other kindes of Winchesters flattering phrases, marueilously whetted the king both to anger and displeasure towards the Queene, and also to be ielous and mistrustfull of his own estate. For the assuraunce whereof Princes vse not to be scrupulous to doe any thyng. Thus then Winchester wyth his flattering wordes, seeking to frame the kynges disposition after hys owne pleasure, so farre crept into the king at that time, and wyth doubtfull feares he with other his fellowes, so filled the kyngs mistrustfull minde, that before they departed the place, the king

(to see belike what they would doe,) had geuen commandement, with warrant to certaine of them made for y^t purpose, to consult together about the drawing of certaine articles against the Queene, wherein her life might be touched: which the king by their perswasions pretended to be fully resolved not to spare, hauing any rigour or coloure of law to countenance the matter. With this commission they departed for that time from the king, resolved to put theyr pernicious practise to as mischieuous an execution.

Duringe the time of deliberation about thys matter, they failed not to vse al kinds of policies,* and mischieuous practises, aswell to suborne accusers, as otherwise to betray her, in seeking to vnderstand what bokes, by law forbidden, shee had in her closet. And the better to bring theyr purpose to passe, because they would not vpon the sodaine but by meanes deale wyth her, they thought it best, at the first, to begin with some of those Ladies whom they knew to be great with her, and of her bloud. The chieftest whereof, as most of estimation, and priuie to all her doings, were these:* the Lady Harbert, afterwarde Countesse of Pembroke and sister to the Queene, & chiefe of her priuie chamber: the Lady Lane, being of her priuie chamber, and also her cosine germane:* the Lady Tyrwit of her priuie chamber, and for her vertuous disposition, in very great fauour and credite with her.*

It was deuised that these three aboue named shoulde first of all haue bene accused and brought to aunswer vnto the 6. articles: and vpon their apprehension in the Courte, their closet and coffers shoulde haue bene searched, y^t somewhat might haue bene found, wherby the Queene myght be charged,* which being found, y^e Queene her selfe presently should haue bene taken, and likewise caried by barge by night vnto the Tower. This platforme thus deuised, but yet in the ende comming to no effecte, the king by those aforesayde, was foorthwith made priuie vnto the deuise by Winchester and Wrisley, and his consent therunto demanded. Who, (belike to prooue the byshops malice, how farre it would presume) like a wise politike Prince, was contented (dissemblingly) to geue his consent, and to alow of euery circumstance (knowing notw^tstanding in the ende what he would doe. And thus the day, the time, and the place of these apprehensions aforesaide was appoynted: which deuise yet after was chaunged.

The king at that time lay at White Hal, and vsed very seldome, being not well at ease, to stirre oute of hys chamber or priuie gallery: and few of his Counsell, but by especial commandement, resorted vnto him, these onely except: who by reason of this practise, vsed oftner then of ordinary to repaire vnto hym. This purpose so finely was handled, that it grewe now within fewe dayes of the tyme appoynted for the execution of the matter, & the poore Quene knew not nor suspected any thing at all: and therefore vsed after her accustomed manner, when shee came to visite the king, still to deale with hym touching Religion, as before shee did.

The king al this while gaue her leaue to vtter her mind at the ful, without contradiction: not vpon any euil minde or misliking (ye must cōceiue) to haue her speedy dispatch•, but rather closely dissembling with them, to try out the vttermoste of Winchesters fetches. Thus after her accustomed conference wyth the kyng, when shee hadde taken her leaue of him (the time and daye of Winchesters ••all day approaching fast vpon) it chaunced that the king of himselfe vpon a certaine night after her being wyth him, and her leaue taken of hym, in misliking her Religion, brake the whole practise vnto one of hys Phisitions, eyther Doctor Windy, or els Owen, but rather Windy as is supposed: pretending vnto him, as though he intended not any longer to be troubled wyth such a Doctresse as shee was, and also declaring what trouble was in working againste her by certaine of her enemies, but yet charging him wythall, vpon peril of his life, not to vtter it to any creature liuing: and therupon declared vnto him the parties aboue named with all circumstances, and when and what the final resolution of the matter should be.

The Queene all this while compassed about wyth enemies and persecutours, perceiued nothing of all thys, nor what was working against her, and what trappes were layde for her by Winchester and his fellowes: so closely the matter was conueied.* But see what the Lorde God (who from his eternall throne of wisdom, seeth and dispatcheth all the inuentiōs of Achitophel, and comprehendeth y^e wily beguily themselues) did for his pore handmaiden, in rescuing her from the pit of ruine, whereunto she was ready to fall vnawares.

For as the Lorde would, so came it to passe, that the bill of Articles drawn againste the Queene, and subscribed with the kings own hand (although dissemblingly ye must vnderstand) falling from the bosome of one of the foresayd Councillours,* was founde and taken vp of some godly person, and brought immediately vnto the Queene. Who reading there the Articles comprised against her, and perceiuing the kings owne hand vnto the same, for the sodain feare thereof, fell incontinent into a great melancholy and agonie, bewailing and taking on in suche sorte, as was lamentable to see: as certaine of her Ladies and Gentlewomen beyng yet aliue, whiche were then present about her,* can testifie.

The king hearing what perplexitie she was in, almost to the pearil and danger of her life, sent his Phisitions vnto her. Who traueling about her, and seing what extremity shee was in, did what they could for her recouerie.* Then Wendy, who knew the case better then the other, and perceiuing by her words what y^e mater was, according to that the king before had told him: for the comforting of her heauy minde, began to breake with her in secrete maner, touching the said articles deuised against her, which he himself (he sayde) knewe right well to be true: although he stode in danger of his life, if euer he were knowen to vtter the same to any liuing creature. Neuertheles, partly for the safety of her life, and partly for the discharge of his owne conscience, hauing remorse to consent to y^e shedding of innocent bloud, he could not but geue her warning of that mischief that hāged ouer her head,* beseeching her most instantly to vse al secrecie in that behalfe, and exhorted her somewhat to frame and conforme her selfe vnto the kings minde, saying he did not doubt, but if she wold so do, and shew her humble submission vnto him, shee shoulde finde him gracious and fauourable vnto her.

It was not long after this, but the king hearing of the daungerous state wherin she yet stil remained: came vnto her hymselfe. Unto whome, after that shee had vttered her griefe,* fearing lest his maiestie (she sayd) had taken displeasure with her, and had vtterly forsaken her: he like a louing husband wyth swete and comfortable wordes so refreshed & appeased her careful mind, that she vpon the same began somewhat to recouer, and so the king after he hadde taryed there about the space of an houre, departed.

After this the Queene remembring with her selfe the wordes that M. Wendy had said vnto her, deuised how by some good oportunitie she myght repaire to the kings presence. And so first commanding her ladies to conuey away theyr bookes, which were against the lawe, the next nyght following after supper, shee (waited vpon only by the lady Harbert her sister and the Lady Lane, who caried the candle before her) went vnto the kings bed chamber, whome she found sitting and talking with certaine Gentlemen of his chamber. Whom when the king did beholde, very curteously he welcomed her, and breaking of the talke, whych before her comming he had wyth the Gentlemen aforsaid, began of himself, contrary to his maner before accustomed to enter into talke of religion, seming as it were, desirous to be resolved by the Queene of certaine doubttes which he propounded.

Page 1244The Queene perceiuinge to what purpose thys talke did tend, not being vnprouided in what sort to behaue her selfe towards the king, with such aunsweres resolved hys questions as the time and oportunitie present did require, mildly, and with a reuerent countenance aunswering againe after thys maner.

Your Maiestie (quoth she) doth right well know, neither I my selfe am ignoraunt,*what great imperfection and weakenesse by our first creation, is allotted vnto vs women, to be ordained and appoynted as inferiour and subiect vnto man as our heade, from which head all our direction ought to proceede, and that, as God made man to his owne shape and likenesse, whereby he being indued with more speciall giftes of perfection, might rather be stirred to the contemplation of heauenly things, and to the earnest endeouour to obey his commaundements: euen so also made hee woman of man, of whome and by whome shee is to be gouerned; commanded and directed. Whose womanly weakenesse & naturall imperfection, ought to be tollerated, aided and borne wythal, so that by his wisdomes such things as be lacking in her, ought to be supplied.

Sithens therefore that God hath appoynted suche a naturall difference betwene man and woman, and your Maiestie beyng so excellent in giftes and ornaments of wisdom, and I a seely pore woman so much inferiour in all respects of nature vnto you: how then commeth it now to passe that your Maiestie in such diffuse causes of religion, will seeme to require my iudgement? Whyche when I haue vttered and sayd what I can, yet must I, and will I referre my iudgement in this and all other cases to your Maiesties wisdomes, as my onely anker, supreme heade and gouerner heere in earth next vnder God, to leane vnto.

Not so by Saint Marye, quoth the King. You are become a Doctor, Kate, to instruct vs (as we take it) and not to be instructed, or directed by vs.

If your Maiestie take it so (quoth the Queene) then hath your Maiestie very much mistaken me, who haue euer bene of the opinion, to thinke it very vnseemely & preposterous for the woman to take vpon her the office of an instructor or teacher to her Lord and husband, but rather to learne of her husband, & to be taught by him. And where I haue with your Maiesties leaue heeretofore bene bolde to holde talke with your Maiestie, wherein sometimes in opinions there hath seemed some difference, I haue not done it so much to maintaine opinion, as I did it rather to minister talke, not onely to the ende that your Maiestie mighte with lesse grieffe passe ouer this painefull time of your infirmitie, beinge intentiue to oure talke, and hoping that your Maiestie shoulde reape some ease thereby: but also that I hearing your Maiesties learned discourse, might receiue to my selfe some profite thereof. Wherein I assure your Maiestie I haue not missed anye parte of my desire in that behalfe, alwayes referring my selfe in all suche matters vnto your Maiestie, as by ordinance of nature it is conuenient for me to doe.

And is it euen so sweete hart, quoth the king? And tended your arguments to no worse end? Then perfect frendes we are now again,* as euer at any time heretofore: and as hee sate in hys chaire embracing her in his armes & kissing her, hee added thys saying: That it did him more good at that time to heare those wordes of her owne mouthe, then if hee had heard present newes of an hundreth thousand pounds in money fallen vnto him. And wyth greate signes and tokens of marueilous ioy and liking, with promises and assurances, neuer againe in any sort more to mistake her, entering into other very pleasaunt discourses wyth the Queene & the Lords, and Gentlemen standing by, in the end (being very farre on the night) he gaue her leaue to departe. Whome in her absence to the standers by, he gaue as singulare and as affectuous commendations, as before time to the Bish. and the chancelor (who then were neither of them present) he seemed to mislike of her.

Now then (God be thanked) the Kings mynde was cleane altered, and he detested in his heart (as afterwards he plainly shewed) this Tragicall practise of those cruell Caiphases:* who nothing vnderstanding of the kings wel reformed minde; & good disposition towarde the Queene, were busily occupied about thinking & prouiding for their next dayes labour, which was the day determined to haue caryed the Queene to the Tower.

The day & almost the houre appoynted being come, the K. being disposed in the after noone to take the aire (waited vppon wyth two Gentlemen onely of hys bed chamber) went into the garden,* whether the Queene also came, being sent for by the Kinge hymselfe, the three Ladies aboue named, alone waiting vppon her. Wyth whom the king at that time disposed himselfe to be as pleasant as euer he was in all his life before: When sodainly in the midst of theyr myrth, the houre determined being come, in commeth the Lord chauncellour into the garden with a 40. of the kings garde at his heeles,* with purpose in deede to haue taken the Queene together with the 3. Ladies aforesaide, whom they had before purposed to apprehende alone, euen then vnto the tower. Whome then the kyng sternly beholding, breaking of his myrth with the Queene, stepping a little a side, called the Chauncellour vnto hym. Who vppon hys knees spake certaine wordes vnto the king, but what they were (for that they were softly spoken, and the King a good pretie distance from the Queene) it is not well known,* but it is most certaine that the kings replying vnto hym, was knaue, for his aunswer: yea arrant knaue, beast, and foole, and with that the king commāded hym presently to auant out of presence.* Which words although they were vttered somewhat lowe, yet were they so vehemently whyspered out by the king, that the Queene did easely with her Ladies aforesayd ouer heare them: which had bene not a litle to her comforte, i• shee had knowen at that time the whole cause of hys comming so perfectly, as after shee knewe it. Thus departed the L. Chācellor out of the kings presence as he came, with all his traine, the whole mould of all hys deuise being vtterly broken.

The king after his departure, immediatly returned to the Quene. Whom she perceiuing to be very much chafed▪ (albeit comming towards her, he inforced himselfe to put on a mery countenance) with as swete words as she could vtter, endeuoured to quallify the king his displeasure with request vnto his maiestie in the behalfe of the L. Chauncelor, whom he seemed to be offended with all: saying for his excuse,* that albeit she knew not what iust cause his maiesty had at that time to be offended with him, yet shee thoughte that ignoraunce not will, was the cause of his error, and so besought hys maiestie (if the cause were not very hainous) at her humble suite to take it.

Ah poore soule (quoth he) thou little knowest how euill he deserueth this grace at thy hands. Of my worde (sweete heart) he hath bene towards thee an arrant knaue,* and so let him go. To this the Queene in charitable maner replying in few wordes, ended that talke: hauing also by Gods onely blessing happely for that time and euer, escaped the dangerous snares of her bloody and cruell enemies for the Gospels sake.

The pestiferous purpose of this Bishop, & of suche like bloody aduersaries practising thus against the Queene, & proceeding of gods gospel (as ye haue heard) putteth me in remembrāce of such an other like story of his wicked working in like manner, a litle before: but much more pernicious & pestilent to the publick church of Iesus Christ, then this was daungerous to the priuate estate of the Queene. Whyche storie likewise I thought heere as in conuenient place, to be adioyned & notified, to be knowen to all posteritie, according as I haue it faithfully recorded and storied by hym, which heard it of the Archbishop Cranmers own mouth, declared in order and forme as foloweth.

*A discourse touching a certaine pollicie vsed by Steuen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, in staying king Henrie the 8. from redressing of certaine abuses of ceremonies in the church, being Ambassadour beyonde the seas.

Also the communication of king Henrye the 8 had wyth the ambassador of France at Hampton Court concerning the reformation of religion, as wel in France, as in Englande. Anno 1546. Mens August.

IT chanced in the time of K. Henrie the 8. when his highnes did lastly (not many yeres before his death) conclude a league betwene the Emperor, the French king and himselfe, that the B. of Winchester Steuē Gardiner by name, was sent in Ambassage beyonde the seas, for that purpose. In whose absence the Archbishop of Cāterbury Thomas Cranmer, attending vpon the kings Court, sought occasion somewhat to further the reformation of the corrupt religion▪ not yet fully restored vnto a perfection.* For lyke as the sayd Archb. was alwaies diligent and forward to prefer and aduaunce the sincere doctrine of the Gospel: so was that other byshop a contrary instrument, cōtinually spurning against the same, in whatsoever coast of the worlde he remained. For euen now he being beyond y^e seas in y^e temporal affaires of y^e realme forgate not, but fōud the meanes as a most valiant champion of the B. of Rome, to stop and hinder, aswel the good diligence of the sayd Archbishop,* as the godly disposition of the kings Maiestie in that behalfe▪ whych thus chaunced.

Whilest the sayde B. of Winchester was nowe remaining beyond the seas, about the affaires aforsaide, y^e kings maiesty and the saide Archbishop, hauing conference together for reformatiō of some superstitious enormities in the Church: amongst other things, the king determined forthwith Page 1245 to pull downe the Roodes in euery churche,* and to suppress the accustomed ringing on Alhalow night, wyth a few such like vaine ceremonies: And therefore, when the said Archb. taking his leaue of the king, to go into Kent his dioces, his highnes willed him to remember that he shuld cause 2. letters to be deuised: for me (quoth the King) to be signed, the one to be directed vnto you my Lorde, and the other vnto the Archbishop of Yorke, wherein I will commaund you both to send forth your precepts vnto all other Byshops wythin your prouinces,* to see those enormities and Ceremonies reformed vndelaidly that we haue communed off.

So vppon this, the kings pleasure knowen, when the Archbishop of Canterburie was then come into Kent, hee caused his Secretarye to conceiue and write these Letters according to the kings minde, and being made in a readinesse, sent them to the Courte to Syr Anthony Denie, for hym to get them signed by the king, when maister Denie had mooued the king thereunto, the king made answe: I am now otherwayes resolved, for you shal send my Lorde of Canterburie worde, that sithence I spake with hym about these matters, I haue receiued letters from my Lord of Winchester, nowe being on the other side of the Sea, about the conclusion of a league betweene vs,* the Emperour and the Frenche king, & he wryteth plainely vnto vs, that the league wil not prosper nor go forward, if we make any other innouation, change, or alteration, either in Religion or ceremonies,* then heretofore hath ben already commensed and done. Wherefore my Lorde of Canterburie must take patience heerein, and forbear vntill we may espye a more apt and conuenient time for that purpose.

Which matter of reformation began to be reuiued again, at what time the great Ambassador from the French king, came to the kings Maiestie at Hampton Courte not long before his death.* Where then no Gentleman was permitted to waite vpon his Lord and maister,* wythout a veluet coate and a chaine of golde. And for that entertainment of the Ambassadour, were builded in the parke there, 3. very notable great and sumptuous banketting houses. At the which it was purposed, that the sayd Ambassadour should haue bene 3. sundry nightes very richly banketted. But as it chaunced, the French kings great affaires were then sodenly such, that thys Ambassadeure was sent for home in post hast, before he had receiued halfe the noble entertainment that was prepared for him, so that he hadde but the fruition of the first banketting house.

Now what princelike order was there vsed in the furniture of y^e banket, as well in placing of the noble estates, namely the kings Maiestie, and the French Ambassadour w^t the noble men both of England and Fraunce on the one parte, and of the Queenes highnesse and the Ladye Anne of Cleue with other noble women & Ladyes of the other part, as also touching the great & sumptuous preparation of both costly and fine dishes there out of number spent, it is not our purpose heere presently to entreate thereof, but onely to consider the note of the conference and communication had the first night after the sayd bāket was finished,* betweene the kings Maiestie, the sayde Ambassadour, and the Archbishop of Canterburie (the kings highnesse standing openly in the banketting house, in the open face of all the people, and leaning one arme vpon the shoulder of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the other arme vppon the shoulder of the Ambassadour) touching the establishing of godly religion betweene those two Princes in both theyr realmes: As by the report of the sayd Arch. vnto hys secretarie vppon occasion of his seruice to be done in king Edwards visitation, then being register in the same visitation,* relation was made on that behalfe in thys sorte.

When the sayd visitation was put in a readines, before the Commissioners should proceede in their viage, the said Archb. sent for the sayde Register his man vnto Hampton Courte, and willed him in any wise to make notes of certaine things in the sayde visitation: whereof hee gaue vnto hym instruction,* hauing then further talke with hym touching the good effect and successe of the sayde visitation. Upon which occasion the Register sayde vnto hys maister the Archbyshop: I doe remember that you not long agoe, caused me to conceiue and write letters, which king Henry the 8. shuld haue signed and directed vnto your grace, and the Archbishoppe of Yorke, for the reformation of certayne enormities in the churches, as taking down of the roodes, and forbidding of ringing on Alhalow night, and such like vaine ceremonies. Whiche letters your grace sent to the Courte to be signed by the kinges Maiestie, but as yet I thinke that there was neuer any thing done therein.

Why, quoth the Archbishop againe, neuer hearde you how those letters were suppressed and stopped? Wherunto the Archbysshops seruauant aunswering againe: as it was (sayde hee) my duetie to wryte those letters: so was it not my part to be inquisitiue what became thereupon. Marye, quoth the Archbishop, my Lord of Winchester then beyng beyond the seas, about a cōclusion of a league betwene the Emperour, the Frenche king, & the king our maister, and fearing y^t some reformation should here passe in the realme touchinge Religion in hys absence, againste hys appetite, wrote to the kinges Maiestie, bearing hym in hande,* that the league then towardes, woulde not prosper nor go forwardes on his Maiesties behalfe, if he made any other innouation or alteration in Religion, or Ceremonies in the Church, then was already done: which hys aduertisement herein caused the king to staye the signing of those letters, as Syr Anthonie Denie wrote to me by the Kinges commaundement.

Then said his seruauant againe vnto hym: Forasmuche as the kings good intent tooke no place then, nowe youre grace may goe forward in those matters, the oportunity of the time much better seruing thereunto then in king Henries daies.

Not so, quoth the Archbyshop. It was better to attempt such reformation in king Henry the viij. his dayes, then at thys time, the King beinge in hys infancie. For if the kings father had set foorth any thyng for the reformation of abuses, who was he that durste gainesay it? Marye, we are now in doubt how men will take the change or alteration of abuses in the Church, and therefore the Counsaile hath forborne specially to speake thereof, and of other thyngs, whych gladly they woulde haue reformed in thys visitation, referring all those & suche like matters, vnto the discretions of the visitours. But if King Henrye the viij. had liued vnto this day, w^t the french king, it had bene past my L. of Winchesters power, to haue v•sured the kynges highnes as he did, when he was about the same league.

I am sure you were at Hampton Courte, quoth the Archb. when the French kings ambassador was entertained there at those solemne banketting houses, not long be••re the kings death: namely, when after the bankette was done the first night, the king leaning vpō the Ambassador and vpon me, if I should tel what communicatiō betwene the kings highnes and the said Ambassador was had, concerning the establishing of sincere Religion then, a manne would hardly haue beleued it. Nor I my selfe had thought the kings highnes had ben so forward in those matters as then appeared. I may tell you it passed the pulling downe of Roodes, and suppressing the ringing of bells, I take it y^t few in England would haue beleued, that the kings Maiestie, and the French king had bene at thys poynt,* not only within halfe a yeare after to haue chaunged the masse in both the realmes into a communion, as we now vse it, but also vtterly to haue extirped, and banished the Byshop of Rome and his vsurped power, out of both their realms and dominions.

Yea they were so throughly and firmly resolved in that behalfe, that they ment also to exhort the Emperour to doe the like in Flanders and other his Countreies and Seniories, or els to breake of from him. And heerein the kynys highnes willed mee (quoth the Archbishop) to pen a forme thereof to be sent to the Frenche king to consider of. But the deepe & most secrete prouidence of almighty God, owing to this realme a sharpe scourge for our iniquities, preuented (for a time) this theyr most godly deuise and intent, by taking to his mercy both these Princes.

A briefe narration of the trouble of Syr George Blage.

HEere woulde also something be sayde of Syr George Blage one of y^e kings priuy chamber,* who being falslye accused by syr Hugh Cauerley knight, and M. Littleton, was sent for by Wrisley L. Chauncellour the sonday before Anne Askew suffered, & the next day was caried to Newgate, & from thence to Guild Hal,* where he was cōdemned the same day, & appoynted to be burned the wensday folowing. The words which his accusers laid vnto him, were these. What if a mouse should eat the bread? then by my cōsent they should hang vp the mouse. Wheras in dede these words he neuer spake as to hys liues ende hee protested. But y^e truth, as he sayd, was this, that they craftely to vndermine him, walking w^t him in Pauls church after a sermon of D. Crome, asked if he were at the Sermon, and he said yea, I heard say (saith M. Littleton) that he sayd in his sermō that the masse profiteth neither for the quick nor for the dead. No saide M. Blage, wherefore then? belike for a gentleman when he rideth a hunting to kepe his horse frō stumbling,* & so they departing immediately after he was apprehended (as is shewed) and condemned to be burned, when this was heard among them of the priuye chamber, the king hearing thē whispering together) whych he could Page 1246 neuer abide) commaunded them to tell hym the matter. Whereupon the matter being opened, and sute made to the king, especially by the good Earle of Bedford then L. priuie Seale, the king being sore offended with their doings, that they would come so nere him, & euen into his priuie chamber without hys knowledge, sent for Wrisley, commaunding him eftsoones to draw out hys pardon himself,* and so was he set at libertye. Who cōming after to the kings presence: ah my pig sayth the king to him, (for so he was wont to call him.) Yea sayd he, if your maiestie had not bene better to me then your Bishops were,* your pig had bene rosted ere this time.

But to let this matter of syr George Blage passe, wee will now reduce our storie againe to Anne Askew and her fellowe Martyrs, who the same weeke were burned, and could finde no pardon.*

Then the Catholicke fathers when they had broughte this christian woman wyth the residue (as aboue hath ben declared) vnto theyr rest, they being now in their ruffe and triumph, like as the Phariseis when they hadde broughte Christ to his graue, deuised w^t themselues howe to keepe him down stil, & to ouertreade truth for euer. Whereupon consulting with certaine of the Counsell, they made oute a straight and harde proclamation, authorised by the kinges name, for the abolishing of the scripture, & al such English bookes, which might geue any light to the setting foorth of Gods true word and grace of the Gospel, the copie and tenour of which Proclamation is this as followeth.

A Proclamation for the abolishing of English bookes, after the death of Anne Askew, set forth by the king. An. 1546. the 8. day of Iuly.

THE kings most excellent Maiestie vnderstanding howe vnder pretence of expounding and declaring the truthe of Goddes Scripture,*diuers leud and euil disposed persons haue taken occasion to vtter and sow abroad by bookes imprinted in the English tongue, sondry pernicious and detestable errours & heresies, not onely contrary to the lawes of this realme, but also repugnant to the true sence of Gods law and his word,*by reason whereof certaine men of late, to the destruction of their owne bodies & soules, and to the euill example of others, haue attempted arrogātly and malitiously to impugne the truth, and therewith trouble the sober, quiet and godly Religion vnited and established vnder the kings Maiestie in this his realme: his highnesse minding to foresee the daungers that myght ensue of the sayd bookes, is enforced to vse hys generall prohibition commaundement and proclamation, as followeth.

First, that from henceforth no man, woman, or person▪ of what estate,*condition, or degree so euer he or they be, shal after the last day of August next ensuing, receiue, haue, take, or keepe in his or their possession, the text of the newe Testament of Tyndalles or Couerdales translation in English, nor any other then is permitted by the Acte of Parliament made in the Session of the Parliament holden at Westminster in the 34. or 35. yere of his maiesties most noble raigne, nor after the sayd day, shall receiue, haue, take, or keepe in his or their possession, any maner of bookes prynted or wrytten in the English tongue, which be, or shalbe set forth in the names of Frith, Tindal, Wickliffe, Ioy, Roy, Basil, Bale, Barnes, Couerdale,*Turner, Tracy, or by any of them, or any other booke or bookes, containing matter contrary to the sayde Acte made An 34 or 35. but shall before the last day of August next cōming, deliuer the same English booke, or bookes to his maister in that housholde, if hee be a seruauant or dwell vnder any other, and the maister or ruler of the house, & suche other as dwell at large, shall deliuer all such bookes of the sortes aforesaid as they haue, or shal come to their hāds, deliuered as afore or otherwise, to the Maior, Bailiffe or chiefe Constable of the towne where they dwell, to be by them deliuered ouer openly within 40. daies next folowing after the said deliuerie to the Shiriffe of the shire, or to the Byshops Chancellour, Commissary of the same diocesse, to the entent the said Bishop, Chauncellour, Commissary, and Shiriffe, and euery of them shall cause them incontinently to be openly burned, which thing the kinges Maiesties pleasure is, that euery of them shall see executed in most effectuall sort,*and of their doings thereof make certificate to the kings Maiesties most honourable Councill, before the 1. of October next comming.

And to the intent that no man shall mistrust any daunger of such penall statutes as be passed in this behalfe, for the keeping of the sayd bookes, the kings Maiestie is most graciously contented by this proclamation,*to pardon that offence to the sayd time appoynted, by this proclamation for the deliury of the said bokes and commaundeth that no Bishoppe, Chauncellor, Commissarie, Maior, Bailiffe, Shiriffe, or Constable, shall be curious to marke who bringeth forth such bookes, but only order, & burne them openly, as is in this proclamation ordered. And if any man after the last day of August next comming, shall haue any of the sayde bookes in his keeping, or be proued, and conuined by sufficient witnesse before 4. of the kings most honourable counsail, to haue hidden thē, or vsed thē, or any copy of any of them, or any parte of thē, wherby it shuld appeare that he willingly hath offēded the true meaning of this proclamation, the same shall not onely suffer imprisonment and punishment of his body at the kings maiesties will and pleasure,*but also shall make suche fine and raunsome to his highnesse for the same, as by his Maiestie or 4. of hys graces said counsaile shalbe determined. &c.

Finally, his Maiestie straightly chargeth and commandeth that no person or persons, of what estate, degree, or condition so euer he or they be, from the day of this proclamation presume to bring any maner of English booke, concerning any maner of Christian religion, printed in the parties beyonde the seas into this realme, to sell, geue, or distribute any English booke printed in outwarde parties, or the copie of any such booke, or any part thereof to any persone dwelling within this his graces realme, or any other hys maiesties dominions, vnlesse the same shalbe specially licenced so to doe by his highnesse expresse graun• to be obtained in writing for the same, vppon the paines before limited, and therewithall to incurre his maiesties extreeme indignation.

For so much as it is & hath alwayes bene the common guise and practise of the popes church to extinct, condemne and abolish all good bookes and holesome treatises of learned men, vnder a false pretence of errors & heresies,* wherof examples abundantly maye appeare in this historie aboue.

Now for the better triall hereof, to see and trie the impudent & shamelesse vanitie of these Catholicke Clergimē, in mistaking, falsifying, deprauing, blaspheming and slandering, where they haue no cause, against al right & honest dealing, yea against their own knowledge, conscience and manifest verity of Gods worde. I shall therfore desire the attentiuē Reader, before we passe any further to consider & expend here 2. things by the way. First what opiniōs and Articles these men gather out of their bookes for errorrs and heresies. Secondly how wittingly and willingly they wrast, peruert, and miscōstrue their sayings, and writings in such sense as the wryters neuer spake nor ment, and all to bryng them into hatred of the worlde, after they haue burned their bookes.

So did they before wyth Iohn Wickliffe, Iohn Hus, & Hierome, So did they with M. Luther, Tindal, Friethe, Lambert, Barnes, Ioy, Roy, Seron,* and briefly yet do stil wyth all the Protestants, either peruerting their sayings, otherwise then they meante, or noting for heresies suche as are manifest principles, & grounds of our religion: Or els falsly belying them, or vntruelly mistaking them, eyther in mangling y^e places, or adding to their words as may serue for their most aduauntage, to bring them out of credite w^t Princes and all the people,

For the more euident probation and experience wherof thou shalt see here (Christen reader) as in a table laid before thine eyes: the booke or catalogue of such errorrs, blasphemies and heresies, whiche the Catholicke Papistes in their own registers haue extracted out of their bokes whō in this & other proclamatiōs they haue condemned. Wher vnto moreouer, we haue annexed y^t very places also of the Authors, out of which euery Article is gathered, keepyng the same signature of verse and page, whyche they in theyr registers doe send vs vnto. So that with a little diligence, thou maist now (louing reader) easely perceiue, conferring the Articles and places together, what trueth and fidelitie these bloudye Catholickes haue vsed toward the children of God: First in burning vp theyr bodies, then in consuming, and abolishing theyr bokes, and afterward drawing out Articles, such as they list thēselues out of their workes to make the people beleue what damnable heretickes they were, as by these articles here vnder ensuing collected and contained in their owne registers may wel appeare. In al which articles, there is not one (speaking of these wryters which here they haue condemned) but either it is a perfect truth and a principle of Christen doctrine, or els it is falsly gathered, or peruersly recited, or craftely handled & maliciously mangled, hauing either something cut frō it, or some more added, or els rackt out of his right place, or wrasted to a wrōg meaning, which the place geueth not, or els whych some other place folowing doth better expound & declare. This false & malicious dealing, hath alwayes bene a common practise amongst Gods enemies from the beginning to falsifie, wrast, and depraue all thinges what soeuer maketh not to their faction & affection, be it neuer so true and iust. So began they w^t Steuen y^e 1. martyr of Iesus Christ,* and so haue they continued stil, & yet do to this present day.

Long it were to recite, but more greuouse to behold what spite and falshood was vsed in the articles of y^e Albingenses Waldenses, Wickliffe, Swinderby, Brute, Thorpe, Page 1247 Armachanus, syr Iohn Oldcastle, Iohn Hus, the Bohemians, and such other. Which thing if the bookes and places when these Articles were gathered againste them, had bene suffered to remayne, we might more playnely vnderstand. In the meane season as touching these Articles here present, for so much as the Bishops owne Registers haue offered them vnto vs, and doe yet remaine with the selfe same bookes from whence they be excerpted, I shall therefore desire thee (frendly reader) first to cōsider the Articles, and laye them with the places which the Registers themselues doe assigne, and then iudge thy selfe what is to bee thought thereof. The Articles gathered out of the foresayd bookes wyth the Bishops decree prefixed before the same, is as here vnder followeth.

A publike Instrument by the Byshops, for the abolishing of the Scripture, and other bookes to be English.

IN the name of God. Amen. Be it knowen to all and singulare, true,* and faithfull people, to whome these present letters testimoniall, or this present publicke and authenticke instrument shall come to be seene, reade, hearde or vnderstande, and whome this vnder wrytten shall or may teache, or appertaine vnto in any maner of wise in time to come, William by the sufferaunce of almighty God, Archbishop of Caunterburie, Primate of all the Realme of Englande, sendeth greeting in our Lorde God euerlasting. We signifie vnto you all, and let you well wit and know by these presents, that the king our soueraigne Lorde, hearing of many bookes in the English tongue, containing many detestable errours, and damnable opinions, printed in the parties beyond the Seas, to be brought into diuers townes, and sondrye parties of this his Realme of Englande, and sowne abroad in the same, to the great decay of our faith Catholicke, and perillous corruption of hys people, vnlesse speedy remedy were briefly prouided, hys highnesse willinge euermore to employ all his studie and mynde in the high degree which almighty God hath called hym vnto, to the wealth of his subiectes, that they might liue, not only in tranquillitie and peace, but also be kept pure and cleane of all contagion, and wrong opinions, in Christes Religion: considering also that he being defendour of the faith, woulde be full loth to suffer such euill seede sowne amongst his people, and so take roote that it might ouergrowe the corne of the Catholicke doctrine before spronge in the soules of hys subiectes: for the repellinge of suche booke, calling vnto him of his great goodnesse, & gracious dispositiō, not onely certain of the chief prelates & clerks of his realm, but also of eache Vniuersitie a certaine number of the chiefe learned men proposed such of those bookes, as his grace had readye to be read vnto them, requiring to heare in that behalfe their aduise and iudgement of them. Who both by great diligence and mature deliberation, perusing ouer the sayde bookes, founde in them manye errorrs and heresies, both detestable and damnable, being of such a sort, that they were like briefly to corrupt a greate parte of his people (if they mighte be suffered to remaine in theyr handes any space) gathering also out of them many great errors, and pestilent heresies, and noting them in wryting, to the intente to shewe for what cause they reputed the sayd bookes damnable, of which hereafter out of eache booke gathered many do ensue: albeit, many more there be in the said bookes, which bookes totally do swarue full of heresies and detestable opinions.

Heresies and errorrs collected by the Byshops out of the booke of Tyndall, named the wicked Mammon with the places of the booke annexed to the same,*_oute of which euery Article is collected.

1. FAith onely iustifieth. Fol. 59.

*This Article being a principle of the Scripture, and the ground of our saluation, is playne enoughe by S. Paule and the whole body of the scripture: Neither can any make this an heresie,*_ but they must make S. Paule an hereticke, and shew themselues ennemies to the promises of grace, and to the crosse of Christ.

2. The law maketh vs to heare God, because we be borne vnder the power of the Deuill.*Fol. 59.

3. It is impossible for vs to consent to the will of God. Fol. 59.

*The place of Tyndall from whence these Articles be wrasted, is in the wicked Mammon, as followeth. Whych place I beseeche thee indifferente to reade, and then to iudge.

*In the faith which we haue in Christ, & in Gods promises, finde we mercy, life, fauour, & peace. In the law we finde death, damnation and wrath, moreouer the curse and vengeance of God vpon vs. And it (that is to say, the law) is called of Paul, the ministratiō of death and damnation. In the lawe wee are prooued to be the ennemies of God, and that we hate hym. For howe can we be at peace wyth God, and loue hym, seeing we are cōceiued and borne vnder the power of the Deuill, and are his possession & kingdome, hys captiues and bondmen, and led at hys will, and he holdeth our hearts, so that it is impossible for vs to consent to the will of God? Muche more is it impossible for a man to fulfill the lawe of hys owne strength and power, seeing that we are by birth and nature the heires of the eternall damnation. &c.

4. The lawe requireth impossible things of vs Fol. 59.

Read the place.* The law when it commaundeth y^t thou shalt not lust, geueth thee not power so to do: but daumeth thee because thou canst not so doe.* If thou wilt therefore be at peace with God and loue hym, then must thou turne to the promises and to the gospel, which is called of Paul the ministration of righteousness and of the spirite.

5. The spirit of God turneth vs & our nature, that we do good: as naturally as a tree doth bring fourth fruit. Fol. 65.*

The place is this: the spirite of God accompanyeth fayth and bringeth with her light, wherwith a man beholdeth himself in the law of God, and seeth his miserable bōdage & captiuitie, and humbleth himself,* & abhorreth himselfe. She bringeth Gods promises of all good thynges in Christ: God worketh with his word, & in his worde. And as hys word is preached, fayth rooteth her selfe in y^e harts of the elect: and as fayth entreth: and the worde of God is beleued, the power of God looseth the hart from the captiuitie & bondage vnder sinne: and knitteth & coupleth hym to God & to the will of God, altereth hym & changeth him cleane, fashioneth and forgeth hym a new, geueth him power to loue and to do that which before was impossible for him either to loue or doe, and turneth him into a new nature: so that he loueth that which before hee hated, & hateth that which he before loued, and is cleane altered and changed, and contrary disposed: and is knitt and coupled fast to gods will, and naturally bringeth fourth good workes: y^t is to say, that which God commandeth to do, & not things of his owne imagination: and that doth hee of his owne accord, as a tree bringeth forth fruit of his owne accord. &c.

6. Workes doe onely declare to thee that thou art iustified. Fol. 65.

If Tindall say,* that workes doe onely declare our iustification, he doth not thereby destroy good works: but onely sheweth the right vse and office of good workes: to be noted to merite our iustificatiō, but rather to testify a liuely fayth, which onely iustifieth vs, The article is playn by the scripture, and S. Paule.

7. Christ with all his workes did not deserue heauen. fol. 69.

Reade the place. Al good workes must be done freely w^t a single eye, without respect of any thing,* so that no profit be sought thereby. That commaundeth Christ, where hee sayth. Free haue you receaued, free geue agayne. For look as Christ with all his workes did not * deserue heauen (for that was his already) but did vs seruice therewith, & neyther looked for, nor sought his owne profite, but ours and the honour of god his father onely: euen so we withal our workes, may not seeke our owne profite, neither in thys world, nor in heauen, but must and ought freely to worke to honour God withall, and without all maner of respect, seeke our neighbours profite, and do him seruice. &c.

8. Labouring by good workes to come to heauen, thou shamest Christes blood. Fol. 9.

Read the place.* If thou wouldest obtaine heauen with the merites and deseruings of thine owne works, so doest thou wrong, yea and shamest the blood of Christ, and vnto thee Christ is dead in vaine. Now is the true beleuer heire of God by christes deseruings,* yea and in Christ was predestinate and ordained vnto eternall life before the worlde began. And when the Gospell is preached vnto vs, we beleue the mercy of God, and in beleuing we receiue the spirit of God, which is the earnest of eternall life, and we are in eternal life already, and feelee already in our harts y^e sweetnes thereof, and are ouercome with the kindnes of God & Christ: and therefore loue the will of God, and of loue are ready to woorke freely, and not to obtaine that whyche is geuen vs freely, and whereof we are heyres already, &c.

9. Saintes in heauen can not helpe vs thither. fol. 69.

Whether saintes can helpe vs vnto heauen, see y^e scripture,* and marke wel the office of the sonne of God our only Sauour and redeemer, and thou shalt not nede to seeke any further.

10. To builde a Church in the honour of our Ladye or anye other Saincte, is in vaine, they cannot helpe thee,*they be not thy friends, fol. 71.

Read the place of Tind. What buildest thou Churches, foundest Abbeyes, Chauntreis, & Colledges in the honour of Saintes, to my mother, S. Peter, Paule,* and Saintes that be deade, to make of them thy friendes? They neede it Page 1248 not: yea they be not thy friends. Thy friends are thy poore neighbours,* which neede thy help and succour. Thē make thy friendes with the vnrighteous Mammon, that they may testifie of thy fayth, and that thou mayest knowe and feelee that thy faith is right, and not fayned, &c.

11. All flesh is in bondage of sinne, and can not but sinne, fol. 74.

This Article is euident enough of it selfe, confirmed by the scripture, and needeth no allegations.

12. Thou canst not be damned without Christ be damned, nor Christ be saued without thou be saued, fol. 76.

Reade the pla•e: A phisition serueth but for sicke men, & that for such men as feelee their sicknes, & moorne therefore, and long for health.* Christ likewise serueth but for sinners only that feelee their sin, and that for such sinnes as sorow & mourne in their harts for health. Health is the power or strength to fulfill the law, or to keepe the cōmandements: Now he that longeth for that health, that is to say, for to do the law of God, is blessed in Christ, and hath a promise that his lust shall be fulfilled, and that hee shall be made whole. Blessed are they which hunger and thirst for righteousnes sake (that is, to fulfill the law) for their lust shall be fulfilled,* Matth. 5.

This longing, and the consent of the hart vnto the lawe of God is the working of the spirit, which God hath poured into thine hart, in earnest that thou mightst be sure that God will fulfill all his promises that he hath made thee. It is also the seale and marke which God putteth on all men that he chooseth vnto euerlasting life. So long as thou seest thy sinne, and mournest, and consentest to the lawe, and longest (though thou be neuer so weake) yet the spirit shall keepe thee in al temptations from desperation, and certifie thine hart, that God for his truth shall delyuer thee, and saue thee, yea and by thy good deedes shalt thou be saued, not which thou hast done, but which Christ hath done for thee. For Christ is thine, and al his deedes are thy deedes, Christ is in thee, and thou in him, knit together inseparably, neyther canst thou be damned, except Christ be damned with thee, neither can Christ be saued, except thou be saued with him, &c. The like comfortable wordes he hath afterwarde, fol. 38. which are these. He that desireth mercy, the same feeleth his owne misery and sin, and moorneth in his hart to be deliuered, that he might honor God, and God for his truth must heare him, which saith by the mouth of Christ: Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousnes, for they shall be satisfied. God for hys truthe sake must put the righteousnes of Christ in hym, and wash his vnrighteousnes away in the blood of Christ. And be the sinner neuer so weake, neuer so feeble and fraile though he haue sinned neuer so oft and so greeuous, yet so long as this lust desire and mourning to be deliuered, remaineth in him, God seeth not his sinnes, reckoneth them not for his truthe sake, and loue in Christ. He is not a sinner in the sight of God that would be no sinner. Hee that would be deliuered, hath his hart loose already, His hart sinneth not, but mourneth, repenteth, and consenteth vnto the lawe and will of God, and iustifieth God, that is, beareth record that God which made the law, is righteous and iust. And such an hart trusting in Christes blood, is accepted for full righteousness, and his weakenes, infirmitie, and frailtie, is pardoned, and his sinnes are not looked vpon, vntill God put more strength in him, and fulfill his desire, &c.

*13. The commaundements be geuen vs, not to do them, but to know our damnation, and call for mercy of God, fol. 76.

*Reade the place. If thou wilt enter into life, keepe the commaundements. Math. 15, 19. First remember that whē God commaundeth vs to do any thing, he doth it not therefore because that we of our selues are able to doe that he commaundeth, but that by the lawe we might see and know our horrible damnation and captiuitie vnder sinne, and so repent and come to Christ and receiue mercy, &c.

14. Fasting is only to auoyde surfet, and to tame the body, all other purposes be nought, fol. 81.

The words of Tyndall be these. Fasting is to abstayne from surfetting or ouermuch eating, from dronkennes and cares of the world, as thou mayst reade Luke 20. And the end of fasting is to tame the body, that the spirite may haue y^e free course vnto God,* and may quietly talke with God. For ouermuch eating and drinking, and care of worldly busines, presseth downe the spirit, choketh it, and tangleth it, that it can not lift vp it selfe to God. Now he that fasteth for any other entent then to subdue the body, that the Spirit may wayte on God, and freely exercise it selfe in the things of God, the same is blinde, and wotteth not what he doth, erreth, and shooteth at a wrong marke, and hys entent and imagination is abhominable in the sighte of God, &c.

*15. To bid the poore man pray for me, is onely to remember him to do his dutie: not that I haue any trust in his prayer, fol. 82.

The words of Tindall be these. When we desire one another to pray for vs,* that do we to put our neighbour in remembrance of his dutie, and not that we trust in his holines, our trust is in God, in Christ, and in the trueth of Gods promises. We haue also a promise that when two or three or moe agree together in one thing, according to the will of God, God heareth vs, notwithstanding as God heareth many, so heareth he few, & so heareth he one, if he pray after the will of God, & desire the honour of God, &c.

16. Though thou geue me a thousand pound to pray for thee, I am no more bound now then I was before, fol. 83.

The wordes be these. If thou geue me a thousand pound to pray for thee, I am no more bound then I was before.* Mans imagination can make the commaundemente of God neither greater nor smaller, neither can the lawe of God either adde or diminish. Gods commaundemente is as great as himselfe, &c.

17. A good deede done and not of feruent charitie as Christes was, is sinne, fol. 83.*

The wordes of Tindall be these. Though thou shewe mercy vnto thy neighbour,* yet if thou do it not with suche burning loue, as Christ did vnto thee, so must thou knowledge thy sinne, and desire mercy in Christ, &c.

18. Euery man is Lord of another mans good, fol. 83.

The words of Tindall be these. Christ is Lord ouer all, and euery Christian is heire annexed with Christ, & therefore Lord of all, and euery one lord of whatsoeuer an other hath. If thy brother or neighbour therefore neede, and thou haue to helpe him, and yet shewest not mercy, but withdrawest thy hands from him, then robbest thou him of his owne, and art a theefe, &c. Reade more heereof in the xx. Article following.

19. I am bound to loue the Turke with the very bottome of my hart, fol. 83.

The place of this Article is this. I am bound to loue the Turke with all my might and power, yea and aboue my power: euen frō the ground of my hart,* after the example that Christ loued me, neither to spare goods, body, or life, to win him to Christ. And what can I do more for thee, if thou gauest me all the world? Where I see neede, there can I not but pray, if Gods spirit be in me, &c.

20. The woorst Turke liuing hath as much right to my goodes at his neede, as my housholde, or mine owne selfe, fol. 83.*

Reade and marke wel the place in the wicked Mammon.

In Christ we are all of one degree without respect of persons. Notwithstanding, though a christen mans hart be open to all mē,*and receyueth all men, yet because that his habilitie of goodes extendeth not so farre, this prouision is made, that euery man shall care for his owne housholde, as father and mother, and thynne elders that haue holpen thee, wife, children, and seruants. If thou shouldest not care and prouide for thine housholde, then were thou an Infidell, seeing thou hast taken on thee so to do, and for so much as that is thy part committed to thee of the congregation. When thou hast done thy dutie to thine housholde, and yet hast further aboundance of the blessing of God, that owest thou to the poore that can not labour, or woulde labour and can get no worke, and are destitute of friends: to the poore I meane, which thou knowest, to them of thine owne parish. If thy neighbours which thou knowest, be serued, and thou yet haue superfluitie, and hearest necessitie to be among the breethren a thousand mile off, to them art thou detter. Yea, to the very Infidels we be detters if they neede, as farrefoorth as we maintayne them not against Christ, or to blaspheme Christ. Thus is euery man that needeth thy helpe, thy father, mother, sister, and brother in Christ: euen as euery man that doth the will of the father, is father, mother, sister and brother vnto Christ.

Moreouer, if any be an Infidel and a false Christian, and forsake his houshold, his wife, children, and suche as can not helpe themselues, then art thou bound to them, if thou haue wherewith, euen as much as to thine owne housholde, and they haue as good right in thy goodes, as thou thy selfe, &c. And if the whole world were thine, yet hath euery brother his right in thy goodes, and is heire with thee, as we are all heyres with Christ, &c.

21. Almes deserueth no meede, fol. 84.*

The place is this: He that seeketh with his aliues more then to be mercifull, to be a neighbour, to succour his brothers neede, to doe his duetie to his brother,* to geue hys brother that he oweth him, the same is blinde▪ and seeth not what it is to be a christen man, and to haue fellowship in Christes bloud, &c.

22. There is no worke better then another to please God, To make water, to wash dishes, to be a sowter or an Apostle, all is one. To wash dishes and to preach is all one as touching the deed to please God, fol. 44.

The words of Tindall be these. As pertayning to good works, vnderstand that all workes are good whyche are Page 1249 done within the lawe of God in fayth, and with thankesgiuing to God,* and vnderstande that thou in thy doing them pleasest God, whatsoeuer thou doest within the law of God, as when thou makest water, &c.

Moreouer, put no difference betweene workes, but whatsoeuer commeth into thy handes, that doe, as tyme, place, and occasion geueth, and as God hath put thee in degree, high or low. As touching to please God, there is no worke better then an other. God loketh not first on thy workes as the world doth, as though the beautifulnes of the world pleased him, as it doth the world, or as though he had neede of them, but God looketh first on the hart, what faith thou hast to his wordes, how thou beleueest him, and how thou louest him for his mercy that hee hath shewed thee: he looketh with what hart thou workest, and not what thou workest, how thou acceptest the degree that he hath put thee in, and not of what degree thou art, whether thou be an Apostle or a Shomaker. Set this example before thine eyes. Thou art a kitchen Page, and wastest thy maisters dishes. Another is an Apostle, and preacheth the word of God. Of this Apostle, harke what S. Paule sayth: If I preach (sayth he) I haue naught to reioyce in, for necessitie is put vnto me. As who shoulde say, God hath made me so, wo is vnto me if I preach not. If I doo it willingly (saith he) then haue I my rewarde: that is, then am I sure that Gods spirit is in me, and that I am elect to eternall life. If I do it against my will, an office is committed vnto mee: that is, if I doe it not of loue to God, but to get a liuing thereby, and for a worldly purpose, and had leauer otherwayes liue: then do I that office which God hath put me in, and yet please not God my selfe, &c. Moreouer, howsoeuer he preach, he hath not to reioice in that he preacheth. But if he preach willingly with a true hart & of conscience to God, then hath he his reward, that is, then feeleth he the earnest of eternall life, and the working of the spirite of God in him. And as he feeleth Gods goodnes and mercy, so be thou sure he feeleth his owne infirmitie, weakenes, and vnworthines, and mourneth and knowledgeth hys sinne, in that the hart will not arise to worke wyth that ful lust and loue that is in Christ our Lord. And neuerthelesse is he yet at peace with God through faith & trust in Christ Iesu. For the earnest of the spirit that worketh in him, testifieth and beareth witnes vnto his hart, that God hath chosen him, and that his grace shall suffice him, whyche grace is now not idle in him. In his workes putteth hee no trust.

Now thou that ministrest in the kitchen, and art but a kitchen page, receiuest all things of the hand of God, knowest that God hath put thee in that office: submittest thy selfe to his will, and seruest thy maister, not as a man, but as Christ himselfe, with a pure hart, according as Paule teacheth: putteth thy trust in God, and with him seekest thy reward. Moreouer, there is not a good deede done, but thy hart reioiceth therein, yea when thou hearest that the word of God is preached by this Apostle, and seest the people turne to God, thou consentest vnto the deede, thy harte breaketh out in ioy, springeth and leapeth in thy brest that God is honoured, and in thine hart doest the same that the Apostle doth, and happly with greater delectation, and a more feruent spirit. Now, he that receaueth a Prophete in the name of a Prophet, shall receiue the reward of a Prophet. That is, he that consenteth to the deede of a Prophet, and maintaineth it, the same hath the same spirite, and earnest of euerlasting life, which the Prophete hath, and is elect as the Prophet is.*

Now if thou compare deede to deede, there is no difference betwixt washing of dishes, & preaching of the word of God. But as touching to please God, none at all. For neither that, nor this pleaseth, but as farrefoorth as God hath chosen a man, hath put his spirit in him, and purified his hart by faith and trust in Christ, &c.

*23. Ceremonies of the Churche haue brought the worlde from God, fol. 86.

Reade the place of Tindall. Seeke the word of God in all thinges,* and without the word of God, doe nothing, though it appeare neuer so glorious. Whatsoeuer is done without the word of God, that count Idolatrie. The kingdome of heauen is within vs. Luke 7. Wonder therfore at no monstrous appearaunce, nor at anye outward thing without the word. For the world was neuer drawne from God, but with an outward shewe, and glorious appearance and shining of hypocrisie, and of fained and vsurped fasting, praying, watching, singing, offering, sacrificing, halowing of superstitious ceremonies, and monstrous disguising, &c.

*24. Beware of good intentes: They are damned of God, fol. 87.

*25. See thou do nothing but that God biddeth thee, fol. 87.

The words of Tindall out of the which these two articles are gathered, are these. Beware of thy good intende, good minde, good affection, or zeale as they call it.* Peter of a good mind, and of a good affection or zeale, chidde Christ, because he sayde that he must goe to Ierusalem, and there be slayne. But Christ called him Sa•an for hys labour: a name that belongeth to the Diuell, and sayde that he perceiued not godly things, but worldly. Of a good intent, and of a feruent affection to Christ, the sonnes of Zebede would haue had fire to come downe from heauen, to consume the Samaritanes: but Christ rebuked them, sayeng, that they wist not of what spirit they were: that is,* that they vnderstood not how that they were altogether worldlye and fleshly minded. Peter smote Malchus of a good zeale, but Christ condemned his deede. The Iewes of a good entent and of a good zeale slew Christ, and persecuted the Apostles, as Paule beareth them record. Rom. x. I beare them record (saith he) that they haue a feruent minde to Godward, but not according to knowledge.* It is another thing then to do of a good mind, and to do of knowledge. Labour for knowledge, that thou mayest knowe Gods will, and what he would haue thee to do.

Our mind, entent, and affection, or zeale, are blinde, and al that we do of them is damned of God, and for that cause hath God made a testament betweene him and vs, wherin is conteneid both what he woulde haue vs to do, and what he would haue vs to aske of him. See therefore that thou do nothing to please God withall, but that he commaundeth, neyther aske any thing of him, but that he hath promised thee, &c.

26. Churches are for preaching onely, and not as they bee vsed now, fol. 87.*

This Article conteyneth neyther error nor heresie, but is playne enough of it selfe, to all them that haue their minds exercised in the scriptures of God.

27. To worship God otherwise then to beleue that he is iust and true in his promise, is to make God an Idol, fol. 87.

Reade the wordes of Tindall with this Article.* God is honoured on all sides,* in that we count him righteous in all his lawes and ordinances, and also true in all his promises. Other worship of God is none, except we make an Idoll of him, &c.

28. Pharao had no power to let the people depart at Gods pleasure, fol. 95.*

29. Our prelates in sinne, say they haue power, fol. 95.

Reade the place in the wicked Mammon,* out of y^e which these two Articles are gathered. S. Paule sayeth: If thou confesse with thy mouth that Iesus is the Lorde,* and beleue with thine hart that God raised him vp from death, thou shalt be safe: that is, if thou beleue he raised him vp againe for thy saluation. Many beleue that God is riche and almighty, but not vnto themselues: and that he wil be good to them and defend them, and be their God. Pharao for paine of the plague, was compelled to confesse his sinnes: but had yet no power to submit himselfe vnto the will of God, and to let the children of Israell go, and to lose so great profite for Gods pleasure. As our prelates cōfesse their sinnes, saieng: though we be neuer so euill, yet haue we the power. And againe, the Scribes and the Phariseis (say they) sate in Moyses seate, do as they teache, but not as they do. Thus confesse they that they are abhominable, &c.

Heere followe other heresies and errors, collected by the Byshops out of the booke named,* the obedience of a Christian man, with the places of the booke annexed to the same.

1. HE saieth we are bounde to make satisfaction to our neighbour, but not to God, fol. 132.

Satisfaction is a full recompence or amends making to him whome we haue offended, which recompence we are able to make, one man to another, and are bound so to do: but to God no man can make any mends or recompence, but onely Gods owne sonne Christ Iesus our Sauour. For else if man could haue made satisfaction to God, then had Christ died in vayne, Gal. 2. Loe, what heresie or error is in this Article?

2 He sayth that children ought not to marry without the consent of theyr parents, fol. 120.

The wordes of Tindall in the obedience be these.* Let the fathers and mothers marke howe they themselves were disposed at all ages,* and by experience of their owne infirmities, helpe their children, and keepe them from occasions. Let them prouide marriages for them in season: teaching them also to know, that she is not his wife which the sonne taketh,* nor he her husband which the daughter taketh, without the consent or good will of their Elders, or them that haue authoritie ouer them. If their friendes Page 1250 will not marry them, then are they not too blame if they marry themselues. Let not the fathers and mothers alwayes take the vttermost of their authoritie of their children, but at all times suffer with them, and beare theyr weakenes, as Christ doth ours, &c.

3 He saith, that vowes are against the ordinance of God, fol. 109.

They that say that this Article is an heresie. Let them shew where these vowes in all the new testament be ordeyned by God,* especially such vowes of single life, and wilfull pouertie, as by the canon law be obruded to yong Priests and Nouices. S. Paule playnely forfendeth anye widowes to be admitted vnder the age of threscore yeres. Is not heere trow you a perilous heresie?

4 He saith that a christian man may not resist a prince being Infidell and an Ethnike. This taketh away free will, fol. 113.

*S. Peter willeth vs to be subiect to our princes, 1. Pet. 2. S. Paule also doth the like, Rom. 13. Who was also hymselfe, subiecte to the power of Nero: and although euerye commaundement of Nero against God he did not follow, yet he neuer made resistaunce against the authoritie and state of Nero, as the Pope vseth to do against the state, not only of Infidels, but also of Christen Princes.

5 Whatsoeuer is done before the spirit of God commeth and geueth vs light, is damnable sinne. This is against morall vertues, fol. 113.*

What heresie Aristotle in his Ethikes can finde by thys article, I can not tell: sure I am that the word and spirite of God well considered, can finde none, but rather wyll pronounce the contrary to be a damnable heresie.

6 He reproueth men that make holy Saints their Aduocates to God,* and there he sayth that Saints were not rewarded in heauen for their holy workes, fol. 114.

The words of Tindall be these. They turne from Gods word, and put their trust and confidence in the Sainct and his merites, and make an aduocate, or rather a God of the sainct,* &c. They ascribe heauen to their imaginations and mad inuentions, and receiue it not of the liberalitie of God, by the merites and deseruing of Christ, &c.

7 God moued the harts of the Egiptians to hate the people. Likewise he moued Kings, &c. fol. 118.

The words in the obedience be these. In the 107. Psalme thou readest: He destroyed the Riuers, and dried vp the springs of water, and turned the frutefull land into barr•nnes, for the inhabitaunces thereof. When the children of Israell had forgotten God in Egypt, God moued the harts of the Egyptians to hate them, and to subdue them with craft and wilines, Psalme 105.

In the second chapter of the first booke of the Kings, God was angry with the people, and moued Daudid to number them, when Ioab and the other Lords wondered why he would haue them numbred, and because they feared least some euill should follow, dissuaded the King: yet it holpe not, God so * hardened his hart in his purpose, to haue an occasion to sleie the wicked people, &c.

8 Paule was of higher authority then Peter, fol. 125.

The words in the Obedience be these, I suppose, sayeth he (speaking of Paule) that I was not behinde the hygh Apostles, meaning in preaching Iesus Christ and his Gospell, and in ministring the spirit. And in the same cha. he proueth by the doctrine of Christ, that he was greater then the high Apostles. For Christ saith, to be great in the kingdome of God, is to do seruice, and take payne for other. Upon which rule Paule disputeth, sayeng: If they be the ministers of Christ, I am more, in labours more abundant, in stripes aboue measure, in prison more plenteous: in death oft, &c. If Paule preached Christ more then Peter, and suffered more for his congregation, then is hee greater then Peter, by the testimonie of Christ, &c.

*9 A Priest ought to haue a wife for two causes, fol. 133.

The words of Tindall be these. He must haue a wife for two causes: One, that it may thereby be knowne who is meete for the rowme, he is vnapt for so chargeable an office:* which had neuer household to rule. An other cause is, that chastitie is an exceeding seldome gift, and vnchastitie exceeding perillous for that degree, in as much as the people looke as well vnto the liuing, as vnto the preaching, and are hurt at once if the liuing disagree, and fall from the faith, and beleue not the word, &c.

10 He condemneth auricular confession, fol. 140.

*Of this, reade aboue, page. 1166.1167.

*11 Euery man is a Priest, and we neede no other Priest to bee a meane for vs vnto God, fol. 144.

The words in the obedience be these. There is a worde called in Latin Sacerdos, in Greeke 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , in Hebrue Cohā, that is, a Minister, an Officer, a Sacrificer, or a Priest, as Aaron was a priest and sacrificed for the people, and was a mediatour betweene God and them, and in the English it should haue had some other name then Priest. But Antichrist hath deceiued vs with vnknown and strange terms to bring vs into confusion and superstitious blindnes.* Of y^t maner is Christ a priest for euer, and all we are Priestes through him, and neede no more of anye such priest to be a meane for vs vnto God. &c.

12 He destroyeth the sacraments of Matrimony and Orders. Fol. 144.*

As truly as matrimony and orders be sacramentes: so truly is this article an heresie.

13 He sayth that Purgatory is of the popes inuention, and therefore he may doe there what soeuer he will. Fol 150.

One of the popes owne writers saith thus,* soules being in purgatory are vnder y^e popes iurisdiction, & the P. may if he will, euacuate all purgatory.* Furthermore y^e olde Fathers make litle mention of purgatory, y^e Greek church neuer beleued Purgatory: S. Augustine doubteth of purgatory and the scriptures playnly disproue purgatory: S. Iohn sayth: The bloud of Iesus Christ the sonne of God purgeth vs from all sinne. And the pope sayth: sinne can not be purged but by the fire of purgatory,* nowe whose inuention can Purgatory be, but onely the popes.

14 Saintes be saued not by theyr merites, but onely by the merites of Christ. fol. 151.

What can be more manifest and playne by the Scryptures, then this? Esay sayth. All we haue erred,* euery man in his owne wayes,* and God hath layd vpon him all our iniquities. &c.

15 He sayth, no man may be hired to pray. fol. 155.

The wordes in the obedience be true, which are these:* To pray one for an other are we equally bound: & to pray is a thing that we may alwayes doe what soeuer we haue in hand, and that to do, may no man hyre an other:* christes bloud hath hyred vs already. &c.

16 Why should I trust (sayth he) in Paules prayer or holines? *If S. Paule were aliue, he would compare himselfe to S. Paule, and be as good as he, fol. 159.

The wordes of Tindall, be these. Why am not I also a false Prophet if I teache thee to trust in Paule,* or in hys holines or praier, or in any thing sauing in Gods word, as Paule did? I• Paule were here and loued me, as hee loued them of his time,* to whom hee was a seruaunt to preache Christ what good could he do for me, or wish me but preache christ & pray to God for me to open my hart, to geue me his spirite, and to bring me vnto the ful knowledge of Christ? Unto which port or hauen when I am once come, I am as safe as Paule, ioynt heire with Paule of all the promises of God. &c.*

17 He sayth that all that be baptised, become Christ himselfe fol. 163.

With this Article conferre the words of the Obedience,* which be these. In Math. 28. sayth Christ: in as muche as ye haue done it to any of the least of these my brethrē, ye haue done it to me. And in as much as ye haue not done it vnto one of the least of these: ye haue not done it vnto me. Here seest thou that we are Christes brethren, and euen Christ himselfe, and whatsoever we doe one to another, that do we to Christ. &c.

18 He sayth that the children of fayth be not vnder no lawe,* fol. 163.

The wordes of Tindall be these.* I serue thee not because thou art my mayster or king, for hope of rewarde or feare of payne, but for the loue of Christ. For the childrē of fayth are vnder no law, as thou seest in the Epistle to the Romaines, to the Galath. and the 1. to Tim. but are free. The spirite of Christ hath written the liuely law of loue in their hartes, whiche driueth them to worke of theyr owne accomde, freely and willingly for the great loue sake onely which they see in Christ, and therefore need they no lawe to compell them. &c.

19 There is no deede so good,*but that the law condemneth it. fol. 177.

The place in the Obedience, is this.* Thou hast the story of Peter how he smote Malchus eare, and howe Christ healed it agayne. There hast thou in plaine text great fruit and great edifying, which I passe ouer. Thē come I, whē I preach of the law and the gospell, and borow this example to expresse the nature of the law and of the Gospell and to paynt it vnto thee before thine eyes,* and of Peter & hys sword make I the law, and of Christ the gospell (saying: as Peters sworde cutteth of the eare, so doth the lawe. The law damneth, the law killeth and mangleth the consciēce. There is no eare so righteous, that can abide the hearyng of the law. There is no deede so good, but that the law dāneth it. But Christ that is to say the Gospell, the promises and Testament that God hath made in Christ, healeth the eare and conscience, which the law hath hurt. &c.

20 To aske of God more then he hath promised,*commeth of a false fayth and is playne idolatry. 171.

Page 1251The wordes of Tindall are these. Looke wherin thou canst best keep the commaundementes,* thither get thy self, and there abide. &c. If we haue infirmities y^t draw vs frō the lawes of God, let vs cure them with the remedies that God hath made. If thou burne, marry, for God hath promised thee no chastitie, as long as thou mayest vse y^e remedy that he hath ordayned:* no more then hee hath promysed to slacke thine hunger without meate. Now to aske of God more then he hath promised, commeth of a false fayth and is playne Idolatry. &c.

21 Our payne taken in keeping the commaundements, doth nothing but purge the sinne that remayneth in the fleshe.*But to looke for any other reward or promotion in heauen, then God hath promised for Christes sake, is abhominable in the sight of God, fol. 171.

Consider the place in the Obedience, which is this. To looke for any other reward or promotion in heauen, or in the life to come,* then that which God hath promised for Christes sake, and which Christ hath deserued for vs, with his payne taking, is abhominable in the sight of God: For Christ only hath purchased the reward, and our payne taking to keepe the commaundementes, doth but purge the sinne that remayneth in the flesh, and certifie vs, that wee are chosen and sealed with Gods spirit, vnto the rewarde that Christ hath purchased for vs, &c.

22 The Pope hath no other authoritie but to preache onely fol. 173.

Christ sayde to Peter: Feede my sheepe. Iohn 21. And thou being conuerted, confirme thy brethren. Luke. 22. And to his Apostles he sayd: Goe ye into all the world and preache the Gospell, &c. Againe, S. Paule. 1. Corinth. 1. sayth: That Christ sent him not to baptise, but to preache. To what other office or function he sent the Pope, let thē iudge which consider the Scriptures.

23 If thou binde thy selfe to chastitie to obteyne that whyche Christ purchased for thee, so surely art thou an Infidell, fol. 175.

Reade and conferre the place of Tindall, which is thys. Chastitie canst thou not geue to God, further then God lendeth it thee. If thou canst not liue chaste, thou art boūd to marry, or to be damned, &c. For to what purpose thou bendest thy selfe, must be seene. If thou do it to obteyne thereby that which Christ hath purchased for thee, so art thou an Infidell,* and hast no parte with Christ. If thou wilt see more of this matter, looke in Deuteronomy, and there shalt thou finde it more largely intreated, &c.

24 He denieth, rebuketh, and damneth miracles, fol. 176.

The words in Tindals Obedience be these: And when they crie miracles, miracles, remember that God hathe made an euerlasting Testamente whiche is in Christes bloud, against which we may receiue no miracles, no neither the preaching of Paule himselfe if he come agayne, by his owne teaching to the Galathians, neither yet by the preaching of the Aungels of heauen, &c.

The end of Gods miracles is good: the end of these miracles is euill. For the offerings which are the cause of the miracles, do but minister and maintaine vice, sinne, and all abhominacion, and are geuen to them that haue too much, so that for very aboundance they some out theyr owne shame, and corrupt the whole world with the stinche of their filthines, &c.

25 He sayth that no man should serue God with good intent or zeale:*for it is playne Idolatry, fol. 177.

The place is this in the Obedience. Remember Saule was cast away of God for euer, for his good intende. God requireth obedience vnto his word,* and abhorreth all good intents and good zeales which are without Gods worde: for they are nothing else but playne Idolatry, and worshipping of false Gods, &c.

¶Heere followe other heresies and errours collected by the Byshops, out of the booke called the Reuelation of Antichrist, with the places of the booke, out of the which they were gathered, annexed to the same.

1. TO binde a man perpetually to any vowe of Religion, is (without doubt) an errour, fol. 19.

*The place of the booke called the Reuelation, whence this Article is gathered, is this as foloweth: Whiche the Fathers did neither make nor keepe (he meaneth vowe) but with the libertie of the spirite, binding no man perpetually to them. For if they did (without doubt) they erred according to mans fragilitie.

2 To say the constitutions of Religion are good, because holy men did ordeyne them,*as Augustine, Benedict, Fraunces, Dominicke, and such other, and to folow such examples of Fathers, is to leaue the fayth, fol. 19.

The place of the article is this. But they object the statutes and ordinances are good. Holy men did make them,* as Augustine, Benedict, Bernard, Fraunces, Dominicke, and such other. To this I aunswer: That is euen it that Christ and the Apostles did meane, that these works shuld be like to those things which are taught in the Gospell: for that they call counterfeiting of the doctrine, and priuily bringing in of sectes and heresies, because they take only of the fathers examples of workes, and leaue the faith, &c.

3 All morall diuines haue a wicked conscience full of scrupulositie,fol. 3.

Morall diuines be they whose doctrine and hope of saluation consisteth in morall vertues, rather then in christian faith, apprehending the free promises of God in Christ. And they that be such, can neuer be certified in conscience of their saluation, but alwayes be full of feare and scrupulositie. S. Paule therefore sayeth, It is therefore of faith, that it might come by grace, and y^e promise might be firme and sure to the whole seede, Rom. 4.*

4 Morall vertues, as iustice, temperance, strength, chastitie described by naturall reason, maketh a Synagoue,*and corrupteth Christes fayth, fol. 64.

The place of this Article gathered out of the Reuelation, is this: So many he (the Pope he meaneth) corrupteth, as he hath subdued and led vnder his lawes and imperie.* And who is he in the world that is not subiect vnder him, except they be infants, or peraduenture some simple persons, which are reserued by the inscrutable counsell and prouision of God? O thou man of sinne: O thou sonne of perdition: O thou abomination: O thou corrupter: O thou author of euill consciences: O thou false maister of good consciences: O thou enemy of faith and christen libertie, who is able to rehearse, yea or to comprehend in his mind the infinite waues of this monstrous * Kings euils.

If he had ordeined these his lawes in those workes of vertues that are commended in the ten precepts, or else in such as the philosophers and naturall reason did describe, as are iustice, strength, temperance, chastitie, mildnes, truth, goodnes, and such other: peraduenture they shoulde only haue made a Sinagoge, or else haue ordeyned in the world a certaine ciuill iustice, for through these also fayth shoulde haue bene corrupted, as it was amōgst the Iewes. Howbeit, nowe hee keepeth not himselfe within these boundes, but runneth at riot, and more at large, raising infinite tempests of mischief, enticing and drawing vs to ceremonies, and his owne fayned traditions, and bindeth vs like asses and ignorant fooles, yea and stockes vnto them, &c.

5 Christ tooke away all lawes, and maketh vs free and at liberty, and most of all he suppresseth all ceremonies, fol. 65.63.*

The place of this Article gathered out of the Reuelation, is this: Christ taking away all lawes to make vs free,* and at libertie, did most of all suppress and disanull the ceremonies which did consist in places, persons, garmēts, meates, dayes, and such other, so that their vse shoulde be to all men most free and indifferent, &c.

What he meaneth by taking away all lawes, he declareth a little before, saieng: he hath not deliuered vs from the law, but from the power & violence of the lawe, which is the very true losing. But for al that, he hath not taken away from the powers and officers their right, sword, and authoritie to punish the euill, for such pertayne not to hys kingdome, vntill they are made spirituall, and then freely and with a glad hart they serue God.

6 If the Pope woulde make all the obseruations of the ceremonies, as Lent, fasting, holydayes, confession, matrimonie, masse,*mattins, and reliques, &c. free and indifferent, he should not bee Antichrist: but now, because he commendeth them in the name of Christ, he vtterly corrupteth the Church, suppresseth the faith, and aduanceth sinne, fol. 67.

If the Pope will infer a necessitie of those things, which Christ leaueth free and indifferēt, then what doth he make himselfe but Antichrist? The Article is plaine, and is founded vpon the doctrine of Christ, and S. Paule.

7 To beleeeue in Christ maketh sure inheritors with Christ, fol. 1.

8 If a man say, then shall we no good workes do?*_I aunswere as Christ did:*_This is the worke of God to beleeeue in him whome he hath sent, fol. 1.

The place of these two Articles gathered out of the Reuelat. is this:*_ Who is this light that we are exhorted to beleeeue in? Truly it is Christ as S. Iohn doth testifie: He was the true light that lighteneth all men which come into the world. To beleeeue in this light, maketh vs the children of light, and the sure inheritors with Iesus Christ. Euen now haue we cruell aduersaries, which set vp their bristles, saying: why? shall we then do no good workes? To these we aunswere as Christ did to the people in the Page 1252 sixt of s. Iohn, which asked him what they should do, that they might worke the workes of God? Iesus answered and sayd vnto them: This is the worke of God that ye beleeeue on him whome he hath sent.*_ And after it followeth: Uerily, verily I say vnto you, he that beleueth on me, hath euerlasting life. To this also condescendeth S. Iohn in his epistle, saying: These things haue I written vnto you that beleeeue on the name of the sonne of God, that you may surely know how that you haue eternall life. What is the name of the sonne of God? Truly his name is Iesus, that is to say, a sauour: therefore thou must beleeeue that he is a sauour.

But what auayleth this? The diuels do thus beleeeue & tremble.*_ They know that he is the sonne of God, and sayd vnto him, crying: O Iesu the sonne of God, what haue we to do with thee? They know that he hath redemed mākind by his passion, and laboured to let it. For whē Pilate was set downe to geue iudgement, his wife sent vnto him, saying:*_ Haue thou nothing to doe with that iust man, for I haue suffered many things this day in my slepe about him. No doubt she was vexed of the diuel, to the intent that she should perswade her husband to giue no sentence vpō him, so that Satan might the longer haue had iurisdiction ouer mankind. They knowe that he hath suppressed sinne and death as it is written. Death is consumed into victory. Death where is thy sting? Hell where is thy victory? The sting of death is sinne: the sting of sinne is the lawe. But thanks be vnto God,*_ which hath geuē vs victory through our Lord Iesus Christ: who by sinne, damned sinne in the flesh. For God made him to be sinne for vs, that is to say, a sacrifice for our sinne (and so is sinne taken in many places) which knew no sinne, that we by his meanes should be that righteousnes which before God is allowed. It is not therefore sufficient to beleeeue that he is a sauour and redeemer: but that he is a sauour & redemer vnto thee, &c.

9 Nombring of sinnes maketh a man a more sinner, yea, a blasphemmer of the name of God,*fol. 3.

The place of this Article gathered out of the Reuelat. is this:* Knowledge thy selfe a sinner, that thou mayest be iustified. Not that the numbring of thy sinnes can make thē righteous, but rather a greater sinner, yea & a blasphemmer of the holy name of God, as thou mayest see in Caine, which said that his sinnes were greater then that he might receiue forgiuenes, and so was a reprobate, &c.

10 God bindeth vs to that which is impossible for vs to accomplish,*fol. 3.

The place of this Article gathered out of the Reuelat. is this:* If thou aske of me why he bindeth vs to that whych is impossible for vs to accomplish: thou shalt haue S. Augustine aunswere, which saith in the second booke that hee wrote to Hierome, that the lawe was geuen vs, that wee might knowe what to do, and what to eschewe, to the intent that when we see our selues not able to do that whiche we are bound to do, nor auoide the contrary, we may then know what we shall pray for, and of whome we shall aske this strength, so that we may say vnto our father: Good father commaunde whatsoeuer it pleaseth thee, but giue vs the grace to fulfill that thou commaundest. And when wee perceiue that we can not fulfill his will, yet let vs confesse that the law is good and holy, and that we are sinners and carnall, solde vnder sinne. But let vs not heere sticke, for now are we at hell gates, and doubtles shoulde fall into vtter desperation,* except God did bring vs agayne, shewing vs his gospell & promise, saying: feare not little flocke, for it is your fathers pleasure to geue you a kingdome,* &c.

11 Sinne can not condemne vs: for our satisfaction is made in Christ which dyed for vs,*fol. 4.

The place of this Article gathered out of the Reuelat. is this:* Sinne hath no power ouer vs, neither can condemne vs for our satisfaction is made in Christ, which dyed for vs that were wicked, and naturally the children of wrath. But God which is rich in mercy, through the greate loue wherewith he loued vs, euen whē we were dead through sinne,* hath quickened vs with Christ, & with him hath raised vs vp, & with him hath made vs sit in heauēly things through Iesus Christ, for to shew in times to come, the exceding riches of his grace in kindnes towards vs through Christ Iesus: for by grace are ye saued through faith, and that not of our selues, for it is the gift of God, and cōmeth not of workes, least any man should boast himselfe, &c.

12 I will shew thee an euident argument and reason, that thou mayst know without doubt,*who is Antichrist. All they that doe pursue, are Antichrists. The Pope, Byshops, Cardinals, and theyr adherents do pursue: therefore the Pope, Byshops, and Cardinals, and their adherents, are Antichrists, I weene our Sillogismus be well made, fol. 9.

*The place of this Article gathered out of the Reuela. is this: I will shew thee an euident reason, that thou mayst know without doubting which is the very Antichrist: and this argument may be grounded of their furious persecution which Paul doth confirme writing to the Galathiās. We (deare brethren) are the children o• promise as Isaac was (not the sonnes of the bond woman as Ismaell:) but as he that was borne a•ter the flesh did persecute him that was borne after y^e spirite, euen so is it now. Mark Paules reason. By Isaac are signified the elect, and by Ismaell the reprobate. Isaac did not persecute Ismaell, but contrarye, Ismaell did persecute Isaac. Now let vs make our reasō.

Bar- All they that do persecute are Ismaell, be reprobates and Antichristes.

ba- But all the popes, Cardinals, bishops,* and theyr adherentes do persecute:

ra. Therefore all the popes, cardinals, bishops,* & their adherents be Ismaell, reprobates and Antichristes.

I weene our Sillogismus is well made, and in the first figure.

Read the place and see how he proueth the partes of this argument more at large.*

13 I thinke verily that so long as the successours of the Apostles were persecuted and martyred,*there were good Christen men and no longer. fol. 10.

The Bishops of Rome in the primitiue Church were vnder persecution the space welneare of 300. yeares, vnder y^e which persecution, as good as 30. of them and moe dyed martyrs. Since that time haue succeeded 204. popes whiche haue liued in great wealth and abundance, amongst whom if the booke of Reuelation thinke that there is not 4. to be found good christen men, I thinke no lesse but that he may so thinke without any heresie?

14 It is impossible that the worde of the Crosse shoulde be without affliction and persecution. fol. 10.*

S. Paule sayth:* who soeuer will liue vertuously in Christ Iesu, shall suffer persecution. And how then cā this be true in Paule, and in this man heresie?

15 That the Apostles did curse euer any man,*truely we can not read in scripture: for Christ commaunded them to blesse those that cursed them. fol. 11.

Upon what good ground of the Reuelatiō this heresie is wroung out, let the place be conferred,* which is written in these wordes following: They are as mercifull as the Wolfe is on his pray. They were ordeyned to blesse men, but they curse as the deuill were in them. Paule sayth, that he hath power to edifie, and not to destroy.* But I wot not of whom these bloudy beastes haue their authority, which do so much reioyce in cursing & destruction. We reade how Paule did excōmunicate the Corinthian (and y^t for a great transgressiō) to the entent that he might be ashamed of his iniquity,* and desired agayne the Corinthians to receaue hym with all charitie:* but that the Apostles did curse any man, truely we can not read in scripture, for Christ commaunded them to blesse those that cursed them, and to pray for those that persecuted them. &c.

16 By workes, superstitions, and ceremonies, we decay from the faith, which alone doth truely iustifie and make holy fol. 15.*

Note here (good reader) how peruersly & corruply this article is drawne. For where the place of this book, which is written, fol. 15. expresly speaketh of trusting to workes, meaning that we should put no confidence in workes, but onely in fayth in Christ Iesus,* this article to make it appeare more infamous and hereticall, leaueth out the false trust, and speaketh simply, as though workes should decay fayth. Read the place which is written in these wordes folowing: Daniell calleth not this word, Peschaim, any maner of sinne, but those speciall and chiefe sinnes, whiche resist and fight agaynst the truth and the fayth: as at the trusting in workes, superstitions, and ceremonies, by y^e which we decay from the fayth. &c.

17 The abusion of the Masse with all his solemnities, with vigils, yeare mindes, foundations burials,*and all the busines that is done for the dead, is but a face and a cloke of godlynes and deceiuing of the people: as they were good workes, rather for the dead then for the quicke. fol. 24.

True godlines consisteth in fayth, that is, in the true knowledge of the sonne of God whom he hath sent, and in y^e obseruation of Gods cōmaundements. All their rites & additions instituted by man, are no part of true godlines. And who so putteth trust and confidence therein, as being thinges meritorious for the dead, is deceiued. Suche funerals S. Austen calleth rather refreshinges of the liuing, then releuings and helpes of the dead.

18 To keep and obserue one day to fast, an other to abstaine, to forbear such a meate vpon the fasting day to deserue heauen therby, is a wicked face and cloke, & agaynst Paul. fol. 29.*

The trueth of this article is manifest enough, to be voyd of all errour and heresie, vnlesse it be heresie, to beleue and hold w^t the scripture, s. Paule sayth,* if heauen & our righteousnes Page 1253 come by the law, then Christ died in vayne. Gal. 2.

*19 The multiplication of holydayes, of feastes of Corpus Christi, of the visitation of our Lady, &c. is a wicked face and colour, and in deede foolish, vnprofitable and vayne, fol 30.

This Article likewise nedeth no declaration, conteining in it a true and necessary complaint of suche superfluous holydayes of the Popes making. Which as they bring with them much occasion of wickednes, idlenes, dronkenesse, and vanitie, so hauing also ioined vnto them opinion of religion, and meritorious deuotion and Gods seruice, they gender superstition, & nourish the people in the same.

20 Keeping of virginitie and chastitie of religion is a diuelishe thing,*fol. 30.

The place cited in the booke of the Reuelation of Antichrist,* doth sufficiently open it selfe, speaking and meaning onely of those Monkish vows, whiche by the canonically constitution of the Pope, are violētly forced vpon Priests and Monkes, the coaction whereof S. Paule doth rightly call the doctrine of deuils. And here note by y^e way another tricke of a Popishe cauller. For where the wordes of the booke speake plainely of the chastitie of the religious, fraudulently turning it to an vniuersalitie sayeth, the chastitie of Religion, whereby it might seeme to the simple reader more odious & hereticall. The words of the place be these.

Keeping of virginie & chastitie of the religious, semeth to be a godly and a heauenly thing: but it is a diuelishe thing. Of the which it is spoken in the fourth of the first epistle to Tim. Forbidding to marry, &c. where as againe our most reuerend father maketh that thing necessary,* that Christ would haue free, whereof Daniell in the 11. chapter speaketh: He shall not be desirous of women. Heere Daniel meaneth that he shall refuse and abstaine from mariage, for a cloke of godlynes,* and not for loue of chastitie.

21 Worshipping of Reliques is a proper thing, and a cloke of aduantage against the precept of God, and nothing but the affection of men, fol. 30.31.

These be the wordes in the Reuel. This (the worshipping of reliques he meaneth) is a proper & most fruitfull cloke of aduantage.* Out of this were inuēted innumerable pilgrimages, with y^e which the foolish & vnlearned people might loose their labour, monie & time, nothing in y^e meane season regarding their houses, wiues & children, cōtrary to the commandement of God: when as they might do much better deedes to their neighbours, which is the precept, &c.

22 There is but one speciall office that pertayneth to thine orders,*and that is to pre•ch the word of God, fol. 36.

Of this matter sufficient hath bene said before in the 22. article alledged out of the booke of Obedience.

23 The Temple of God is not stones and woode, neither in the time of Paule was there any house which was called the temple of God,*fol. 37.

The place of this article is this: Which is an aduersary (the Pope he meaneth) and is exalted aboue all that is called God or that is worshipped:* so that he shall sit in y^e temple of God & shew himselfe as God. Doth not he sit in the Temple of God, which saith and professeth hymselfe to be the maister in the whole Church? what is the Temple of God? Is it stones and wood? Doth not Paule saye: The Temple of God is holy, which temple are ye? Neither in the time of Paule was there any house, which was called the tēple of God, as we now cal them. What meaneth this sitting, but reigning, teaching, and iudging? Who sith the beginning of the Church, durst presume to call himselfe the maister of the whole Church, but only the Pope? &c.

*24 He that fasteth no day, that sayth no Mattens, and doth none of the precepts of the Pope, sinneth not, if he thinke that he doth not sinne, fol. 43.

The place in the Reuel. is this: Because he feareth the consciences vnder the title & pretence of Christes name, he maketh of those things which in themselues are no sinnes very greuous offences. For he that beleueth that hee doth sinne if he eate flesh on the Apostles euē, or say not Mattēs and Prime in the morning, or else leaue vndone any of the Popes precepts, no doubt he sinneth: not because the dede which he doth is sinne, but because he beleueth it is sinne, and that against this foolish beliefe & conscience he offendeth. Of the which foolish cōscience only the Pope is head author. For another doing the same dede, thinking that he doth not sinne, truely offendeth not. And this is the cause that the spirit of Paul cōplaineth that many shall depart frō the faith. And for this foolish conscience mens traditiōs be pernicious & noisome, y^e snares of soules hurting the faith & the libertie of the Gospel. If it were not for this cause, they should do no hurt. Therefore the diuell through the Pope abuseth these consciences to stablish the lawes of his tyranny, to suppress the faith and libertie, and to replenish the world with error, sinne and perdition, &c.

*25 Christ ordeyned the Sacrament of the aultar, onely to nourishe the fayth of them that liue: but the Pope maketh it a good woorke, and a sacrifice to be applyed both to quicke and dead, fol. 48.

The place is this: Sathan hated the Sacramente,* and knew no way how to suppress & disanull it: Therefore he found this craft, that the sacrament which Christ did onely ordeine to nourish and stablish the faith of them that liue, should be counted for a good worke and sacrifice, & bought and sold: And so faith is suppressed, and this holosome ministry is applied, not to the quicke, but vnto the dead, that is to say, neither to the quicke, neither yet to the dead. O the incredible fury of God, &c.

26 These signes (he speaketh of miracles and visions or apparitions) are not to the increase of the fayth and Gospell,*for they are rather against the fayth and Gospell, and they are the operation of sathan, and lying signes, fol. 49.

The place is as followeth: Who is able to number the monstrous maruels only of them that are departed?* Good Lord, what a sea of lyes hath inuaded vs, of apparitions, coniurings, and aunsweres of spirits? By the which it is brought to passe, that the Pope is also made the king of thē that are dead, and reigneth in Purgatory, to the great profite of his Priestes, which haue all their liuing, riches, and pompe out of Purgatory: howbeit, they should haue lesse, if they did so well teache the fayth of them that lyue, as they do ridelesse them that are dead. Neyther was there syth the beginning of the world, any worke founde of so little labour and great aduauntage. For truely to thys purpose were gathered almost the possessions of all Princes and rich men. And through these riches sprang vp all pleasures and idlenes, and of idlenes came very Babilone and Sodoma, &c.

Neither are these signes to the encrease of the fayth and Gospell (for they are rather against the faith and Gospell) but they are done to stablishe the Tirannie of these* faces and reedeles, and to set vp & confirme the trust in works. Among these illusions are those myracles to bee reputed, which are shewed in visions, pilgrimages, and worshippings of Saints as there are plenty now adayes, whiche the Pope confirmeth by his Bulles, yea and sometyme doth canonize Saints that he knoweth not. Now behold what is the operation of Satan in lying signes, &c.

27 The people of Christ doth nothyng because it is commaunded, but because it is pleasaunte and acceptable vnto them, fol. 63.

The wordes out of the which this Article is gathered, are these. They are the people of Christ,* whiche willingly do heare and folow him, not for any feare of the lawe, but only intised and lead with a gracious liberty and faithfull loue: not doing any thing because it is commaunded, but because it is pleasant and acceptable vnto them though it were not commaunded: for they that would do otherwise, should be counted the people of the lawe & Synagoge,* &c.

28 In the whole new law is no vrgent precept, nor greeuous, but onely exhortations to obserue thinges necessary for soule health, fol. 63.

The place of this Article gathered out of the Reuelat. is this: * A christian should worke nothing by compulsion of the law, but all through the spirit of liberty, as Paule saith in the 2. of the first epistle to Tim. The law is not geuen to a righteous man. For whatsoever is done by compulsion of the law, is sinne: for it is not done with a glad and willing spirit, but with a contrary will, and rebelling against the law, and this truly is sinne. Therefore in the fourth of the second Epistle to the Cor. He calleth the preachers of the new Testament, the Ministers of the spirit, * and not of the letter, because they teach grace and not the law. Wherefore in the whole newe testamente are there no vrgent or greeuous precepts, but only exhortations to obserue those thinges whiche are necessary to our health. Neither dyd Christ and his Apostles at any time compel any man. And the holy Ghost was for that cause called Paracletus, that is to say, an exhorter and comforter, &c.

29 All things necessary are declared in the new Testament, * but no man is compelled, but to doo according to their owne wyll. Therefore Christ teacheth. Math. 28. that a rebell should not bee killed, but auoyded, fol. 63.66.

The wordes in the Reuelat. are these. In the new Testament are all things declared, * which we ought to do and leaue vndone: what reward is ordeined for them that do & leaue vndone: and of whome to seeke, finde, and obteyne helpe to do and leaue vndone: But no man is compelled, but suffered to do according to their owne will. Therefore in the 18. of Math. he teacheth that a rebell shoulde not be killed, but auoied & put out of cōpany like a Gentile, &c.

30 Christ forbad that one place should be taken as holy, * and another prophane: but would that all places shoulde bee indifferent, fol. 65.

Page 1254 * The place is this, Christ taking away the difference of all places, will be worshipped in euery place. Neither is thee in his kingdome one place holy & an other prophane: but a• places are indifferent, neither canst thou more hartily & better beleue, trust, and loue God in the temple at the altar, in the churchyard, then in thy •arne, vineyard: kitchine, or bed. And to be shorte, the martyrs of Christ haue honored him in darcke dungeons and prisons. &c.

31 He rayleth agaynst all the rites and ceremonies of the Masse, as he were mad fol 68.

The place out of the which this article is collected, is as followeth. * If a Nunne touch the superaltare or the Corpores (as they call it) it is a sinne. To touche the Chalice, is a great transgression. To say Masse with an vnhalowto Chalice, is a greuous offence. To doe sacrifice in vestimentes which are not consecrated, is a haynous crime. It is reputed for a sinne if in ministring any Sacrament, the Priest doe lacke any ornament that perteyneth thereunto, If he call a childe, or speake in the wordes of the Canon, it is a sinne. He offendeth also that doth stut or stamber in the wordes of the Canon. He sinneth that toucheth the holy Reliques of Sayntes. He that toucheth the Sacrament of the aultar eyther with hand or finger, though it be for necessity to plucke it from the roufe of his mouth, committeth such villanous iniquity, that they will scrape & shaue of the quick flesh from the part which, did touch it. I think at length they will sley the tounge, the roufe of the mouth, y^e throte, and the belly, because they touch the sacrament. But to hurt thy neighbor, or priuily to conuey away any of his goods, or not to helpe him in his need, is in a maner counted for no sinne, nor yet regarded. &c.

*32 No labor is now a dayes more tedious then saying of Masse Mattens. &c. Which before God are nothing but greuous sinnes fol, 70.

*33 The sinnes of Manasses and other wicked kinges sacrificing theyr owne children, are but light and childish offences to those. The cursed sacrifices of the Gentiles may not be compared to ours, we are seuen times worse Gētiles then we were before we knew Christ. fol. 70.

*The wordes out of the whiche these two Articles are gathered are these. They are so oppressed (those hee meaneth which are vnder the seruitude of the Popes lawes & decrees) that they fulfill them onely with the outwarde worke: for theyr willes are cleane contrary, as we see by experience in troublesome busines of Uigilles, Masses, & Houres, which both must be sayd and song. In the which they labour with such wearinesse, that now a dayes no labour is more tedious. Yet neuerthelesse the cruell exactors of these moste hard workes, compell men to worke such thinges without ceasing, which before God are nothing but grieuous sinnes: although before men they be good workes and counted for the seruice of God. Here are inuēted the intisementes of the senses through organes, musicke and diuersity of songes: but these are nothing to the spirit, which rather is extinct through these wantō trifles. Ah Christ, with what violence, with what power are they driuen headlong to sinne, & perish through this abomination?

It is horrible to looke into these cruell wherlepoles of consciences,* which perish with so great paynes and labor what light offences to these are the sinnes wherin Manasses and other wicked kinges sinned by doing sacrifice with theyr owne children and progeny? Truely the cursed sacrifices of the most rude gentils, no not of the Lestrigones may be compared vnto ours. The saying of Christ may be verified in vs: seuen more wicked spirites make the ende worse then the beginning. For I say that we Gentiles are worse 7. times then we were before we knew Christ. &c.

34 It were better to receiue neither of the partes of the sacramēt of the aulter,*then the one alone. fol. 73.

The wordes be these. Playnely I thinke that y^e whole is takē away, sith I see manifestly the one part gone (for y^e bread & the wine is but one sacramēt) the other is left only for a laughing stocke. For he that in one part offendeth against god, is guilty in al. Therefore it were better to receiue neither of the partes, then the one alone: for so we might y^e more su•ely eschue the transgression of that which Christe did institute. &c.

35. The law of the Pope that commaundeth euery man to communicate together vpon one day, is a most cruell law constrayning men to theyr owne destruction. fol. 73.

The place is this. He (the Pope he meaneth) setting a most cruell and deadly snare to tangle the consciences, suffereth not the vse of this Sacrament to be free, but cōpelleth all together on one certayne day once in the yeare to communicate. Here I pray thee Christē brother, how many doest thou thinke do communicate onely by the cōpulsion of this precept, which truely in theyr hart had leuer not to communicate? And all these sinne (for they doe not communicate in spirite, that is to say,* neither in fayth nor will, but by the compulsion of this letter and law (sith that this bread requireth a hungry and not a full hart, & muche lesse a disdayning & hateful minde. And of all these sinnes, the Pope is author, constrayning all men by his most cruell lawe to theyr owne destruction, where as he ought to leaue this communion free to euery man, and onely call & exhort them, and not compell and driue them vnto it. &c.

36 The spirit would that nothing should be done, but that which is expressly rehearsed in scripture· fol. 81.*

In thinges appertayning to Gods worship and seruice, true it is that he is not to be worshipped,* but only according to that which he hath reuealed & expressed vnto vs in his owne word. And this is the meaning of the author, as by his wordes doth playnely appeare.

37 Saynt Thomas de Aquino sauoreth nothing of the spirite of God. fol. 83.*

The doctrine of Thomas Aquine referreth the greatest or a very great part of our righteousness to opus operatū, and vnto merites.* The spirit of God referreth al our righteousness before God, onely to our fayth in Christ. Nowe how these sauor together, let any indifferent reader iudge.

38 The Pope did condemne the truth of the word of God openly at Constance in Io. Hus,perseuering vnto this day in the same stubbernes. fol. 86.

Touching the condemnation of Iohn Hus, & the maner of his handling & the cause of his death, read his storye before beginning pag. 602. and consider moreouer his prophecy of the hundreth yeares after him expyred pag. 770. how truly the sequele did folow in M. Luther, & thē iudge of his cause, good reader, as the truth of Gods worde shall lead thee. And thus much concerning these slaūderous articles.

Here follow other heresyas and errors,* collected by the Byshops out of the booke named the Summe of the Scripture, with the places of the booke annexed to the same.

THE water of the fount hath no more vertue in it then hath any other water. fol. 1.*

2 The water of Baptisme lyeth not in halowed water or in other outward thing, but onely in fayth. fol. 6.

The place of these two articles gathered out of y^e sūme of the Scripture is this.* The water of Baptisme taketh not away our sinne: for then were it a precious water, and then it behoued vs dayly to wash our selues therein.* Neyther hath the water of the Fount more vertue in it selfe, thē the water that runneth in the riuer of Rhene. Whē Philip baptised the Eunuch, the seruant of Candace, the Queene of Ethiope, there was then no halowed water, nor candle, nor salte nor creame, neither white habite:* but he baptised him in the first water they came to vpō y^e way. Here mayst thou perceiue that the vertue of Baptisme lyeth not in halowed water, or in the outward thinges that we haue at y^e Fount, but in the fayth onely. &c. Christ hath healed vs (sayth S. Paule by the bath of regeneration and renouation of the holy Ghost.*

3 Godfathers and Godmothers be bound to helpe theyr childrē that they be put to schole, that they may vnderstand the Gospell,*and the Epistles of S. Paule. fol. 15.

The place of this article gathered out of the sayd booke is this: The Godfathers and Godmothers be bounde to helpe the children that they be put to schole, to the entent,* y^t they may vnderstand the Gospell, the ioyfull message of God, with the Epistles of S. Paule, God hath commaun'ded to publish, & to shew the Gospell, not onely to priestes but to euery creature. Goe ye (sayth Christ vnto his Disciples) into the vniuersall world and preach the Gospell to euery creature.* For we be all equally bound to knowe the Gospell and the doctrine of the new testament. &c. And S. Paule writing to the Corinthi. confesseth that hee sendeth hs Epistles to all the Church, that is to say, to all the assemble of Christen men, & to all them that call •n the name of Iesus. &c.

4 We thinke when we beleue that God is God, & can our creed, that we haue the fayth that a christian man is bound to haue:*but so doth the deuill beleue. fol. 17.

5 To beleue that the Father, the Sonne & the holy Ghost be one God, is not the principall that we must beleue: our fayth dooth not lye principally in that, for so beleueth the deuill. fol. 18.*

This place out of the which these two articles are collec'ted, is this: We thinke, when we beleue that God is God,* and can our Creede, that we haue the fayth which a Christian is bound to haue. The deuill beleueth also that there is a God and life euerlasting, and a hell,* but hee is neuer Page 1255 the better for it: and he trembleth alway for this fayth, as sayth Saint Iames, The deuils beleue, and they tremble. A man might aske:* what shall I then beleue? Thou shalt beleue playnely and vndoubtedly that the father, the sonne and the holy Ghost is one only God. &c. But this likewise beleue the wicked spirites, and are nothing the better ther'fore. There is yet an other fayth which Christ so much requireth of vs in the Gospell, and whereunto S. Paule almost in all his Epistle so strongly exhorteth vs, that is, that we beleue the Gospell, when our Lord began first to preach, he sayd (as rehearseth S. Marke) repent and beleue the Gospell. Of this fayth, read before in the first Article gathered out of the wicked Mammon, and in the ix. and x. of the Reuelation of Antichrist.*

6 If we beleue that God hath promised euerlasting life, it is impossible that we should perish. fol. 20.*

Lo here good Reader, an other manifest example of the vn honest dealing and false cogging of these mē. For where the place of the author, speaketh expressely of putting our trust in God & his promises, the article pretily leaueth out our trusting in gods promise, & fayth onely: if we beleue y^t god hath promised.* Read the place and conferre it with the article & then iudge whether there be no differēce betwene trusting in the promise y^t God hath made of euerlasting life and beleuing onely that God hath made the promise of euerlasting life. The place here foloweth as it is there, written.

When with a perfect courage we put all our trust in god and in his promises, it is impossible that we should perish for he hath promised vs life euerlasting. And for as much as he is almighty, he may well performe that that he hath promised: and in that he is mercifull and true, he will performe his promise made vnto vs, if we can beleue it stedfastly, and put all our trust in him.

*7 If thou canst surely and stedfastly beleue in God, he will holde his promise. For he hath bound himselfe to vs, and by his promise he oweth vs heauen: in case that we beleue him. fol. 21.

Seing all our hope standeth onely vpon the promise of God, what heresy then is in this doctrine, to say that God oweth vs heauen by his promise,* whiche is no other to meane but that God can not breake promise. And nowe iudge thou good reader whether is more heresy to say, that God oweth vs heauen by his promise, as we say: or this, that God oweth vs heauen by the condignity & congruity of our workes as the Papists say?

*8 All Christes glory is ours. fol. 27.

*9 We neede not to labour for to be Christes heyres and sonnes of God, and to haue heauen: for we haue all these thinges already fol. 24.

The words out of the which these two heresyas are gathered, be these: We be made his heyres, and al his glory is ours, as S. Paule largely declareth. This hath God geuen vs without our deseruing and we need not to labour for all these thinges, for these we haue already. &c.

They which note these articles for heresy, by the same iudgement they may make heresy of S. Iohns gospel, & of Paules epistles,* and of al together. S. Iohn sayth, the glory which thou gauest me, I haue geuen thē that they may be one, as we also are one. As many as receiued him, to thē gaue he power to be the sonnes of God. S. Paule sayth: The same spirit certifieth our spirit,* that we are the sonnes of God.* If we be sonnes, then are we also heyres, y^e heyres I meane of God, and heyres annexed with Christ.

10 We need not to labor by our good workes to get euerlasting life:*for we haue it already: we be all iustified, we be all the childrē of God. fol. 28.

*11 All that thinketh that good workes helpe or profite any thing to get the gift of saluation, they blaspheme agaynst God and rob God of his honour. fol. 28.

12 If we be circumcised, that is to say, if we put any trust in workes,*Christ shall not helpe vs. fol. 18.

13 We deserue nothing of God. fol. 30.

*14 We deserue not euerlasting life by our good woorkes, for God hath promised it vnto vs,*before that we began to do good. fol. 40.

*15 Euery Christian man muste keepe Gods commaundementes by loue, and not by hope, to gette for his seruice euerlasting lyfe. fol. 42.

16 The Iewes kept the commaundementes, and the law of God: yet they could not come to heauen.*fol. 43.

17 Men trusting in theyr good workes, are like to the theefe on the left side,*and are such men as commeth to the Church daylye, keepeth holydayes and fasting dayes, and heareth masses, & these people be soonest damned: for this is one of the greatest errors in Christendome, to thinke that thy good workes shall helpe to thy saluation.*fol. 47.

If these articles be made heresy, which referre the benefite of our inheritance of life and saluation to Gods gyft, & not to our labors: to grace and not to merits: to faith and not to the law of workes, thē let vs shut vp clean the new testament, & away with Gods word, and set vp a new diuinity of the Popes making: yea let vs leaue Christ with his hereticall gospell, and in his stead sette vp the Byshop of Rome with his Talmud, and become the Disciples 〈◇〉 his decretals. And certes, except christen princes begynne betime to sake some zeale of God vnto them, & looke more seriously vpon the matter, the proceedinges of these men seme to tend to litle better, then to driue vs at length from true Christianity, to an other kinde and forme of religion of theyr owne inuention, if they haue not brought it well neare to passe already.

18 To serue God in a tediousnesse, or for feare of hel,*or for the ioyes of heauen, is but shadowes of good workes, and such seruice doth not please God. fol. 41.

The place is this: Works done in faith, be alonely pleasant vnto God, and worthy to be called good workes:* for they be the works of the holy ghost that dwelleth in vs by this fayth. But they that are done by tediousnes and euill will, for feare of hell, or for desire of heauen, be nothing els but shadowes of workes, making hipocrites. The end of our good works is onely to please god, knowledging that if we do neuer so much, we can neuer do our duty: for they that for feare of hell, or for the ioyes of heauen do serue god do a constraigned seruice, which God will not haue. Such people do not serue God because he is their God and their father, but to haue theyr reward and to auoyd his punishments, and such people are hyred men and waged seruaūtes, & are not children. But the children of God serue theyr father for loue. &c.

19 We must loue death, & more desire to dye, then to feare death fol. 36.*

Although our nature be frayle & full of imperfectiō, so that we do not as we should, yet doing as we ought & as we are lead by the Scriptures to do, we should not dread, but desire rather to dye and to be with Christ, as the place it selfe doth well declare, which is this:

We must loue death,* and more desire to die and to be w^t god, as did S. Paul, then to feare death. For Iesus Christ dyed for vs, to the intent that we shoulde not feare to dye, and he hath slayn death, and destroyd the sting of death, as writeth S. Paule, saying: O death where is thy sting?* death is swallowed vp in victory. And to the Philippians:* Christ is to me life, and death is to me aduauntage.

20 God made vs his children and his heires,*while we were his enemies, and before we knew him. fol. 44.

I maruell what the Papistes meane in the Registers to condemn this article as an heresy, vnlesse theyr purpose be vtterly to impugne & gainstand the scripture, & the writings of S. Paule, who in the fift chapter to the Rom. & other his Epistles, importeth euen the same doctrine in all respectes, declaring in formall words that we be made the children and heyres of God, and that we were reconciled vnto him when we were his enemies.

21 It were better neuer to haue done good worke, and aske mercy therefore, then to do good workes,*and thinke that for thē god is bound to a man by promise. fol. 48.

22 We can shew no more honor to God,*then fayth and trust in him. fol. 48.

The place out of the which these two articles are gathered, is this:.* It were better for thee a thowsande folde that thou haddest bene a sinner, and neuer had done good deed, & to acknowledge thine offences & euill life vnto God, asking mercy with a good hart, lamenting thy sinnes, then to haue done good workes & in them to put thy trust, thinking that therfore God were bound to thee. There is nothing, which (after the maner of speaking) bindeth God, but fyrme and stedfast fayth and trust in him & his promises. &c. For we can shew vnto God no greater honor, then to haue faith and trust in him: For whosoeuer doth that, he confesseth that God is true, good, mighty & mercifull. &c.

23 Fayth without good workes, is no litle or no feeble faith,*but it is no fayth. fol. 50.

24 Euery man doth as much as he beleueth. fol. 50.

The place out of the which the two Articles be gathered, is this:.* If thy fayth induce thee not to do good workes thē hast thou not y^e right fayth, thou doest but onely thinke that thou hast it. For S. Iames sayth, that fayth wythout workes is dead in it selfe. He sayth not that it is little or feeble, but that it is dead and that is dead, is not.* Therefore whē thou art not moued by fayth vnto the loue of god and by the loue of god vnto good works, thou hast no fayth but fayth is dead in thee, for the spirit of God that by fayth commeth in to our hartes to styrre vp loue, cannot be idle.* Euery one doth as much as he beleueth, & loueth as much as he hopeth, as writeth S. Iohn. He that hath thys hope that he is the sonne of god, purifieth himself, as he is pure.*Page 1256 He sayth not, he that purifieth himselfe hath this hope, for the hope must come before, proceeding from the fayth, as it behoueth that the tree must first be good which must bring forth good fruit.

25 We cannot be without motions of euill desires: but we must mortify them in resisting them.*fol. 52

They which note this article of heresy, may note them selues rather to be like the Pharisy. Luke. 18. who foolishly flattering himselfe in the false opinion of his owne righteousnes, was not subdued to the righteousnes, which standeth before God,* by fayth, and therefore went home to his house lesse iustified then the publican. If the scriptures condemne the hart of man to be crooked euen from his youth Gene. 6. and also condemneth all the righteousnes of man to be like a filed cloth, & if S. Paule could finde in his flesh no good thing dwelling, but sheweth, a cōtinuall resistance betwene the old man and the new, then must it folow, that these phariseis which condemne this article of heresy, eyther cary no flesh, nor no old man about them to be resisted or verely, say what they will, they can not choose but bee combred with euill motions for the inward man continually to fight agaynst. The place of the authour sufficiently defendeth it selfe, as foloweth.

S. Paule byddeth vs mortify all our euill desyres and carnall lustes, as vncleanesse, couetousnesse, wrath, blasphemy,* detractation, pride, and other like vices. And vnto the Rom. 6. he sayth: let no sinne raigne in your mortall bodyes. That is to say, albeit that we cannot liue without the motion of suche euill desires, yet we shall not suffer them to rule in vs, but shall mortifye them in resisting them. &c.

26 All true Christianity lyeth in loue of our neighbors for God, and not in fasting,*keeping of holy dayes, watching, praying, and singing long prayers dayly and all day long, hearing Masse, running on pilgrimage. &c. fol. 52.

The place of this article is this: Thou hast alwaies occasion to mortify thine euill desires to serue thine neighbor,* to comfort him, and to helpe him with word and deed, with coūsell and exhortation and other semblable meanes. In such loue towardes our neighbor for the loue of God, lyeth all the law and the prophets (as saith Christ) yea and all christianity: and not in fasting, keeping of holydayes, watching, singing, and long praiers daily and all day lōg, hearing of masses, setting vp of candles, running on pilgrimages and such other things, which as well the hypocrites, proud people, enuious and subiect to all wicked affections, do. &c.

27 Many Doctors in diuinity, and not onely common people beleueth that it is the part of Christen fayth onely to beleue that Iesus Christ hath liued here in earth. fol. 53.54.*

The place is this: We beleue that Iesus Christ hath here liued-on earth, and that he hath preached, and that he dyed for vs,* and did many other thinges. When we beleue these things after the story, we beleue that this is our christen fayth. This not onely the simple people beleueth, but also Doctors in diuinity, which are takē for wise men. Yea the deuill hath also this fayth, as sayth S. Iames: The deuils beleue, and they tremble. For as we haue sayd before, the deuil beleueth that God is God, and that Iesus Christ hath here preached, that he dyed, was buried, and rose agayn▪ Thus must we also beloue, but this is not the fayth wherof speaketh the Gospell and S. Paul. &c.

Of this fayth and what it is, read before in the place of the 4 and 5. articles of this booke, and of the 1. Article gathered out of the wicked Mammon, and the 9. and 10. article of the Reuelation of Antichrist.

28 He that doth good agaynst his will, he doth euill. fol. 56.

The place is this: A• good deedes which are not done by loue and good wil, are sinne before God as saith S. Augustine. He that doth good against his wil, doth euil, albeit that he doth, be good. For that I do agaynst my wil, I hate and whē I hate the commaundement, I hate also him that hath commaunded it. &c.

29 No man doth more then he is bound to do, and therefore no man may make other partakers of theyr good workes fol. 59•*

The words be these: The Prophet Esay sayth: we are all as an vncleane thing, and all our iustice is as it were a filthy cloth and therefore I can neuer maruell enough, that many of the religious persons would make other partakers of theyr good workes,* seeing that Christ sayth in the Gospell: when ye haue done all those things which are cōmaunded you: say, we are vnprofitable seruantes we haue done but that which was our duety to doe. For none can do to much. None doth more then he is bound to doe, but onely Iesus Christ (which onely as sayth S. Peter neuer did sinne, neither was there deceit found in his mouth) hath done that he was not bound to doe: and as the Prophet Esay sayth, hath taken vpon him our infirmities, and borne our sorrowes, he was wounded for our offences, & smitten for our wickednesse, & by his stripes are we made whole. &c.

30 Christ hath gotten heauen by his passion, but that right hath he no need of,*but hath graunted it to all them that beleue in hys promises. fol. 59,

Read the place: Iesus Christ possesseth the kingdome of heauē by double right.* First because he is the sonne of god and very inheritor of his kingdome. Secondly because he hath gottē it by his passion and death. Of his second right he hath no neede, and therefore he geueth it to all them that beleue and trust in him and in his promises.

31 If God had promised vs heauen for our good woorkes,*wee should euer be vnsure of our saluation fol. 59.

32 Be our sinnes neuer so great,*that it seemeth impossible to vs to be saued, yet without any doubt we must beleue to be saued. fol. 59.

The wordes out of the which these two articles be gathered are these: If God had promised heauen vnto vs be'cause of our workes, we should euer then be vnsure of our saluation. For we should neuer know how much,* nor how long we should labor to be saued, & should euer be in feare that we had done to litle, and so we should neuer dye ioyfully. But God would assure vs of heauen by his promise, to the entent we should be certayne and sure, for he is the trueth and cannot lye: and also to the intent that we should haue trust and hope in him. And notwithstanding that after the greatnes & multitude of our sinnes, it seeme to vs a thing impossible, yet alwayes we must beleue it without any doubt, because of his sure promise. And who soeuer doth this, he may ioyfully dye and abide the iudgement of god, which els▪ were intollerable. Read more hereof before in the xi. article taken out of the wicked Mammon.

33. If thou loue thy wife because shee is thy wife, that is no loue before God:but thou shalt loue her because shee is thy sister in God. fol. 83.

The wordes be these: Our Sauour Christ hath commaunded nothing so straightly as to loue an other: yea to loue our enemies also. Then how much more shoulde the man & wise loue together. But there be but few that know how to loue the one the other as they ought to do. If thou loue thy wife onely because she is thy wife, and because she serueth and pleaseth thee after the flesh, for beauty, byrth, ri'ches, and such like this is no loue before god. Of such loue speaketh not S. Paule. For suche loue is among harlots, yea among brute beastes: but thou shalt loue her because she is thy sister in the christen faith, and because she is inheritour together with thee in the glory of God, & because ye serue together one God, because ye haue receaued together one baptisme

&c. Thou shalt also loue her for her vertues, as shamefastnes, chastitie and diligence, sadnes, pacience, temperance, secrecy obediēce, and other godly vertues &c.

34. It is nothing but all incredulitie to runne in pilgrimage and seeke God in one certayne places,*which is like mightye in all places. fol. 62.

The matter of this article is euident to all indifferent & learned iudgementes to be voyde of all doubt of heresie.

35. Men should see that their children come to Churche to heare the sermon. fol. 89.*

The place of this article is this: On the Festiuall dayes thou shalt bring thy children to the church to heare the sermon, and when thou shalt come home,* thou shalt ask them what they haue kept in memory of the sermon. Thou shalt teach thē the Christian fayth. Thou shalt admonish thē to liue well, and to put all their hope and trust in God, and rather to dye, then to do any thing that is against the will of God. And principally thou shalt learne them the contentes of the prayer of our Sauour Christ, called y^e Pater noster, that is to say how they haue an other father in heauen, of whom thy must seeke for all goodnesse, and without whom they can haue no good thing: & how that they may seeke nothing in all theyr workes, and in all theyr intents, but the honor of theyr heauenly father: And how they must desire that this father would gouerne all that they doe, or desire: And how that they must submit all to his holy wil, which cannot be but good. &c. Thou shalt buy them wholsome bookes, as the holy Gospell, the epistles of the holye Apostles, yea both the new & the old Testament, that they may vnderstand and drinke of the sweet fountayne & waters of life.

36 Thou shalt not vexe or greue by iustice or otherwise the pore that oweth vnto thee: for thou mayest not doe it without sinne.*fol 97.

The place is this: Thou shalt not vexe or greue by iustice. &c. as Christ sayth: resist not euill,* but whosoever striketh thee on the right cheeke, turn to him the other also. &c. S. Paul sayth: Render not euil for euil,* and if it be possible as much as is in you, liue in peace with all men, not reuēging Page 1257 your selues my welbeloued, but geue place to wrath for• is written: to me the vengeance, and I will render it, sayth the Lord God.

*37. Some textes of Canon law suffereth warre, but the teaching of Christ forbidde•h all warres. Neuerthelesse when a City is besieged, or a country inuaded, the Lord of the country is bounde to put his life in ieopardy for his subiectes. fol. 119.

*38 So a Lord may vse horrible warre charitably and Christianly: fol. 119.

As touching warre, to be moued or styrred first of our parts agaynst any people or country vpon any rash cause, as ambi•ion, malice, or reuēge, the gospell of Christ geueth vs no such sword to fight withall. Notwithstanding for defence of coūtry and subiectes, the magistrate being inuaded or prouoked by other, may lawfully, and is bound to do his best, as the city of Mar•urgh did well in defending it selfe agaynst the Emperour. &c.

39. The gospell maketh all true Christen men seruauntes to all the world. fol. 79.

*He that compiled this article craftely to make y^e matter to appeare more haynous, leaueth out y^e latter, part which should expound the other, that is, by the rule of charity: for that the author addeth withall. By which rule of charitye, and not of office and duety, euery christen man is boūd one to help another, as Christ himselfe being Lord of all, yet of charity was a seruaunt to euery man, to do him good, read the place of the summe of the scripture in the page as in the article it is assigned.

*40. The Gospell is written for all persons, estates, Prince, Duke, Pope, Emperour. fol. 112.

They which noted this article for an heresy, I suppose could litle tell either what GOD, or what the Scripture meaneth.

*41. When iudges haue hope that an euill doer will amend they must be alwayes mercifull, as Christ was to the woman taken in aduou•ry. The temporall law must obey the Gospell and thē that we may attēd by warning, we shall not correct by iustice. fol. 113.

The purpose of the book whence this article is wrasted being well vnderstood, intendeth not to binde tēporal iudges and magistrates, from due executiō of good lawes, but putteth both them, and especiall spiritual iudges, in remēbraunce by the example of Christ to discern who be penitent offēders, and who be otherwise, and where they see euident hope of earnest repentance and amendment, if they be ecclesiasticall iudges, to spare them: if they be ciuill magistrates, yet to temper the rigour of the law (as much as they conueniently may) with merciful moderation, which the Greekes do call 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 .

And thus much hitherto of these heresies and Articles collected by the byshops, & inserted in theyr own registers one of the bookes ab••e specified. The names of y^e bishops and collectors were these: Syr Tho. More, L. Chaūcellor Wil. Warham Archb. of Cant. Tunstall bish. of London. Ste. Gardiner, G. of Wint. Rich. Sampson Deane of the chappel, Rich. Wolman M. of Requestes, Iohn Bell, D. Wilson, with a great number moe, as in the registers doth appeare. Ex Regist. Cant & Londinensi,

*I shall not need I trust (gentle reader) further here to tary thee with reciting mo places: whē these already reher'sed may suffice for a taste & a triall for thee sufficient to note and consider how falsely & most slaunderously these catholickes haue deptraued, and misreported the books and writings of good men, who might almost gather heresies as well of S. Iohns gospell, & S. Paules epistles, as out of these places. Thus may we see, what cannot malice do, being set on mischief? or what cannot the spirite of spite and cau•lling finde out, being inflamed with hatred, & blowne with the bellowes of ambition and iniquity? * And as they haue done with these, the like partes they haue and do practise stil against al other: whosoeuer in defēce of truth, dare touch neuer so litle either the Popes crowne, or the bellies of his clergy: for these ij. sores in no case they can abide to be touched. And hereof onely cōmeth all this crying out, he'resy, heresy, blasphemy, error & schisme. Although the doctrine be neuer so sound and perfect after the scripture, yet if the writer be not such in all pointes (especially in these two aboue touched) as wil sing after theyr tune, and daunce after theyr pipe (he is by & by an) hereticke, * by vertue of theyr Inquisition. So did they with the Articles of the learned Erle Ioannes Picus Mirandula. So did they with Ioh. Rencline or Cap[•]ion. So did they also with good Iohn Colet here in England. Also with the like spirite of lying & caulling, the catholicke faculties of Louane, Spain and Paris condemned the works and writings of Erasmus & many mo. So full they are of censures, articles, suspicious, offences, inquisitions, so captions they be in taking, so rash in iudging, so slaunderous of reporte, so practised in deprauing, misconstruing and wrasting true meaninges into wrong purposes, briefly so pregnant they be in finding he^resies where none are, that either a man must say nothing, or serue theyr deuotiō, or els he shall procure theyr displeasure, that is, shall be demed for an hereticke. Yea & though no iust cause of any heresy be ministred, yet wher they once take disliking, they will not sticke sometimes with false accusations to presse him w^t matter, which he neuer spake nor thought. If Luther had not styrrd against the Popes pardons and authority, he had remayned still a white sōne of the mother Catholick church, and all had bene wel done whatsoever he did. But because he aduentured to touche once y^e triple crowne, what flouds of heresies, blasphemies and articles were cast out against him, enough to drown a whole world? what lyes and forged crimes were inuented agaynst him?

Here now cōmeth Staphylus and furious Surius,^{*} w^t theyr fraternity, and say, that he learned his Diuinity of the deuill. The foloweth an other certain Chronographer who in his lying story reporteth most falsely, that Luther dyed of dronkennes. With like malice the sayd Chronogra^pher writeth also of M. Bucer, falsely affirming vpon his information, that he should deny at his death, Christ our Messias to be come. When not onely D. Redman whiche preached at his buriall, but also all English men, whiche knew the name of Bucer, did know it to be contrary.

So was it laid against one Singleton Chapplein some time to Queene Anne Bullen,^{*} that he was the murderer of Packington, and afterward, that he was a styrrer vp of sedition & cōmotion: who also suffered as a traytor for the same: Where in very deed the true cause was for nothing els, but for preaching the Gospell vnto the people, whose purpose was euer so farre of from styrring sedition, that he neuer once dreamed of any such matter, as he himselfe declared and protested to one R. Lante his scholer, who is yet aliue and can testify the truth hereof. But this is no new practise amongst the Romish Bishops: whereof enough hath bene sayd before in the story of Syr Ioh. Oldcastle, and Syr Roger Acton. &c.

An other like practise of such malicious slaunder wee finde also in one Meriall a Brickleyer,^{*} whose name w^t hys abiuration remayneth yet in the Registers of the Byshop of London.

The story is this, and not vnworthy to be remembred. In the yeare of our Lord. 1534. whiche was about the first beginning of Queene Anne Bullen, at what time Purgatory and such trompery began to grow in contempt. Stokesly Bishop of London made a sermon in the Shroudes vpon the Sondag before May day:^{*} Where he preaching in the commendation and vertue of Masses, declared to the people that for a little cost, if they procured Masses to be sayd, wiues might deliuer their husbandes, and husbandes their wiues out of the bitter paynes of purgatory. At thys sermon, besides many other, was Thomas Meriall, a zelous fauourer of Gods word: who being on the watche on May euen, made relation of these wordes of the Byshop vnto the company about him, amongst whom then was one Iohn Twyford, a furious papist, and who had y^e same time the setting vp of the stakes in Smithfield, wherat the good Saintes of God were burned.

This Twyford whiche then kept a Tauerne and had an old grudge agaynst y^e sayd Meriall for striking his boy hearing these words: *allured home to his house certain per^sons, to the number of x. Whose names were these: Blackwell, Laurence Wilson, Thomas Clarke, Iohn Duffild, W. Kenningham, Thomas Hosier, Worme a cutler, Alen Ryse, with an other whiche was the tenth. Besides these he procured also secretly M. Chābers Clerke whose name was Bright. And when he had craftily ouercome them w^t wyne, & made them to report what wor[•]es he listed, and which they knew not thēselues, the Clerkes by and by receaued y^e same in writing. Wherupō this article was gathe^red agaynst Meriall, that he should holde and affirme, that y^e passion of Christ doth not help thē which came after him but onely them which were in Limbo before: * & also that he should say y^t his wife was as good as our Lady. Upō this writing of the Notary, he was immediately brought to bishop Stokesly, and therby y^t depositiō of these x. false witnesses wrōgfully accused, and also for the same should haue be condemned, had not Doct. Barret the same tyme, byd him speake one word (which he knew not) as the sentence was in reading, whereby y^e condemnation was stayd and he put to doe open penaunce and to beare a Fagotte. * Notwithstanding the sayd Meriall sware before the Byshop that he neuer spake nor ment any such words as there was sayd vnto him, but onely recited the wordes of the bishops sermō, reporting the same in the person of the bishop, and not his owne. Whiche also was testified to bee true by the othes of 3. other, to witte, W. Tōson▪ Gregory Newman▪ Page 1258 and W. Witte, who being in the foresayde watch the same time, did take vpon theyr oth before the Bishop: that hys wordes were no other, but as is aboue declared. Which 3. witnesses at the second edition hereof were also liuing, w^t the wife of the foresayd Meriall, who woulde then also be sworne that the same is true. Where as contrary the other x. persons be al gone, and none of them all remayning. Of whome moreouer the most of all the sayd x. came to a miserable end where as the other 3. which testified the truth w^t Meriall, being liuing at the 2. editiō hereof, did see the ende of all the other. And as for Twyford, which was the executioner to F••th, Bayfield, Baynham, Teukesbury, Lambert, * and other good men, he died rotting aboue the groūd, that none could abide him, and so came to a wretched end. Ex testimon. vxoris Meriall, W. Tomson, Greg. Newman. W. Wit. &c.

Of thys malycious and peruerse dealinge of these men contrary to all truth & honesty, in defaming them for hereticks, * which in deed are none, & with opprobrious railing to slaunder their cause, which is nothing els but the simple truth of Christes gospel, who so listeth to search further (if these examples hitherto recited do not suffice) let hym read the story of Merindol, & Angrogne, pag. 945.955. Let him consider the furious Bull of Pope Martine. pag. 625. The like slaunderous Bull also of Pope Leo x. with the •dict of Charles the Emperour agaynst Luther. Also let hym suruey the railing stories of Surius the Monke of Colen, the booke of Osius, of Lindus, the Chronologie of Genebrardus, the story of Cochleus agaynst the Hussites and the Lutheranes, with the Preface of Conradus Brunus the Lawyer prefixed before the same, wherein he most falselye and vntruely rayling agaynst these Protestantes, whom he calleth heretickes, chargeth them to be blasphemers of God, contemners of God and men, Church robbers cruell, false lyers, crafty deceiuers, vnfaythfull, promise breakers, disturbers of publicke peace and tranquility, corrupters and subuerters of commō weales, and all els that naught is.

*In much like •ort was Socrates accused of his countrymen for a corrupter of the youth, whō Plato notwithstanding defendeth. Aristides the iust lacked not his vniust accusers. Was it not obiected vnto S. Paule that hee was a subuerter of the law of Moyses, * and that we might do euill that good might come thereof? How was it layd to the Christian Martyrs in the primitiue Churth for worshiping an Asses head, and for sacrificing of Infantes. pag. 54? And to come more nere to these our latter daies, you heard likewise how falsely the Christian congregation of french,* men gathered together in the night at Paris, to celebrate y^e holy communion, were accused of filthy commixion of mē and women together, and the king the same time Henry 2. was made to beleue that beds with pillowes and mats were founde there in the floore where they laye together: wherupon the same time diuers were condēned to the fire and burned pag. 862. Finally what innocency is so pure, or truth so perfect, which can be voyd of these sclaunderers or crimynatiōs,* whē also our Sauior Christ himselfe was noted for a wine drinker, & a common haunter of the Publicanes? &c.

Euen so likewise it pleaseth our Lorde and Sauior Christ, to keepe vnder and to exercise his church vnder the like kinde of aduersaries now rainging in the church,* who vnder the name of the church will nedes mayntain a portly state and kingdome in this world, and because they can not vpholde theyr cause by playne scripture and the word of God, they beare it ou• with facing, rayling, and slaundering, making Princes and the simple people beleue, that all be heretickes, schismatickes, blasphemers, rebels & subuerters of all authority & commō weales, whosoever dare reply with any scripture agaynst theyr doings.

It is writtē of Nero, that when he himselfe had burnt the Citty of Rome sixe dayes and seuen nightes,* he made open proclamations that the innocent Christians had set the City on fire, to styrre the people agaynst them, wherby he might burne and destroy them, as rebels and traytors.

Not much vnlike seemeth the dealing of these religious Catholickes, who when they be the true heretickes themselues, and haue burnt and destroyed the Church of Christ, make out theyr exclamatiōs, Buls, briefes, articles bookes,* censures, letters and Edicts against the poore Lutheranes, to make the people beleue, that they be the heretickes, schismatickes, disturbers of the whole world. Who if they could proue them as they reprove them to be heretickes, they were worthy to be heard. But nowe they cry out vpon them heretickes, and can proue no heresy: they accuse them of errour: and can proue no errour: they call them schismatickes, and what Church since the worlde stood, hath bene the mother of so many schismes as the mother Church of Rome? They charge them with dissention and rebellion. And what dissention can be greater, then to dissēt from the scripture, and word of God? or what rebellion is like, as to rebell against the sonne of God, & against the will of hys eternall Testamente? They are disturbers (they say) of peace and of publicke authority: Which is as true, as that the Christians set the Citty of Rome on fire. What doctrine did euer attribute so much to publicke authority of Magistrates, as do the protestantes, or who euer attributed lesse to magistrates, or deposed moe dukes, kinges, and Emperours, thē the Papistes? They that say, that the Bishop of Rome is no more but the Bishoppe of Rome, and ought to weare no crowne, is not by and by a rebell agaynst his king and Magistrates, but rather a maynteyner of theyr authority: which in deed the Byshop of Rome cannot abide. Briefely, wilt thou see whether be the greater heretickes, the Protestantes or the Papistes? Let vs try it by a measure,* and let this measure be the glory onely of the sonne of God, which cannot fayle. Nowe iudge I beseeche thee, whosoever knowest the doctrine of them both, whether of these two do ascribe more or lesse to the Maiestye of Christ Iesus our king and Lord: the Protestantes which admit none other head of the Church nor iustifier of our soules, nor forgeuer of our sinnes, nor Aduocate to his father but him alone: Or els the papistes which can abide none of all these articles, but condemn the same for heresy. Which being so (as they themselues wyll not deny) now iudge (good reader) who hath set the Citty of Rome on fire. Nero, or els the Christians.

But to returne agayne to the purpose of our former matter, which was to shew forth the proclamation of the Byshops for the abolishing of English bookes aboue rehearsed, as being corrupt and full of heresye, whiche notwithstanding we haue declared to conteine no heresye, but sounde and wholesome doctrine, according to the perfect word and Scripture of God.

Here nowe when the Prelates of the Popes side had procured this Edict & proclamation aforesayd, for the condemnation of al such English bookes printed or vnprinted which made agaynst theyr aduantage, they triumphed not a litle, wening they had made a great hand against y^e Gospell for euer to rise againe, & that they had established their kingdome for euer, as in deed to all mās thinking it might seme no lesse. For who would haue thought,* after so strayt so precise, and so solemne a proclamation set forth & armed with the kinges terrible authority: also after the cruel execution of Anne Askewe, Lacels, and the rest: Item after the busy search moreouer and names taking of many other, of whom some were chased away, some apprehended and layd vp, diuers in present perill, & expectation of theyr attachment: who would haue thought (I say) otherwyse possible, but that y^e gospel must nedes haue an ouerthrow, seing what sure worke the papistes here had made, in setting vp theyr side, and throwing downe the contrary.

But it is no new thing in the Lord, to shew his power agaynst mans presūption,* that when he counteth himselfe most sure, then is he furthest of, and when he supposeth to haue done all, then is he new to begin agayne. So was it in the primitiue Church before Constantinus time, that when Nero, Domitianus, Maxentius, Decius, and other Emperours impugning the gospell & profession of Christ, did not onely constitute lawes and proclamations against the Christians, but also did ingraue the same lawes in tables of brasse, minding to make all thinges firme for euer and a day: yet we see, how with a litle turning of Gods hand, all theyr puissant deuises, & brasen lawes turned all to wind and dust. So little doth it auayle for man to wrastle agaynst the Lord and his procedinges. Howe so euer mans building is mortall and ruinous, of brickle bricke, and mouldring stones, the Lord neuer taketh in hande to builde, that either time can waste, or man can pluck down. What God setteth vp, there is neither power nor striuing to the contrary. What he entendeth, standeth: what he blesseth, that preuayleth. And yet mans vnquiet presumption will not cease still to erect vp towers of Babell against the Lord, which the higher they are builded vp,* fall with the great ruine. For what can stand, that standeth not with the Lord? Which thing as in example of all ages is to be seene: so in this late proclamation deuised by the bishops, is in like maner exemplified.

The which proclamation, though it was sore & terrible for the time, yet not long after,* by reason of the kings death (whō the Lord shortly therupon took to his mercy) it made at length but a castle come downe. So that where the prelates thought to make theyr Iubile, it turned them to the Threnes of Ieremy. Such be the admirable workings of the Lord of hostes, whose name be sanctified for euer.

Page 1259This I do not inferre for any other purpose, but onely for the workes of the Lord to be seene: premonishing thee (good Reader) withall that as touching the king (who in this Proclamation had nothing but the name onely) here is nothing spoken but to his laude and prayse. Who of hys owne nature & disposition,* was so inclinable and forward in all things vertuous and commendable, that the like enterprise of redresse of religion, hath not lightly bene sene in any other Prince christned: As in abolishing the stout and almost inuincible authority of the Pope, in suppressing mo'nasteries, in repressing custome of Idolatry & pilgrimage &c. Which enterprises, as neuer king of England dyd accomplish (though some beganne to attempt them) before him: so yet to this day we see but few in other Realmes dare folow the same.

If Princes haue alwayes theyr Counsell about them, that is but a common thing. If some time they haue euill counsell ministred that I take to be the fault rather of such as are about them,* then of princes themselues. So long as Queene Anne, Tho. Cromwell, B. Cranmer, M. Denny, D. Buts, with such like were about him, & could preuaile with him, what organe of Christes glorye did more good in the Church then he? as is apparant by such monuments, instrumentes and actes set forth by him, in setting vp the Bible in the church, in exploding the pope with his vile pardons, in remouing diuers superstitious ceremonies in bringing into order y^e inordinate orders of friers & sectes, in putting chantry priests to theyr pensions: in permitting white meate in Lent: in destroying Pilgrimage worship: in abrogating idle & superfluous holydaies, both by act publicke, and also by priuate letters sent to Boner, tending after this effect.

¶By the king.

Right reuerend father in God, right trusty and welbeloued, we greet you well. And whereas considering the manifolde inconueniences which haue ensued, and dayly do ensue to our subiectes by the great superfluity of holy dayes, we haue by the assentes and consentes of all you the Byshops, and other notable personages of the Clergy of this our Realme, in ful congregation and assembly had for that purpose, abrogated and abolished suche as be neither Canonically, ne meete to bee suffered in a common wealth, for the manifolde inconueniences which do ensue of the same, as is rehearsed: and to the intent our determination therein may be duely obserued and accomplished, we haue thought cōuenient, to commaūd you immediately vpon the receit hereof, to addresse your commaundementes in our name to all the curates, religious houses, and colledges within your dioces, with a cōpye of the act made for the abrogation of the holy dayes aforesayd, a transumpt whereof ye shall receiue herewith, commaunding thē and euery of them in no wise, eyther in the Church or otherwise, to indict or speake of any of the sayd dayes and feastes abolished, wherby the people might take occasion either to murmure, or to contemne the order taken therein, and to continue in theyr accustomed idlenes, the same notwithstanding: but to passe ouer the same with such secret silence, as they may haue like abrogation by disuse, as they haue already by our authority in conuocation. And forasmuch as the time of haruest now approacheth, our pleasure is, ye shall with such diligence and dexterity, put this matter in execution, as it may immediatly take place, for the benefite of our subiectes, at this time accordingly without fayling, as ye wil aunswere vnto vs for the contrary. Geuen vnder our Signet, at our Monastery of Chertesey, the 11. day of August.

Thus while good Counsell was about him, and could be heard,* he did much good. So agayne when sinister and wicked Counsell, vnder subtile and craftye pretences had gotten once the foot in, thrusting truth & verity out of the Princes eares, how much Religion and all good thinges went prosperously forward before, so much on the cōtrary side all reuolted backward agayn.

Wherupō proceded this Proclamation aboue mētioned, concerning the abolishing and burning of English bookes. Which proclamation bearing the name of the kinges maiesty, but being y^e very deed of the bishops, no doubt had done much hurt in the church among the godly sort, bringing thē either into great daūger, or els keping thē in much blindnes, had not the shortnes of the kinges dayes stopped the malignant purposes of the foresayd Prelates,* causing the king to leaue that by death vnto y^e people, which by his life he would not graūt. For within 4. monethes after,* the proclamatiō cōming out in August, he deceased in the beginning of Ianuary, in the 38. yeare of his raigne. an. 1547. leauing behinde him three children, who succeded him in his kingdome, K. Edward, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth: of whom it remaiⁿeth now to prosecute (by the permission and sufferance of Christ our high Lord and Prince) in the proces of this hystory, according as the order of theyr succession, and Actes done by them in the church shall require, after that fyrst I shall haue prosecuted certayne other matters by the way, according to my promise, here to be inserted.

¶The History touching the persecution in Scotland, with the names and causes of such blessed Martyres, which in the same country suffered for the truth after the time of Patricke Hamelton.

THus hauing finished the time and rase of kyng Henry the eight, it remayneth now according to my promise made before, here to place & adioyne so much as hath come to our handes, touching the persecution of Scotland, and of the blessed Martyrs of Christ, which in that coūtry likewise suffered for the true religion of Christ, & testimony of theyr fayth.

To proceede therefore in the historye of these Scotland matters,* next after the mention of Dauid Straton and M. Nicholas Gurlay, with whom we ended before. pag. 956. the order of time woulde requyre nexte to inferre the memory of syr Iohn Borthwike Knight,* commonly called Captayn Borthwike. Who being accused of heresy (as the papistes call it) and cited therefore. an. 1540. and not appearing, and escaping out into other countryes, was condemned for the same, being absent, by the sentence of Dauid Beaton Archbishop of S. Andrewes, and other Prelates of Scotland, and all his goodes confiscate, and his picture at last burned in the open market place. Whose story with his articles objected agaynst him, and his confutations of the same here ensueth in processe vnder expressed, as followeth.

The Act or Processe or certayne Articles agaynst Syr Iohn Borthwike Knight in Scotland with the aunswere and confutation of the sayd Borthwike, whose preface to the reader here foloweth.

BY the helpe of a certayne frend of mine, there came cer^tayne articles vnto my hand for the which the Scottish Cardinal and such other like of his sect and affinity did cōdemne me as an hereticke.* And for so much as this condēnation should not lacke his cloke or defence, they gathered together a great number of witnesses, where as besides the bare names of the witnesses they alledged none other profe at all. Wherefore I thought good to bestow some labour in refelling these articles which they could not proue partly that I might take away from all true Christians, the occasion of all euill suspition, as though that I beyng vanquished or ouerthrowne by theyr threatnings would deny Christ: and partly that theyr errors being thereby made manifest they should euen for very shame repent, or els hereafter y^e lesse abuse y^e furor or madnesse of such wytnesses to shed bloud. Therefore I will first confirme by euident testimonyes of the Scriptures those things whiche in times past I haue taught, and afterwarde I will refell theyr vayne Sophistication, wherby they go about to subuert the trueth of God.

SYr Iohn Borthwike knight commonly called Captain Borthwike being accused suspected, slaundered and conuicte by witsnesse, without all doubt of greater estimation then he himselfe, in the yeare of our Lord. 1540. the 28. day of May, in the cloister of S. The first Article.

That our holy father the Pope as Christes vicar, hath not, neither can exercise greater autoritie ouer Christians here on earth, then any other bishop or prelate.

Borthwike.

These holy ones do magnify their Lord by like title, as common theeues and robbers are accustomed to preferre the captaines and ringleaders of their robberies and mischiefs, calling them in euery place the most honest, & good men, where as likewise it is euidēt, y^t in the whole world there is no man more geuen to riot, which more greedily doth seeke after all kynde of delicatenes and wantonnesse, and finally aboundeth with all kynde of vice: as treason, murder, rapine, and all kynd of such euils. Furthermore, where as they affirme him to be the vicar of Christ here in earth, it shall be easily conuinced when as it shall be made manifest, that he hath not, nor cannot exercise more power or autoritie ouer christians, then any other bishop or prelate. For vnto that office of beyng vicar, they referre that great autoritie the which they do so greatly boast and brag of, which beyng taken away, the office of vicar doth also fall and decay. But now to attempt the matter, I wil first demand of the mainteiners of this preheminance and authority, whereupon they wil ground the same. I know that they will aunswer vnto me that Peter had power & authority ouer the other Apostles, and consequently ouer the vniuersall church, the which power by succession, is translated vnto the bishops of Rome. But how vnshamefastly they do lye herein, any may easily perceiue which hath but any small sparke of iudgement in him. When as he shal heare the testimonies of the scriptures, which we will alleage to confirme this our opinion. For Peter in the xv. of the Actes. In the counsell doth declare what is to be done, and admonisheth vs what of necessitie we ought to doe. And he there did also heare other speake, and did not onely geue them place to say theyr myndes, but also permit and receiue their iudgement: and where as they decreed, hee followed and obeyed the same. Is this then to haue power ouer others? Furthermore, where as in his first epistle he writeth vnto bishops and pastors, he doth not commād them as a superior or head ouer them, by power and authoritie, but maketh them his fellowe companions, and gently exhorteth thē as is accustomed to be done betweene equals of degree: for these are his wordes: I beseech and desire the bishops and pastors which are amongst you, for so much as I my selfe am also a bishop, and a witnesse of the afflictions of Christ, and also a partaker of the glorye which shall be reuealed, that they do diligently feede the flocke of Christ which is committed vnto them. Why then do they so challenge vnto them the authority of Peter, which he neuer acknowledged in himselfe. Truly I do not dout, but if that Peter were here present, he would with like seueritie rebuke their folly and madnes, as Moses in times past did vnto Iosua, which burned with too earnest a zeale towards hym. I doubt not but that many in this fayned authoritie of Peter do seeke out more vayne helps to main'taine and vpholde the tyranny of Popes, rather then to make him ruler and gouernour ouer all other. For where as in the 8. chapter of the Acts he is commaunded by hys fellowes, to go with Iohn into Samaria, he did not refuse so to do. In so much then, as the apostles do send him, they declare thereby, that they doe not count him as theyr hed and superior, and in that he doth obey them, & taketh vpon him the office or ministry committed vnto him, he confesseth thereby that he hath a societie and fellowship w^t them, but no rule nor imperry ouer them, as he writeth in his epistle.* But if none of these examples were euident or manifest, the onely epistle to the Galathians were sufficiēt to put vs out of all doubt: where as S. Paule almost throughout two whole chapters, doth nothing els but declare and affirme himselfe to be equall vnto Peter, in the honour or dignitie of the Apostleship. For first of all he reherseth how he went vp to Ierusalem vnto Peter, not to the intent to professe any homage and subiection vnto him but onely to witnesse with a common consent and agreement vnto all men, the doctrine which they taught, & that Peter did require no such things at his hand, but gaue vnto him the right side or vpper hand of the fellowship, that they might iointly together labour in the vineyard of the Lord.* Moreouer, that he had no lesse fauour and grace amongst the Gentils, then Peter had amongst the Iewes: and finally, when as Peter did not faithfully execute hys office and ministerie, he was by him rebuked, & Peter became obedient vnto his correction. All these things do euidently proue, that there was equalitie betweene Paule and Peter, and also that Peter had no more power ouer the residue of the Apostles, then he had ouer Paule. The which thing S. Paule euen of purpose doth intreat of, lest that any man should preferre Peter or Iohn before hym, in the office of Apostleship, which were but his companions, & not Lordes ouer one a other. Wherupō, the•• places of scripture work this effect, y^t I cannot acknowledge Peter to be superior or hed ouer other Apostles, neyther y^e Pope ouer other bishops. But I acknowledge & confesse Christ to be the only head of the church, the foundation and high priest therof, the which with one only oblation, hath made perfect for euermore all those which are sanctified.* And I boldly doe affirme and say with S. Gregory, that whosoeuer calleth himselfe, or desireth to be named or called, the head or vniuersal priest or bishop, in that his pride, he is the forerider or predecessor of Antichrist: for so much as thorough his pride he doth exalt himselfe aboue all others. Furthermore, where as they alledge out of the olde law, the high priesthood and the supreme iudgemēt, which God did institute and ordaine at Ierusalem: I aunswer therunto, that Christ was that high bishop,* vnto whome the right and title of priesthood is now transported and referred. Neither is there any man so impudent, which will take vpon hym to succeed in the place or degree of hys honour. For so much as this priesthood doth not consist only in learyng, but in the propitiation and mercy of God,* which Christ hath fulfilled by his death, and in the intercession, by the which he doth n•w intreat for vs vnto hys father.

Whereas also they do alledge out of the 16. chapter of Mathew, thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke, &c. If they do thinke that this was peticularly spoken vnto Peter, S. Cyprian, and S. Augustine shall sufficiently aunswere them that Christ did it not for this purpose, to preferre one man aboue all the residue, but that thereby he might commend and set forth the vnity of the church: for so •ayth S. Cyprian in the person of one man,* God gaue vnto him al the kayes, that he might therby signify the vnity of thē all. For euen as Peter was, euen the very same were all the residue, beyng endued with like fellowship of honour and dignity. But it was conuenient that it should take his originall of one, that the church of God might be manifested to be one only. Saint Augustines wordes are these,* if the mistery of the church were not in Peter, the Lorde would not haue sayde vnto hym, I wyll geue vnto thee y^e kaies of the kingdome of heauen. If this were spoken vnto Peter, the church hath them not. If the Church haue them: Then Peter, when he receyued the kayes, did figurate the whole church. Agayne, when as they were all demaunded and asked, only Peter answered. Thou art Christ. Then was it sayd vnto him, I will geue vnto thee the kaies, as though that he alone had receyued the power of bindyng and loosing, for like as he alone spake that for them all,* so he as it were bearing the person of that vnity, receiued the same with them all. Therefore one for them all, because he is vnited vnto them all. Another argument they doe gather vppon the wordes which Christ spake vnto Peter. Thou art Peter, and vppon this rocke will I builde my church. The which wordes are not found to be spoken vnto any other of the apostles. The which argument shal easily be dissolued, if we did vnderstand & know why Christ did geue Peter that name, which otherwise was called Simon. In the first chapter of Iohn, Christ speaketh thus vnto hym. Thou shalt be called Cephas, the which by interpretation signifieth Peter, in that point hauing respect vnto the constant confession of Christ which he had made, lyke as God changed the name of Abraham, who at the first was called Abram, because he should be a father of many nations, then euen as Abraham took his name of y^e multitude, which should come forth of his seede: so likewyse Peter tooke his name of the constaunt confession of Christ, which in deed is the true rocke wherupon y^e church is builded, and not Peter himselfe. No otherwise then Abraham, which was not the multitude it selfe, whereof he tooke his name. Besides this, the church should be stayed or builded vpon ouer weak a foundation if it should haue Peter for the ground or foundation thereof, who beyng amased and ouercome with the words of a little wench, did so constantly deny Christ. Nowe therfore I thinke there is no man but that doth vnderstand how these Romishe builders do wrest the scriptures hether and thether, & like vnto the rule or squire, do apply them accordyng to their wils, to what end and vse they thēselues thinke good. Furthermore in that they doe alledge out of the xx. chapiter of Iohn, feede my sheepe, it is ouer childish and argument: for to sheepe is not to beare rule and dominion ouer the whole Church, besides all this as Peter had receiued cōmaundement Page 1261 of the Lord,* so doth he exhort all other Bishops to feed their flocke in his first Epistle and v. chapter. Hereby a man may gather by these wordes of Christ y^e either there was no autoritie geuen vnto Peter more then vnto others, or els that Peter did equally communicate that right and authority which he had receiued vnto others and did not reserue it vnto himselfe after his death, to bee transported vnto the Bishops of Rome. As for such reasons as they doe alledge, which are not gathered or taken out of holy scriptures, I passe them ouer, least I myght seeme to contend with shadowes.

The second Article.

That Indulgences and pardons graunted by our supreme head the pope, are of no force, strength, or effect, but tend onely to the abuse of the people and the deceiuyng of their soules.

Borthwike.

It shalbe euidently declared, that indulgences and pardons are of none effect, after that I haue first of all taught what they do call Indulgences or pardons. They say they are the treasure of the church, that is to say, the merites of Christ, of the Saints, Apostles and Martyrs, which they impudently affirme to haue performed and merited more at Gods hand, at the tyme of their death, then was necessary or needfull for them: & that of the aboundance of their merites, there did so much superabound which was not onely sufficient for themselues, but also might redound to the helpe of others. And because so great a goodnes should not be superfluous or in vayne, they affirme and teach that their bloud was mixed and ioyned with y^e bloud of Christ: and of them both the treasure of the church was compoūd and made for the remission and satisfactiō of sinnes. How cunning and notable cookes these are, which can make a confection of so many sundry herbes. Furthermore, they do fayne the custody and keping of this treasure to be cōmitted wholly vnto the bishop of Rome,* in whose power consisteth the dispensation of so great treasures, that he eyther by himselfe may geue or graunt, or otherwyse geue power vnto other to geue the same. And hereupon riseth the plenary, Indulgences and pardons graunted by the Pope for certaine yeares, by cardinals for 100. dayes, by bishops for 40. dayes. This is the iudgement and opinion which they hold of the Indulgences. But I pray you, who taught those saints to worke or deserue for other, but only Sathan, who would vtterly haue y^e merits of Christ extinguished and blotted out, which he knoweth to be the onely remedy of saluation? For if the Scripture do teache vs that no man of himselfe can deserue or worke their saluation,* how did the saints then worke or merit for others. It is manifest that Christ saith in the xvij. of Luke, when we haue done all that which is commanded you for to do, yet sayth he, we are vnprofitable seruaunts. Besides this, all that which may be deserued or merited in the righteousnes of man, in the 64. chapter of Esay, they are compared vnto the garment menstruous & defiled, to be cast out.

There are almost infinite places in y^e scripture, wherein mans power is so extenuate, and the corruption & frowardnes of our nature so made manifest, that euen in the best and most perfect workes, there lacketh not imperfection. Notwithstanding the parable of the x. virgins written in the 25. chapter of Mathew,* ought to put vs out of all controuersie and doubt. There Christ describeth two kindes of men, the one kynde of holy men which obserue and keepe the inward righteousnesse of the heart, as the oyle of fayth, the other sorte is of suche, which hauyng no mynde of theyr oyle, are aunswered by them whiche are wyse no, least that there be not sufficient for you and for vs, but go you rather to them which doe sell and buy for your selues: in the whiche place it is manifestlye declared how vainely the second sorte of men doth flye to the patronage of the elect, by whose merites they thinke to be saued.

Now let vs waie and consider vpon what places of scripture they build or establish their fayned inuention of pardons: they alledge the saying of S. Paule to the Colossians. I supply or fulfill the afflictions of Christ, which were wanting in my flesh, for his body which is y^e church. But Paul in this place doth not referre that defect or supplement to any worke of redemption, expiation or satisfaction, but to those afflictions, by the which the members of Christ, that is to say, all faithfull, should be afflicted, so long as they liue in the flesh, wherefore he sayth, that this doth yet remaine of the passions of Christ, that those afflictions which once he suffered in his owne body, he nowe daily suffereth in his members. For Christ hath vouchsaued to honour vs with this honour, that he doth impute and call our afflictions to be his. And where as S. Paule doth adde this word for the church, he doth not vnderstād thereby for the redemption, reconciliation, satisfaction▪* or expiation of the church. But for the edi••eng and profit•ng of the same, as in the ij. epistle to Timothie, he saith: That for the elect sake he suffered all these things, y^t they myght obtaine saluation, but to the intent no man should thinke that saluation to depend vpon those things which he him'selfe had suffered, he added further,* the which is in Christ Iesu. As touching the reason that the blood of the Martyrs is not shed in vayne without fruit or profit, & therefore ought to be conferred to the common vilitie and profite of the church. I answer, that the profit and fruit therof is aboundant to glorify God by their death, to subscribe and beare witnesse vnto the truth by their blood, and by the contempt of this present lyfe, to witnesse, that he doth seeke after a better lyfe, by his constancie and stedfastnesse, to confirme and establish the fayth of the church, and subdue and vanquish the enemy.

The third Article.

That the Pope is an open vser of Simony, daily selling the gifts of the spiritualties, and that it is lawfull for all bishops to be coupled and ioyned in matrimony.

Borthwike.

This article hath his seuerall partes, for those things which we haue spoken or answered vnto the article before written, doth sufficiently declare, that the Pope is not only a vser of Simony, but also a notable deceiuer, which selleth such kynd of merchandise, as can in no place helpe or preuaile. For so much as his pardons are nothyng lesse then such as he faineth them to be. Doth he not then shew himselfe a manifest deceiuer, when as he maketh faires and markets of them, but to the intent I will not seeme in this behalfe vainly to labour or trauaile,* I will passe vnto the second part, where as I do say, that it is not onely done against the worde of God, but also against equitie and iustice to forbid priests to marry, for so much as it is not lawfull for any man by any meanes to forbid y^t thing, which the Lord hath left at liberty. For S. Paule in the xiiij. chapter vnto the Hebrewes, declareth, that matrimony is lawfull for all men, saying that mariage and the vndefiled bed or chamber is honourable amongst all men: and in the first to the Corinthians and vij. chapter. He sayth, for auoiding of whoredome, Let euery man haue a wife of his owne: but I know what these obstinate and stiffe necked will aunswer vnto me, that the same is spoken and meant of others, and not of priestes. But what will they aunswere vnto me as touching that whiche is written in the first to Timothie, and iij. chapter. A Bishop ought to be without rebuke, the husband of one wyfe, and by and by after he sayeth, Deacons ought to be the husbandes of one wyfe, the which should rule and gouerne their children and family vprightly. Unto these Paule affirmeth matrimony to be meete and necessary, let them say what they can vnto the contrary. What could bee more vehemently spoken agaynst their wicked tyranny, then that which by the holy Ghost he declareth in the iiij. chapter of the same Epistle, that in the latter daies there should come wicked men which should forbid matrimonye, and calleth them not onely deceiuers, but also wicked spirities attending vnto the doctrine of wicked spirities: but these men thinke that they haue very well escaped, whē as they wrest this sentence to those old ancient heretikes the Tatianes, they say (these men) did onely condemne matrimonye, we do not condemne it, but onely forbidde Church men to marry. Unto whome we thinke matrimonye is not conuenient. As though that albeit this prophesie were first of all complete and fulfilled in the Tationes, that it did not also redound vnto them, or as though this theyr subtile sophistication, were worthy to be regarded that they do not deny or prohibite matrimony, because they do not forbid it vnto all men generally. Lyke as if a tyraunt would contend and affirme hys lawe to be good, by the extremity and violence whereof onely one part of the citie is oppressed, but now let vs heare the reasons of the contrary part, it behoueth say they, a Priest to differ from the common sort of the people by some notable marke or token. But read Saint Paule, where as he describeth the perfect Image of a good Bishop, did he not reckon and account mariage amongst the other good giftes which hee required to bee in them. But I knowe very well howe these men interpret Paule? Uerily that a Bishop ought not to be chosen, which hath married hys second wyfe. But also it appeareth openly by the text, that this interpretation is false, for so much as he doth by and by declare & shew what maner of women the wiues of Byshops & deacons ought for to be. Wherefore Saint Paule nūbereth matrimony amongst the principall vertues pertainyng vnto a Bishop. And these men do teache it to be an intollerable vice amongst the orders of the Church, and not Page 1262 beyng content with that generall reproche or slaunder, they call it in the Canons, the vncleanlinesse, pollutyng and defilyng of the fleshe. Nowe let euery man consider with himselfe, out of what shop this stuffe is taken. God instituted matrimony, Christ sanctified it with hys presence, by turnyng water into wyne, and vouchsafed so to honour it, that he would haue it the Image or figure of his loue and friendship with the Church: What can be more famous or notably spoken to the commendation and prayse of wedlocke. But these vnshamefast faces doe call it a filthy and vncleane thyng, alledgyng the Leuitical priestes, which as often as they came vnto the office of ministration, were bounden to lye a part from their wiues, whereby they beyng cleane and vndefiled, might handle the holy things: * and our sacraments, for so much as they are much more noble and excellent then theirs, and daily vsed, it would be a very vncomely thing that they should be handled by married men. As though that the office of the ministry of the Gospell were all one with the Leuiticall priesthoode. For they as figures did represent Christ, which beyng mediator betweene God and man, by hys singular and absolute puritie and cleannes, should reconcile the father vnto vs, for so much as on no part sinners could exhibite or shew forth any tye or forme of his sanctity or holynesse, yet to the intent they might shadow hym out, with certaine similitudes or lineamentes, they were commaunded that when so euer they should come vnto the sanctuary or holy place, they should purify themselves: aboue all mens order or fashion, for then did they most nere and properly figurate Christ which appeared in the Tabernacle, as peacemakers to reconcile the people vnto God. This Image or personage, forsomuch as our Ecclesiasticall pastors at this day doe not take vpon them or execute, in wayne are they compared vnto them: Wherefore the Apostle without all exception vpon a sure & good ground, doth pronounce and say, that mariage is honourable amongst all men, and that whoremongers and adulterers do abide the iudgement of God. Besides all this, the Apostles themselves by their examples do prooue that matrimony is not vnworthy of any office or function, be it neuer so excellent, for S. Paule himselfe is witnes, that they did not only kepe their wyues, but also caried them about with them.

The 4. Article.

That all those heresies commonly called the heresies of England,* or at the least, the greater or most part of them to be now presently vnderstand and knowen by the English men to be of themselves good and iust, and to be obserued of all faythful Christians as most true and conformable vnto the law of God, and that he hath persuaded many persons, to imbrace the sayd heresies.

Borthwike.

Saint Iohn in his xi. chapter, declareth how Caiphas hy• Bishop of Ierusalem did prophesie that Iesus should dye for the people, which thing he spake beyng vtterly ignoraunt. The lyke Image of blyndnes we haue now presently in our luxurious Cardinall of S. Andrewes, and hys adherents, which accused religion of heresie, which in the yeare of our Lorde, 1540. was had in estimation in England, at the which tyme they proclaymed me an Archheretike, although they esteeme the same religion for most christian, for what religion at that tyme was vsed in England,* the lyke the whole realme of Scotland did imbrace, in this poynt onely the English men differed from the Scottes, that they had cast of the yoke of Antichrist, the other not. Idols were worshipped of both nations, y^e profauatyng of the Supper and Baptisme, was lyke vnto them both, wicked superstition raigned on both partes, and true worship was deformed and defaced with detestable hipocrisie.

Truely it is most false that they do affirme and say, that I had subscribed vnto such kynde of heresies, as though they had bene conformable vnto the law of God, when as nothyng is more aduerse or repugnaunt therevnto: for euen now of late, God of hys goodnesse and mercy had opened my da•elyng eyes, and hath drawen me out of the filthy slow of Idolatry and superstition, in the which amongst others I haue so long tyme wallowed and tumbled. Neither is it any lesse absurde, that they affirme me to haue allured many to embrace the same, except peradventure they do vnderstand that I haue oftentimes wished, that the yoke of Antichrist should be shaken and cast off from the neckes of the Scottes, as it is from the Englishe men: whiche thyng with a sincere and vpright heart, and with an earnest mynd, I do now also wish and desire.

The 5. Article.

That the Scottish nation and their Clergy be altogether blynded,* whome he did also say and affirme that they had not the true Catholike fayth. And this he dyd openly teach and preached also, that hys fayth was much better & more excellent, then the faith of all the clergy in the realme of Scotland.

Borthwike.

No man will deny that people to be blynded, which neyther heareth Christ nor his Apostles. Such is the people of Scotland, I speake of those vnto whom the veritie and truth of Christ hath not yet opened or manifested it selfe. There is no cause therefore, why they should accuse me of heresy. Furthermore, how farre of the nation and people of Scotland be from the hearyng of Christ, albeit the premisses do sufficiently declare, in that they do challenge vnto the Romishe Antichrist, the autoritie which Christ and hys Apostles do declare,* Christ himselfe to be endued with all, and that contrary to the worde of GOD they forbid priests to marry. I will adde some thing more vnto it, where by the matter may be more euident. Christ calleth himselfe the dore, whereby all men ought to enter in at Iohn the x. chapter. Contrariwise, the Scottes doe say and affirme, that we must enter in by the virgine Mary, and Saint Peter. Christ in the fourth of Iohn sayth: The tyme shall come when as the true worshippers shall worship the father in spirit and truth, the Scottes builde themselues hye temples and chappels for Idols, in the which euen as Israell in tymes past they commit fornication: Paule in his Epistle to the Hebrews, and x. chapter, sayth: That Christ by one onely oblation hath made perfect all those for euermore, which are sanctified, which saying confirmeth also the wordes of Christ hangyng vppon the Crosse, saying (it is finished) signifieng that by hys death there was a finall ende set vnto all sacrifices, which are offered vp for sinnes. But the Scottish church men, as they are blasphemers in deede, so do they bragge and boast that they daily offer vp Christ for the sinnes both of the quicke and of the dead. God commaundeth vs that we shall not worship any grauen Image. The Scottes do not onely fall downe flatte before Images, but also offer vp incense vnto them. Saint Paule teacheth vs that Christ is made our wisdom, righteousness, satisfaction, and redemption. The Scottes beyng wyse men in theyr owne conceites, preferre and embrace traditions fayned & inuented out by mans head before the lawe of God, they stablish righteousness in their owne workes, sanctification in holy water and other externall things, redemption in pieces of lead, which they doe buy of their great Antichrist, who then will quarell with me that I doe lye that the people of Scotland are blind? and that my faith which doth onely behold the word of God to be much more better and excellent then theirs.

The 6. Article.

Agreeably to the ancient errors of Iohn Wickliffe and Iohn Hus Archheretikes condemned in the Councell of Constance,* he hath affirmed and preached that the clergy ought not to possesse or haue any temporall possessions, neyther to haue any iurisdiction or authoritie in temporalities, euen ouer theyr owne subiectes, but that all these things ought to be taken from them, as it is at this present in England.

Borthwike.

The Lord in the xviij. chapter of the booke of Numbers sayd thus vnto Aaron,* thou shalt possesse nothyng in theyr land, neyther shalt thou haue any portion amongst them, I am thy portion and inheritance amongst the children of Israell for vnto the sonnes of Leuy, I haue geuen all the tithes of Israel, that they should possesse them for their ministry which they do execute in the tent of ordinaries. Albeit I do not doubt, but that the order of the Leuites and of our clergy, is farre different and variable. For the administration of theyr sacred and holy thyngs, after theyr death, passed vnto their posterity, as it were by right of inheritaunce: which happeneth not vnto the posteritie of our clergy in these dayes. Furthermore, if any heritage be prouided or gotten for them, I doe not gaynesay but that they shall possesse it. But still I doe affirme that all temporall iurisdiction should bee taken from them, for when as twise there rose a contention amongst the Disciples, which of them should be thought the greatest Christ, answered: The kyngs of nations haue dominion ouer them, and such which haue power ouer them, are called beneficiall, you shall not do so. For he which is greatest amongst you, shall be made equall vnto the yongest or lest, and he which is the prince or ruler amongst you, shall be Page 1263 made equall vnto hym which both minister, myndyng thereby, and willyng vterly to debarre the ministers of hys word, from all terrene and ciuill dominion and Empire. For by these poyntes he doth not onely declare that the office of a pastor is distinct and deuided from the office of a prince and ruler:* but that they are in effect so much different and separate, that they cannot agree or ioyn together in one man. Neither is it to be thought that Christ did set or ordaine an harder law then he himself before did take vpon hym. Forsomuch as in the 12. of Luke, certayne of the company sayd vnto hym: Maister, commaund my brother that he deuide his inheritaunce with me. He aunswered: Man, who made me a Iudge or deuider amongst you? We see therefore that Christ euen simply did reiect and refuse the office of a Iudge,* the which thing hee would not haue done, if it had bene agreeable vnto his office or duety. The like thyng also he did in the 8. chapter of Iohn. When as he refused to geue iudgement vppon the woman taken in adulterye, which was brought before hym. Where as they doe alledge that Moyses did supply both offices at once,* I aunswer that it was done by a rare miracle. Furthermore, that it continued but for a time vntill things were brought vnto a better state. Besides that, there was a certayne forme and rule prescribed him of the Lord, then tooke he vpon hym the ciuill gouernaunce and the priesthood, he was commaunded to resigne vnto hys brother, & that not w^tout good cause, for it is agaynst nature, that one man should suffice both charges: wherefore it was diligently foreseene and provided for in all ages. Neither was there any Bishop, so long as any true face or shew of the Church did continue, who once thought to vsurpe the right and title of the sword. Whereupon in the tyme of Saint Ambrose, this Prouerbe tooke his original: that Emperours did rather wishe or desire the office of priesthood, then Priests any Empire. For it was all mens opinions at that tyme, that sumptuous pallaces dyd pertayne vnto Emperoures, and Churches vnto Priestes. Saint Bernard also writeth many thyngs which are agreeable vnto this our opinion,* as is this his saying: Peter could not geue that which he had not, but he gaue vnto hys successours that which he had, that is to say, carefulnesse ouer the congregation, for when as the Lord & Maister sayth, that he is not constitute or ordained Iudge betwene two, the seruaunt or Disciple ought not to take it scornefully,* if that he may not iudge all men: and lest that he might seme in that place to speake of the spiritual iudgement, he straight way annexeth: Therefore sayth he, Your power and autoritie shall be in offence and transgression, not in possessions. For this purpose and not for the other, haue you receyued the keyes of the kingdome of heauen. Why then do you inuade other mens bounds or borders: The rest I will passe ouer for breuities cause.

Falsly, and against the honour, state, and reuerence of the sacred maiestie of the kyng of Scottes,* he hath said, holden, and affirmed, that our most noble king of Scottes, defender of the Christian fayth, would appropriate vnto him selfe all the possessions, landes and rentes of the Church, geuen and graunted by his predecessors, and also by himselfe, and conuert them vnto hys owne priuate vse. And for this ende and purpose, as he hath many tymes written vnto him, so hath he with his whole endeuour perswaded our sayd noble Lord and kyng therunto.

Borthwike.

It is no maruell though these mad dogges do so barke agaynst me, whom they thinke to haue counselled y^e kings Maiesty (I would to God I had also thoroughly perswaded hym) that he should take away from these vniust sacrilegious possessours, the riches wherewithall they are fatted and engreased lyke Swyne. For this is the nature of dogs, that if any man go about to take away the boane out of their mouth, by and by to snatche at hym and teare hym with theyr teeth. It is out of all controuersie vnto such which haue any wit at all, that such were very childish, that is to say, ignoraunt of all learnyng and iudgement, which did so fat and feede with their possessiōs these belly beastes. For who would not iudge it more then childish,* to bestow the kyngs vitayles or meate vpon the bellies of the Prophets of Baal and Iesabell? But all they which at this present do endue such filthy sinkes (I wyll not call them deus of thieues) with such reuenues they do follow the steps of Iesabell, for what other thing do they, when as daily they are bleating and bowyng before theyr Images, burnyng of incense, and fall flat downe before their altars, but y^t which in tymes past y^e prophets of Baal dyd when as they transported the worship of God vnto an Idoll? Wherefore, if Daniel and Helias were spotted with heresie when they would haue destroyed the Priests of Baall, I graunt that I also must be an hereticke. But forsomuch as then he did nothyng but which was cōmaunded hym of the Lord, that was able to kyll the Prophet which had allured the people to follow strange gods, he could not truly and iustly be accused of heresie: so neyther can my aduersaries spot me therewithall, except peradventure they will condemne in me, that where as Elias delt more rigorously with the Prophetes of Baall, for he cast them into the broke Kidron. I required or desired no more, but that the riches which was wickedly bestowed vpon them, and theyr possessions might be taken frō them.

He willed and desired, and oftentimes with his whole heart prayed that the church of Scotland might come and be brought to the same poynt and state,* and to lyke ruine as the church of England was already come vnto.

If the church of Israel decayed, when as in the tyme of Zorobabell, N•emias, and other holy men, it was released and set at libertie out of Babilon: I graunt also, that it was a ruine vnto the Englishmen to haue departed and gone away out of Babylon, the mother of all whoredome:* vpon whose rotten and filthy paps and brests, they haue a long tyme depended and hanged, beyng made drunke with the wyne of her whoredome and vnshamefastnesse. They had rather cause to geue me thankes, which wyth so sincere and good a heart, wished vnto them so happy a fall. But these vnthankfull persones thought it not enough w^t slaunder and reproch to teare me asunder, but that now also as blynd rage and madnesse hath taken away all sinceritie and vprightnesse of mynde and iudgement to lye in wayte, and lay snares for my lyfe.

The 9. Article.*

He hath openly holden, sayd, and affirmed, preached, and taught, that the lawes of the Church, that is to say, the sacred Canons approoued and allowed by the holy Catholike and Apostolike church to be of •o force, strength, or effect, alledging therfore, and affirmyng that they are made and inuented, contrary to the law of God.

Borthwike.

God forbid that I should say, that those things which are approoued and allowed by the holy Catholike Church, should be of no effect or vaw. For well I know that the holy Apostolicke church hath neuer allowed, ordained,* or taught any thyng which she hath not learned of the Lord, the apostles are witnesses thereof, Peter and Paul, wherof the one of thē dareth not freely vtter or speake of any of those things, which Christ hath not wrought by hymselfe for the obedience of the Gentiles.

The other exhorteth that if any man speake, he should speake the praises of God, but I condemne those lawes, which the bishops of Rome haue made accordyng to their owne will and mynde, and say that they are spirituall,* pertaynyng vnto the soule, and necessarie vnto euerlastyng lyfe.

For so much as the writyngs of the Apostles doe euidently declare, that there was no authoritie knownen amongst them to make or ordayne any ordinaunces or lawes.

Furthermore the Scriptures do manifestly shewe the same, how oftentimes euen by the Lordes owne mouth,* this foresayd authoritie is taken from the Ministers of the Church: so that no excuse for them remayneth, but that they be playne rebelles agaynst the worde of GOD, how many so euer doe presume or take vpon them to appoint or set any new lawes vpon the people of GOD, whiche thyng is more manifest and euident, then the lyght it selfe in many places of the Scripture. For in the 23. chapter of Iosue, it is written you shall obserue, and doe all that is written in the lawe of Moyses, neyther shall you swarue from that, eyther to the ryght hande, eyther to the lefte hand. But that which is written in the twelfth chapter of Deuteronomium, ought to mooue them somewhat the more.

Whatsoever I commaund sayth the Lorde, that you shall obserue and doe: thereunto you shall adde nothing, neyther shall you take any thyng from it. The lyke he had sayd before in the fourth chapter of the same booke. And agayne Moyses in the xxx. chapter of the same booke doth witnesse, that he dyd put foorth lyfe, and blessing vnto Israell, Page 1264 when as he gaue them that lawe which he had receiued of the Lord.* How can they then excuse themselues of periury, which ordaine new lawes to liue by? But let vs proceede further, and see what authoritie the Priestes of Leuies stocke had to make lawes. I doe not denye but that God in the xvij. chapter of Deuteronomie, ordayned vnder a great penaltie, that the authoritie of the Priestes should not be contemned, but had in reuerence. But in the ij. of Malachie. He also declareth vnder what condition they are to be heard, where as he sayth: he hath made a couenaunt with Leuy, that the law of truth should be in hys mouth, and by and by after he added: the lips of the Priest shall keepe and maintayne wisdom, and the law they shall require at hys mouth, which is the messenger of the Lord of hostes. Therefore it is fitte and necessary that if a Priest will be heard, that he doe shew hymselfe the messenger of God, that is to say, faythfully to report and declare the commaundements which he hath receiued of the Lorde. For where as Malachie speaketh of hearyng of them, he putteth this specially that they doe aunswere accordyng to the lawe of the Lorde. Therefore lyke as the Leuiticall Priestes did breake theyr couenaunt made with GOD, if they do teache any other lawe then that which they had receyued of hym: So likewyse these men muste eyther acknowledge themselues to be couenant breakers, or els they may not bynde the consciences of men with no new lawe.

Furthermore, what power the Prophetes had vniuersally, it is very liuely described in Ezechiel in his xxxiiij. chapter.

Thou sonne of man sayth the Lord, I haue made thee a guide vnto the house of Israel, thou shalt heare the word out of myne owne mouth,* and declare it vnto them from me. He then which is commaunded to heare of the mouth of the Lord, is he not forbidden to rehearse or speake any thing of hymselfe? For what other thyng is it to speake from the Lord, but so to speake, that he may boldly affirme and say, that it is not his word, but the word of the Lorde, which he speaketh.

Further, God by his Prophet Ieremy calleth it chaffe, what so euer doth not proceede from hymselfe. Wherefore, none of the Prophetes haue opened theyr mouthes at any tyme to speake, but beyng premonished before by the worde of GOD. Whereupon it happeneth, that these wordes are so often pronounced by them, The worde of the Lord, The charge or burden of the Lord, The vision of the Lord, Thus sayth the Lord, The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

Now that we may also confirme that which is before spoken, by the examples of the Apostles, that they haue taught nothyng but that whiche they haue learned of the Lorde, the law which Christ prescribed vnto them, when as he endowed them with the dignitie and honour of the Apostleship, is somewhat more profoundly to be repeated. In the last chapter of Mathew, he commandeth them to go forth and teach, not such thyngs as they themselues did rashly inuent or deuise, but those things which he had commaunded them.

Furthermore, Paule in the second to the Collossians, denieth that he hath any dominion or rule ouer the fayth of the Corinthians, albeit he was ordayned by the Lorde to be their Apostle. If you require and desire a further reason of the moderation of Saint Paule, read the tenth chapter of his Epistle to the Romaines, where as he teacheth, That fayth commeth by hearyng, it commeth not by the dreames of the Bishop of Rome, or by any other Bishop, but onely by the worde of God, neyther ought any man to thinke it straunge, that neyther Christ restrayned hys Apostles by the lawe, that they should not teache any thyng but that which they had learned of the mouthe of the Lord. He set the same law vppon hymselfe because it should not be lawfull for any man to refuse it.

My doctrine sayth Christ is not myne, but hys which sent me, my fathers: he which hath bene the onely and eternall counsellor of the father, which also is ordayned by the Father, the Lord and Maister ouer all, for so much yet as he doth the office and part of a Minister, he doth by hys example prescribe vnto all Ministers, what rule and order they ought to followe in teachyng, wherefore the power of the Church is not such, that it may at hys owne wyll and discretion, teach new doctrines, eyther as they terme it, frame new Articles of fayth, either establish new laws: but is subiect vnto the worde of the Lorde, and as it were included in the same. But now let vs beholde what defence they do bryng for their constitutions. The Apostles say they, and the Elders of the Primitiue Church established a decree, besides the commandement of Christ, wherby they did commaunde all people to abstayne from all things offered vnto Idols, suffocation, and bloud.* If that were lawfull for them so to doe, why is it not lawfull for their successour, as often as necessitie shall require to imitate and follow them in doying the lyke.

But I deny that the Apostles in that behalfe, did make any new decree or ordinaunce, for so much as Peter in the same counsell pronounceth God to be tempted, if any yoke be layd vpon the neckes of the Disciples: Euen he hymselfe doth subuert and ouerthrowe hys owne sentence,* if they consent to lay any yoke vppon them. But a yoke is layd vpon them if the Apostles by their owne authoritie do decree to prohibite the Gentils not to touch any thyng offered vnto Idoles or strangled, but you will say, they do write that they should abstayne from those thinges. I graunt that they do so write. But what doth S. Iames declare? That the Gentils which are conuerted vnto God are not to be troubled and vexed in such externe decrees and outward elementes as these be. And the Apostle sufficiently declareth that he goeth about nothyng lesse thē to restraine the libertie of the Gentiles, but onely to admonish and warne them how they should moderate and rule themselues amongst their brethren, lest they should abuse their libertie to the offence of the others.

They alledge furthermore, that which is written in the 23. of Mathew, the Scribes and Phariseis haue sitten in the chayre of Moyses, therefore all thyngs what so euer they commaund you to obserue and keepe,* the same obserue and do, but do you not as they doe. I aunswer, the Lord in this place doth inuey agaynst the manners of the Phariseies simply instructing his hearers, which before he had taught, that albeit they could perceiue or see nothyng in their lyfe which they should follow, yet for all that they should not refuse to doe those thyngs which they dyd teach by the worde, I say by the worde, and not of theyr owne head.

The 10. Article.

Diuers and many wayes he hath sayd, holden, and also affirmed, and openly taught that there is no religion to be obserued or kept, but simply to be abolished and destroyed: as it is now in England, and despising all religion, affirmyng, that it is but abusing of the people, he hath taught that their habites and vestures are deformed, and very monstrous, hauyng in them no maner of vtilitie or holynesse, inducyng and alluryng as much as in him laye, all the adherentes of hys opinion, that all religion in the kyngdome of Scotland should be subuerted and vtterly taken away, to the great offence of the Catholicke Church, and the diminishing and detrimen of the Christian Religion.

Borthwike.

The Prophet Esay in hys fift chapter, cryeth out, saying. Wo be vnto you which call euill good, and good euill, darkenesse, lyght, and lyght, darkenesse, sower, sweete, and sweete sower. And followeth in the same place, in the sayd Prophetes, Wo, sayth he, to you that be wise and Sapient in your owne eyes, and prudent in your owne estimation. No man can denye but that the Cardinall of Scotland and hys adherentes to be vnder this most heauy and grieuous curse, when as they doe so generally confound the Christian religion and their wicked Monkery, that they do entitle them both by one name of holinesse, I trust I will make it appeare more manifest then the day, that they do it by a sacrilegious audacitie or boldnesse, vnto such as setting a parte all preposterous affection, wyll embrace the truth, when as she doth manifestlye shewe her selfe.

But before I enter into the matter, I will all men to vnderstand, that I do not touche that kynd of Monkery, whiche Saint Augustine and other so often make mention of: As in which the Monkes beyng gathered together vtterly, contemnyng and despising the vanities of this world, dyd lead a most chaste and godly lyfe, liuyng in prayer, readyng, and disputations, not puffed vp wyth pryde, nor contentious with frowardnesse, neyther full of enuie, no man possessed any thing of hys owne, no man was chargeable or burdenous vnto others, they wrought with theyr handes to gette that which might sustayne the body, the spirit and mynd not let and hindered from God. Whatsoever did superabound more then was necessarye for their sustentation, as by the restraint of their delicious and delicate fare, much did redound of the labours of their hands, it was with such diligence distributed vnto y^e poore and nedy, as it was not with greater diligence gotten by them which did geue the same.

Page 1265For they by no meanes went about to haue aboundaunce lyeng by them, but sought all meanes possible that nothyng should remayne by them more then sufficient, besides this, no man was forced to any extremitie, which he could not beare or suffer, no man had any thyng layd vpon hym, which he refused, neyther was he condemned of the rest, which confessed hymselfe vnable to imitate or follow: they had alwayes in their mynde how commendable a thyng loue and charitie was, they remembered that all things are cleane vnto them which are cleane. Therefore they did not refuse or reiect any kynds of meate as polluted or defiled: but all their whole industry and labor was applied to subdue lust and concupiscence, and to retayne loue amongst brethren. Many of them did drinke no wine, yet notwithstanding they thought not themselues defiled therewithall. For vnto such as were sicke and diseased, who could not recouer the health of their body without the same, they did most gently permit it. And where as many foolishly refused the same, they brotherly admonished them to take heede that they became not rather the weaker▪ then the hollier, thorough theyr vayne superstition.

Hetherto I haue repeated that which Saint Augustine writeth of the Monkes in his tyme wherby I would as it were paint out in a table, what maner of Monkery there was in the old tyme, that all men might vnderstand how great difference there is betweene that and the monkery in these our latter dayes. For he would haue all extreme compulsion to be taken away in such things as by the worde of God are left to vs at libertye.* But nowe a dayes there is nothing more seuerely and cruelly exacted. For they say it is a remedillesse offence if any do but neuer so little swarue from their prescript order in coulor or kind of garment, or in any kynd of meat or in any other friuolous or vayne ceremony.

Saint Augustine doth straightly affirme that it is not lawfull for Monkes to lyue idle vpon other mens labor, he plainly denieth that in his tyme there was any such example of any well ordered Monastery: but our Monkes do constitute the principall part of holynesse in idlenesse, which they call a contemplatiue lyfe, wherfore the state of Monkery of the olde tyme, and of these our dayes, is in all points so diuers,* that scarce can any thing be more vnlike, I will not say vtterly contrary: for our Monkes not content with that godlinesse to the studye and desire, whereof Christ commaundeth all his continually to be intentiue, they imagine a new kynd of godlinesse, I know not what, by the meditation whereof they are more perfect, then all other. But it is a most pestilent error (which all godlye men ought to abhorre) to fayne any other rule of perfection, then that common rule deliuered vnto the whole vniuersall Church, which we suppose to be sufficiently approoued in the refutation of the article before passed. Now I also passe ouer with silence the great blasphemy, whereby they compare their monasticall confession vnto Baptisme. I also hold my peace that they do dissipate and deuide the Communion of the Church, when as they doe separte themselues from the lawfull societie and fellowship of the faythfull, and clayme vnto themselues a peculiar ministry and priuate administration of the Sacraments, but as Saint Augustine witnesseth, it was so far of, that the Monkes in tymes past, had any seueral church or administration of the Sacramentes with others, and were a part and portion of the common people. Albeit that they dwelt asunder.

But if that a man may touch the manner of these our Monks, what shall I call the cloysters in these our dais, otherwise then brothell houses, swine sties, and dennes of discord. Besides that, I will passe ouer their faires and markets, which in these latter dayes they do make of their reliques of Martyrs, to build vp Sodome agayne. Wherefore I conclude, that this their kynde of lyfe whiche they clayme vnto themselues, is vtterly wicked and naughte, the which is not established or grounded vppon any certayne callyng of God, neyther allowed by him, wherefore I may be bold to say, that it is vnlawfull, because their cōscience hath nothing wherby to sustaine it selfe before god, and whatsoeuer is not of fayth, is sinne.

And furthermore, so long as they do entangle & bynde themselues with so many and so peruerse, and wicked kynd of worshipping, as the Monkery now a days doth contayne in it, I may well say that they are not consecrated vnto God, but vnto the diuell. For why? was it lawfull for the Prophets, to say, that Israelites did offer theyr children vnto wicked spirites, and not vnto God onely, for this cause that they did corrupt and violate the true worshipping of God with prophane ceremonies. Is it not lawfull then to speake the lyke of our Monkes which together with their cowles haue put on a thousand snares of most wicked superstitions? Let euery man now waigh and consider with himselfe, if I haue done wickedly to wishe such religions as is this our Monkery, to be vtterly extinguished and rooted out. Moreouer, all christian princes should rightly and truely do their office, if as in tymes past Iosias pulled downe and ouerthrew the high places which hys elders the kings of Iuda had builded, so they woulde abolishe and dryue away these kynde of Monkes.

It is plainly manifest by lawfull prooues, that the said Iohn Borthwike had and presently hath, diuers bookes suspected of heresie, condemned as wel by the papall, as also Regall and ordinary authoritie, and prohibited by the lawe, that is to say, specially the newe Testament commonly printed in Englishe, Oecolampadius, Melancton, and diuers treatises of Erasmus, and other condemned heretickes, also a Booke intituled, vnio dissidentium, the which conteyneth most manifest and great erroures, and hereticall assumptions, and hath red and studied the same as well openly as priuately, and hath presented and communicated them vnto others, and also hath instructed and taught many Christians in the same, to the ende and purpose, to diuert and turne them away from the true christian and catholike fayth.

Borthwike.

O good God, who can suffer so great a blasphemye? with what a filthy cankered stomacke doe these Romishe swine note the new testament of heresie? who would not iudge it a most venomous tongue, which dare pronounce or vtter such contumelious wordes agaynst the holy Gospell of our Sauour Christ? Truely as the Iewes which put Christ to death, of all other murderers, euen so these men (how so euer they doe pronounce me an Archheretike) do fill vp the measure of all other heretikes: I wyll not say blasphemies, how then shall these serpentes and stocke of Uipers escape and flye the iudgement of euerlastyng fire? I do not greatly stand or stay that they doe suspect Oecolampadius, Melancton, or Erasmus, neither am I so mad to plead their cause who as they are men of singuler learnyng and eloquence, so doe their writings manifestly declare, how falsly and wickedly these Sicophants impute this crime & slaunder of heresie vnto them.

It is manifest that the sayd Iohn Borthwike was so obstinate in all the foresayde errorr and heresies, and so maintained and taught them with such an indurate heart and mynd, that he would not by no meanes be perswaded from them by his friends and diuers other persons, which did dearly loue and fauour hym, but chose rather obstinatly to perseuere in his sayd errorrs.

Borthwike.

I am willingly contented to be reduced to the Catholike faith, but if that Sathan rayse vp any stormes or tempest agaynst that, those I do some thyng resist, wherefore they most shamefully lye which doe otherwyse iest or talke of me, for I know not by what reason they call them my friendes which so greatly laboured to conuert me, neither will more esteeme them, then the Madianites, whiche in tymes past called the children of Israell to doe sacrifice vnto their Idols. And furthermore, I desire the most highe and mighty God, that he will neuer suffer me to swarue or turne away from this so holy, godly, and christian obstinacie and stubburnnesse. The man is blest that hath set his whole hope and confidence vpon the Lorde, and hath not regarded or looked vpon the proud, or those which follow after lies.

¶The sentence of condemnation agaynst Sir Iohn Borthwike Knight, by the Cardinall, Byshops, and Abbots in Scotland. An. 1540.

OF all which the premisses and many other errorrs by hym, holden, spoken, published, affirmed, preached,* & taught, the common fame and report is, that the sayd Sir Iohn Borthwike is holden, reputed, and accounted of very many, is an heretike, and principall heretike whiche holdeth euill opinion of the catholike fayth.

Wherefore we Dauid by the title of S. Steuen in moūt Celio, Prelate and Cardinall of the holy church of Rome, Archbishop of S. Andrews, primate of the whole kingdō of Scotland, & borne Legate of the Apostolike Sea, sitting after the manner of Iudges in our tribunall seate, the most holye Gospels of God beyng layed before vs, Page 1266 that our iudgement myght proceede from the face of God, and our eyes might behold and looke vpon equitie and iustice, hauing only God, the veritie and truth of the Catholike faith before our eyes, his holye name being first of all called vpon, hauing as is beforesayde hereuppon holden a counsel of wise men, as well deuines as lawyers, wee pronounce, declare, decree, determine, and geue sentence, that the said Sir Iohn Borthwike called captaine Borthwike, beinge suspected, infamed, and accused of the errorrs and heresies before said, and wicked doctrines manifoldly condēpned, as is aforesayd, & by lawfull prooues against hym, in euery of the premisses had, beinge conuicte and lawfully cited and called, not appearing but as a fugitiue, runne away, and absent, euen as though hee were present, to be an heretike, and is, and hath bene conuict as an heretike. And as a conuicte heretike and heresiarche to be punished and chastened with due punishment, and afterward to be deliuered and left vnto the secular power. Moreouer, we confiscate and make forfeite, and by these presents declare and decree to be confiscated and made forfeite, all and singular his goodes, mooueables and vnmooueables, howe so euer, and by what so euer title they be gotten, and in what place or partie so euer they be, and all his offices what so euer he hath hetherto had, reseruing notwithstanding the dowrye and such part and portion o• his goodes,* as by the law, custome and right of this Realme vnto parsones confiscate, ought to appertaine. Also we decree that the picture of the said Iohn Borthwike being formed, made, and painted to his likenesse, be caried thorow this our citie to our Cathedral church, and afterward to the market crosse of the same citie, and there in token of maledictiō and cursse, and to the terror and example of others, and for a perpetual remembraunce of his obstinacie, and condemnation to be burned. Likewise we declare and Decree, that notwithstanding, if the sayd I. Borthwike be here after apprehended or takē, y^t hee shall suffer suche like punishment due by order of lawe vnto heretikes, without any hope of grace or mercye to be obtained in that behalfe. Also we plainly admonishe and warne by the tenour of these presentes, all & singular faithfull Christians, both menne and women of what dignitie, state, degree, order, condition, or preheminance so euer they be, or with what so euer dignitie, or honour ecclesiasticall or temporall they be honoured with all, that from thys day forward they doe not receiue or harbour the said sir Iohn Borthwike, commonly called captaine Borthwike, being accused, conuict, and declared an hereticke, and Archeheretike into their houses, hospitals, castels, Cities, Townes, villages or other cottages what so euer they be, or by anye manner of meanes admit him thereunto, either by helping him wyth meate, drinke or victualles, or any other thyng what so euer it be, they do shewe vnto him any manner of humanitie, helpe, comforte, or solace, vnder the paine and penaltie of greater and further excommunication, confiscation and forfeitures, and if it happen that they be founde culpable or faultie in the premisses, that they shalbe accused therefore as the fauourers, receiuers, defenders, maintainers and abettors of heretikes, and shall be punished therfore according to the order of law, and with such paine and punishment as shalbe due vnto men in such behalfe.

And nowe to prosecute such other as followed, beginning first in order wyth Thom. Forret and his fellowes. Their storie is this.

Persecuters.	Martyrs.	Their Causes.
• Daid Beton, Bishop and Cardinall of S. Andrewes. • George Treichon Bishop of Dunkelden.	• Tho. Forret, priest. • Frier Iohn Kelowe. • Fryer Benarage. • Duncane Sympson, priest. • Rob. Foster, a gentlemā, with three or foure other men of Striuelynge, Martyrs.	NOt longe after the burning of Daid Stratton, and maister Gurlay aboue mentioned, in the daies of Daid Beaton, bishop and Cardinall of S. Andrewes, & George Treichon B. of Dunkelden, a canon of Saint Colmes Inche, and vicar of Dolone, called Dean Thomas Forret, preached euery sonday to hys parishners, the Epistle or Gospell, as it fell for the time: which then was a great nouelty in Scotlande, to see any man preach, except a blacke frier, or a gray frier: and therefore the friers enuied him, and accused him to the Bishop of Dunkelden (in whose diocesse he remained) as an heretike, and one that shewed the mysteries of the Scriptures to the vulgare people in English, to make the Clergie detestable in the sighte of the people. The bishop of Dunkelden mooued by the friers instigation, called the said Deane Thomas,* and said to him: my ioy Deane Thomas, I loue you wel, and therfore I must geue you my counsel, how you shal rule and guide your selfe. To whom Thom. said, I thank your Lordship hartily. Then the B. began his counsaile on this maner.

My ioy Deane Thomas,* I am enfourmed that you preache the Epistle or Gospell euery Sonday to your Parishners, and that you take not the kowe, nor the vpmoste cloth from your Parishners, which thing is very preiudiciall to the church men: and therefore my ioy Deane Thomas, I would you tooke your kow and your vpmost cloth as other church men do, or els it is too much to preach euery sonday, for in so doing you may make the people thinke that wee shoulde preache likewise. But it is enoughe for you, when you finde any good Epistle, or any good gospell, that setteth foorth the libertie of the holy church, to preache that, and let the rest be.

Thomas answered: My Lorde, I thinke that none of my parishners wil complaine that I take not the kowe nor the vppermost cloth, but will gladly geue me the same together with any other thinge that they haue, and I will geue and communicate with them anye thing that I haue, and so my Lord we agree right wel, and there is no discord among vs.

And where your Lordshippe sayeth, it is too muche to preache euery Sonday: in deede I thinke it is too little,* and also woulde wishe that your Lordship did the like. Naye, nay, Deane Thomas (sayeth my Lorde) let that be, for we are not ordained to preache. Then sayde Thomas, when your Lordship biddeth me preache, when I finde any good Epistle, or a good Gospell, truely my Lorde, I haue reade the newe Testament and the olde, and all the Epistles and the Gospels, and among them all I could neuer finde any euil Epistle, or any euil Gospell: but if your Lordship will shewe me the good Epistle and the good Gospell, and the euill Epistle and the euill Gospell, then I shall preache the good, and omit the euill.

Then spake my Lord stoutly, and saide, I thanke God that I neuer knewe what the olde and newe Testamente was,* (and of these wordes rose a Prouerbe which is common in Scotland: Yee are like the Bishop of Dunkeldene that knewe neither newe nor olde lawe:) therefore Deane Thomas, I will knowe nothing but my Portous and my Pontifical. Go your way, and let be all these fantasies: for if you perseuer in these erroneous opinions, ye wil repent it when you may not mende it.

Thomas saide, I trust my cause be iust in the presence of God,* and therefore I passe not muche what doe followe thereupon, and so my Lorde and he departed at that tyme. And soone after a Summons was directed from the Cardinall of S. Andrewes, and the sayde Bishop of Dunkelden vpon the saide Deane Thomas Forret, vpon 2. blacke Friars, called frier Iohn Kelowe, and an other called Benarage, and vpon one priest of Striueling called Duncane Sympson, and one Gentleman called Robert Foster in Strielyng, with other three or foure, wyth them of the towne of Strielyng: who at the day of their appearaunce after their summoning, were cōdemned to the death without any place of recantation, because (as was alleged) they were heresiarkes or chiefe heretikes and teachers of heresies, and especially because manye of them were at the bridall and marriage of a Priest, who was vicar of Twybodye beside Strielynge, and did eate fleshe in Lent at the said bridal, and so they were altogether burnt vpon the castle hill of Edenbrough, where they that were first bounde to the stake, godly and marueilously did comfort them that came behinde.

Heere foloweth the manner of persecution vsed by the Cardinall of Scotland, against certaine persons in Perth.

Persecuters.	Martyrs.	Theyr Causes.
Dauid Beton, Byshop and Cardinall of S. Andrewes.	• Robert Lambe. • William Anderson. • Iames Hunter. • Iames Raueleson. • Iames Fouleson. • Hellen Stirke hys wife.	First there was a certaine Acte of Parlamente made in the gouernement of the Lorde Hamleton Earle of Arran,* and Gouernour of Scotlande, geuinge priuiledge to all men of the Realme of Scotlande, to reade the Scriptures in their mother tongue, and language, secluding neuerthelesse all reasoning, conference, conuocation Page 1267 of people to heare the Scriptures reade or expounded.* Which liberty of priuate reading being granted by publike proclamation, lacked not hys owne • ruite, so that in sondrie partes of Scotland therby were opened the eies of the elect of God to see the truthe, and abhorre the Papistical abominations. Amongest the which were certaine persones in S. Iohnston, as after is declared.

At thys time there was a Sermone made by Fryer Spense,* in saint Iohnston, aliâs called Perth, affirmynge prayer made o saintes to be so necessarye, that wythoute it there coulde be no hope of saluation to man. Whyche blasphemous doctrine a Burges of the sayd towne called Robert Lambe, could not abide, but accused hym in open audience, of erroneous doctrine, and adiured hym in Gods name to vtter the trueth. The which the Frier being stricken with feare, promised to doe, but the trouble, tumulte, and sturre of the people encreased so, that the Frier coulde haue no audience, and yet the sayde Roberte wyth greate daunger of his life escaped the handes of the multitude,* namely of the women, who contrary to nature, addressed them to extreme cruelty against him.

At this time in the yeare of our Lorde 1543. the ennemies of the truth procured Iohn Chartuous, who fauoured the truthe, and was Prouost of the saide citie & towne, of Perth, to be deposed from his office by the sayde Gouernours authoritie,* and a Papist called Maister Alexander Marbecke to be chosen in his rouse, y^t they myght bring the more easily their wicked enterprise to an ende.

*After the deposing of the former Prouost, and election of the other, in the moneth of Ianuary the yere aforesayde, on saint Paules day, came to sainte Iohnston, the Gouernour, the Cardinall, the Earle of Argile Iustice, sir Iohn Campbell of Lunde knight, and Iustice De•orte, the Lorde Borthwyke, the Bishop of Dumblane, and Orkeney, with certaine other of the Nobilitie. And althoughe there were manye accused for the crime of heresie (as they terme it) yet these persones were onely apprehended vppon the sayde sainte Paules day, Robert Lambe, William Anderson, Iames Hunter, Iames Raueleson, Iames Founleson, and Hellen Stirke his wife, and cast that night in the Spay tower of the sayde Citie, the morowe to abide iudgement.

Uppon the morrowe, when they appeared and were brought forth to iudgement in the towne, was said in generall to all their charge, the violating of the Acte of Parliament before expressed, and their conference and assemblies in hearing and expoundinge of scripture againste the tenour of the sayde Acte. Robert Lambe was accused in speciall for interrupting of the Frier in the pulpit: whyche he not onely confessed, but also affirmed constantly, that it was the duetie of no manne, whych vnderstood and knewe the trueth, to heare the same impugned wythoute contradiction, and therefore sundry which there were presente in iudgement, who hidde the knowledge of the truth, shoulde beare their burden in Gods presence for consenting to the same.

The sayde Robert also wyth William Anderson, and Iames Raueleson were accused for hanging vp the image of S. Fraunces in a corde,* nailing of Rammes hornes to his head, and a Cowes rumpe to hys taile, and for eatinge of a goose on Alhalow euen.

Iames Hunter being a simple man and wythout learning, and a Fletcher by occupation, so that hee coulde be charged wyth no greate knowledge in Doctrine, yet because he often vsed the suspect companye of the rest, he was accused.

The woman Hellen Stirke was accused, for that in her childbed she was not accustomed to cal vpon the name of the virgine Mary,* being exhorted thereto by her neyghbours, but onely vpon God, for Iesus Christes sake, and because she said in like maner, that if she her selfe had beene in the time of the virgin Mary, God might haue looked to her humilitie and base estate, as hee did to the virgines, in making her the mother of Christe, thereby meaninge, that there was no merites in the virgine, whyche procured her that honour, to be made the mother of Christe, and to bee preferred before other women, but Gods only free mercy exalted her to that estate. Whiche woordes were counted moste execrable in the face of the Clergie and whole multitude.

Iames Raueleson aforesayde building a house, set vppon the round of his fourth staire, the 3. crowned diademe of Peter carued of tree, which the cardinal tooke as done in mockage of his Cardinals hat, and this procured no fauor to the sayd Iames at theyr handes.

These forenamed persones vppon the morrowe aft•• sainte Paules day were condemned and iudged to deathe,* and that by an Assise, for violatinge (as was alleaged) the Acte of Parliament, in reasoning and conferryng vppon Scriptures, for eating flesh vppon dayes forbidden, for interrupting the holy frier in the pulpitte, for dishonouryng of Images, and blaspheming of the virgine Mary, as they alleaged.

After sentence geuen, theyr handes were bounde, and the men cruelly entreated. Which thing the woman beholding, desired likewise to be bounde by the sergeantes with her husband for Christes sake.

There was great intercession made by the Towne in the meane season for the lif• of these persones aforenamed, to the Gouvernour, who of him self was willing so to haue done, that they myght haue bene deliuered. But the Gouvernour was so subiect to the appetite of the cruel priestes, that he could not do that which he would. Yea, they manaced to assist his ennemies, and to depose him, except he assisted their crueltie.

There were certaine priestes in the Citie, who did eate and drinke before in these honest mens houses, to whō the priestes were much bounden. These priestes were earnestly desired to entreate for their hostesse, at the Cardinales handes: but they altogether refused, desiring rather theyr death, then preseruatiō. So cruell are these beastes from the lowest to the highest.

Then after, they were caried by a great band of armed men (for they feared rebellion in the towne, except they had theyr men of warre) to the place of execution, whych was common to all theeeues, & that to make their cause appeare more odious to the people.

Robert Lambe at the gallowes foote made his exhortation to the people, desiring them to feare God, and leaue the leauen of Papisticall abominations,* & manifestly there prophesied of the ruine and plague whych came vpon the Cardinall thereafter. So euerye one comforting an other, and assuring them selues to sup together in the kingdome of heauen, that night commended themselues to God, and died constantly in the Lord.

The woman desired earnestly to die with her husband, but shee was not suffered: yet folowing him to the place of execution, shee gaue him comfort, exhorting hym to perseueraunce and pacience for Christes sake, and parting from him with a kisse, sayd on this maner: Husband, reioyce, for we haue liued together many ioyful dayes: but this day, in which we must die, ought to be most ioyfull to vs both, because we must haue ioy for euer. Therefore I will not bid you good night, for we shall sodainely meete with ioy in the kingdome of heauen.

The woman after was taken to a place to be drowned, and albeit she had a child sucking on her brest, yet this moued nothing the vnmercifull hearts of the enemies. So after she had commended her children to the neighbors of the towne for Gods sake, and the sucking barne was geuen to the nurse, she sealed vp the truth by her death. The condemnation of M. George Wiseheart, Gentleman, who suffered Martyrdome for the faith of Christ Iesus, at saint Andrewes in Scotland, An. 1546. Marche 1. wyth the Articles obiected againste him, and his answeares to the same.

With most tender affection and vnfaigned heart consider (gentle Reader) the vncharitable manner of y^e accusation of M. George Wiseheart,* made by y^e bloody enemies of Christs faith. Note also the articles whereof he was accused, by order digested, and hys meeke answeares,* so farre as he had leaue and leisure to speake. Finally, ponder with no dissembling spirite the furious rage, and tragicall cruelnes of the malignant Church, in persecuting of thys blessed man of God: and of the contrary, hys humble, pacient, and most godly answeres, made to them sodainly without all feare, not hauing respect to their glorious manasings and boysterous threats, but charitably and wythout stop answering: not moouing his countenaunce, nor changing his visage, as in his accusation hereafter folowing manifestly shall appeare.

But before I enter into his Articles, I thoughte it not impertinent, somewhat to touche concerning the life and conuersation of this godlye man, according as of late came to my handes, certified in wryting by a certaine scholler of hys, sometime named Emerey Tylney, whose wordes of testimoniall as he wrote them to me, here folow.

Page 1268 Aboute the yeare of oure Lorde a thousande, fiue hundreth, fortie and thre, there was in the vniuersitie of Cambridge one maister George Wiseheart, commonlye called maister George of Bennettes Colledge, who was a man of talle stature, polled headed, and on the same a rounde Frenche cappe of the best. Iudged of Melancholye complexion by his Phisiognomie, blacke heared, long •earded comelye of personage, well spoken after his countrey of Scotlād, courteous, lowly, louely, glad to teach, desirous to learn, & was wel traueled, hauing on him for his habit or clothing, neuer but a mantell friese gowne to the showes, a blacke Millian fustian dowblet, and plaine blacke hosen, course newe canuesse for his Shirtes, and whyte fallinge Bandes and Cuffes at the handes. All the whych Apparell hee gaue to the poore, some weekelye, some monethly, some quarterlye as hee liked, sauing hys Frenche cappe whyche hee kepte the whole yeare of my being with hym.

Hee was a manne modest, temperate, fearinge God, hatinge Couetousnesse: For his Charitie had neuer ende, nyghte, noone, nor daye, hee forbare one meale in three, one daye in foure for the moste parte, except somethyng to comforte nature. Hee lay harde vppon a pouffe of straw: course newe canuesse Sheetes, whyche when hee chaunged, hee gaue awaye, hee hadde commonly by his beddes side a tubbe of water. In the whyche, (hys people being in hedde, the candell pu•te out, and all quiet) he vsed to bathe hymselfe, as I being very yong, being assured often heard him, and in one light nighte descerned hym, hee loued mee tenderly, and I him, for my age as effectually. He taught wyth great modestie and grauitie, so that some of his people thought hym seuer, and woulde haue slaine hym, but the Lorde was hys defence. And hee after due correction for their malice by good exhortation amended them, and he went hys way! O that the Lord hadde left hym to me his poore boye, that hee might haue finished that he hadde begonne: For in his Religion he was as you see heere in the rest of hys life, when he went into Scotland with diuers of the Nobilitie, that came for a treatie to kinge Henry the eighte. Hys learning no lesse sufficient, then his desire alwayes prest and readye to doe good, in that hee was able bothe in the house priuately, and in the Schoole publikely, professing and reading diners authours.

If I shoulde declare hys loue to mee and all menne, hys Charitie to the poore, in geuinge, relieuinge, caringe, helpinge, prouidinge, yea infinitely studyinge howe to doe good vnto all, and hurte to none, I shoulde sooner wante woordes then iuste cause to commende.

All thys I testifie wyth my whole heart and trueth of thys Godly manne. Hee that made all, gouerneth all, and shall iudge all, knoweth I speake the trothe, that the simple maye be satisfied, the arrogante confounded, the hypocrite disclosed.

Missae ministerium, mysterium iniquitatis.

To the sayde maister George beinge in Captiuitie in the Castle of Sainte Andrews, th^e Deane of the same Towne, was sente by the commaundement of the Cardinall, and hys wicked Counsaile, and there summoned the sayde maister George, that hee shoulde vppon the morning followinge,* appeare before the Iudge, then and there to geue accounte of hys seditious and hereticall doctrine.

To whom M. George answeared, what needeth (said he) my Lord Cardinal to summon me to answeare for my doctrine, openly before him, vnder whose power and dominion I am thus straitly bound in yrons? May not my Lord compel me to answeare of hys extorte power? Or beleueth hee that I am vnprouided to render a counte of my doctrine? To manifest your selues what men yee are, it is well done that ye keepe your olde ceremonies and constitutions made by men.

Upon the next morning, the Lord Cardinal caused his seruauntes to addresse them selues in theyr moste warlike arraye, with Iacke, Knapskal, Splente, Speare, and axe, more seeming for the warre, then for the preaching of the true word of God.

And when these armed chāpions marching in warlike order had conueyed y^e bishops into y^e abbey Church,* incontinently they sent for M. George, who was conueyed into the sayd Church by the Captayne of the Castle, accompanied with an hundred men addressed in maner aforesayde. Like a lambe lead they him to sacrifice.

As he entred into the Abbey Church doore, there was a poore man lying, vexed with great infirmities, asking of his almes: to whom he flang his purse. And when he came before the Lord Cardinall,* by and by the Suppriour of the Abbey, called Dane Iohn Winryme, stood vp in the pulpite, and made a sermon to all the congregation there thē assembled, taking his matter out of the xiii. chapter of Mathewe, Whose sermon was deuided into foure principall partes.

The first part was a briefe and short declaration of the Euangelist.

The second part, of the interpretation of the good seed.* And because he called the word of God the good seede, and heresie the euill seede, he declared what heresie was, and how it should be known: which he defined on this maner.* Heresie is a false opinion defended with pertinacie, clearly repugning the word of God.

The third part of his sermon, was the cause of heresie within that Realme, and all other Realmes.* The cause of heresie (quoth he) is the ignoraunce of them which haue the cures of mens soules, to whome it necessarily belongeth to haue the true vnderstanding of the woorde of God, that they may be able to winne againe the false Doctours of heresies with the sworde of the spirite, which is y^e worde of God, and not onely to winne agayne,* but also to ouercome them, as sayth Paule: A Byshop must be faultlesse, as it becommeth the minister of God, not stubburne, nor angrie, no drunkard, no fighter, not geuen to filthy lucre, but barbarous, one that loueth goodnes, sober minded, righteous, holy, temperate and suche as cleaueth vnto the true worde of doctrine, that hee may be able to exhort with wholesome learning, and to improue that which they say agaynst him.

The fourth part of his sermon was how heresies shuld be knowne: * Heresies (quoth he) be knowne on this maner as the Goldsmith knoweth the fine golde from the vnperfect, by the touchstone: so likewise may we knowe heresie by the vndoubted touchstone: that is, the true, sincere, and vndefiled word of God. At the last he added, that hereticks shoulde be put downe in this present life. * To whiche proposition the gospel appeared to repugne, which he entreated of: Let them grow vnto the haruest: the haruest is the end of the world, Neuerthelesse, hee affirmed that they shoulde be put downe by the ciuile magistrate and law. And when hee ended his sermon, incontinently they caused mayster George to ascend into the pulpit, there to heare his accusation and articles. And right agaynst him stood by, one of the fed flocke, a monster, Iohn La•der, * laden full of cursinges, written in paper. Of the which he tooke out a roll, both long and also full of cursinges▪ threatens, maledictions and wordes of deuilish spite and malice, * saying to the innocent M. George, so many cruell and abhominable wordes, and hit him so spitefully with the popes thunder, that the ignoraunt people dreaded least the <◇> then woulde haue swallowed him vp quicke. Notwithstanding he stood still with great pacience, hearing their sayinges, not once mouing or chaunging his countenance.

When that this fed s•w had read throughout all his lying manasinges, his face running down with sweate, * and frothing at his mouth like a boare, he spit at M. Georges face, saying: What aunswerest thou to these sayinges, thou runnagate traytor, theefe, which we haue duely proued by sufficient witnes agaynst the? M. George •earing thys, kneeled downe vpon hys knees in the Pulpit, making his prayer to God. When he had ended his prayer, sweetly and Christianly he answered to them all in this maner.

Mayster George his aunswere.

MAny and horrible sayinges vnto me, a Christian man, * many wordes abhominable for to heare, ye haue spoken here this day. Which not onely to receaue, but also once to thinke, I thought euer great abomination. Wherefore I pray your discretions quietly to heare me, that ye may know what were my sayings, & the maner of my doctrine. This my petition (my Lord) I desire to be heard for three causes. *

The first is, because thorough preaching of the worde of God, his glory is made manifest. It is reasonable therefore, for the aduauncing of the glory of God, that ye heare Page 1269 me teaching truely the pure word of God without any dissimulation.

*The second reason is, because that your health springeth of the word of God: or he worketh all thing by his worde. It were therefore an vnrighteous thing, if ye shoulde stop your eares from me, teaching truely the word of God.

*The third reason is, because your doctrine vttereth many blasphemous and abominable words, not comming of the inspiration of God, but of the deuil, with no lesse perill then of my life. It is iust therefore and reasonable your discretions to knowe what my wordes and doctrine are, and what I haue euer taught in my time in thys realme, that I pearish not vniustly, to the great pearill of your soules. Wherefore both for the glory and honor of God, your owne health, and safegarde of my life, I beseeche your discretions to heare mee, and in the meane time I shall recite my doctrine without any colour.

*First & chiefly, since the time I came into thys realme, I taught nothing but the 10. commandements of God, the 12. Articles of the faithe, and the prayer of the Lorde in the mother tongue. Moreouer, in Dundie I taught the Epistle of S. Paul to the Romanes. And I shal shew your discretions faithfully what fashion and maner I vsed when I taught, without any humane dread, so that your discretions geue me your eares beneuolent and attent.

Sodenly then with all high voice cried the accuser, the fedde sowe: thou heretike, runnagate, traytor, and thiefe, it was not lawfull for thee to preache. Thou haste taken the power at thine owne hande, wythout any authoritie of the church. * We forethinke y^t thou hast bene a preacher so long. Then all the whole congregation of y^e prelates with theyr complices, sayde these wordes: If wee geue hym licence to preach, he is so crafty, and in the holy scripture so exercised, that he will perswade the people is hys opinion, and raise them against vs.

*Maister George seeing their malicious and wicked entent, appealed from the Lord Cardinal to the Lord gouernour, as to an indifferent and equal Iudge. To whom the accuser Iohn Lauder aforesayde, with hoggish voyce answered, * Is not my Lorde Cardinal the second person wⁱn this realme, Chauncelour of Scotlande, Archb. of S. Andrewes, bishop of Meropois, Commendator of Aberbrothoke, Legatus natus, Legatus à Latere. And so retiring as many titles of his vnworthy honours, as woulde haue loden a ship, much sooner an asse, is not hee, quoth Iohn Lauder, an equall Iudge apparantly vnto thee? Whom other desirest thou to be thy Iudge?

To whom this humble man answeared, saying, I refuse not my Lord Cardinall, but I desire the word of God to be my iudge, and the temporall estate, with some of your lordships mine auditors, because I am here my Lord Gouernours prisoner. * Whereupon the pridefull & scornful people that stode by, mocked him, saying: Suche man suche iudge, speaking seditious & reprochful wordes against the gouernor and other the Nobles, meaning them also to be heretikes. And incontinent without all delay they woulde haue geuen sentence vppon M. George, and that wythout farther processe, had not certaine men there counsailed the Cardinall to reade againe the articles, and to heare his answers thereuppon, that the people might not complaine of his wrongfull condemnation.

And shortly to declare, these were the articles following, with his answeares, as farre as they would geue hym leaue to speake. For when he entēded to mitigate their •ea•ings, and shew the maner of hys doctrine• by and by they stopped hys mouth with an other article.

*1 THou false heretike, runnagate, traytour and thiefe, deceiuer of the people, thou despisest the holy Church, and in lyke case contemnest my Lorde gouernours authoritie. And this wee know for suretie, that when thou preachedst in Du•dy, and wast charged by my Lord Gouernours authority to desist: neuertheles thou wouldest not obey, but perseueredst in the same: and therefore the Bishop of Brothen cursed thee, and deliuered thee into the deuils handes, and gaue thee in commaundemente that thou shouldest preach no more. That notwithstanding thou diddest continue obstinately.

My Lordes, I haue reade in the Actes of the apostles, that it is not lawfull to desist from the preaching of the gospell,* for the threatens and maners of men. Therefore it is wrytten: We shal rather obey God then men. I haue also read in the Prophet Malachi: I shall curse your blessings, & blesse your cursings, beleeuing firmly, that the Lorde will turne your cursings into blessings.

2 Thou fals heretike diddest say, that the priest standing at the altar saying Masse,* was like a Foxe wagging his taile in Iulie.

My Lordes, I sayde not so. These were my sayings: The moouing of the body outwarde,* without the inwarde moouing of the heart, is nought else, but the playenge of an Ape, and not the true seruing of God: For God is a secrete searcher of mennes heartes. Therefore who will truely adore and honour God, he must in spirite and veritie honor hym. Then the accuser stopped his mouth wyth an other article.

3 Thou false heretike preachedst against the sacraments,* saying, that there were not 7. sacraments.

My Lordes, and if it be your pleasures,* I neuer taught of the number of the sacraments,* whether they were seuen or eleuen. So manye as are instituted by Christe, and are shewed to vs by the Euangel, I professe openly. Except it be the word of God I dare affirme nothing.

4 Thou false heretike hast openly taught,* that auriculare confession is not a blessed sacrament. And thou sayest that we should only confesse vs to God, and to no priest.

My Lords, I say, that auricular confession,* seeing that it hath no promise of the Euangel, therefore it can not be a Sacramente. Of the confession to be made to God,* there are many testimonies in scripture, as when Dauid sayth: I thoughte I woulde knowlege mine iniquitie againste my selfe vnto the Lorde, and hee forgave the punishment of my sinne. Psal. 32 Heere confession signifieth the secrete knowledging of our sinnes before God. Whē I exhorted the people in this manner, I reprooued no manner of confession. And farther S. Iames sayeth: Knowledge your faultes one to an other, and pray one for an other, that you may be healed.* When that hee had sayde these woordes, the Bishops and their complices cried and grinned with their teeth, saying: Se ye not what colours hee hath in hys speaking, that hee may beguile vs and seduce vs to hys opinion▪

5 Thou heretike didst say openly,* that it was necessary to euery man, to knowe and vnderstande his Baptisme, and what it was, contrary to generall Councels, and the states of holy Church.*

My Lordes, I beleeeue there be none so vnwise heere, that will make marchandise with a French man,* or any other vnknown straunger, except he know and vnderstand first the condition or promise made by the Frenche man or straunger. So likewyse I woulde that wee vnderstoode what thing we promise in the name of y^e infant vnto God in Baptisme. For this cause I beleeeue ye haue confirmation. Then said master Bleiter chapleine, that he had the deuill within hym, and the spirite of error. Then answered him a child, saying: The deuill cannot speake suche wordes as yonder man doth speake.

6 Thou heretike, traitour, and thiefe, thou saidest that the Sacrament of the altar was but a peece of bread baken vpon the ashes and no other thing els, and all that is there done,*is but a superstitious rite against the commaundement of God.

Oh Lorde God, so manifest lies and blasphemies the Scripture doeth not teache you.* As concerning the sacrament of the aultare (my Lordes) I neuer taught any thing against the Scripture,*the whych I shall (by Gods grace) make manifest thys daye, I being ready therefore to suffer death.

The lawfull vse of this Sacrament is most acceptable vnto God: but the great abuse of it is very detestable vnto hym. But what occasion they haue to say such wordes of me, I shall shortly shew your Lordships. I once chaunced to meete wyth a Iewe, when I was sailing vpon the water of Rhene. I did enquire of him what was the cause of his pertinacie,*that he did not beleue that the true Messias was come, considering that they had seene all the Prophecies whych were spoken of him, to be fulfilled. Moreouer, the Prophecies taken away, and the Scepter of Iuda, by many other testimonies of the scripture, I vāquished him, that Messias was come,*y^t which they called Iesus of Nazareth. Thys Iewe aunswared againe vnto mee, when Messias commeth, he shall restore all things, and hee shall not abrogate the law, which was geuen to our forfathers, as ye do. For why▪ we see the poore almost perish through hunger amongst you: yet you are not mooued with pity towards them: but among vs Iewes (though we be poore) there are no beggers found.

Secondarily, it is forbidden by the lawe, to faine anye kind of imagery of things in heauen aboue,*or in the earth beneath, or in the sea vnder the earthe: but one God onely to honour: but your Sanctuaries and Churches are ful of Idolles.

Thirdly, a peece of bread baken vpon the ashes,*ye adore and worship, and say, that it is your God. I haue rehersed heere but the sayings of the Iewe, which I neuer affirmed to be true. Then the bishops shooke their heads, and spitted on the earth, and what they meant in this matter further they would not heare.

7 Thou false heretike diddest say,*that extreeme vnction was not a sacrament.

My Lordes, forsooth I neuer taught any thyng of extreme Page 1270 vnction in my doctrine, whether it were a Sacrament or no.

*8 Thou false heretike saidest, that holye water is not so good as washe, and suche like. Thou condemnest coniuring, and sayest that holy Churches cursings auaille not.

My Lordes, as for holy water, what strengthe it is of, I taught neuer in my doctrine. Coniuringes and Exorcismes,*if they were conformable to the woorde of God, I would commend them: but in so much as they are not conformable to the commaundement and woord of God, I reprooue them.

*9 Thou false heretike and runnagate hast sayde, that euery lay man is a priest, and suche like. Thou sayest, that the Pope hathe no more power, then any other man.

My Lordes, I taught nothyng but the worde of God, I remember that I haue read in some places in S. Iohn and S. Peter, * of the which one sayth: He hath made vs kings and priests. The other sayeth: Hee hath made vs a kingly priesthood. * Wherefore I haue affirmed that any man being cunning in the woorde of God, & the true faith of Iesu Christ, hath his power geuen him from God, and not by the power or violence of men, but by the vertue of the woorde of God, the which woord is called the power of God, as witnesseth S. Paule euidently enough. And againe, I say that any vnlearned man, * not exercised in the worde of God, nor yet constant in his faith, what so euer estate or order hee be of, I say, he hath no power to binde or loose, seeing he wanteth the instrument, by the which he bindeth or looseth, that is to say, the woorde of God.

After that he had sayd these wordes, all the Byshoppes laughed, * & mocked him. When that he behelde their laughing, Laugh yee (sayeth he) my Lordes? Though that these sayings appeare scornefull and worthy of derision to your Lordships, neuertheles they are very waighty to me, and of a great value, because they stand not only vpon my life, but also the honour and glory of God. In the meane time many godly men beholding the woodnes and great crudelitie of the Bishops, and the inuincible patience of maister George, did greatly mourne and lament.

10 Thou false heretike saidest, that a man hath no free wil. But is like to the Stoikes, * which say, that it is not in mans will to doe any thing, but that all concupiscence & desire commeth of God, what soeuer kinde it be of.

My Lordes, I saide not so, truely, I say, that as many as beleue in Christe firmly, vnto them is geuen libertie, conformable to the saying of S. Iohn: * If the sonne make you free, then shall ye verely be free. Of the contrary, as many as beleue not in Christ Iesu, * they are bond seruants of sinne: He that sinneth, is bond to sinne.

*11 Thou false heretike sayest, it is as lawfull to eate flesh vpon the friday, as on sonday.

Pleaseth it your Lordshippes, I haue read in the Epistles of S. Paule, * that who is cleane, vnto him all thyngs are cleane. Of the contrary, to the filthy men all things are vncleane. * A faithful man cleane and holy, sanctifieth by the woorde, the creature of God. But the creature maketh no manne acceptable vnto God. * So that a creature may not sanctifie any impure and vnfaithful man. But to the faithfull man, all things are sanctified by the praier of the word of God. * After these sayings of master George, then said all the Bishops wyth theyr complices: what needeth vs any witnesse against him? hath he not openly here spoken blasphemie?

12 Thou false heretike doest say, that wee shoulde not praye to Saintes, * but to God onely. Say whether thou hast sayd this, or no: say shortly.

For the weakenes and the infirmitie of the hearers, he said without doubt plainly, * that Saints should not be honoured. My Lordes (sayde hee) there are two things worthy of note. * The one is certaine, the other vncertaine. It is found plainly and certaine in Scripture, that we should worship and honor one God, according to the saying of the first Commaundement: Thou shalt only worship and honour thy Lord God, with all thy heart. But as for praying to, and honouring of Saintes, there is great doubt among many, whether they hear or no, inuocation made vnto thē. Therefore I exhorted all men equally in my doctrine, that they shoulde leaue the vnsure waye, and folowe that way, which was taught vs by our master Christ. He is our only mediatour, and maketh intercession for vs to God hys father.* He is the doore by the which we must enter in. Hee that entreth not in by this doore, but climeth an other way, is a theefe and murtherer. Hee is the veritie and lyfe. Hee that goeth out of this way, there is no doubt but hee shall fall into the mire: yea verely, is fallen into it already. This is the fashion of my doctrine, the whych I haue euer followed. Uerely that whyche I haue hearde and reade in the woorde of God; I taught openly, and in no corners. And now ye shal witnes the same, if your Lordships will heare me. Except it stande by the woorde of God, I dare not be so bold to affirme any thinge. These sayings he rehearsed diuers times.

13 Thou false heretike haste preached plainly,*saying that there is no Purgatorie, and that it is a fained thinge, any man after thys life to be punished in Purgatorie.

My Lordes, as I haue oftentimes sayde heeretofore,* without expresse wnesse and testimonie of the Scripture, I dare affirme nothyng.* I haue ofte and diuers times read ouer the Bible, and yet suche a terme founde I neuer, nor yet any place of Scripture applicable therunto. Therefore I was ashamed euer to teache of that thyng, whych I coulde not finde in the Scripture. Then sayd he to master Iohn Lauder hys accuser: If you haue any testimonie of the Scripture, by the which ye may prooue any such place, shewe it now before this audiorie. But this dolt had not a worde to say for him selfe, but was as dumbe as a beetle in that matter.

14 Thou false heretike hast taught plainly against the vowes of Monkes, Friers, Nunnes, and Priestes, saying:*that whosoeuer was bounde to such like vowes, they vowed themselues to the estate of damnation: Moreouer, that it was lawful for priestes to marry wiues, and not to liue sole.

Of soothe (my Lordes) I haue read in the Euangell,* that there are three kindes of chaste men. Some are gelded from their mothers wombe: some are gelded by men:* and some haue gelded themselues, for the kingdome of heauen sake. Uerelye I say,* these men are blessed by the Scripture of God. But as many as haue not the gift of chastitie, nor yet for the Euangell, haue not ouercome the concupiscence of the flesh, and haue vowed chastitie: yee haue experience, although I should holde my peace, to what inconuenience they haue vowed them selues.

When he had sayde these wordes, they were all dumbe, thinking better to haue tenne Concubines, then one married wife.

15 Thou false heretike and runnagate sayest,*thou wylte not obey our Generall, nor Prouinciall Councils.

My Lords, what your general Councils are, I knowe not, I was neuer exercised in them:* but to the pure worde of God I gaue my labors. Read here your general Councils, or els geue me a booke wherin they are contained, that I may reade them. If they agree with the word of God,* I will not disagree. Then the rauening wolues turned into woodnes, & said. Wherefore let we him speake any further? Reade forth the rest of the articles, & stay not vpō them. Among these cruell tygers, there was one false hypocrite,* a seducer of the people, called Ioh. Graifind Scot, standing behind Ioh. Lauders backe, hasting him to read the rest of y^e articles, & not to tary vpō his witty and godly answers: For we may not abide them, quoth he, no more then the diuill may abide the signe of the Crosse, when it is named.

16 Thou heretike sayest, that it is vaine to builde to the honor of God, costly Churches,*seeinge that God remaineth not in the Churches made with mens handes, nor yet God can be in so litle space, as betwixt the priests handes.

My Lordes, Salomon sayeth: If that the heauen of heauens can not comprehend thee,* howe muche lesse thys house, that I haue builded? And Iob consenteth to y^e same sentence: Seeing that he is higher then the heauens, therefore what canst thou build vnto him? He is deper then hel,* then how shalt thou know him? He is longer then y^e earth, and broader then the sea. So that God cannot be comprehēded into one place, because that he is infinite. These sayings notwithstanding, I said neuer that Churches should be destroyed. But of the contrarye I affirmed euer,* that Churches should be sustained and vpholden, that the people should be congregated into them, there to hear of God. And moreouer, wheresoeuer is true preaching of the word of God, and the lawfull vse of the Sacraments, vndoubtedly there is God himselfe. So that both these sayings are true together: God cannot be cōprehended into any place, and where soeuer are two or three gathered in hys name, there is he present in the midst of them. Then sayde he to hys accuser, If you thinke any otherwise then I say, shew foorth your reasons before this audiorie. Then he without al reason being dumbe, and not answering one word, proceeded foorth in hys articles.

17 Thou false heretike contemnest fastinge, and sayest,*thou shouldest not fast.

My Lordes, I finde that fasting is commended in the Scrypture: therefore I were a sclaunderer of the Gospell, if I contemned fastynge. And not so onely,* but I haue learned by experience, that fastinge is good for the health of the bodye: but God knoweth who fasteth the true fast.

18 Thou false heretike haste preached openly,*sayinge that Page 1271 the soule of man shall sleepe to the latter daye of iudgement, and shall not obtaine life immortall vntill that day.

God full of mercy and goodnesse forgeue them that saye such things of me. I wote and knowe surely by the worde of God, that he which hathe begun to haue the faith of Iesu Christ, and beleueth firmly in him, I know surely that the soule of that man shall neuer sleepe, but euer shall liue an immortall life. The which life from day to day is renued in grace and augmēted:, nor yet shal euer perish, or haue an ende, but euer immortall shall liue with Christ. To the which life all that beleue in him shal come, and rest in eternall glory. Amen.

When the Bishoppes wyth their complices had accused this innocent man in manner and fourme aforesayde, incōtinently they condēned him to be burnt as an heretik, not hauing respect to hys godly answers and true reasons which he alleaged, nor yet to their owne consciences, thinking verelye that they shoulde doe to God good sacrifice, conformable to the sayings of S. Iohn:,*They shal excommunicate you: yea, and the time shal come, that he which killeth you, shall thinke that he hath done to God good seruice.

The prayer of maister George.

O Immortall God, how long shalt thou suffer the woodnes & great crudelitie of the vngodly to exercise theyr fury vpon thy seruaunts which doe further thy woorde in this worlde,* seeing they desire to be contrary, y^t is to choke and destroy thy true doctrine & veritie, by the whych thou hast shewed thy selfe vnto the world, which was all drowned in blindnesse and misknowledge of thy name. O Lord wee knowe surelye that thy true seruauntes must needes suffer for thy names sake, persecution, affliction, and troubles in this present life, whiche is but a shadowe, as thou haste shewed to vs by thy Prophetes and Apostles. But yet we desire thee hartily, that thou conserue, defende, and helpe thy congregation, which thou haste chosen before the beginning of the worlde, and geue them thy grace to heare thy word, and to be thy true seruaunts in thys present life.

Then by & by they caused the common people to voide away, whose desire was alwayes to heare that innocente man to speake. Then the sonnes of darkenesse pronounced their sentence definitiue, not hauing respecte to the iudgement of God. When all this was done and sayde, the Cardinall caused his warders to passe againe wyth the meeke Lambe into the Castle, vntill suche time as the fire was made ready. When he was come into the Castle, then there came two Gray feendes, frier Scot and his mate, sayinge, Sir, yee must make your confession vnto vs. He aunswered, and said, I wil make no confession vnto you. Go fetch me yōder man that preached this day, and I will make my confession vnto him. Then they sent for the Suppriour of the Abbey, who came to him withall diligence. But what he sayd in thys confession I can not shewe.

When the fire was made readie, and the gallowes at the West part of the Castle neare to the Priorie, the Lorde Cardinall dreading that master George should haue bene taken away by his friendes, commaunded to bende all the Ordinance of the Castle right against that parte, and commaunded al his gunners to be ready and stand beside their gunnes, vnto such time as he were burned. All this beyng done, they bounde Maister Georges handes behinde hys backe, and ledde hym foorth wyth their souldiors from the Castle, to the place of their wicked execution. As hee came forth of the Castle gate, there met him certaine beggers asking his almes for Gods sake. To whome he answered, I want my handes wherwith I should geue you almes: but the mercifull Lorde, of his benignitie and aboundaunce of grace, that feedeth all men, vouchsafe to geue you necessities both vnto your bodies and soules.* Then afterwarde met him two false fiendes, I shoulde say Fryers, sayinge: Master George, pray to our Lady, that she may be mediatrix for you to her sonne. To whome he answered meekely: Cease, tempt me not my brethren. After thys hee was lead to the fire with a roape about his necke,* and a chayne of yron about his middle.

When that he came to the fire, he sate downe vpon hys knees, and rose againe, and thrise he sayd these woordes: O thou Sauour of the worlde haue mercy on mee. Father of heauen, I commend my spirit into thy holy hands. When he had made this prayer, he turned him to the people and sayde these wordes.

*I beseeche you Christian brethren and sisters, that yee be not offended in the woorde of God for the affliction and torments, whych ye see alreadye prepared for mee. But I exhorte you that ye loue the worde of God, and suffer paciently and wyth a comfortable heart for the woordes sake, whych is your vndoubted saluation and euerlasting comfote.

Moreouer, I pray you shewe my brethren and sisters, whych haue hearde me ofte before, that they cease not, nor leaue of the worde of God, which I taught vnto them, after the grace geuē vnto me, for no persecutiōs or troubles in this world, which lasteth not: and shew vnto them, that my doctrine was no wiues fables after the constitutions made by men. And if I had taught mens doctrine, I had gotten greate thanks by men. But for the woordes sake and true Euangel, which was geuen to me by the grace of God, I suffer thys day by men, not sorowfully,* but with a glad heart and minde. For this cause I was sent, that I shoulde suffer this fire for Christes sake. Consider and beholde my visage, yee shall not see mee chaunge my colour. Thys grim fire I feare not. And so I pray you for to doe, if that any persecution come vnto you for the wordes sake, & not to feare them that slay the bodye, and afterwarde haue no power to slay the soule. Some haue sayde of me, that I taught, that the soule of man should sleepe vntil y^e last day. But I know surely, & my faith is such, that my soule shall suppe w^t my sauour Christe this night, ere it be 6. houres: for whom I suffer this. Then he praied for them which accused hym, saying:* I beseeche thee (father of heauen) to forgeue them that haue of any ignoraunce, or els of any euill minde, forged any lies vpon me. I forgeue them wyth all my heart. I beseeche Christ to forgeue them that haue condemned me to death thys day ignorantly.

And last of all he sayd to the people on thys manner: I beseeche you brethren and sisters, to exhorte your Prelates to the learning of the woorde of God,* that they at the laste may be ashamed to doe euill, and learne to do good. And if they will not conuert themselues from their wicked error, there shal hastily come vpon them the wrath of God, which they shall not eschewe. Many faithfull wordes sayde he in the meane tyme, taking no heede or care of the cruell torments which were then prepared for him.

The Martyrdome of M. George Wisehart.

*

And last of all, the hangman that was hys tormentor, sate downe vpon hys knees, and said: Syr I pray you forgeue me, for I am not giltye of your death. To whome hee answeared: come hether to me. When that he was come to him, he kissed his cheeke, and sayd: Loe here is a token that I forgeue thee▪ My heart do thine office: and by and by, he was put vpon the gibbet and hanged, and there burnte to poulder. When that the people beheld the great tormēting, they might not withholde from pitious mourning & complaining of this innocent Lambes slaughter.

A note of the iust punishment of God vpon the cruell Cardinall Archbishop of S. Andrewes, named Beaton.

IT was not long after the martyrdom of the blessed man of God M. George Wisehart aforesayd, who was put to Page 1272 death by Dauid Beaton, the bloody Archbishop and Cardinall of Scotland,* as is aboue specified, an. 1546. the first day of March, but the sayd Dauid Beaton Archbyshop of S. Andrewes, by the iust reuenge of Gods mighty iudgement, was slaine within his owne Castle of S. Andrewes by y^e hands of one Lech & other Gētleme, who by the Lord stirred vp, brake in sodenly into his Castle vpon him, and in his bed murthered him the same yeare, the last daye of May, crying out: Alas, alas, sley me not, I am a Prieste. And so like a butcher he liued,* and like a butcher he dyed, & lay 7. monethes and more vnburied, & at last like a carion buried in a dunghill. an. 1546. Maij vlt. Ex histor. impressa.

After this Dauid Beaton, succeeded Iohn Hamelton Archbishop of S. Andrewes. an. 1549. who to the entent that he would in no wayes appeare inferiour to his predecessour,* in augmenting the number of the holy Martirs of God, in the next yeare following called a certayne poore man to iudgement, whose name was Adam Wallace. The order and maner of whose story heere followeth.

The story and Martyrdome of Adam Wallace in Scotland.*

There was set vpon a scaffold made hard to the Chauncelary wall of y^e blacke Friers Church in Edinbrough on seates made therupon,* the L. Gouverneur. Aboue hym at his back sate M. Gawin Hamelton Deane of Glasgue, representing the Metropolitane Pastor thereof.* Upon a seate on his right hand sate the Archb. of S. Andrewes. At his backe, and aside somewhat stode the Official Lowthaine. Next to the Byshop of S. Andrewes, the Byshop of Dunblane, the Bishop of Murray, the Abbot of Dunfermeling,* the Abbot of Glen•uce, with other Churchmen of lower estimation, as the Official of S. Andrewes, & other Doctours of that nest and City. And at the other end of the seate sate maister Uchiltrie. On his left hand sate the Earle of Argyle Iustice, with his Deputye Syr Iohn Campbell of Lundy vnder his feete. Next him the Earle of Huntley. Then the Earle of Anguish, the Byshop of Gallaway, the Prior of S. Andrewes, the Bish. of Orkenay, the L. Forbes, Dane Iohn Wynrime Suppriour of S. Andrewes, and behinde the seates stode the whole senate, the Clarke of the Register, &c.

At the further end of the Chauncelary wall in the pulpit was placed M. Iohn Lauder parson of Marbottle accuser, clad in a Surplice, and a red hood, and a great Congregation of the whole people in y^e body of the church, stāding on the ground. After that, Syr Iohn Ker, Prebendary of S. Giles Church was accused, conuicted, and condemned, for the false making and geuing forth of a sentēce of diuorce, and thereby falsly diuorced and parted a man and his lawfull wife in the name of the Deane of Roscalrige and certaine other Iudges appointed by the holy Father the Pope.* He graunted the falshood, and that neuer any such thing was done in deede, nor yet ment nor moued by the foresad Iudges, and was agreed to be banished the realmes of Scotland and England for his life time, and to lose his right hande, if he were found or apprehended therein heereafter, and in the meane time to leaue his benefices for euer, and they to be vacant.

After that was brought in Adā Wallace, a simple poore man in appearance,* cōueyed by Iohn of Cunnoke seruant to the B. of S. Andrewes, and set in the midst of y^e scaffold, who was commaunded to looke to the accuser: who asked him what was his name. He aunswered, Adam Wallace. The accuser sayd, he had another name, which he graunted, and sayd he was commonly called Feane. Then asked he where he was borne? Within two myle of Fayle (said he) in Kyle. Then sayd the accuser, I repent that euer such a poore man as you should put these noble Lords to so great encombrance this day by your vaine speaking,* And I must speake (sayd he) as God geueth me grace, and I beleue I haue said no euil to hurt any body. Would God (said the accuser) ye had neuer spokē, but you are brought forth for so horrible crimes of heresie, as neuer was imagined in this countrey of before, and shall be sufficiently proued, that ye can not deny it: and I forethinke that it should be heard, for hurting of weake consciences. Now I wyll yea thee no more, & thou shalt heare the points that thou art accused of.

Adam Wallace, aliās Feane, thou art openly delated and accused for preaching,* saying, and teaching of the blasphemies and abominable heresies vnderwritten. In the first, thou hast said and taught, that the bread and wine on the altar, after the words of consecration, are not the body and bloud of Iesu Christ. He turned to the Lord Gouverneur, and Lords aforesayd, saying: I sayd neuer, nor taught nothing, but that I found in this booke and writte (hauyng there a Bible at his belte, in French, Dutch, and English) which is the word of God, and if you will be content that the Lord God and his word be Iudge to me and this his holy writ, here it is, and where I haue sayd wrong,* I shal take what punishment you wil put to me: for I neuer said nothing concerning this that I am accused of, but that which I found in this writte.

What diddest thou say, sayd the accuser? I sayde (quoth he) that after our Lord Iesus Christ had eaten the Pascall Lambe in his latter Supper with his Apostles, and fulfilled the ceremonies of the old law, he instituted a new Sacrament in remembraunce of his death then to come. He tooke bread, he blessed, and brake it, and gaue it to hys Disciples, and sayde: Take yee, eate yee,* thys is my bodye, whyche shall bee broken and geuen for you: And lykewise the cuppe, blessed, and badde them drinke all thereof, for that was the cup of the new testament, which should be shed for the forgeuing of many. How oft ye do this, do it in my remembraunce.

Then saide the B. of S. Andrewes,* and the Officiall of Lowthaine, with the Deane of Glasgue, and many other Prelates: we know this well enough. The earle of Hütly said: thou aunswerest not to that which is laide to thee: say either nay or yea thereto. He aunswered, if ye will admitte God & his word spoken by the mouth of his blessed sonne Iesus Christ our Lord and Sauour, ye will admit that I haue sayd: for I haue sayd or taught nothing, but that the word, which is the triall and touchstone sayth, whych ought to be Iudge to me, and to all the world.

Why (quoth the Earle of Huntley) hast thou not a Iudge good inough? and trowest thou that we know not God and his word? Aunswere to that is spoken to thee: and then they made the accuser speake the same thing ouer againe. Thou saydest (quoth the accuser) and hast taught, that the bread and wine in the Sacrament of the aultar, after the words of the consecration, are not the body and bloud of our Sauour Iesus Christ.

He aunswered: I sayd neuer more then the write sayth, nor yet more then I haue sayd before.* For I know wel by S. Paule when he sayeth: Whosoeuer eateth this bread, and drinketh of thys cup vnwoorthely, receaueth to hymselfe damnation. And therefore when I taught (which was but seldome, and to them only which required and desired me) I sayd, that if the Sacrament of the aultar were truly ministred, and vsed as the sonne of the liuing God did institute it, where that was done, there was God himselfe by hys diuine power, by the which he is ouer all.

The Bishop of Orkney asked him: Beleeuest thou not (sayd he) that the bread and wine in the sacrament of the aultar, after the wordes of the consecration, is the very body of God, flesh, bloud, and bone?

He answered: I wot not what that word consecration meaneth. I haue not much latine,* but I beleeue that the sonne of God was conceaued of the holy Ghost, and borne of the Uirgin Mary, & hath a naturall body with handes feete, and other members, and in the same body hee walked vp & downe in the world, preached, and taught, he suffered death vnder Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead and buryed, and that by his godly power hee rayased that same body agayne the thyrd day: and the same body ascended in to heauen, and sitteth on the right hand of the father,* whiche shall come agayne to iudge both the quicke and y^e dead. And that this body is a naturall body with handes & feete and cannot be in two places at once, he sheweth well hym selfe: For the whiche euerlasting thanks be to hym that maketh this matter cleare.* When the woman brake the oyntment on hym, aunswering to some of hys Disciples which grudged thereat, he sayd: The poore shall you haue alwayes with you, but me shall you not haue alwayes, meaning of his naturall body. And likewise at his Ascension sayd he to the same Disciples that were fleshly, and would euer haue had him remayning with them corporally:*It is needfull for you that I passe away, for if I passe not away, the comforter the holy Ghost shall not come to you (meaning that his naturall body behoued to be taken away frō thē) But be stout and be of good cheare,*for am with you vnto the worldes end.

And that the eating of his very flesh profiteth not,* may well be knowne by his wordes which he spake in the 6. of Iohn, where after that he had sayd: Except ye eate my fleshe and drinke my bloud, ye shall not haue life in you: they murmuring therat, he reproveth them for their grosse & fleshly taking of his wordes, and sayd: What will ye thinke when ye se the sonne of man ascend to the place that he came frō? It is the spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing, to be eaten as they tooke it, and euen so take ye it.*

It is an horrible heresie, sayde the Bishop of Orkney. When he began to speake again, and bad the Lord Gouverneur Page 1273 iudge if hee had righte by the write, the accuser cryed Ad secundam. Nunc ad secundam, aunswered the Archbishop of S. Andrewes.

*Then was he bidden to heare the accuser, who propounded the second Article, and sayd: Thou saydest lykewyse, and openly diddest teach, that the Masse is very Idolatry, and abhominable in the sight of God.

He aunswered and sayde: I haue read the Bible and word of God in three tounes, and haue vnderstand them so farre as God gaue me grace, and yet read I neuer that word Masse in it all: but I found (sayd he) that the thyng that was highest and most in estimation amongst men, and not in the word of God, was Idolatry, and abhominable in the sight of God. And I say the Masse is holden greatly in estimation,* and high amongst men, and is not founded in the word, therefore I said it was Idolatry and abhominable in the sight of God. But if any man will find it in the Scripture, and proue it by Gods word, I will graunt mine errour, and that I haue fayled: otherwise not, and in that case I will submit me to all lawfull correction and punishment. Ad tertiam, sayd the Archbyshop.

Then sayde the accuser: Thou hast sayde and openly taught that the God which we woorship, is but bread, sowne of corne,* growing of the earth, baked of mēs hands, and nothing else.

He aunswered, I worship the father, the sonne, and the holy Ghost, three persons in one Godhead, which made & fashioned the heauen and earth, and all that is therein of naught, but I know not which God you worship: and if you will shew me whome you worship,* I shall shew you what he is, as I can by my iudgement.

Beleeuest thou not (sayd the accuser) that the sacrament of the alter, after the words of the consecration betwixt the Priests hands, is the very body and bloud of the sonne of God, and God himselfe? What the body of God is, sayde he, and what kind of body he hath, I haue shewed you, so farre as I haue found in scripture.

Then sayd the accuser, thou hast preached, sayd, and openly taught diuers & sundry other great errours and abhominable heresies against all the vij. sacramentes, which for shortnes of time I pretermit and ouerpasse. Whether doest thou graunt thy foresayd Articles that thou art accused of, or no, and thou shalt heare them shortly? and then repeated the accuser the three Articles aforesayd shortly ouer, and asked him whether he graunted or denied them.

He aunswered that before he had said of his aunsweres, and that he sayd nothing, but agreeing to the holy word as he vnderstoode, so God iudge him, and his owne conscience accuse him, and thereby would he abide vnto the time he were better instructed by scripture, and the contrary proued,* euen to the death: and said to the Lord Gouvernour and other Lords: if you cōdemne me for holding by Gods word, my innocent bloud shall be required at your hands, when ye shall be brought before the iudgemente seate of Christ, who is mightie to defend my innocent cause, before whome ye shall not denie it, nor yet be able to resiste hys wrath:* to whome I referre the vengeance, as it is written: Vengeance is mine, and I will reward.

Then gaue they forth sentence, and condemned him by the lawes,* and so lefte him to the secular power, in the hands of Sir Iohn Campbell Iustice deputie, who delyuered him to the Prouost of Edenbrough to be burnt on the Castle hill, who incontinent made him to be put in the vppermost house in the towne with yrons about his legs and necke,* and gaue charge to Sir Hugh Terry to keepe the key of the sayd house, an ignoraunt Minister and impe of Sathan, and of the Bishops, who by direction, sente to the poore man two Gray Friers to instructe hym, wyth whome he would enter into no communing. Soone after that was sent in two blacke Friers, an Englishe Frier, and another subtile sophister,* called Arbirtromy, with the which English Frier he would haue reasoned and declared his faith by the scriptures. Who aunswered, he had no commission to enter in disputation with him, and so departed and left him.

Then was sent to him a worldly wise man, and not vngodly in the vnderstanding of the truth,* the Deane of Roscalrige, who gaue him Christian consolatiō, amongst the which he exhorted him to beleue the realtie of the sacramēt after the cōsecration. But he would cōsent to nothing that had not euīdēce in the holy scripture, & so passed ouer that night in singing, & landing God to the eares of diuers hearers,* hauing learned the psalter of Dauid w^tout booke, to his consolation: For before they had spoyled him of his Bible, which alwaies til after he was cōdēned, was w^t him where euer he wēt. After y^t, sir Hugh knew that he had certaine bookes to read & cōfort his spirit, who came in a rage & tooke y^e same frō him, leauing him desolat (to his power) of all cōsolatiō, and gaue diuers vngodly & iniurious prouocatiōs by his diuelish venome, to haue peruerted him a poore innocent, frō the patience & hope he had in Christ his sauour: but God suffered him not to be moued therewith, as plainly appeared to the hearers and seers for the time.

So all the next morning abode this poore man in yrons, and prouision was commaunded to be made for his burning against the next day. Whiche daye the Lord Gouvernour, and all the principall both spirituall and temporall Lords departed from Edenbrough to their other busines.

After they were departed,* came y^e Deane of Roscalrige to him againe & reasoned with him after his wit. Who answered as before, he would say nothing cōcerning his faith but as the scripture testifieth, yea though an Aungell came from heauen to perswade him to the same: sauing that he confessed himselfe to haue receaued good consolation of the said Deane in other behalves as becommeth a Christian.

Then after came in the said Terry again & examined him after his old manner, and said,* he would garre deuils to come forth of him ere euen. To whome he aunswered: you should be a godly man to geue me rather cōsolation in my case. When I knewe you were come, I prayed God I might resiste your temptations, which I thanke hym, he hath made me able to doe: therfore I pray you let me alone in peace. Then he asked of one of the Officers that stode by, is your fire making ready? Who tolde hym it was. He answered, as it pleaseth God: I am ready soone or late as it shall please him: & then he spake to one faithful in that company, & bad him cōmend him to all the faithfull, being sure to meete together with thē in heauen. From that time to his forth comming to the fire, spake no man with hym.

At his fourth comming, the Prouost with great manasing words forbad him to speake to any mā, or any to him,* as belike he had commandement of his superiours. Comming from the towne to the Castell hill, the commō people sayd, God haue mercy vpon him. And on you to (sayd he.) Being beside y^e fire, he lifted vp his eyen to heauē twice or thrise, and said to the people: Let it not offend you, that I suffer the death this day, for the truthes sake, for the Disciple is not aboue his maister. Then was y^e Prouost angry that he spake. Then looked he to heauen againe, and sayd: They will not let me speake. The corde being about hys necke, the fire was lighted, and so departed he to God constantly, and with good countenance to our sightes, Ex testimonijs & literis è Scotia petitis. an. 1550.

¶The schisme that arose in Scotland for the Pater noster.

AFTER that Richard Mershal Doctour of Diuinitie and Priour of the blacke Friers at the new Castle in England, had declared in his preachings of S. Andrewes in Scotland, that the Lordes Prayer (commonly called the Pater noster) should be done only to God & not to Saints▪ Page 1274 neither to any other creature: the Doctours of the Uniuersitie of S. Andrewes together with the Gray Friers, who had long ago taught the people to pray the Pater noster to Saints, had great indignatiō that their old doctrine shuld be repugned, & stirred vp a Gray Frier called Frier Toittis, to preach again to the people that they should & might pray the Pater noster to Saintes. Who finding no part of the Scripture to founde his purpose vpon, yet came to the Pulpit, the first of Nouember, being the Feast of All hallowes, an. 1551. and tooke the text of the Gospell for that day read in their Masse, written in the 5. of Mathew, containing these wordes: Blessed are the poore in spirite, for to them pertayneth the kingdome of heauen.*

This feeble foundation being layde, the Frier began to reason most impertinently,* that the Lordes Prayer might be offered to Saints: because euery petition therof appertaine to them. For if we meete an old mā in y^e streete (sayd he) we will say to him: good day father, and therefore much more may we call the Saints our fathers: and because we graunt also that they be in heauen, we may say to euery one of them: Our father which art in heauen. Father, God hath made their names holy, and therefore ought we as followers of God to holde their names holy, and so we may say to any of the Saints:*Our father which art in heauen, hallowed be thy name. And for the same cause, sayd the Frier, as they are in the kingdome of heauen, so that kingdome is theirs by possession: and so praying for the kingdome of heauen, we may say to them and euery one of them: Thy kingdome come. And except their will had bene the very will of God, they had neuer come to that kingdome, and therefore seeing their will is Gods will, we may say to euery one of them: Thy will be done.

But when the Frier came to the fourth petitiō touching our daily bread, he began to be astonished and ashamed, so that he did sweate abundantly, partly bicause his sophistry began to fayle him,* not findyng such a colour for that part as for the other which went before: and partly because he spake against his owne knowledge and conscience and so was compelled to confesse that it was not in the Saintes power to giue vs our daily bread, but that they shoulde pray to God for vs (said he) that we may obtaine our daily bread by their intercession, and so glosed he the rest to the ende. Not standing yet content with this detestable doctrine, hee affirmed most blasphemously, that S. Paules napkyn and S. Peters shadow did miracles, and that the vertue of Eliseus cloke deuided the waters, attributing nothing to the power of God: with many other errours of the Papistes, horrible to be heard.

Upon this, folowed incontinent a daungerous schisme in the Church of Scotland: for not onely the Cleargie, but the whole people were deuided among themselues, one defending the trueth, and an other the Papistry, in suche sort, that there rose a Prouerbe: To whome say you youre Pater noster? * And although the Papists had the vpper hand as then, whose words were almost holdē for law (so great was the blindnes of that age) yet God so inspired y^e harts of the common people, that so many as could get the vnderstanding of the bare words of the Lords prayer in english (which was then saide in Latin) vtterly detested that opiniō, holding that it should in no wise be said to Saints: So that the craftes men and their seruantes in theyr bootes, when the Frier came, exploded him with shame enough,* crying, Frier Pater noster, Frier Pater noster, who at the last being conuict in his owne conscience, and ashamed of his former Sermon, was compelled to leaue the Towne of S. Andrewes.

In the meane time of this brute, there were two Pasquils set on the Abbay Church, the one in Latin beatyng these words.

- Doctores nostri de Collegio▪
- Concludunt idem cum Lucifero,
- Quod Sancti sunt similes altissimo:
- Et se tuentur grauatorio
- De mandato Officialis,
- Ad instantiam fiscalis,
- G•w & •eruey non varij
- In premissis connotarij.

*The other in English, bearing these words.

Doctors of Theologie, of fourescore of yeares,

And old iol•e Lupoy the bald gray Friers,

They would be called Rabbi and Magister noster,

And wot not to whome they say their Pater noster.

Shortly, the Christians were so 〈◇〉 offended, and the Papistes on the other side so proud and wilfull, that necessary it was, to eschew greater incōueniences, that y^e Clergy at least should be assembled to dispute and conclude the whole matter, that y^e lay people might be put out of doubt.* Which being done, and the Uniuersitie agreed, whosoever had bene present might haue heard much subtile sophistry. For some of the popish Doctours affirmed that it shoulde be sayd to God formaliter, and to Sayntes, materialiter, Others vltimatè, & non vltimatè. Others sayde it shoulde be said to God principaliter, and to sayntes minus principaliter. Others, that it should be sayd to GOD primariè, and to saintes secundariè, Others that it would be sayd to GOD capiendo strictè, & to sayntes capiendo largè. Whiche wayne distinctions being heard and considered by the people they y^t were simple, remayned in greater doubtfulnes thē they were in before: so that a well aged man, and seruaunt to y^e Suppriour of S. Andrewes called y^e Suppriours Thome being demaunded to whome hee sayde hys Pater noster: he answered, to God onely. Then they asked agayne what should be sayd to the sayntes, he answered, geue them Aues and Credes inough in the deuils name, for that may suffice them wel inough: albeit they doe spoyle God of his right. Others making their vauntes of the Doctours, sayd, that because Christ (who made the Pater noster) neuer came into the Ile of Britaine, & so vnderstood not the English tonge therefore it was that the Doctors concluded it shoulde be sayd in Latine.

This perturbation and open sclaunder yet depending it was thought good to call a principal Councell to decide the matter. Whiche being assembled at Edenbrough,* the Papistes being destitute of reason, defended theyr partes with lyes, alledging, that the Uniuersitie of Paris had cōcluded that the Lordes Prayer should be sayd to Saintes. But because that could not be proued, and that they could not preuayle by reason, they vsed theyr wil in place of reason, & sometime dispitefull and iniurious talke. As Fryer Scot being asked of one to whō he shuld say the Pater noster, hee aunswered, saying: say it to the deuill, knaue. So the Councel perceauing they could profite nothing by reasoning, they were compelled to passe * voting.

But then incontinent they that were called Churchmē, were found deuided and repugnaunt, among themselues. For some Bishop with the Doctours and Friers, consented that the Pater noster should be sayde to sayntes: but the Byshops of S. Andrewes, Caitnesse and Atheins, wyth other moe learned men, refused vtterly to subscribe to the same. Finally, with consent of both the parties, Commission was geuen by the holy church to Dane* Iohn Winrame, then Suppriour of S. Andrewes, to declare to the people how and after what maner they shoulde praye the Lordes prayer. Who accepting to the commission, declared that it should be sayd to God, with some other restrictions which are not necessary to be put in memory. And so by litle and little, the brute and tumulte ceased, Ex testimonio è Scotia allato.

*The martyrdome of the blessed seruant of God, Walter Mille.

AMong the rest of the Martirs of Scotland, y^e marueilous constancie of Walter Mille is not to be passed ouer w^t silence. Out of whose ashes sprang thousands of his opinion and religion in Scotland, who altogether choose rather to dye then to be any longer ouertroden by the tyranny of the foresayd cruell, ignorant, and beastly byshops Abbots, Monkes, and Fryers, and so began the congregation of Scotland, to debate the true Religion of Christ agaynst the Frenchmen and Papists, who sought always to depresse and keepe down the same: for it began soone after the Martyrdome of Walter Mille, of the which y^e forme here after followeth.

In the yeare of our Lorde. 1558. in the tyme of Marye Duches of Longawayll Queene Regent of Scotland, & the sayd Iohn Hamelton being bishop of S. Andrewes,* and Primate of Scotland, this Walter Mille (who in hys youth had bene a papist) after that he had bene in Almaine, & had heard the doctrine of the Gospell, he returned again into Scotland, and setting aside al papistry and compelled chastitie, maryed a wyfe, whiche thing made him vnto the Byshops of Scotland to be suspected of heresie: and after long watching of him he was taken by 2. Popish Priestes one called sir George S•raqwhen, and the other sir Hugh Turry seruantes to the sayd byshop for the tyme, wythin the towne of Dysart in Fi••e, and brought to s. Andrewes and imprisoned in the castell therof. He being in prison, the Papistes earnestly trauay•ed and laboured to haue seduced him, and threatned him with death and corporall tormentes, to the intent they woulde cause him to recant and forsake the trueth. But seeing they coulde profit nothing thereby, and that he remained still firme and constant, they Page 1275 laboured to perswade him by faire promises, and offered vnto him a Monkes portion for all the dayes of his life, in the Abbay of Dunfermeling, so that hee woulde denie the things he had taught, and graunt that they were heresie: but he continuing in the truth euen vnto the end, despised their threatnings and faire promises.

Then assembled together the Bishops of S. Andrewes, Murray, Brechin, Caitnes, and Atheins, the Abbots of Dunfermeling, Landors, Balindrinot, & Towper, with Doctors of Theologie of S. Andrewes, as Iohn Greson blacke Frier, and Dane Iohn Uymame, suppriour of S. Andrewes, William Trāston Prouost of y^e old Colledge, with diuers others, as sondry Friers blacke & gray. These being assembled, and hauing cōsulted together, he was taken out of prison, & brought to y^e Metropolitane Church, where he was put in a Pulpit tofore the Bishops to be acused, the 20. day of Aprill. Being brought vnto y^e Church, and climbing vp to the Pulpit, they seeing him so weake & feeble of person, partly by age and trauaile, & partly by euil intreatment, that without help he could not clime vp, they were in despaire not to haue heard him for weakenesse of voyce. But when he began to speake, he made the Church to ring and sound againe, wyth so great courage & stoutnes, that the Christians which were present, were no lesse reioyced,* then the aduersaries were confounded and ashamed. He being in the Pulpit, and on his knees at Prayer, sir Andrew Oliphant, one of the Byshops Priestes, commaunded him to arise and to answere to his Articles, saying on this maner: Sir Walter Mille, arise and aunswere to the Articles, for you hold my Lord heere ouer long. To whome Walter after he had finished his prayer, aunswered saying: We ought to obey God more then men, I serue one more mightie, euen the omnipotent Lord: and where you call me sir Walter, they call me Walter and not sir Walter, I haue bene ouerlong one of the Popes Knightes. Now say what thou hast to say.

These were the Articles whereof he was accused, with his aunsweres vnto the same.

Oliphant.

What thinke you of Priests mariage?

Mille.

*I hold it a blessed band, for Christ himself maintained it, and approued the same, and also made it free to al men: but ye thinke it not free to you: ye abhorre it, and in y^e meane time take other mens wiues and daughters, & wil not keepe the band that God hath made. Ye vow chastitie, & breake the same. S. Paul had rather marry then burne: the which I haue done, for God forbad neuer mariage to any man, of what state or degree so euer he were.

Olip.

*Thou sayest there is not seauen sacraments.

Mille.

Geue me the Lords supper and Baptisme, and take you the rest, & part them amōg you: For if there be vij. why haue you omitted one of them, to wit, mariage, and geue your selues to sclaunderous and vngodly whoredome.

Oliph.

*Thou art against the blessed sacrament of the aultar, and sayest, that the Masse is wrong, and is Idolatry.

Mille.

*A Lord or a King sendeth & calleth many to a diner, and when the diner is in readinesse, he causeth to ryng a bell, and the men come to the hall, and sit downe to be partakers of the diner, but the Lord turning his backe vnto them, eateth all himselfe, and mocked them: so do ye.

Oliph.

Thou denyest the sacrament of the aultar to be the very body of Christ really in flesh and bloud.*

Mille.

The scripture of God is not to be taken carnally but spiritually, and standeth in faith only: & as for the Masse, it is wrong, for Christ was once offered on the Crosse for mans trespasse, and will neuer be offered agayne, for then he ended all sacrifice.

Oliph.

Thou deniest the office of a Byshop.

Mille.

*I affirme that they whome ye call Byshops, do no Bishops workes, nor vse the offices of Bishops, (as Paul biddeth writing to Timothy) but liue after their owne sensuall pleasure, and take no care of the flocke, nor yet regard they the word of God, but desire to be honored and called, my Lords.

Oliph.

*Thou speakest against pilgrimage, and callest it a pilgrimage to whoredome.

Mille.

I affirme that, and say that it is not commaunded in the scripture,* and that there is no greater whoredome in no places, then at your pilgrimages, except it be in common brothels.

Oliph.

Thou preachedst quietly and priuatly in houses, and openly in the fields.

Mille.

Yea man, and on the sea also sailing in ship.

Oliph.

*Wilt thou not recant thine erroneous opiniōs? and if thou wilt not, I will pronounce sentence against thee.

Mille.

I am accused of my life: I know I must die once, & therefore as Christ sayd to Iudas: Quod facis, fac citius. Ye shal know that I will not recant the truth, for I am corne,* I am no chaffe, I wil not be blowne away with the wind nor burst with the flaile, but I will abide both.

These thinges rehearsed they of purpose, with other light trifles, to augment their final accusation, and then sir Andrew Oliphant pronounced sentence against him, that he shuld be deliuered to the temporall iudge, and punished as an hereticke, which was to be burnt. Notwithstanding his boldnes and constancie moued so the hartes of many, that the Byshops Stuard of his regaltie, Prouost of the towne called Patrike Learmond, refused to be his temporall iudge: to whome it appertained if the cause had bene iust. Also the Bishops chamberlaine being therwith charged, would in no wise take vpon him so vngodly an office. Yea the whole towne was so offended with his vniust cōdemnation, that the Bishops seruauntes could not get for their money so much as one cord to tie him to y^e stake, or a tarre barrell to burne him, but were constrained to cut the cordes of their maisters own paulion to serue their turne.

Neuerthelesse one seruaunt of the Byshops more ignoraunt and cruell then the rest, called Alexander Symmerwayll, enterprising the office of a temporall iudge in that part, conueyed him to the fire, where against all naturall reason of man, his boldnes and hardines did more and more increase: so that the spirit of God working miraculously in him, made it manifest to the people that his cause and Articles were iust, and he innocently put downe.

Now when all things were ready for his death, and he conueyed with armed men to the fire, Oliphant had him passe to the stake: and he said, nay, but wilt thou put me vp with thy hand and take part of my death, thou shalt see me passe vp gladly, for by y^e law of God I am forbiddē to put hands vpon my selfe. Thē Oliphant put him vp with his hand, and he ascended gladly, saying: Introibo ad altare Dei, and desired that he might haue place to speake to y^e people, the which Oliphant and other of the burners denyed, saying that he had spoken ouer much, for the Byshops were altogether offended that y^e matter was so long continued. Then some of the yong men committed both the burners, and the Byshops their maysters to the Diuell, saying, that they beleued that they should lament that daye, and desired the sayd Walter to speake what he pleased.

And so after he had made his humble supplicatiō to God on his knees, he arose, and stāding vpon the coales said on this wise. Deare frends, the cause why I suffer this day, is not for any crime layd to my charge (albeit I be a miserable sinner before God) but only for the defence of y^e fayth of Iesus Christ,* set foorth in the new and old Testament vnto vs, for which, that as the faithfull Martirs haue offered themselues gladly before, beeing assured after the death of their bodies of eternall felicitie, so this daye I praise God, that he hath called me of his mercy among the rest of his seruauntes, to seale vp his truth with my lyfe: which as I haue receaued it of him, so willingly I offer it Therefore as you will escape the eternal death, be no more seduced with the lies of Priests, Monkes, Friers, Priours, Abbots, Bishops, and the rest of the secte of Antichrist, but depend onely vpon Iesus Christ and hys mercy, that ye may be deliuered from condemnation. All that while there was great mourning and lamentation of the multitude, for they perceiuing his patience, stoutenes, and boldnes,* constancie, and hardines, were not only moued and stirred vp, but their harts also were so inflamed, that he was the last Martyr that dyed in Scotland for the Religion. After hys prayer, he was hoysed vp on the stake,* and being in the fire, he sayd: Lorde haue mercy on me: Pray people while there is time, and so constantly departed.

Epitaphium.

After this, by the iust iudgement of God, in the same place where Walter Mille was burnt, the Images of the great Church of the Abbey, which passed both in number and costlines, were burnt in time of reformation. Ex fideli testimonio è Scotia misso.

And thus much concerning such matters as happened, and such Martirs as suffered in the Realme of Scotland for the faith of Christ Iesus, and testimonie of his truth.

The Articles whereupon these fiue blessed Martyrs were accused and condemned by the foresayd Iudges and witnesses, were these as follow.

First, W for holdinge that the sacrament of the aulter was not the very true bodye o Christ, but onely materiall bread in substaunce.

2. That auricular confessiō was not to be made to a priest.

3. That no power is geuen of God to Priestes of minystring sacramentes, saying Masse, or other Diuine seruice, W more then to lay men.

4. That the solemnisation of Matrimony is not necessary to saluation of soule, neyther was instituted of God (for a Sacrament they meant)
5. That the sacrament of extreme vnction is not auaileable, nor necessary to soules health.
6. That the Images of the crosse, of the crucifixe of y^e blessed virgin and other Saintes, are not to be worshipped: & that they which worship them, do commit Idolatry.
7. That pilgrimages to holy places and holy Reliques be not necessary, nor meritorious to soules health.
8. That inuocation is not to be made to sayntes, but onely to God, and that he onely heareth theyr prayers.
9. That holy bread and holy water haue no more vertue after their consecration, then before.
10. That they haue beleued, taught & holden all and euery of the same damnable opinions before: as they did at that present.
11. That where they nowe haue confessed theyr erroures, they would not haue so done, but onely for feare of manyfest proufes brought agaynst them, eyther els but for feare to be conuicted by them, they would neuer haue confessed y^e same of theyr owne accord.
12. That they haue commoned and talked of the sayd damnable erroours heretofore with diuers other persons and haue had bookes concerning the same.

The order and fourme of processe vsed agaynst these fiue Martyrs aforesayd, and first of William Carder. Anno. 1511.

William Carder being conuēted before William Warrhā Archbishop,* and his Chancellour Cutbert Tonstal, Doctour Siluester, Doctor Welles, Clement Browē with other moe, the Notaries being William Potkyng and Daudid Cooper, the Articles and interrogatoryes aaboue specified were layd vnto him. Which articles he ther and then denied, affirming that he neuer did, nor doth hold any such opinions, otherwise then becommeth that euerye Christen man shoulde doe, ready to conforme hymselfe in all poyntes to their doctrine: & therfore to cleare himselfe y^e better gaynst those Interrogatories obiected against them he stood in denya^l of the same. The like also did euerye of the other foure martyrs after hym.

All whiche notwithstanding,* the vncharitable Archbyshop seeking all aduauntage agaynst him that he might, & more then right law would ge•e, brought in agaynst hym such witnesses, as before were abiured, whom he knew for feare of relapse, durst doe none other but disclose whatsoever they knew, to wit, Christopher Grebyll, William Rich Agnes Iue, Iohn Grebill, Robert Hils,* & Stephen Castelyn. Whose depositions being taken, and the sayd Carder being asked what he could lay for hymselfe, hee had nothing, he sayd, to produce agaynst theyr attestations, but submitted him vnto theyr mercye, saying moreouer, that if he had euer any misbeliefe of the sacrament of the Church, contrary to the common holding of the Catholickes, hee now was sory, & repented him therof. Which being done, y^e archb. this his submission notw^tstanding, & notwithstanding that y^e Register maketh no mention of any relapse, cō^trary to good law, at least contrary to all Christen charity proceeded to the reading of his blinde sentence, and so condemned him: who neyther stooode stubbornely to that whiche he did hold, neither yet did hold any thinge contrary to the mind of holy scripture, to the execution of burning.

Then after him was called for Agnes Grebill, and examined of the sayd xii. articles aboue recited, whiche she in like maner denyed, as the other had done before, puttyng her aduersaries to ther proof. Then the archbishop calling for Iohn Grebyll her husband, and Christopher and Ioh. Grebyll her two sonnes (who before had bene abiured) caused them vppon theyr othe to depose agaynst theyr owne naturall mother, and so they did.

First Iohn Grebell the elder her husband, examined by vertue of hys othe, to say how Agnes his wife hath and doth beleue of the sacrament of the aaltar, of going in pilgrimage, offeringes, and worshipping of Sayntes, Images &c. and how long she hath so holdē, thus deposed: that first about the end of king Edwardes dayes the fourth, in Page 1277 his house, by the teaching of Iohn Iue, she was brought to that beliefe, and so forth from thence dayly, till this time of detection, she hath continued.

And besides that (sayd he) when my children Christofer and Iohn, being about seauen yeares of age, were then taught of me in my house the said error of the Sacrament of the aaltar, and by the sayd Agnes my wife diuers times, she was alwayes of one mind in the said misbeliefe against the Sacrament of the aaltar,* that it was not Christes body, flesh and bloud, but only bread. Furthermore, being examined how he knew that she was stedfast in the sayd error, he sayd that she alwaies without contradiction affirmed this teaching, and sayde, the sayd opinion was good, and was well contented that her children aforesaid,* were of the same opinions againste the Sacramente of the aaltar, &c. Ex verbis Registri.

The Byshop with his Catholicke Doctours, not yet contented with this, to set the husband agaynst the wyfe, proceeding further in their Catholicke zeale, caused her two children Christofer and Iohn to be produced,* one of the age of xxij. the other of xix. against their owne naturall mother. Who likewise being pressed with their othe, witnessed and sayd, that the foresaid Agnes their mother held, beleued, taught, and defended, that the Sacrament of the aaltar was but bread, and not the very body of Christ, fleshe, and bloud: That Baptisme was no better in the Fount, then out of the Fount: That confirmation was of no effect: That the solemnisation of Matrimony was no sacrament: That confession to God alone was sufficient: Also that going in pilgrimage and worshipping of Saints and Images was of none effect, &c. Item, that their father and the sayd Agnes their mother helde, taught, and communed of the sayd errors within their house diuers times, by the space of those three yeares past, as well on holy dayes, as working dayes, affirming and teaching that the saide opinions were good and lawfull, and to be holden and maintained, and agreemente was made amongst them, that none of them should discouer or bewray eyther of these beliefes in any wise. Finally, that they neuer heard their sayd father and mother, holding nor reaching any other opinions, then be the said errors against the Sacrament of the altar, and pilgrimages, offerings, worshipping of Saints and Images, as farre as they could remember, &c. Ex verbis Regist.

Heere hast thou (Christian reader) before thine eyes, an horrible spectacle of a singular, yea of a double impietie, first of an vnnaturall husband,* witnessing against his own wife: and of as vnnaturall children, accusing and witnessing against their owne naturall mother. Which although they had so done, the cause being of it selfe iust and true (as it was not) yet had they done more then nature would haue led them to do. Now the case being such, as which by Gods word standeth firme, sound, and perfect, what impietie were it for men to accuse a poore innocent in case of heresie, which is no heresie? Now besides all this, the husband to come in against his owne wife, and the children to bring in the knife wherewith to cut the throate of theyr owne naturall mother that bare them, that nourished thē, that brought them vp, what is this, but impietie vpon impietie,* prodigious and horrible for all Christian eares to heare? And yet the greatest impietie of all resteth in these pretensed Catholickes and Clergiemen, which weare the authors and causers of all this mischiefe.

The cause why this good woman so stood (as she dyd) in the deniall of these foresaid articles objected,* was thys, for that she neuer thought that her husband and her owne children, who onely were priuie of her Religion, would testifie agaynst her. Whom notwithstanding after she perceaued to come in, and to depose this agaynst her, denying stil as she did before) that she did euer hold such maner of errorrs,* and being now destitute of all frends and comfort, brast out in these woordes openly (as the register reporteth) that she repented the time that euer she bare those children of her body. And thus the Archb. with his Doctours hauing now the thing that they sought for, albeit she was ready to deny all errorrs,* and to conforme her selfe to theyr religion, yet notwithstanding, they refusing her readines and conformitie, proceeded to theyr sentence, and so condemned her to death.

*After whose condemnation, next was brought to examination Rob. Harrison, whom in like maner, because, he stode in his deniall, contrary witnesses agaynst him were produced: to wit, Christofer Grebyll. W. Rich, W. Olberd Agnes Iue, who a litle before had bene abiured, and therefore were so much the more apt and appliable to serue the Bishops humour for daunger of relapse. After the deposition & conuiction of which witnesses, although he submitted himselfe to repentaunce and conformitie, yet notwythstanding it would not be receaued, but sentence was read & he condemned with the other two aforesayd, vnto y^e fire.

And thus these three were condemned and burned,* & certificate geuen vp of them together to the king frō Warrham the Archbishop vpon the same. An. 1511. Maij. 2. Ex Regist. Cant.

Ouer and besides these three godly martyrs aboue recited. I finde in the foresayd Registers of W. Warrham,* ij. other godly like martirs also in the same yeaere, and for the same xij. articles aboue specified, to be condemned vpon y^e depositions of certayne witnesses brought in agaynst thē, to wyt. Tho. Harwod, Phillip Harwod,* Stephen Castelyn, W. Baker, Rob. Reynold, Ioh. Bāpton, Rob. Bright W. Rich. &c. whereupon they were adiudged likewise for heretickes to be burned, the yeaere aforesayd. 1511. y^e names of which two martyrs were Iohn Brown, and Edward Walker. Ex Regist. W. Warrh. fol. 179.

Nowe as you haue heard the names of these blessed Martyrs, with their articles recited, let vs also heare the tenor of the Bishops sentence, by the which they were condemned one after an other. Their sentence contayneth one vniforme maner of wordes in forme as followeth.

The tenour of the sentence.

IN nomine Dei. Amen. Nos Willielmus permissione diuina Cantuariensis Archiepis. totius Angliae primas & Apostolicae sedis Legatus,* in quodam negotio hereticae prauitatis contra te Willielmum Carder de Tenterden nostrae Cant. ¶The Articles layd to these abiurers, appeare in the Registers to be the same which before were objected to the other v. Martyrs aforesayd: which was, for beleuing and defending.

1. First that the sacrament of the aultar was not the very body of Christ,* but materiall bread.
2. That cōfessiō of sinnes ought not to be made to a priest.
3. That there is no more power geuen of God to a priest, then to a lay man.
4. That the solemnization of Matrimony is not necessary for the weale of mans soule.
5. That the sacrament of externe vnction, called aneyling, is not profitable nor necessary for mans soule.
6. That Pilgrimages to holy and deuoute places be not necessary nor meritorious for mans soule.
7. That Images of Saintes, or of the Crucifixe, or of our Lady, are not to be worshipped.
- *8. That a man should pray to no saint, but onely to God.

9. That holy water and holy bread is not better after the benediction made by the Priest. Ex verbis Regist. W. Warrhā. Fol. 176. an. 1511.

*By these articles & abruations of the forenamed persons, thou hast to vnderstand Christian Reader, what doctrine of religion was here styrring in this our Realme of England before the time that the name of Martine Luther was euer heard of here amongst vs.

Three diuers sortes of iudgements amongst the Pa'pistes, agaynst heretickes, as they call them.

*AS touching the penaunce & penalty enioyned to these aforesaid, as also to al other such like, first here is to be noted, that the Catholick fathers in theyr processes of hereticall prauity, haue three diuers and distinct kindes of iudgementes and proceedinges.

*For some they iudge to be burned, to the intent that other being brought into terrour by them, they might therfore more quietly hold vp theyr kingdome, & reign as they list. And thus condēned they these v. aforesayd, & notwithstanding they were willing to submit themselues to y^e bosome of the mother Church, yet could they not be receiued as by the words of the Register, and by the tenor of theyr sentence aboue specified, may well appeare.

And this sort of persons thus by them condemned, cōsisteth either in such as haue bene before abiured, and fallē agayne into relapse: or els such as stand constantly in their doctrine, and refuse to abiure, eyther els such as they intēd to make a terrour and example to all other, notwithstanding that they be willing and ready to submit themselues, and yet cannot be receiued. And of this last sort were these v. Martyrs last named. So was also Iohn Lambert, who submitting himselfe to the king, could not be accepted: So was likewise Richard Mekins the sely lad, pag. 1174. and the three women of Gernesey, whose submission woulde not serue to saue theyr liues, with many other in like case. Agaynst this sort of persons, the processe which the papists vse, is this. First after they beginne once to be suspected by some Promotor, they are denoūced and cited: then by vertue of Inquisition they are taken and clapt fast in Irons and prison: from thence they are brought forth at last to examination, if they be not before kilde by famine, colde, or strayghtnesse of the prison. Then be articles drawne or rather wrested out of theyr writinges or preachinges, & they put to theyr othe to answere truely to euery poynt and circumstaunce articulated agaynst them.* Whiche Articles if they seeme to deny, or to salue by true expounding, thē are witnesses called in and admitted, what witnesses soeuer they are, be they neuer so much infamous, vsurers, ribaldes, women, yea and common harlots. Or if no other witnesses can be founde, then is the husband brought in and forced to sweare agaynst the wife, or the wife agaynst the husband, or the children agaynst the naturall mother, as in this example of Agnes Grebyll. Or if no such witsesse at all can be found, then are they strayned vpon the racke, or by other bitter tormentes forced to confesse theyr knowledge, and to peach other. Neyther must any be suffered to come to them, what neede so euer they haue. Neither must any publicke or quiet audience be geuen them to speake for themselues: till at last sentence be readde agaynst them, to geue them vp to the secular arme, or to degrade thē, if they be Priestes, and so to burne them. Ex hist. Cochlaei contra Hussitas.

And yet the malignity of these Aduersaryes doth not here cease. For after that the fire hath consumed their bodyes, then they fal vpon theyr bookes and condemne them in like maner to be burned, & no man so hardy to read thē, or keep them, vnder payne of heresy.* But before they haue abolished these bookes, first they gather articles out of thē, such as they list themselues, & so peruersly wrast & wringe them after theyr owne purpose, falsely, & cōtrary to y^e right meaning of the author, as may seeme after theyr putting down, to be most heretical, & execrable. Which being done, & the bookes then abolished, that no man may confer them with theyr articles to espy theyr falshood: thē they diuulge and set abroad those articles in such sort as princes & people may see what heretickes they were. And this is the rigor of theyr processe and proceeding against these persons, whom thus they purpose to condemne and burne.

To the second order belongeth that sort of heretickes whom these Papistes do not condemne to death, but assigne them vnto Monasteries there to continue,* and to fast all theyr life, In pane doloris & aqua angustiae, that is, wyth bread of sorow, and water of afflictio: and that they should not remoue one mile out of the precinct of the sayd Monastery, so long as they liued, without they were otherwise by the archbishop himselfe or his successors dispensed with all. Albeit many times the sayd persons were so dispensed withall, that theyr penaunce of bread and water, was turned for them to wollward Wednesdaies and fridaies euery weeke, or some other like punishment. &c.

The thyrd kinde of heretickes were those whom these Prelates did iudge not to perpetuall prison, but onely inioyned them penaunce either to stand before the preacher, or els to beare a fagot about the market, or in processio: or els to weare the picture of a fagotte bordered on theyr lefte sleeues, without any cloke or gowne vpon the same:* or else to kneele at the saying of certain masses, or to say so many Pater nosters, Aues, and Creedes to such or such a Saynct: or to go in pilgrimage to such or such a place: or els to beare a Fagot to the burning of some hereticke:

either els to fast certayne Fridayes bread & water: Or if it were a woman to weare no smocke on Fridayes, but to go wolward. &c, as appeareth Regist. fol. 159.

And thus much by the way out of the Register of William Warrham aforesayd, like as also out of other bishops registers many mo such like matters and examples might be collected, if either leysure would serue me to search, or if the largenes of this Uolume would suffer al to be inserted Page 1279 that might be found. Howbeit, amōgst many other things omitted, the story and Martyrdome of Lancelot, and hys felowes, is not to be forgottē. The story of whō with their names is this.

¶The Martyrdome of Lancelot one of the kinges garde, Iohn a Paynter, and Gyles Germane.

*About the yeare of our Lord. 1539. one Iohn a Paynter, and Giles Germaine were accused of heresy, and whilst they were in examination at London, before the Byshop and other Iudges, by chaunce there came in one of the kinges seruantes named Lancelot, a very tall man, and of no lesse godly minde and disposition, then strong & tall of body.

This man standing by, seemed by his countenance & gesture to fauour both the cause & the poore men his frēds. Wherupon he being apprehended, was examined and condemned together with them, and the next day at v. of the clocke in the morning, was caryed with thē into S. Giles in the field, and there burned, being but a small concourse or company of people at theyr death.

In the company and felowship of these blessed Saints and Martyrs of Christ, which innocently suffered within y^e time of K. Henryes raigne, for the testimony of Gods word and truth, an other good man also commeth to mind not to be excluded out of this number, who was with like cruelty oppressed and burned in Smithfield, about the latter end of Cuth. Tonstals time Byshop of Londō: whose name was called Stile, as is credibly reported vnto vs by a worthy & auncient Knight, named Syr Robert Outred, who was the same time present himselfe at his burning, and witnes of the same. With him there was burned also a book of the Apocalips, which belike he was wont to read vpon. This book when he saw fastened vnto the stake to be burned with him, lifting vp his voyce, O blessed Apocalips (sayd he) how happy am I, that shal be burned with thee? And so this good man, and the blessed Apocalips were both together in the fire consumed.

AND thus (through the gracious supportatiō of Christ our Lord) we haue runne ouer these 37. laborious yeares of king Henries race. Under whose tyme and gouernance, such actes and recordes, troubles, persecutions, recantations, practises, alterations and reformations as thē happened in the church, we haue here discoursed, with such statutes, iniunctions and proclamations, as by him were set forth in causes & matters to the sayd church apperteyning: Albeit not cōprehending all things so fully as might be, yet pretermittting so few thinges as we could, of suche matters as came to our handes:* saue onely, that certayne instruments with a few other occurrentes somewhat pertaining to the course of this kinges history, haue past our hands, as the false lying bul of pope Leo x. against M. Luther: with the forme also of the sayd M. Luthers appeale from the Pope vnto a generall counsel. All which, w^t other matters moe besides omitted, we haue differred by themselues hereafter to be exhibited and declared in the sequele of this present story, as in his due place shall appeare.

In the meane season, amongst other omissions here ouerpast,*^u forsomuch as a certayne instrument of the popes sentence definitiue against K. Henries first deuorse w^t Lady Katherine Dowager, hath of late come to our handes, conteining matter neither impertinent nor vnmeet to be committed to history, I thought here presently to place the same, to the intent that the Reader seeing the arrogant and impudent presumption of the Pope in the sayde sentence, going about by force & authority so to constrayne & cōpell kings and princes agaynst theyr willes, & agaynst right & scripture to apply to his imperious purpose, may the better vnderstand thereby, what was the true cause & groūd why the king first began to take stomacke against the pope and to send him cleane packing out of this realme. But be'fore I shall produce this foresayd sentence of the Pope definitiue, to make the matter more plain to y^e reader, it shal not be amisse, first to discipher & rip vp the originall of such occasions as shal induce the reader to the better vnderstāding of this falling out betwene the king and the Pope.

For so I finde by the letters of D. Stephen Gardener written to Cardinall Wolsey frō Rome, (at what time he & Foxe were sent Ambassadors by the king to Pope Clement the 7. about the expedition of the kings diuorce. Ann. 1632.) that the sayd Pope Clement with the counsell of the Cardinall Sanctorum quatuor and other Cardinals, at first was well willing, and very inclinable to the accomplishment and satisfaction of the kinges desire in that behalfe and that for diuers respectes.

As first, for the great benefites receiued,*^u and the singuler deuotion of the king toward the sea Apostolicke, in taking warre for the Churches cause, in surceasing warre at the Popes desire, and especially in procuring the Popes deliuerance, whereby the Pope then thought himselfe with his whole Sea, much obliged to the king mail respectes, to passe by his authority whatsoever• reasonable might be graunted in gratifiyng the kinges so ample merites and desertes.

Secondly, for the euident reasons and substantiall argumentes in the *^u kinges booke conteyned, which seemed well to satisfy the Popes liking, and to remoue away all scruples.

Thirdly, for the good opinion & confidence that y^e pope had in the excellent wisdom, profoūd learning, and mature iudgement of the king, which the Pope (as he sayd in formall words) would soner leane vnto, then to any other learned mans minde or sentence, so that the kinges reasōs (he sayd) must needes be of great efficacy and strength of himselfe to order and direct this matter.

The fourth cause mouing the Pope to sauor the kings, request, was for the quiet and tranquility of his conscience which otherwise in that vnlawful Mariage with his brothers wife could not be settled.

The fift cause was for the consideration of the perils & daungers, which otherwise might happen to the realm by the pretended titles of the king of Scottes, & other, without an heyre male to establish the kinges succession: for the auoyding of which perils and also for the other causes aboue rehearsed, the pope shewed himselfe at that time propense and forward to promote and set forward the kinges desired purpose in that behalfe.

And thus much touching this by matter I thought here to suggest, & repeat to the reader, albeit the same is also sufficiently expressed before, pag. 1057. and 1058. to the end that the studious

Reader pondering these first proceedinges of the Pope, & comparing them with this sentence definitiue, which vnder foloweth, may y^e better vnderstād what inconstant lenity, what false dealing, what craftye packing, and what contrariety in it selfe, is in this Popes holy Sea of Rome: as by this case of the Pope may well appeare, who in short time after all this, was so clean altered from that he was, that whereas before he pretended to esteeme so gratefully the kinges trauell and benefites exhibited to the sea Apostolicke, in his defence agaynst the Emperor and the Spanyardes, now he ioyneth vtterly wyth the Cesarians agaynst the king. And where before he so greatly magnified the kinges profound learning, & mature iudgement, esteeming his minde & Sentence aboue al other learned mē, to be as a iudge sufficient in the directiō of this case: now turning head to the taylor, he vtterly refuseth to bring the matter in iudiciū orbis, but will needes deteine it at home. Agayne, where before he pretēded a tēder prouision for the state of this Realme: now he setteth all other realmes against it.* And finally where he before seemed to respect the quiet & tranquility of the kinges conscience: now he goeth about to commaund & compell the king agaynst his will and cōscience to do cleane contrary to that, which he himselfe before in his iudgemēt had allowed, thin|king to haue the king at his becke, and to doe and vndoe what he lifted and commaunded: as by the tenor and true copy of this his Sentence definitiue, ye may vnderstand. Which as it came newly to our hāds, I thought here to exhibite vnto the world, that al mē might see what iust cause the king had, being so presūptuously prouoked by the pope to shake of his proud authority, & vtterly to exile him out of his realme. Marke, I pray thee, the maner of the popes proud Sentence how presumptuously it procedeth.

¶The effect in English.

THE effect of this Sentence is as much to meane in english: That Pope Clement the vij. with the consent of his other brethrē the Cardinals assembled together in his Consistory,* sitting there in the throne of (A) Iustice, calling vpon the name (B) of Christ, and hauing God onely before his (C) eyes, doth pronounce, define, & declare in the cause & causes betwene his dere daughter Katherine Quene of England appealing to the sea Apostolicke, & his beloued (D) sonne Henry the eight, king of England, concerning y^e validity & inualidity of the Matrimony heretofore contracted betwene thē, and yet depending in the Consistory court of the said pope Clement: that the sayd Matrimony alwaies hath (E) and still doth stand firme & Canonically, & that the issue proceeding, or which shall proceed of the same, standeth, and shall stand lawfull and legitimate: and that the foresayd Henry king of England, is and shalbe boūd and obstruct to the Matrimoniall society and cohabitatiō with the sayd Lady Katherine his lawfull wi•e & Quene, to hold and maynteine her with such loue and princely honor, as becommeth a louing husbande, and his kingly honor to do.

Also that the sayd Henry king of England, if he shall refuse so to performe and accomplish all and singuler the premisses, in all effectuall maner, is to be condemned and compelled hereunto by all remedies of (F) the law, & enforced, according as we do cōdemne, compell and enforce him so to do, prouiding that al molestations and refusals what'soeuer, made by the sayde king

Henry agaynst the sayde Queene Katherine, vpon the inualidity of the sayd Mariage, to haue bene and to be iudged vnlawful and vniust: and the sayd king frō henceforth for euer to hold his peace, and not to be heard in any Court hereafter (G) to speake touching the inualidity of the sayd matrimony: like as we also do here will and charge him to holde his peace, and do put him to perpetuall silence herein: Willing moreouer & adiudging the sayd king henry to be condemned and presently here doe condemne him in the expenses on the sayde Quene Katherines behalfe here in our Court, exposed & employed in trauersing the foresaid cause, the valuation of which expenses, we reserue to our selues to be limited and taxed, as we shall iudge meete hereafter.

We do so pronounce. I. At Rome in our Apostolicall palace publickely in our Consistory.23.
Mart. M.D.XXXIII.

Blosius.

Now as you haue heard the presumptuous and arrogant Sentence of Pope Clement, wherein he taketh vpon him, contrary to the ordinaunce of God in his Leuiticall law (as before is shewed pag. 1025.) and contrary to y^e best learned iudgementes of Christendome, to commaund and compell the king agaynst his conscience, to reteine in Matrimony his brothers wife: here foloweth in like order to be inferred, according to my promise, an other like wicked, blasphemous,* and sclaunderous Bull of Pope Leo against Martin Luther, with the iust Appellation also of the sayd Martin Luther, from the Pope to a generall Counsell. Wherein may appeare to all men the lying spirite of the pope, both in teaching most heretical doctrine, derogating from the bloud of Christ, and also falsely deprauing & peruerting the sound doctrine of Luther, falsely and vntruely charging him with heresy, when he is the greater heretick himselfe. For what hereticke would euer say that the church of Rome was consecrate and sanctified by the bloud of Peter, but onely the Pope? Or who would cal this heresy, to referre al our saluation and sanctification onely and totally to the bloud of the sonne of God, vnlesse he were an hereticke of all heretickes himselfe?

After the like dealing we read .3. Reg. 18. of wicked king Achab,* who being onely the disturber of Israel himselfe, crieth out vpon Elias, for troubling Israel. So here in semblablewise Pope Leo, with what heape of tragicall wordes and exclamations doth he fare and rage agaynst y^e true seruant of God poore Luther, for disturbing y^e church of God, when it is the Pope onely & his fathers house that troubleth, and long hath troubled the true Church of the Lord, as by his doings all the world may see enough & to much. In the meane time read, I besech thee, with iudgement this impudent & false slaunderous Bull of the Pope, with the appeale also of Luther agayn from the sayd pope. The copy wherof because they be rare to be gotten, & hath not bene hetherto commonly sene, being before omitted I thought to cōmit here to history, as I had it out of certayn Registers: the maner & tenor wherof is this as foloweth.

A copy of the Bull of Pope Leo x. no lesse slaunderous then barbarous, agaynst Martin Luther and his doctrine. Leo Papa .x.

LEo Episcopus seruus seruorum Dei ad perpetuam rei memoriam: Exurge Domine & iudica causam tuam.* Memor esto impropriorum eorum quae ab insipientibus fiunt tota die. Inclina aurem tuam ad preces nostras, quoniam surrexerunt vulpes querentes demoliri veneam, cuius tu torcular solus calcasti, & ascensus ad patrem, eius curam, regimē,* & administrationem Petro tanquam capiti, & tuo vicario eius{que} successoribus instar triumphantis Ecclesiae commisisti. &c.

¶The sayd sclaunderous and barbarous Bull of Pope Leo the x. agaynst Luther, in English, with the aunswere of Luther ioyned to the same.

LEo Byshop, seruauent of the seruauentes of God, for a perpetual memory hereof. Rise vp O Lord, & iudge thy Page 1281 cause: Remember the rebukes wherewith we are scorned all the day lōg of foolish rebukers. Encline thy eare to our prayers: for Foxes are risen vp, seeking to destroy thy vine|yarde, the vinepresse wherof thou onely hast trodē, and ascending vp to thy Father, hast committed the charge and regiment therof vnto Peter as chiefe head, and to thy Uicare and his successors. The wilde Bore out of the woode seeketh to exterminate and roote vp thy Uineyard. Rise vp Peter, and for this thy pastorall charge committed to thee from aboue entēd to the cause of the holy Church of Rome the mother of all churches,* and of our fayth, which thou by the commaundement of God didst consecrate wyth thine owne bloud: agaynst which (as thou hast foretold vs) false lyers haue risen vp, bringing in sects of perdition, to their owne speddy destruction. Whose toūg is like fire, full of vnquietnes, and replenished with deadly poysō: who hauing a wicked zeale, and nourishing contentions in theyr harts do bragge and lye agaynst the verity.

Rise vp Paul also, we pray thee, which hast illuminate the same Church with thy doctrine and like martyrdome. For now is sprong vp a new Porphery, who, as they said Porphyry then vniustly did sclaunder the holy Apostles, so semblably doth this man now sclaunder, reuile, rebuke, byte, and barcke agaynst the holy Byshops our predecessors, not in beseeching them, but in rebuking them. And where he distrusteth his cause, there he falleth to opprobrious checkes & rebukes, after the wonted vse of heretickes, whose vttermost refuge is this (as Hierome sayth) y^t whē they see theyr cause go to wracke, then like Serpentes they cast out theyr venime with theyr tounge, and when they see themselues, neare to be ouercome, they fall to rayling. For though heresies (as thou sayest) must needes be, for the exercise of the faythfull: yet least these heresies should further encrease and these Foxes gather strength agaynst vs, it is needfull that by thy meanes and helpe, they be suppressed and extinguished at the beginning.

Finally let all the whole vniuersall Churche of Gods Saynts and Doctours rise vp, whose true expounding of holy Scripture being reiected, certayne persons (whose hartes the father of lyes hath blinded) and wise in theyr owne conceites (as the maner of heretickes is) do expoūd the scriptures otherwise then the holy Ghost doth require folowing onely theyr owne sense of ambition and vayne-glory: yea rather do wrast and adulterate the Scriptures: so that as Hierome sayth, now they make it not the gospel of Christ, but of man, or which is worse of the deuill.

Let all the holy church I say, rise vp, & wi•h the blessed Apostles together make intercessiō to almighty God, that the errors of all schismatickes being rooted & stocked vp, his holy Church may be conserued in peace and vnity.

For of late (which for sorrow we can not expresse) by cre'dible information and also by publick fame it hath come to our eares, yea we haue seene also & read with our eyes, diuers and sundry errors, of which some haue bene condemned by counsels and constitutions of our predecessors containing expresly y^e heresies of the Greekes & of the Bohemians: * some agayn respectiue, either heretical or false, or sclauderous, or offensiue to good eares, or such as may seduce simple myndes: newly to be raysed vp, by certayne false pretended Gospellers: who by curious pride seeking worldly glory against the doctrine of the apostle, would be more wise then becommeth them, whose babling (as S. Hierome calleth it) without authority of the Scriptures, should finde no credit, vnlesse they should seme to cōfirme theyr false doctrine euen with testimonies of the scripture, but yet falsely interpreted. Which worketh vs so much the more grief, for y^t those heresies be sprong in y^e noble nation of the Germanes, vnto the which natiō we with our predecessors, haue alwayes borne speciall fauor and affection. For after the Empyre was first translated by the Church of Rome, from the Greekes vnto the Germanes, the said our predecessors and we, haue alwayes had them as speciall fautors & defenders of this our Church, and they haue alwaies shewed themselues as most earnest suppressors of heresies: as witnes wherof remaine yet those laudable cōstitutions of the Germane Emperors, set forth and confirmed by our predecessors, for the liberty of the Church, and for expulsiō heretickes out of all Germany, and that vnder greuous penalty and losse of al theyr goods and lands. Which constitutiōs, if they were obserued this present day both we and they should now be free from thys disturbaunce.

*Furthermore, the heresy of the Hussites, Wicleuistes, & of Hierome of Prage, being condēned and punished in the Coūcel of Constance, doth witnes y^e same. Moreouer doth witnes the same, so much bloud of y^e Germanes spilt fighting agaynst the Bohemians. To cōclude, the same also is confirmed & witnessed by the learned & true confutatiō, reprobation and condēnation set forth by the Uniuersities of Colene and Louane in Germany agaynst the foresayd errors. Many other witnesses also we might alledge, which here, least we should seme to write a story, we preterm••.

Wherefore we for the charge of our Pastorall office cōmitted vnto vs, can no longer forbear or winck at the pestiferous poyson of the foresayd errors: of the which errors we thought here good to recite certayne. The tenor of whiche is this, as foloweth.

It is an old heresy to say, *that the Sacramentes of the new <◇> doth geue grace to them, qui non ponunt obicem. i. which haue in themselues to the contrary, no let.

In a childe after his Baptisme, to deny that sinne remayneth, is to tread downe Paule and Christ vnder foote.

The origene of sinne, although no actuall sinne doe folow •fter, doth stay the soule leauing the body, from the entraunce into heauen.

Vnperfite charity of a mā departing, must needes bring wyth it great feare, which of it selfe is enough to deserue the payne of Purgatory, and stoppeth the entrance into the kingdome of heauen.

To say that penauce standeth of three partes, to wit, contrition, confession, and satisfaction, is not founded in holy Scripture nor in auncient, holy and Christian Doctors.

Contritiō, which a man stirreth vp in himselfe, by discussing, remembring, and detestinge his sinnes, in reuoluing his former yeares in bitternesse of soule, and in pondering the waight, number and filthinesse of his sinnes, the leeing of eternall blisse, and getting of eternall damnation: this contrition maketh a man an hipocrite and a great sinner.

It is an olde prouerbe, & to be preferred before the doctrine of all that haue written hitherto of contrition: from henceforth to transgresse no more. The chieftest and the best penance is a new life.

Neither presume to confesse the veniall sinnes, nor yet all thy mortall sinnes,*for it is impossible to remember all the mortall sinnes that thou hast committed, and therefore in the primitiue Church they confessed the mortall sinnes, which onely were manifest.

While we seeke to number vp all our sinnes sincerely vnto the priest, we meane nothing els herein, but that we will leaue nothing to the mercy of God, to be forgeuen.

In confession no man hath his sinnes forgeuen, except he beleue, whē the priest forgeueth, the same to be remitted: yea otherwise his sinne remayneth vnforgeuē, vnles he beleue the same to be forgeuen. For els remission of the priest, and geuing of grace doth not suffice, except beliefe come on his part that is remitted.

Thinke not thy sinne to be assoyled, for the worthines of thy contrition, but for the word of Christ: Whatsoeuer thou lovest. &c. When thou art absolued of the priest,*trust confidently vpon these wordes, and beleue firmly thy selfe to be absolued, & then art thou truely remitted.

Admit the party that is confessed were not contrite (whiche is*impossible, or that the priest pronouced the wordes of losing, not in earnest, but in iest: yet if the party beleue that he is absolued, he is truely absolued in deed.

In the sacrament of penance and absolution, the Pope or bishop do no more, then any inferior priest can do. Yea and where a priest is not to be had, there euery Christian man, yea or Christian woman standeth in as good stead.

*None ought to say to the priest, that he is contrite, neither ought the priest to aske any such matter.

It is a great error of them which come to the holy housel tru'sting vpon this, that they are cōfessed, that theyr cōscience grudgeth them of no deadly sinne, that they haue sayd theyr prayers, and done such other preparatiues before: all those do eat & drink to theyr owne iudgement▪ But if they beleue there to obteyne Gods grace, this fayth maketh them pure and worthy.

It were good that the church should determine in a generall coūcell, lay men to cōmunicate vnder both kindes: & the Bohemians so doing, be therin neither hereticks, nor schismatickes.

The treasures out of which the Pope doth graunt his Indulgences, are not the merites of Christ, nor of the Sayntes.

Indulgences and pardons be a deuout seducing of the faythfull, and hinderance to good works: and are in the number of thē which be thinges*lawfull, but not expedient.

Pardons and Indulgences to them which haue them, auayle not to remission of the punishment due before God, for actuall sinnes committed.

They which thinke that Indulgences are wholesome and cōducible to the fruite of the spirite, are deceiued.

Indulgences are onely necessary for publicke transgressions, & are onely graunted to them that are obstinate and impacient.

Indulgences and pardons are vnprofitable to 6. sortes of per|sons. 1. to them that be dead, or lye in dying. 2. to thē that be we•• and infirme. 3. to such as haue lawful impedimentes. 4. to thē that haue not offended. 5. to such as haue offended▪ but not publickly. 6. to those that amend and do well.

Page 1282Excommunications be onely outward punishmentes, and doe not depriue a man of the publike spirituall prayers of the Church.*

Christians are to be taught rather to loue excommunication, then to dread it.

The bish. of Rome, successor of Peter, is not the vicar of Christ, ordeined by Christ and S. Peter, to haue authoritie ouer all the churches in the world.

The wordes of Christ to Peter, Whatsoeuer thou loosest, &c. Math 16. extend no further, but onely to those things, which bee bound of Peter hymselfe.

It is not in the hands eyther of the church, or of the Pope, to make articles of the fayth, yea, or lawes either of maners, or good workes.

Albeit the Pope with a great part of the church, teachyng so or so, did not erre therein: yet is it no sinne nor heresie for a man to hold contrary to them, namely in such things, which are not necessary to saluation, so long as it is not otherwise condemned or approued by a generall Councell.

We haue a way made playne vnto vs, to infringe the authoritie of Councels, and freely to gainestand their doyngs, and to iudge vpon their Decrees, and boldly to speake our knowledge whatsoeuer we iudge to be true, whether the same be approued or reprobued by any generall Councell.

Some of the articles of Iohn Hus condemned in the Councell of Constance, are Christian, most true and Euangelicall, whome the vniuersall Church cannot condemne.

In euery good worke the iust man sinneth.

*Euery good worke of ours, when it is best done, it is a veniall sinne.

To burne heretikes, is against the will of the spirit.

*To fight agaynst the Turkes, is to repugne agaynst God, visiting our iniquities by them.

Freewill after sinne, is a title and name onely of a thyng, and while a man doth that which lyeth in him, he sinneth deadly.

Purgatory cannot be proued out of holy scripture, whiche is Canonically.

Soules in Purgatory be not certaine of their safetie, at lest not all, neither is it proued by reasons or by scriptures, that they bee vtterly out of the state to deserue, or encrease charitie.

*Soules in Purgatory do sinne without intermission, so long as they seeke rest, and dread punishment.

The soules beyng deliuered out of Purgatory by the prayers of the liuyng, be lesse blessed, then if they had satisfied for themselues.

Ecclesiasticall prelates & worldly princes should not doe amisse, if they would scoure away all the bags of begging Friars.

All which errors there is no man in his right wittes, but he knoweth the same in their seuerall respects, how pestilēt they be, how pernicious, how much they seduce godly and simple minds, and finally how much they be against all charitie, and agaynst the reuerence of the holy Church of Rome, the mother of all faythfull, and maistresse of the fayth it selfe, and agaynst the sinews and strength of ecclesiasticall discipline, which is obedience, the fountayne and welspring of all vertues, and without the which euery mā is to be conuincd easily to be an Infidel.

We therefore desiring to proceede in the premisses more earnestly, as behooueth in things of most importaunce and meanyng, to cut of the course of this pestiferous and cankered disease, lest it should spread it selfe further in y^e Lords field, like hurtfull brambles or bryers, and vsing vpon the sayd errors, and euery of them diligent triall, debatyng strait examination, ripe deliberation. And further, weying and thorowly sifting all and euery of the same together w^t our reuerend brethrē, *the cardinals of the church of Rome, the priors of the orders regular, or ministers generall, also with diuers other professors and maisters of Diuinitie, & of both the lawes, and those the best learned: do finde the foresayd errors or articles respectiue, as is aforesayd, not to be the catholike, nor to be taught as Catholike, but to be agaynst the doctrine or tradition of the catholike Church, and agaynst the true interpretation of holy Scripture, receyued by the same: to whose author Augustine thought we ought so much to leane, that he would not (as he sayd) haue beleued the Gospell, if the authoritie of the Church had not thereto mooued hym.

For by these errors, or at least by some of them it followeth consequently, that the same Church which is guided by the holy Ghost, now doth, & euer hath erred, which is vtterly agaynst that which Christ at the tyme of his ascension (as we read in the holy Gospell of Mathew) promised to his Disciples, saying: I am with you vntill the ende of the world, &c. and also agaynst the determination of the holy Fathers, against the expresse ordinances or Canons of Councils and head bishops, whom not to obey, hath always bene the cause and nurse of all heresies and scismes, as Cyprian doth witnesse.*

Wherefore by the counsaile and assent of the sayde our reuerend brethren, vpon due consideration of all and singular the premisses, by the authoritie of almighty God, & of the blessed Apostles of Peter and Paule, and our owne, we do condemne, reprove, and vtterly reiect all and singular the Articles or errors aforesaid respectiue, as some to be hereticall, some to be slaunderous, some offensiue to godly eares, or els seducing simple mynds, and repugnant to the catholike truth, and by the tenor hereof, we here decree and declare that they ought of all christen people both men and women, to be taken as damned, reprooued, and reiected. And therefore forbidding here vnder payne of the greater curse and excommunication, loosing of their dignities, whether they be Ecclesiasticall or temporall, and to be depriued and made vncapable of all regular orders & priuiledges, geuen and graunted by the Sea Apostolike, of what condition so euer they be: also of loosing theyr liberties to hold generall schooles, to read and professe any science and facultie: of loosing also their tenures and feoffments, and of inhabilitie for euer to recouer the same agayne, or any other: moreouer, vnder payne of secludyng from christian buriall, yea and of treason also, and incurring such paynes and punishments expressed in the lawe, as are due for all heretickes and fautors of the same: wee charge and commaund all and singuler Christen people, both men and women, as well of the laitie, as of the Clergie, both secular & also regular, of what order so euer they be, and brieflye all other persones, of what degree or condition so euer they bee, or in what dignitie so euer they are placed, either ecclesiasticall or temporall: as first y^e cardinals of the holy church of Rome, Patriarkes, Primates Archbishops, Bishops, with the prelates and heads of the churches Patriarchall, Metropolitane,* or other cathedrall Collegiate, and other small and inferiour churches: to all clerkes and other persons ecclesiasticall, as Abbots, Priors, or ministers generall or perticular, brethren or religious men, exempt and not exempt: also Uniuersities of schooles, and all other, as well secular priests, as regular, and religious persons of all orders, yea of the begging friers also. Item, kings, Electors of the Imperiall crowne, princes, Dukes, Marquesses, Barons, captains, conductors and seruitures, and all Officers, Iudges, Notaries, whether they be ecclesiasticall or secular: comminalties, vniuersities, dominions, cities, castles, lordships, and places, with the inhabitants of the same: and finally all other persons whatsoever, ecclesiasticall or regular, dispersed in whatsoever places through the whole * vniuersal world, or which shall be hereafter dispersed, but especially in high Almany, that they shall not presume publikely or priuately vnder any maner of pretence or colour, colourably or expressly, or how els soeuer, to hold, maintaine, defend,* preach, or fauour the foresayd errors or any of them, or any such peruerse doctrine.

Ouer and besides, for so much as the foresayd errors, and many other are contained in the bookes or writings of the foresayd Martin Luther, therefore we condemne, reprove, and vtterly reiect, and hold for vtterly condemned, reprooued, and reiected the foresayd bookes, and al the writings of the sayd Martin, with his preachings, in what tongue so euer they are found, wherein the sayd errors or any of them is conteined willing and commanding vnder the vertue of holy obedience, and incurring the penalties aforesayd, to all and singular christen people, both men and women aboue rehersed, that they presume not by any maner of waies, directly, or indirectly, colourably or expresly, priuily or apertly, either in their houses, or in other publike or priuate places, to read, hold, preach, print, publishe, or defend, eyther by themselves or by others, but straight wayes after the publishing hereof, they doe burne or cause to be burned the sayd errors, by their Ordinaries diligētly beyng searched out, and solemnely presented in the sight of the whole Clergy of the people, vnder all and singular the penalties aforesayd.

Now as touching the sayd Martin, O good lord, what haue we left * vndone? what haue we left vnattempted? what fatherly charitie haue we not shewed, whereby to haue reduced him from these errours? For after that wee did cite hym, thinking to proceed with him more fauourably, we inuited and exhorted him as well by diuers tractations had with our Legate, as by our owne letters, that he would relinquish the foresayd errors, or els hauing safe conduct offred to him, with money necessary for his iourney, to come to vs without any feare or dread, which perfect charitie ought to cast out, and so after the example of our sauour, and his Apostle S. Paule, he would speake, not in corners and in secret, but openly to our face. Which if he had done, of truth we thinke no lesse, but that reformyng Page 1283 himselfe, he would haue recognised his errors, neyther should haue found so many faults in y^e court of Rome which he beyng seduced with the rumours of malicious people, more thē he ought, doth so much reprehend. Where we would haue taught him to see more clearely then the light day, that the holy fathers of Rome our predecessors (whome he without all modestie, most iniuriously doth rayle vpon) did neuer erre in their Canons and constitutions (which he so much depraue.) For as saith the prophet: Neither is there Rosine or Phisition lacking in Galaa. But he hath alwayes shewed himselfe disobedient, and refused at our Citation to appeare, and yet to this present day continuing still in hys stubburne mynd and heart indurate, hath remayned now more then a yeaere vnder our curse, yea & moreouer, adding mischiefe to mischief (which is worst of all) he hearing of this our Citation, burst out into a presumptuous appellation from vs, vnto the next generall Councell,* against the constitution both of Pope Pius the second, and Pope Iulius the second, our predecessours, which so decreed, that all they which so did appeale,* should be punished as heretikes.

In vayne also he seeketh refuge to the generall Councell, which professeth himselfe not greatly to regard such couēcels. So that now we might lawfully proceed against hym, as against one notoriously suspected of his fayth, yea a very heretike in deed, without any further citation or delay, to the condemnation of him, as of an heretike, and to the seueritie of all and singular paynes and censures afore written. Yet we notwithstanding by the counsell of our brethren aforesayd, following the clemencie of almighty God, which wyll not the death of a sinner, but rather that hee should conuert and lyue, and forgetting all iniuries heretofore done vnto vs and to the See apostolike, haue thought good to vse all fauourable meanes toward hym that wee might, and so to worke (as much as in vs lyeth) that he by this way of mansuetude, might be brought to reformation: so that he forsaking hys former errours, might be receiued as the lost chyld, and returne home againe into the lap of his mother the Church.

Wherefore in most harty wise we exhort and beseech the said Martin and all his adherents, receiuers, and fautors by the bowels of the mercy of our God,* and by the sprinklyng of the bloud of our Lord Iesu Christ, in whome, and by whom, is made the redemption of mankind, and the edification of holy mother church, that they will cease to disturbe the peace, vnitie, and veritie of the said Church, for the which our sauior so instantly prayed to his father, and that they will absteyne from such pernicious errors aforesaid. Who in so doyng shall fynd with vs (if they shal obey, or shall certifie vs by lawfull witnesses, to haue obeyed effectually herein) the affection of fatherly charitie, and a full fountayne opened of all mercy and clemencie: willing and charging the said Martine notwithstanding, from henceforth that he vtterly desist in the meane time from all preachyng and office of preaching. Or els if the loue of Iustice and vertue shall not restrayne the said Martin from sinne, neither the hope of our pardon shall reduce hym to repentaunce: to the intent that the terror of punishment and of discipline may bridle him, we require and admonish y^e said Martin and his adherents, abettors, fautors, and receyuers, by the tenor hereof, in the veritie of holy obedience, & vnder incurring all the penalties aforesaid, districtly charging and commaunding that within fourty days (whereof twenty we assign for the first twenty, for the second, and the other twenty for the third & peremptory terme) immediately following after the setting vp of these present letters,* that the sayd Martin, his abettors, fautors, adherēts and receiuers aforesayd, do surcease from the foresayd errors, and from the preching, publishing, mainteyning and defending of the same: also from setting out of booke or scriptures vpon the said errors or any of them: & furthermore, that they burne, or cause to be burned all and singular such bookes and scriptures as containe the foresaid errors or any of them by any maner of way.

Also that the said Martin doe vtterly reuoke those errors and assertions, and so to certifie vs of the reuokynge thereof by publike testimonie in due forme of lawe, signed by the handes of two prelates, to be sent vnto vs within the terme of other like xl. daies, or els to be brought by him vnto vs, if he himselfe will come (which would please vs much rather) with a full safeconduct aboute mentioned, which from henceforth we are content to offer vnto hym, to the entent that no scruple of doubt touching hys true obedience,* should hereafter remayne.

Contrarywise, if the said Martin (which God defend) his abettors, fautors, adherents, and mainteyners aforesaid, shal otherwise do, or shal not fulfill to euery effect and purpose, all and singular the premisses within the terme aforesaid, we thē folowing the doctrine of the apostle, which teacheth vs to auoyd an heretical person, after the first and second correction, as wel now as before, and as wel before as now, declaring by our authoritie the said Martin, his abettors, fautors, adherents, mainteyners, and receyuere▪ as withered braunches not remainyng in Christ, but teaching and preaching contrary doctrine, repugnaunt to the Catholike faith, slaundersous and damnable, to the great offence of Gods maiestie, to the detriment and slaunder of the vniuersal church and catholike faith, and despising the keyes of the church: to be, and to haue bene notorious and obstinate heretikes, do condemne the same for such by the tenor hereof, willing and commanding them to be holden and taken for such of all christen people aforesayd.

Ouer and besides, we forbid vnder the incurring of all and singular the penalties afore expressed, in so doing,* that no man presume by any maner of way, directly or indirect^{ly}, secretly or expresly, priuily or apertly, to read, holde, preach, praise, print, publish or defend, either by thēselues, or by any other the sayd bookes and writings, not onelye those wherein the errors aforesayd are contained, but also all others whatsoever haue bene or shall be set forth, written, or made by the sayd Martin, vehemently suspected as a pernicious enemy of the Catholike faith, to the intent y^t his memory may vtterly be rooted out from the fellowship of all christian people, or rather with fire to consume them as is afore declared.

We admonish moreouer, al and singular Christes faithful people, vnder the said payne of the great curse, to auoid or cause to be auoided so much as in them doth lie, the foresaid heretikes not obedient to our commandements, and to haue no fellowship or any conuersation or communion with them or with any of them, neither to minister to thē things necessary.

And moreouer, to the more confusion of the said Martin, with his abettors, adherents, and retainers aforesayd,* thus being declared and condemned as heretikes, after the expiring of the terme aforesayd, we command all and singular Christes faithfull people, both men and women, as Patriarchs, Archbishops, Prelates of Churches, eyther Patriarchall, Metropolitane, and other Cathedrall, Collegiate, and other inferiour Churches, to Deanes & Chapters, and other Ecclesiasticall persons secular, and of all other orders, euen of the begging Friers also, namely, of that congregation, where the sayd Martin is professed,* or hath his abode: also to regular, exempt, and not exempt. Item, to all and singular Princes, what dignity or calling so euer, eyther Ecclesiasticall or Temporall they be of: to Kings, Princes, Electors, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Barons, Captaynes, Conductors, Seruitours, Comminalties, Uniuersities, Dominions, Cities, Landes, Castles and places, or the Citizens and inhabitauntes thereof: and briefly, to all and singular other aforesaid, through the Uniuersall world dispersed, specially in Almany, that they and euery of them, vnder all and singular penalties aforesayd, doe personally apprehend the sayd Martin, hys abettors, adherents, receyuers, and fautours, and to retaine them being apprehended, at our instance, and to send them vnto vs (who in so doyng, for their good worke shal receiue of vs and the Sea Apostolike, condigne reward and recompence) or at least, that they vtterly driue them, and euery one of them, out of their Metropolitane, cathedrall, Collegiate, and other Churches, Houses, Monasteries, Conuents, Cities, Dominions, Uniuersities, Comminalties, Castles, Landes, and places respectiuey, as well the Clergy men, as the regular and lay men, all and singular aforesayd.

Those cities, dominions, landes, castles, villages, comminalties, holdes, townes, and places where so euer they be situate respectiuey, Metropolitane, Cathedrall, Collegiate, and other Churches, Monasteries also, Priories, Couents, and religious and deuout places, or what order so euer (as is aforesaid) vnto the which it shall chance the sayd Martin to come, so long as he or they shall there remayne, and three dayes after their departing from thence, we here geue ouer to the Ecclesiasticall interdiction.

And that the premisses may be knowen to all men, we commaund moreouer all Patriarches, Archbishops, Bishops, Prelates of Patriarchall, Metropolitane, & other cathedral & collegiate churches, to Deanes and Chapters, and other persons ecclesiastical, & of what order els soeuer aforesaid, to regular brethren, religious monkes, exempt & not exempt aforesaid, wheresoeuer they dwell, and especially within Almany, that they and euery of thē vnder like censures and paynes, do publikely denounce, & cause and commaund to be denounced of others, the said Martin w^t all and singular his foresaid adherents, which shall not obey our commandements and monitions, within y^e terme Page 1284 aforesayd, vpon euery sonday, and other Festiuall dayes, within their churches, when as the greatest concourse of people shal resort to diuine seruice, to be declared and condemned for heretikes, and that all Christes faithful people shall auoid them vnder the said censures and penalties, as be afore expressed, and that they do set vp these presents, or cause to be set vp, or the transcript of them made vnder the forme hereafter ensuing, in their churches, Monasteries, houses, Conuents, and other places there openly to bee seene and read.

Item, we do excommunicate and curse, all and singuler persons, of whatsoeuer state, degree, condition, preheminence, dignitie, or excellencie they be, which shal procure or cause to be procured by themselues or other, priuily, or apertly, directly or indirectly, secretly or expressly, wherby these presents, or the copies transcript, or the examples of them can not be read, set vp, and published in their landes and dominions, &c.

Let no man therefore be so bold to dare, to infringe, or with rash presumption, to contrary this wrytyng of our damnation, reprobation, reiection, decree, declaration, inhibition, will, commandement, exhortation, beseching, request, admonition, assignation, graunt, condemnatiō, subiectiō, excommunication & curse. And if any person & persons dare presume to attempt the same, let him know and be sure, that he shall incur the indignation of almightie God,* and of his blessed Apostles Peter and Paule.

Geuen at Rome at S. Peters, an. 1520.17. Calend. Iulij, and of our Popedome, the viij. yeare.

Although it was somewhat long before this Bull aforesaid of Pope Leo, being sent & dispersed through all other places abroad,* could come to the hands of Luther, yet so soone as he by meanes of his friendes, might get a sight thereof, he shaped againe an answer to the same: in such sort, as I am sure, the Pope himselfe wil say, that his Bull was neuer so baited, and so welfauoredly shaken in al his days,* as by the handling of the matter, and reading of his answer may evidently appeare. The contentes & copy of the which answer, I thought here next after the said Bull immediatly to exhibite to the christian reader, that who so is disposed to conferre the one with the other, hauing thē both at hand,* may iudge the better of the whole matter & cause, and also may see the true Image of the Pope out of his paynted visour appeare in his owne perfect colours. The answer now to the Bull here followeth.

IESVS. Martinus Lutherus Christiano Lectori, gratiam Christi in salutem aeternam.

Fama peruenit ad me, Christiane Lector, exijsse Bullam quandam aduersum me,* penē in omnē terrā, prius quam ad me, in quem vnice fuerit, & cui maximē erat inferenda, veniret. Fortē, quod noctis & tenebrarum scilicet filia, tumult lucem vultus mei. Hanc tamen ipsam noctuam, vix tandem multum adiuuātibus amicis, in imagine sua, datum est videre, &c.

¶Here followeth the same aunswer of Martin Luther agaynst the execrable Bull of Pope Leo, in English.

Martin Luther to the christiā reader, wisheth the grace of Christ to eternall saluation.* I heard a fanie a farre of (Christian reader) that a certayne Bull was past out against me, and sent almost ouer al the world before it came to me, against whom it was especially directed, & to whō most chiefly it appertained. For what cause I cannot tell, except peraduenture it was for that the sayd Bull like vnto a nightcrow, and as a bird of darkenesse hatched in the night, durst not flie in y^e day, nor abide to come in my sight. Notwithstanding the said night foule after long tyme, by helpe of friends was caught at length & brought vnto me in his owne likenes to behold. Which causeth me yet to be vncertaine what to thinke, whether my papists do dally & iest with me, in setting out such famous libels without any name against me: or whether in truth and earnest they play the mad men so against me at Rome, or no. For first, neither do I see here the stile (as it is called) nor y^e processe of the court of Rome obserued. And againe (which maketh me more to doubt) herein be brought & condemned such articles which it is plaine and manifest to be most christian: whereby it seemeth to me most like, the said monster to be hatched by Iohn Eccius, a man wholly compact and framed altogether of lies, dissimulations, errors, & heresies.

*The said suspicion this also partly confirmeth, for that I heare it so bruted abroad, that y^e said Eccius is thought and sayd to be the Apostle of such a goodly Bull. And not vnlike, when none could be more meet an Apostle for such an Apostleship then he. And in deed I heard no lesse long since, that a Bull was in working agaynst me at Rome, partly by the workemanship of Eccius: which because (as the stile and composition therof declareth) it displeased the good and learned men there, was therefore differred and should haue bene suppressed.

But whatsoeuer the matter be, it semeth to me not vnlike wheresoeuer this apostle Eccius beareth rule, there to be the kingdom of Antichrist, and all kind of madnes there to reigne. In the meane tyme I will so deale, that I wyll not seeme to beleue Pope Leo the x. with his learned cardinals to be the authors of this furious madnes: which I doe not so much for the honor of the Sea of Rome, as because I will not be puft vp to much with pride, and seeme to my selfe as one worthy to suffer such, so great, & so glorious things for the veritie of God. For if it were so in deed that the bishop of Rome did so furiously rage against me, who were then so happy before God as Luther, to be condemned for so manifest a truth of such a proude Prelate? Wherein what were more to be wished for of me, then that I should neuer be absolved, reconciled, nor haue any part with that so doltish and vnlearned, wicked, and furious Antichrist? Happy were that day, happy were that death, and to be receiued with all ioy and thankfulness to God, if it might be my happe at any tyme in such a cause as this is, to be apprehended and to suffer death.* But geue the honour of this cause vnto others, and let this matter fynde his Martyr worthy for the same: I for my sinnes am not worthy to come to that honour.

Let other men therefore thinke of these Romanists what they list: Thus I thinke, that whosoever was the author of this bull, he is a very Antichrist, and against Antichrist, these thinges I write, to redeeme the veritie of Christ, so much as in me lieth, which he laboreth to extinguish. And first, that he shall obtayne no part of his will in any thing agaynst me,* here I protest before God and our Lord Iesu Ehrhist, and his holy angels and all the world, that I dissēt with all my hart from the condemnatiō of this bull, which Bull I also do curse and execrate as an enemy, a Church robber and blasphemy against Christ the sonne of god our Lord. Amen.

Furthermore I hold, defend, and imbrace with the ful trust of my spirit, those articles in the said Bul condemned and excommunicate,* and affirme that the same oughe to be holden of all faithful christians, vnder paine of eternal malediction, and that they are to be counted for Antichristes, who so euer haue consented to the sayd Bull, whom I also together with the spirit of all them which purely know, & do vtterly shun them according to the precept of our Lord Iesu Christ. Amen. And let this stand for thy reuocation, O Bulla verè Bullarum filia. i. O thou Bull which art the very daughter of all vayne * bubbles.

This my confession and protestation made (for witnes whereof I take all them that shall read these presents) before I proceed to defend & declare these foresaid Articles, I will first begin, with certaine arguments for the confutation of the sayd Bull: whereof the first I will take of the blind ignorāce of this blockish Antichrist.* For the Apostle Peter so commandeth, that we should be redy to render a reason of that faith and hope which is in vs. And the apostle Paule willeth a bishop to be mighty to exhort in soūd doctrine & to refute the gaynesayers. And these thinges be they, which now 3. yeres agoe, I haue desired & looked for out of Rome, or from them which take part with Rome.* Which things also we do read to be obserued most diligētly amongst the ancient fathers, whensoever they condemned heresies. Neither do we read that the apostles did euer decree any thing in their Counsels, but they first alledged the holy Scripture. So I also when I wayted that they would aunswer me with grapes, and to enforme me wyth true testimonies of the scripture, behold they bryng to me sower and wylde grapes, condemning me with nothing els but bare words, whereas I haue fortified my matter with playne scriptures.

I say vnto thee. O thou most vnlearned Antichrist, hast thou ioined such brain•like rashnes together with such barbarous ignorance, that thou wilt presume to thinke all mē to be turned into stockes & blocks, and to thinke that thou with thy bare and naked words only canst triūph against the inuincible force and power of Gods holy worde? Hast thou learned this maner of condemning of the magistralities of Colen and Louaine.

If this be the maner of the Church to damne errorrs, only to say. I like it not, I deny it, I will not: what foole, what patch, what asse, what block cannot condemne after this maner? Is not thy whorish face ashamed in the publike sight of the church, to dare once to set the trifling vanities Page 1293 onely of thy naked and bare wordes against the thunderboirs of Gods eternall word? O impudent condemnation and right seemely for Antichrist, which hath not one iote or title to bring against such euident scriptures inferred agaynst him, but onely with one worde commeth and sayth, I condemne thee. And why then do we not beleeeue the Turke? Why do we not admit the Iewes? Why doe we not honour the heretikes which also condemne our writings as well as he, if it be enough only to condemne? vnlesse we do not therfore peraduenture geue place vnto them, because they condemne vs not vtterly without some scriptures and reasons: but these men after a new found fashion, vtterly without all scriptures or reason doe condemne vs. What then shall I thinke to be the cause why they proceeded against me with this their Bul condemnatory,* so vaine, so ridiculous, so trifling, but only their mere blockishnes, wherby they seyng my allegations to be true and not able to abide, nor yet to confute the same, thought to terrifie me with the vayne ratlyng of their rottē parchment. But I tell thee Antichrist, that Luther being accustomed to warre, will not be terrified with these vayne buls, and hath learned to put a difference betwene a piece of paper, and the omnipotent word of God.

Of the like ignorance proceedeth this also, that they against their owne conscience, durst not perticularly digest all and singular the Articles in their orders: for they feared least they should note hym for an heretike, whom they were not able perhaps to conuince either to be erroneous or offensiue,* & therefore they haue found out this Aduerbe respectiue: & after the numbring of the articles, then come they & say that some be respectiue heretical, some erroneous, and some offensiue, which is as much to say, as we suppose some to be heretical, some erroneous, & some slanderous, but we cannot tell qui, quales, quanti. i. Which, what maner, and how great they are. O dastardly ignoraunce, how slippery and cowardly art thou? how art thou afayrd of the light?

how doest thou turne and returne all thyngs, least thou shouldst be taken lyke a Proteus: and yet for all that thou shalt not so escape, yea in thy wylynes thou shalt the rather be ouertaken and subuerted.*

Come out therefore O thou asseheaded Antichrist, and shew forth thy wisdom, and dispose thy matters in order. Tell vs if thou canst, what sayest thou or meanest thou, when thou sayest this article is hereticall, this is erroneous, this is offensiue. For it becommeth such a worshipful condemner to know what he condemneth. And to shamefull it is to condemne an article for heretical, and yet cānot name the same. Neither will I be answered herewith respectiuely, but I looke to be taught simply and plainly, for I am one of Occams faction which contemneth these respectiues, and loue to haue all things simple & absolute.

Thou seest therefore (good Reader) the ignorant dotage of this Antichrist,* how craftily, & yet grossely he thinketh to walke in a net vnder his aduerbe, respectiuely, who not only •oth not teach the truth, and cause of his cōdemning, but neither also dare proue any error, nor shew forth what it is that he condemneth, and yet must he nedes condemn. Is not this trow you a proper kind of damning, to damn and cannot tell what he damneth? Is not this a fine maner of loquution, passing all Rhetorike, to speak, & yet not to know what he speaketh, what purgatories might wee wish sufficient to purge the doltish braynes of these Bull bragging bedlems? with such blindnes & doltishnes are all the aduersaries of Gods truth worthy to be plagued.

But I know wherupon all this grieffe riseth. The origine whereof is this:* Eccius mine old aduersary remembring how he was put to shame enough at Lypsia when he rousing hymselfe vppon hys stage, and frothing at the mouth like a Bore, with a furious mouth called me 3. hūdreth tymes heretike, for the Articles of Husse, and yet afterward was not able to proue the same, whereas the sentence condemnatory of the Councell of Constance, alleaged by me otherwise then Eccius looked for, noted there, no certaine article for hereticall: and also the same condemnation much like to this of ours, with the like foolishnes called some of his Articles hereticall, some erroneous, & some offensiue,* and Eccius hearyng this, beyng confounded in himselfe for his impudent rashnes: perceiued that he had called me heretike falsly and vntruly: he thought then to heale this his wound again at Rome, and there to stablish his false and impudent lying. But the lying sophister shall not preuayle by the helpe (I trust) of Christ, for I aske and require yet stil, y^t they absolutely, not respectiuely, distinctly, and not confusedly, simply, & not dissemblingly, plainly and not obscurely, perticularly & not in generall, do shew what is, and what is not heretical. But when will they so do? When Christ and Beliall, or when light and darkenes shall agree together.

And what shall I do then in the meane tyme? First I will contemne these dastardly dotipoles and vnlearned Papists and apostles of Antichrist.* And I wil scorne them as Helias did, and say: if Baal be God, let hym aunswere, pe•••'uenture he is drunke, or busie in hys iourney, Cry out higher, for he is a God and peraduenture heareth. For what other thyng do these Bull bragging Asses deserue els, which cōdemne that they know not, and confesse also their own ignoraunce?

Secondly, I wil not be troubled nor disquieted for the matter, neither am I to be counted heretike, erroneous▪ or offensiue, so long as I shall not be prooued and plainly cōuicted with simple and manifest wordes in what Article I am so iudged. Neither do I here charge my Papists, these blockheds, that I will put them to their proofes, but onely that they will shew me at least my error that is, that they will shew me if they know what it is that they themselues do prattle of, or haue any feelyng of their owne doyngs. For so long as they assigne me no hereticall Article, I am at free liberty to deny what Article so euer they lay vnto me to be heretical, and say it is Catholike.

Agayne, what a rudenes is it in this wicked & doltishe Antichrist worthy to be laughed at, where as these drummedaries do distinct hereticall Articles from those that be erroneous, and the erroneous from offense, * and those agayne from slaunders? By the which subtle distinction of those grosseheaded dolts, this we do gather, that that article which is erroneous, is not heretical, and if it be not heretical, what doth it then appertaine to these Ecclesiastical condemners, which ought to condemne those things only, which be hereticall. For that which is not hereticall, is catholike, as Christ himselfe saith: He that is not against vs is with vs. Yea I would wish, that these iolly Sophisters would shew me in all the Church an Article that is erroneous, and not heretical: for if it be erroneous, it differeth nothyng from hereticall, but onely in stiffnesse of defendyng. For all things be equally either true or false, * althogh affection in some one thing which is true or false, may be greater or lesser. Ye see therfore agayne, how these men for all theyr braggyng Bulls, are not able to produce me one Article which is erroneous and not heretical, * and yet lyke wise brainsike men, they will needs babble they know not themselues what, condemning that which they finde erroneous and not hereticall: which cannot stand eyther in matter or in words so that such as are the Articles: such is the condemnation.

The lyke wisdom also they shew in affirmyng that to be Scandalous, * which is neither hereticall nor erroneous. That Article I would fayne see eyther in my booke or in the words and workes of any writer els from the beginnyng of the world to the latter end. What made my papists then to excogitate these so prodigious monsters, but onely their monstrous fury and madnesse? Unlesse peradventure they meane those Articles so to be Scandalous, as commonly all true and Catholike Articles are wont to be. For what is more scandalous then Ueritie? Yea onely truth and veritie is scandalous to all proud and senselesse persons, and is sayd of Christ, 1. Cor. 1. We preach (saith S. Paule) Christe crucified, a stumbyng stone to the Iewes, and to the Gentiles foolishnesse. And in Luke 2. * He is set to be the fall and rising vp of many in Israell. Wherefore, where as my Papistes do distinguish scandalous Articles from hereticall and erroneous, and forasmuch as that which is not hereticall or erroneous, must needs be Catholike and true: it followeth thereof, that these scandalous Articles be vnderstanded and condēd of them for such as be very Catholike and sound. O worthy commendation & me•te for the Papists.

Marke here good Reader, * the impietie of these blynde Bussards, whether they roll themselues, how they deride and mocke themselues, how easily they are taken in theyr owne words, how fond and foolish they are in their studies not only in not proouyng any error or slander in these Articles, but also in goyng about only to expresse them, how they cast out things impossible and most foolishly repugnant to themselues. Where is then thou most presumptuous and shameles Bull, thy doltish respectiue nowe become? whether respectedst thou? Uerily into the bottomles pit of impiety, and thine owne brutish stoliditie.

The like also is to be sayd touching the Articles offense, which must be neyther slaunders, neyther erroneous, nor hereticall, seyng they are distincted by such great Rabbines. Who wyll not now maruell at the depe & profound wisdom of these Papistes, which could finde out that to be offensive in the Church, which is neyther false, neyther hereticall nor slaunderous, but true, sound, Catholike and edifieng, and yet must that also be condemned? And who would not now desire & couet to be condemned Page 1286 also of such harebrained Idiotes, who by their owne condemning do vtter themselves to approoue things damnable, and to condemne things iustifiable, that is, whyche openly shew themselves, to their owne great ignominy and shame, to be more senseles then stockes, rockes, or blocks. Goe ye nowe therefore, O ye impious and brainlesse Papistes, and if yee wil needes wryte: shew your selues more sober: for this Bull (it appeareth) was spued out in youre night feasts amongs other drabs and harlots, or els hudled vp in the Caniculare dayes or mad midsomer Moone: For neuer were there any dissardes that would shew them selues so madde.

Lette vs now retourne this dirt of Antichrist, and cast it in hys owne teethe, and of hys owne words let vs iudge hym and condemne him,* that heereafter hee maye learne to take better heede, and be better aduised in his lyinge. For as the Prouerbe sayth, a lyer had neede to haue a good memorye. If some Articles be offensive, and other hereticall, and thou condemnest him whych is no hereticke, and consequently a true Catholicke, although hee be sixe hundreth times offensive. Doth not thy shamelesse mouth then condemne thy selfe, not onely of heresie, but of extreeme impietie, blasphemye and treason against Gods holy trueth, shewing thy selfe to be the manne in dede whych is the aduersarye, and is extolled aboue all that which is called God, or is worshipped? Art not thou then the manne of sinne, and the sonne of perdition,* which denieth God hys redeamer, and taketh away the loue of trueth, to stablishe the settinge forth of his error, for men to beleue iniquitie, as Paule foretolde? For if the Article be not hereticall, it can not be offensive or slaunderous, but onely to suche hereticke as Antichrist is, and Sathanistes of all pietie. See theefore howe his shamelesse and moste foolish Bull, whiles it condemneth in me one thinge to be hereticall, and an other offensive, doeth manifestly declare the authours thereof to be true hereticke and the enemies of God in deede.* So that nowe it maye appeare, that there is no knowledge nor counsell against the Lorde, seeing blinde impietie is thus caughte in the woordes of hys owne mouth: so truely it is sayd, that he whiche casteth vpp a stone on highe, it falleth downe againe vpon his owne pate.

And (whyche is chieftest of all) by thys theyr wycked contradiction it commeth to passe,* that the cogitations of theyr owne hartes be reuealed, and that they them selues chiefly do vtter and disclose their owne wickednes which they couet most to conceale, that all men may see how ready they are to condemne all veritie euen at once. For when they affirme suche Articles to be hereticall, whyche neyther they can, nor knowe, nor yet dare shewe or name to be hereticall, what haue we thereby to vnderstand, but that they are the aduersaries of Christe from the bottome of theyr hearts, and ready to impugne all trueth, and yet notwithstanding wyth their dampnable hypocrisie they pretende themselves to be condemners of heresies? Learne, learne, yee beetell headed Asses wyth your blustering buls,* learne I say, what it is, Christe to be a signe of contradiction and a stone of offence. Howe soone and easily is al your inward impietie and your ignominie disclosed wyth the same couert of woordes,* wherewith in vaine yee went aboute to cloke the same? Thus then haue we heere prooued by thys first and manifest argument, that the foresayde Bull proceedeth from none other, then very Antichrist hymselfe, the chieftest aduersarye of God and of all godlinesse. And nowe let either Eckius or the Pope acknowledge if he dare, and then consider what opinion wee ought to haue of hym, or what name to geue him: in whome all cursed names, as in one heape, doe concurre together and agree, as impietie, blasphemie, ignorance, foolishnes, hypocrisie, lying, briefly, Sathan himselfe with his Antichrist.

Neither doeth thys impietie any thing lesse appeare in that also which I will nowe say. For this worshipful Bul decreeth in plaine and moste impudent woordes,* that those Bookes also of mine ought to be burned, in the whyche are no errors contained, to the end that the memory of me may be vtterly rooted out.

Canst thou O Christian Reader, now doubte that the great Dragon of hell hymselfe speaketh in this Bull? It is an olde Prouerbe, that the Asse singeth therefore euill fauoredly, because hee taketh hys note to hye. So thys Bull in like manner should haue piped more tunably, if he had not sette by hys blasphemous throte so open againste heauen, so impudently and deuclishly condemning also the manyfest and euident trueth. For hitherto Sathan when so euer hee oppressed the trueth, did it vnder the colour of trueth: but this man of sinne, the Aduersarie whyche is extolled aboue God, wythout all colour, not priuily but apeartly, and that in the open Church of God, wythoute all shame taketh vpon hym to condemne, and commaundeth to be burned the sincere veritye of Christe,* knowne and allowed both of hym and of all others. What could be more done amongst the Turkes? What place is thys woorthy off (I praye thee) but the deepe dungeon of Hell? And are yee not afrayde yee Antichristes, wyth your brutishe Bulles, leaste stones and trees shoulde sweare wyth bloude, at the moste horrible sighte of thys your execrable impietie and blasphemie?

Where art thou now good Emperour Charles? Where are yee Christen Kings and Princes? Ye haue geuen your name to Christe in Baptisme, and can ye nowe abide these infernall voyces of suche an Antichriste? Where be yee Bishoppes? Where be yee Doctours? Where be all yee that confesse Christe? Can yee holde your peace at these horrible and prodigious monsters of the Papistes, O miserable Church of God, whyche arte made nowe so greate a scorne, and a very mocking stocke of Sathan. O miserable are all they which liue in these times. The wrathe of God is finally come vpon the Papistes, ennemies to the crosse of Christe and veritie of God, resistinge all menne, and forbidding the trueth of Christe to be taught and preached, as S. Paule sayd of the Iewes. Admitte I praye you, that I were suche a one in deede,* as that cursed and malicious Bull doeth make me to be an hereticke, erroneous, schismaticall, offensive, scandalous, in certaine of my bookes: yet whye shoulde the other bookes of mine be condemned, which are Catholike, Christian, true, edifying, and peaceable? Where haue these wretched Papistes learned thys religion, that for the persones cause being euil, they should damne and burne the holy and sounde verity of God? Can ye not destroy menne, but you must also destroy the truth? Will yee plucke vppe the good wheate also with the cockle? Will yee scatter also the corne away together wyth the chaffe? And whye then receyue yee Origen in hys Catholike bookes, and doe not vtterly reiecte hym all together? Yea, whye suffer yee wicked Aristotle (in whome is nothyng taughte but errours) and doe not at leaste in some parte condemne hym? Why burne yee not and set on fire, the wycked, barbarous, vnlearned, and hereticall Decretalles of the Pope? Why doe ye not all this, I say, but only for that ye are set in this holy place, for none other cause, but onely to be that abomination spoken of in Daniell, whiche shoulde put downe trueth and set vp lyes,* and the operation of errour. For this thinge and none other, becommeth the seate of Antichrist.

Wherefore this I say to thee (Pope Leo the tenth and to you Lord Cardinals, and all other whosoeuer is in anye parte or doing in that Courte of Rome) and thys I speake boldly vnto your faces, if this Bull hath come out in your name, and by your knowledge, and if ye will so acknowledge it for your owne: then wil I likewise vse my power, by the which I am made in my Baptisme, y^e sonne of God, and coheyre with Christ, being founded vppon a sure rocke which neither feareth the gates of hell, nor heauen, nor earth, and say, monish and exhort you in the Lord that you will reforme your selues and take a better waye,* and refrayne heeeafter from those diabolicall blasphemies and to much exceeding presumptuous impeties, and thys I alledge: That vnlesse ye so do, know it for certayne, that I with all them that worship Christ, doe recount youre seate, possessed and oppressed of Sathan himselfe, to be the damned seate of Antichrist, whiche we not onely do not obey, and will not be subiect nor concorporate vnto, but also do detest and abhorre the same, as the principall & chieftest enemy of Christ, being ready in this our sentence and profession, not onely to suffer gladly your fond foolish censures, but also do pray you hartily that you will neuer assoyle vs agayne, nor euer number vs in your fellowship, and moreouer to fulfill your bloody tyranny, do willingly offer our selues to die for y^e same.* And according y^e to power & might, y^t the spirite of Christ, and efficacye of our fayth can doe in these our writinges, if ye shall persist so still in your fury, we condemne you, & together with this Bull, & all the Decretall, we geue you to Sathan, to the destruction of flesh y^t your spirite in the day of our Lord may be deliuered: in the name whiche you persecute of Iesu Christ our Lord. Amen.

For our Lord Iesus Christ yet liueth and raygneth (in whom I do nothing doubt) who I firmly trust wil shortly come and slay with the spirite of his mouth, and destroy with the brightnes of his comming, this man of sinne, and sonne of perdition, for asmuch as I cannot deny,* if the pope be the author and doer of these mishapen and monstrous doinges, but he is the true, finall, most wicked, and that famous Antichrist: that subuerteth the whole worlde by the Page 1287 operation of his delusions, as we see it in all places fulfilled and accomplished.

But whether doth the burning zeale of charity cary me. Neither am I as yet fully perswaded this to be the popes Bull, but to proceede from his wicked Apostle Eckius, who with his fathers,* furiously gaping at me like a gulfe, would swallow me cleane vppe: •inging wyth the wicked thus: Let vs swallow him vp quicke and whole like hell, and like one descending downe into the pitte. For little careth this furious ma•braine,* howe the veritie of God be extinguished (ye he would count that for a lucre) so he might •ill his malicious desire with the bloude <◇> his brother. O miserable state of the Churche at this time• worthy to be bewailed w^t teares o• bloude. But who heareth our gronings, or who comforteth our weepings? The furie of the Lorde seemeth to be inoxorable against vs.

Ouer and besides, what a ridiculous toye, or pretie figment haue they inuented, wherby belike to sport thēselues with some merye matter amongst their earnest businesse, wryting that besides other great frendshippe, whych they haue shewed vnto me: they haue also offered to support me with mony,* and to beare my charges with theyr liberality, in my iourney to Rome. Wil ye see what a charity is newly come vpon the Citie of Rome, which after it hath pilled and polled the whole world of their money, and hath consumed & wasted the same by intolerable tyranny, nowē cōmeth, and to me onely offereth money? But this impudent lye I know with whose hōmer it was coined, Caietanús the Cardinall, a man borne and formed to lie for the whetstone after his worshipfull Legacie depeached in Germanie comming home to Rome, there he forged & fained that he promised me mony, wheras he being at Anspurge, was there in such miserable penury, & so pinching in his house, that it was thought he woulde haue famished his familye. But thus it becommeth the Bull to be verè Bulla, that is a thing of nought, voide of all trueth and wit.

And so these great iudges & condemners after all thys, yet haue authority to commaund vs to beleue them to say truth, when they do nothing but lie, and that they are good Catholickes, when they be starke heretickes, and that they are true Christians,* whē they play the very Antichrist, and all by the vertue of this vniuersall: Quodcunque ligaueris. &c. i. Whatsoeuer thing thou bindest. &c. So that where nothing is excepted, they thinke they may do all things. Who not only do lie most loudly and manifestly, but also (which passeth all impudencie) do vaunt and commend their liberalitie before y^e people to bring me more in hatred, making men falsly to beleue that they offered frendship and money vnto me: Whereas these tyrantes of Rome, if they had had any trueth, goodnesse, or godlinesse in them, shoulde haue taken some better hede in their doing and speaking, so that no aduersarye might conceiue any suspition of euil against them. But now if there were no other matter els to bring this Bull out of credite, onely this grosse & foolish lie were sufficient to declare how light, vaine, and false this Bul is. What? would Rome (thinke yee) offer money to mee? And how then commeth thys, which I knowe to be moste certaine, that out of the banke (as they call it) two or three hūdreth crownes were assigned in Germanye to be disposed and geuen to ruffians and catchpoles,* to murder Luther: for these be the reasons & arguments, whereby nowe fighteth, raigneth and triumpheth the holy Apostolicke sea, the mistres of faith & mother of al churches, y^t which long since should haue bene prooued to be the very •eate of Antichrist, and manifold waies hereticall, if shee had fought wyth the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God: whereof she her self is nothing ignorant, & therefore because she would not be brought to that issue, thus shee fareth and taketh on like as she were madde, in the Church of Christ, confounding and consuming all thinges wyth warres,* murders, bloudshed, death, and destruction, and yet for all thys they must nedes be counted most holy fathers in God, & vicars of Christ, and Pastors of his flocke.

But goe to (that I may also dally with them a while) let them, yet send me the money they speake of: for as touching their promise & safeconduct (because I will not ouercharge them) that I gladly resigne to them againe, seeing I haue no great nede therof, so that y^e moni may come to my hāds. But heere I must require so muche as may suffice mee: to wit, that I may be furnished with fifty thousand footemen, and ten thousande horsemen, to conducte me safe to Rome, and so for any other promise of safe conduct I wil not trouble them. And this I requier, because of the daunger that is in Rome,* whych deuoureth vp her inhabitauntes, neyther keepeth, nor euer did keepe promise wyth any: Where these most holy fathers do slay their beloued children in the charitie of God, and brethren destroy their brethren to doe seruice to Christe, as the manner is and stile of Rome. In the meane time I will keepe my selfe free and sa•• from the Citation of this most reuerend Bull. O ye miserable varlets, which are so cōfounded with the truth and with your own conscience, that neither ye can lie handsomely, neither dare ye speake the truth, and yet neither ca ye so kepe your selues quiet, to your perpetuall ignominie and confusion.

Furthermore, here in this Bull is brought in a straunge fashion of stile, not heard of before. For where Augustine would haue sayd, that he would not beleue the Gospel, except he had ben moued by the authority of the church, now commeth in this goodly Bull, and maketh this Catholicke church to be a few reuerent Cardinals his brethren, & priours of regular orders, Masters of Diuinitie and doctors of the law, out of whose counsell the sayd Bull boasteth her selfe to be borne and brought forth, a blessed babe (forsooth) of such an vniuersall Church, O happy trauell (no dout) of this Catholike church, neuer seene nor heard of before,* and such as Augustine the valiant impugner of sectes, if he did see, would not doubt to call it the Sinagogue of the deuill. See therefore the madnesse of their Papistes. The vniuersall Church is a •ewe Cardinals, Priours and Doctours, scarsly perhaps 20. persons in all, when also it is possible enough that neuer one of them all is the mēber of one chappel or altare. And whereas the Church is the communion of Saintes, as we say in the Creede, out of this communion of saintes, that is, out of this vniuersal church, all they then must needes be excluded, whosoever be not in the nōber of these 20. persons:*, and so whatsoever these holye men doe thinke or iudge, by and by the vniuersal Church must needes holde and beleue the same, albeit they be liers, heretikes, and Antichristes, thinking and iudging nothing but that which is abhominable.

Would there euer any man thinke such doltishnesse and madnes to be in Rome? Is there any braine in these mens heads thinke ye, or hart in their bodies?, Austen speaketh of the church dispersed throughe the whole worlde, confessing the gospel with one consent. Neither would God that any booke els should be receiued with such cōsent of the whole world as the holy scripture (as the sayd Augustine in hys confessions affirmeth) least by the receiuing of other bokes,, schismes might take occasion to rise, according as the wicked Sea of Rome hath long sought by her decrees, & hath, for a great part, brought the same to passe already. But yet the vniuersall Church did neuer agree thereto. For in the East, West, & South ther haue ben christians, which being content only with y^e gospel, haue not regarded how Rome hath gone about of a particular church, to make her self an vniuersal church, & accuseth other churches as schismatical whē as she hath cut of her selfe from the vniuersal Church, and striueth in vaine to draw the whole vniuersall church to her, being the mother and fountaine of all schismes, and all by the meanes of this tyrannie.

Let no man therefore euer thinke that this true Catholike Church aforesaide,*, will beleue or maintaine those things which this detestable Bull heere pratleth, when as neyther that which is the very true Church of Rome, in'deede doth her selfe so thinke, neither taketh that by and by to be Catholike, whatsoever is knowen to proceede from y^e Church of Rome. For as I saide, there is no booke which shall be called Catholike heereafter, as neither it hath bene heretofore, besides onely the holy scripture. For the church of Rome it may suffice to glory her selfe to be a little parcell or peece of the vniuersal church, and so let her vexe her selfe onely with her owne decrees.

Neither let any man thinke this to be the Bull of the catholike church, but rather to proceede out of the Court of Rome. For such wisdom and religion may well beseeme that seate of Sathan, whiche seeketh to be counted for the whole vniuersall Church, and obtrudeth her foolish and wicked Bulles most arrogantly and vainely to the whole world in y^e steade of sincere catholike doctrine., Whose pride and presumption hath growne so farre, that shee trustinge vpon her owne power, without al learning and holines of life, taketh vpon her to prescribe lawes to al men of al their doings and sayings,, as though for dominion only and loftines of spirit, she were to be counted the house and church of Christ, where as by this meanes Sathan also the prince of the worlde, or the Turke might be counted the Church of Christ. Again, neither the Monarchies of the Gentiles can abide mighty Princes to raigne ouer them w^tout wisdom and goodnes. Furthermore,* in the Church the spirituall man onely iudgeth al things, & is iudged of no man, and not the Pope alone or the Court of Rome, vnlesse they be spirituall.

But against all this theyr rashe presumption, I boldly set the inuincible Champion of the Church S. Paule, who 1. Cor. 14. sayeth: If anye thinge be reueiled to an other that sitteth by, lette the firste manne holde hys peace. Heere haue yee Page 1288 plainly that Pope or any other elder, what so euer he be, ought to kepe silēce, if any thyng be reueiled to other in the Church, that is inferiour. I therefore vpon hys authoritie condemning the presumptuous proceeding of this swelling Bull, do confidently take vpon me to defende the Articles, caring nothing for the bare condemnation of any persone, yea of the Pope him selfe with hys whole Church, vnlesse he shall enforme me by the Scriptures. Whereof the firste Article is this.

The Article.

*It is an hereticall sentence, and also common to saye, that Sacraments of the new lawe doe geue grace to them, which haue no obstacle in themselues to the contrary.

The Answer.

I acknowledge this Article to be mine, and I aske of you good maisters Respectiuiestes, which make these Articles respectiuey,* some to be hereticall, some erroneous, some slaunderous, &c. whether respecteth thys article I pray you? To heresie, to error, to slaunder and offence? Or els whether respected you in condemning the same? To the holy scripture? to the holy fathers? to faith? to y^e church? To which of these I beseech you tell me. Neither do I here put you to the labour of proouing, but onely require you to shew your iudgement what you thinke, that I may know wherein I say amisse. Will you that I should tell you (you babish in•antes and noddies) whether this Article respecteth? I will. This article hath ij. respects. Whereof the one respecteth the Papists the condemners heereof, amongste whome it respecteth some to be mules, some to be horses, which haue no vnderstanding and be voide of al sence, and yet notwithstanding they will nedes condemne al things. An other respect it hath to the holy Scripture, which saith. Rom. 14. What so euer is not of faith, is sinne. Whereupon consequently it followeth that the Sacraments or the new law can geue no grace to the vnbeleeuers (for so muche as the sinne of infidelitie is the greatest obstacle) but onely to the beleeuers. For onely faith putteth no obstacle: all other things be obstacles, although they put not the same obstacles which the Sophisters vnderstande, meaning onely of the actuall purpose of externall sinne. I confesse therefore this article not only to be mine, but also to be the article of the Catholike and Christian veritie: and the Bull whych confesseth the same, to be twise heretical, impious, and blasphemous, with all them which folow the same. Who litle regarding the sinne of incredulitie, foolishly and madly doe holde that the obstacle is taken away, if a man cease from suming, although the vnbeleuer can thinke no good thyng. But these things I haue discussed more at large in my bookes, and wil more discusse if those prating Romanists dare at any time prooue their opinion and confute mine.

The 2. Article.

To denie that sinne remaineth in a childe after his Baptisme, is as much as to tread downe Christ & Paul together vnder fote.

The Answer.

I wold also require of them to shew the cause why this article is condemned, if they were not so blinded in theyr fantasticall respects, that they are not able to perceiue why they would haue this article condemned. And yet I cānot tell whether it be hereticall or erroneous. And no maruel, when as the condemners themselues cannot tell mee. I hold therfore this article also by the Apostle. Rom. 7. I my selfe in my minde do serue the law of God, and in my flesh the lawe of sinne. Heere the Apostle confesseth plainely of himselfe, that in his flesh he serueth sinne. And also 1. Cor. 1. Christ is made to vs of God our righteousnesse, our wisdom, sanctification and redemption. And how then doeth he sanctified them that be sanctified already, vnlesse it be as the Apoc. sayeth: He that is holy, let him be holy stil? To be sanctified,* is as much as to be purged frō sinne. But what haue these our Respectiusts to do with the apostle Paule, seeing they are the whole vniuersall Church,* by whose authoritie Paule either standeth or falleth, being but a member onely and a parte of the church.* The Lorde rebuke thee Sathan, and these thy Sathanicall papists.

The 3. Article.

The originall roote of sinne, although no actuall sinne do followe, stoppeth the soule departing out of the body, from entrance into heauen.*

The Answer.

As touching this matter, I neuer defined any thing hetherto, but largely & probably I haue disputed hereof, neither yet to this day am I fully certain what is done w^t such a •oule. But our papists more blind then bussardes, when they are nothing able to perceiue what cause thys Article hath worthely to be condēned, yet dare they take vpon thē to pronounce that which the whole vniuersal church is ignorant of.* I yet notw^tstanding contemning this folish and fond condemnation aforsaid, doe holde this article probably to be true. For seing this original roote which I speake of, is truly sin, as I haue proued. Rom. 7. & Gal. 5. and seing that sin letteth a man from entring into heauen, as it is written: No polluted thing shal enter: I suppose therefore that originall sinne wythholdeth a man from entring into heauen. Nether do I any thing at al esteeme the fantasticall dreames of them, whereby they extenuating original sinne, doe call it only the paine of sinne, and imperfections, plainly against the manifest scriptures, whiche call it sin and teach the same to be cured by grace, which is the me|dicine of true, and not of fained sinne.

The 4. Article.*

The imperfect charity of a man departing, necessarily carieth with it great feare, which of it selfe is enough to make the pain of Purgatorie, and letteth the entrance into the kingdome of heauen.

The Answer.

This foloweth of the other going before, which in lyke maner I did not determinately affirm, although very probably I do yet holde the same, asking before a dispensation after mine owne arbitrement, euen in defiance of the Bul, which is not able to bringe foorth any other probation but this: We are the hiest powers in the Church, yea we are the church it selfe. Ergo, we are the best learned, most holiest, ful of the holy Ghost which cannot erre, although we stink like a filthy puddle to the whole worlde, polluted with all kind of sinnes, and drowned in ignorāce. But all these reasons preuaile nothing with me: peradventure they may w^t them, which feare least if my sentence should preuaile, then purgatory should be taken out of the Popes hands, & then priests and religious men hauing lost their gainful offices of vexing (of releasing I wold haue said) of the dead,* should be pinched by the bellies and brought to penurye. It was time therefore for their greedy auarice here to wake & looke about, and not to suffer these their friuolous opinions, but yet very gainefull, to be ouercome with truth, and so to be ouerthrowen.

The 5. article.*

Where they say penance standeth of three partes, to wit, contrition, confession, and satisfaction it is not founded in holy scripture, nor in ancient, holy, and christian Doctours.

The aunswere.

This article, in what respect it is condemned, I do right well perceauē: For the respect thereof is to greedye couetousnesse, and therefore I know that the probation therof hath the like respectē, which is this: if this article wer true then men would geue nothing for satisfactiō and indulgences, neither should we haue any more wherewith to vexē them with confessiōs, cases reserued, restricted, or ampliāted for our gayne, and so should we become beggars, and gods seruice shoulde be minished in Uigils and Masses. But it is wicked that Gods seruice shoulde be minished: therfore Luther is an hereticke: This consequent holdeth a respectu Bullae ad Papistas. 1. From the Bull to the papists and contrariwise.

I beseech thee by the Lord Iesus, whatsoever graue & learned reader shalt read these thinges, that thou wilt pardon this my leuitie, and (as it may seeme) my childishnes. For thou seest how I haue to do with such mē as be twise children, and yet do brag themselues to be peeres and prin^cipall pillars of all men. I assure you, I know it most certaynly to be true, that there be many and great gouernors of people, whiche this so ridiculous and foolish reason aboue recited, hath moued to y^e condemnation of my books. Unlesse I perceiued (with teares I speake it) the anger of God sharpe and fierce agaynst vs, in bringing vs vnder subiēction of such effeminate children, and such dregs of the earth, and vile refuse of al other people of the whole world it would make •e to burst for very grieve and sorrow.

My sentence is, and hath bene this, that that satisfaction whiche the keyes are able to dispenche withall, standeth not by the law of God. For if it did, then could it not be dispensed with all by the keyes. If these Bull founders doe charg me with any other thing besides in this article, they do nothing els but as they are wont to do. For what matter or marueile is it if Antichrist do lye?

The 6. article.

Contrition whiche is gotten by examining,* remembryng and detesting our sinnes, whereby a man calleth to mynde hys yeares past in the bitternes of his soule, in pondring the greatnes, the multitude and filthines of his sinnes, the loosing of eternall blisse, and purchasing of eternall damnation: this contrition maketh an hypocrite, yea rather a manne to be more a sinner.

The Answer.

O the incredible blindnes and brutishnes of these Romish bulles. This Article is truely mine, & very christian, Page 1289 which I will not suffer to be wrested from mee, for all the Popes and papists in the world.* For thys I meant by that doctrine, that repentaunce is of no force, vnlesse it be done in faithe and charitie, whiche thinge they also teache them selues, but that they do not knowe nor teach, neither what faith nor charitie is. And therefore in condemning my doctrine, they condemne also their owne, foolishly repugnyng against themselues in their owne cōtradiction. I say therfore that he which teacheth repentaunce in such wise & maner, that he hath not a greater regard to the promised mercye of God and faith in the same, then to this afflicting and vexing of the minde, he teacheth the repentaunce of Iudas Iscariot, he is pestilent, a deuill to mens soules, and a tormentor of consciences. Read the bookes of those sophisters, where they wryte of repentaunce, and thou shalt see there no mētion made eyther of promise or faith. For these liuely parts of repētance, they cleane omitte, & onely do vexe mē with these dead contritions. But heereof we haue, and wil hereafter entreat more at large.

But what should I here stand vpon euery Article, seeing my bookes be abroad, wherein I haue geuen a reason of all sufficiently, and more woulde haue done, if mine aduersaries also had brought to light theirs.* For what folishnesse is this, that they thinke to answere me with thys one saying, that they count all my sayings as damned, wheras I did wryte to this ende onely, that they shoulde acknowledge their errorrs, wherewith they haue so long bewitched the people of God. Neither did I looke that I should be condemned, which vnderstanding & knowing the same right wel, haue iustified those things which they haue condemned before with sufficient authoritie, bothe of scripture and reason. Neither looked I that they should tel me what they thought (for I knew all that well enough) but that I sought of them was to knowe whether they thought right therin or not. Here looked I to be taught, and behold, none of them all durst once put foorth his head. Wherefore I see these asses nothing to vnderstand either the things that I say, or yet themselues. But they be suche blinde bussardes, that they perceiue not what it is that I seeke in my bookes. For they dreame that I haue suche an opinion of them, as though they had the truthe of their side, when there is nothing that I lesse thinke to be true. For I foreseeing that they had condemned al these things before, came foorth and shewed my selfe, as one not to be condemned, but as already condemned of them, to accuse their condemnation to be wicked, hereticall, and blasphemous, and so openly to denounce them as heretikes and erroneous, vnles they shewed some better reason and ground of their doings & doctrine: where as they on the other side, like foolish minstrels harping all on one string, haue nothing else in their mouthes,* but we condemne that we haue condemned, proouing after a newe kinde of Logike, the same thing by it selfe. O most idiote huddypeaks, and blockish condemners, where is the saying of Peter? Be alwayes ready to rēder a count of that faith and hope which is in you.

Wherefore seeing these ignorant Papists, being thus confounded, doe so flie away, from the face of the manifest veritie, that they dare not once open their mouthes in defence of themselues, or of their cause, and haue blasted oute with much ado this timerous Bul of theirs: I being comforted with the flight of these mine aduersaries, do account this theyr dastardly damnation in sted of full allowing and iustifying of my cause, and so rebounde againe theyr owne damnation vppon their owne heads, for howe coulde they more condemne themselues, then whiles they, (fearing to be founde themselues culpable of heresie, if they shoulde be driuen to geue account of their doctrine) do flie to this miserable and desperate refuge, willingly to shutte their eyes and stop their eares, and to say, I will not, I damne thee, I heare thee not, I allow thee not. If I should haue plaid any such mad part, how would they (I pray you) haue triumphed against me? This dastardly feare declareth what cowardes they are.

Wherefore, not to burden the reader with any tedious prolixitie of matter in prosecuting euery Article, I heere protest in these presents, that I * confesse all these thinges here condemned by this miserable Bull, for pure, clear and Catholike doctrine: whereof I haue sufficiently geuen accompt in my bookes which be extant abroad.

Furthermore, I wil also that the sayd my bokes being extant abroad, shalbe taken as a publike accusation against these wicked Sophisters & seducers of the people of God: so that vnlesse they shall geue a count of their doctrine, and shall conuicte me with good grounde of Scripture, I doe here as muche as in me lieth, denounce thē as guiltie of errour, heresie, and sacriledge, admonishing, desiring, and in the Lorde exhorting all them which truely confesse Christ, that they will beware and take heede of their pestiferous doctrine, and not to dout, but that the true Antichrist raigeth by them in the world amongst vs.

And if any shal contemne thys my brotherly admonition, lette him knowe that I am pure and cleane from hys bloud, & excused frō the laste iudgement of Christe. For I haue left nothing vndone, whiche Christian charitie dyd binde me to doe.

Finally, if there be no other way whereby I may resist these babling and trifeling condemners, the vttermost and last which I haue, I will geue and bestow in the quarrell, that is, this life and bloude of mine. For better it were for me a thousande times to be slaine, then to reuoke one sillable of these Articles which they haue condemned. And now as they doe curse and excommunicate me for their damnable heresie, so I againe likewise doe curse and excommunicate them for the holy veritie of God. Christ which is only the Iudge of all, iudge and determine this matter betwene vs, whether of these two excommunications, hys or mine shall stande and preuaile before him. Amen.

In storying the life of Luther, * before pag. 849. it was declared, how the sayd Luther in the beginning, first being reiecte of the Cardinall Caietan, appealed from y^e cardinall vnto the Pope. When that would not serue, neither could not any tollerable submission of Luther to y^e pope be receiued, but that the P. with his Cardinals, contrary to all equity and conscience, wold nedes procede against him, and against the expresse truth of Gods word, thinking by meere authoritie to beare downe the veritie as he had vsed before to do. Luther folowing the iustnes of his cause, * was then compelled to appeale from the Pope to the next generall councell, and so did, as before you may read, pag. 812. Which was 2. yeares before the Popes Bull agaynst Luther came out. The tenour of which appellation before omitted, I thought here to exhibite, wherby the reader considering the great change of religion and state of the church which since hath ensued, may also perceiue y^e true originall cause and occasion, howe it first began, by what order & degrees it after encreased, what humility and submission first on Luthers part was shewed, and again what insolencie, wrong, and violence on the Popes part was declared. And further, where Pope Leo in his Bull aboue prefixed, seemeth to pretend certaine conditions of fauour, charity, and money offred to Luther in the beginning, how false & vain that is, by this present appeale may appeare. The copie wherof, as it was drawn by the publike notarie and exhibited, is this as in forme here followeth.

The tenour and forme of the Appeale of Martine Luther, from Pope Leo to the next generall Councill.

IN nomine Domini, Amen.* Anno a natiuitate eiusdem .1518. indictione sexta, die vero solis vigesima octaua mensis Nouemb. Pontificatus sanctissimi in Christo patris & Domini nostri, Domini Leonis, diuina prouidentia Papae, decimi, anno sexto in mea Notarij publici testium{que} infra scriptorum ad hoc. specialiter vocatorum & rogatorum praesentia constitutus, &c.

The effect of the sayd Appeale of Luther, in English.

THE effect of the appeale aforesayde, is this: That for somuche as the libertie of appealing is prouided for a remedie to relieue the oppressed from iniurie and violence of the superiour, it was therefore lawful for Martine Luther so to do, especially being manifold waies iniured and molested by the See of Rome, and other the Popes confederates, as hee in the sayde appeale declareth. For at firste whereas he modestly disputing of the errors and abuses of the Popes pardons, did somewhat withstand the impudēt rauens and blasphemies of them that come about with the Popes pardons to poll and rob the people, he was therefore openly railed vpon, and defamed by them in their publike sermones to be an heretike, and consequently vpon the same accused to Pope Leo for an heretike, by Marius the Popes Proctor and others.

Then was obtained of the Pope a commission to cite vp the sayde Luther to appeare at Rome before the Cardinales, by Hieronymus, and Syluester Prieras, hys mortall ennemies, where as he could by no way appeare wythout manifest danger of his life, both by the way, and also in the citie of Rome.

For the consideration whereof, Duke Ih. Fridericke, Prince Electour, and the Lantgraue entreated for hym Page 1290 to haue his cause indifferently to be heard, and to be committed to two parties that were equall, and not partiall: yet notwithstanding the sute of these princes, and the contrary labour of the Cardinals, whiche were his capitall aduersaries,* so preuailed at Rome, that the cause of Luther was still detained in their owne handes, and contrary to all indifferencie, was committed to the hearing of the Popes Legate then in Germanie, called Cardinalis Sancti Sixti. Who being no lesse enemy against Luther, then the other, and notwithstanding that Luther obediently appeared at his call, and with humble protestation submitted himselfe to be aunswered by the Scriptures, and referred himselfe to the iudgement of the Sea of Rome, and of four Uniuersities, to witte, Basill, Friburge, Louane, and Paris yet contrary to all equitie, shewing forth no Scripture nor reason, reiecting his gentle protestation, submission, and honest offer, with all other his requests and sutes, he would needes forthwith haue him to reuoke his errorrs, threatning and menasing him most cruelly, and commanded him no more to come in his sight.

Whereupon Luther being thus proudly reiected of the Cardinall,* made his appeale from the sayde Cardinall to Pope Leo being better informed.

This appellation also being contemned of the Pope, who would neither come to any agreement, nor take any reasonable condition, nor shew Luther his errors by the scripture, nor yet referre the matter by learning to be decided, but would needes perforce proceede against him by meere authoritie, and oppression at Rome, Luther then seeing there was no other refuge or remedie for his owne defence, and seeing moreouer the truth of Gods worde to lie vnder foote by might and authoritie oppressed, so that none durst almost confesse the same,* and that the poore flock was so misled in errors and vaine opinions to the seduction of their soules, for these and other such causes, he being necessarily thereunto compelled, commensed thys Appeale from the Pope misinformed to the nexte generall Councell that should be, calling for the helpe of the publick notarie, and testimonie also of sufficient witnesses requisite in that behalfe accordingly.

¶The death of K. Henry the viij. with the maner thereof.

AND thus closing vp this eight booke with the death of King Henry the 8. I will now (the Lorde Christ assisting me with his grace) proceede next to the time & reigne of King Edward his sonne,* after that first I shall intermitte a few wordes touching the death of the sayde Kyng Henry his father, and the maner of the same. Who after long languishing, infirmitie growing more and more vppon him, lay from S. Steuens day (as is aboue mentioned) to the latter end of Ianuary. His Phisicians at length perceiuing that he would away:* and yet not daring to discourage him with death, for feare of the Act past before in Parliamente, that none shoulde speake anye thing of the Kings death (the Act being made onely for Southsayers and talkers of prophesies) moued them that were about the King to put him in remembrance of his mortall state and fatall infirmitie. Which when the rest were in dread to do, M. Deny who was specially attendant vpon hym, boldly comming to the King: told him what case he was in, to mans iudgement not like to liue, and therefore exhorted him to prepare himselfe to death, calling himselfe to remembrance of his former life, and to call vpon God in Christ betime for grace and mercy, as becommeth euery good Christian man to do.

Although the K. was loth to heare any mētion of death, yet perceiuing the same to rise vpon the iudgement of hys Phisicians and feeling his owne weakenes, he disposed himselfe more quietly to harken to the wordes of his exhortation, and to consider his life past. Which although he much accused, yet (said he) is the mercy of Christ able to pardon me all my sinnes, though they were greater then they be. M. Deny being glad to heare him thus speake, required to know his pleasure, whether he would haue any learned man sent for to conferre withall, and to open hys mind vnto.* To whome the King aunswered againe, that if he had any, he would haue D. Cranmer, who was then lying at Croydon. And therefore M. Denye asking the King whether he woulde haue him sente for, I will first said the King take a little sleepe, and then as I feele my selfe, I will aduise vpon the matter.

After an houre or two, the King awaking and feeling feeblenes to encrease vpon him, commanded D. Cranmer to be sent for: but before he could come, y^e king was speechles, and almost senseles. Notwithstanding perceiuing D. Cranmer to be come, he reaching his hande to D. Cranmer, did hold him fast, but could vtter no word vnto hym, and scarce was able to make any signe. Then the Archbyshop exhorting him to put his trust in Christ, and to call vpon his mercy, desired him, though he could not speake, yet to geue some token with his eyes, or with hand, as he trusted in the Lord. Then the King holding him with his hand, did wring his hand in his, as hard as he could, and so shortly after departed, after he had reigned in this land the terme of 37. yeares and 9. monethes, leauing behinde him three children, Edward, Mary, and Elizabeth.

Moreouer, for so much as mention is inserted in thys place of the good inclination of King Henry in his latter dayes to the reformation of religion,* by the occasion hereof it commeth also to minde, somewhat likewise to adde by way of appendix touching the talke betweene the Archbishop of Canterbury Thomas Cranmer, and the Duke of Suffolke Charles Branden, as cōcerning the Kings purpose and intent conceaued against the Bishop of Winchester Steuen Gardiner, in that he could neuer allowe any reformation in religion in this realme, and namely beeing offended with this that men should vse in their talke, The Lord, as well as our Lord. The sayd Duke sayd vnto the sayd Archbyshop: We of the Counsell had him once at a good lift, and should well haue dispatched him from his authoritie, if the Kings Maiestie our Maister had stayed himselfe from admitting him to his presence, as then hys highnes was content that we should thoroughly haue sifted and tried him, It was my Lord (quoth the Duke to the Archbishop) at that time, when Gardiner his Secretarie was attached and suffred for defending the Popes authoritie. For then I and certaine of the Counsell hauing conference with the Kings Maiestie for that matter, his highnesse was fully perswaded that the Bishops Secretarie being in such speciall fauour with his Maister, would neuer stande so stiffe in defence of the Bishop of Romes vsurped power and authoritie,* without his said maisters both aduise, knowledge, and perswasion. For already, quoth the King, he played but a homely part with me, when he was Ambassadour to the Pope concerning my cause of diuorce. And therefore (quoth the King to me) send for him my Lord incontinently, and by assistance of two or three moe of the Counsell whome you thinke good, let him be committed to the Tower, to aunswere to suche thynges as may bee obiected agaynst hym. Thys communicatiō was in y^e euening: so that we purposed to haue executed the kinges pleasure and commaundement y^e next morning. How beit our talke was not so secrete, but that some of his friendes of the priuy chamber then, suspecting the matter (where he had many frends) sent him word ther of. Who incontinently repayred to the kings presence,* and finding some matter to minister vnto y^e king, his highnesse sayd to the bish. We doe marueile that your secretary hath thus notoriously offended agaynst vs & our lawes. It is surely though: that you are not all cleare in this offēce, but that you are of the same opinion with him, & therefore my Lord be playne with me,* and let me know if you be y^e way infected or no: If you will tell me the trueth, I will rather pardon the fault, but if you halt or dissemble with me, looke for no fauour at my hand.

With this monition Winchester fell downe vppon hys knees & besought his maiesty of mercy and pardon,* manifestly confessing y^t he of long time had bene of that opinion w^t his sayd secretary: and there bewayling himselfe, promised from that day forward to reform hys opinion, & become a new man. Well (quoth y^e king) this way you haue of me, that which otherwise you should neuer haue obtayned. I am content to remitte all thinges past and pardon you vpon your amendment.

The next morning I had worde how the matter was handled, whereupon I came to his highnes & sayde: Your Maiestie hath preuented our commission, whiche I and other had from your grace concerning my Lord of Winchesters cōmitting to the tower. Wot you what quoth the K.? hee hath confessed himselfe as giltie in this matter as hys man,* and hath with muche sorrowe & pensiuenes sued for my pardon: And you know what my nature and custome hath bene in such matters, euermore to pardon them that will not dissemble but confesse their fault.

Thus wil•ly and politicke he got himselfe out of our hands. But if I had suspected this, I would haue had him in the tower ouer night and stopped his iourney to y^e court. Well sayd my Lord of Caunterbury hee was euermore to good for you all.

Moreouer as touching this foresaid bishop of Winchester for so much as he in king Edwardes tyme bragged so much of his old mayster of famous memory king Henr. 8. to y^e entent y^t the glorious vanitie of this bishop, & of all other like vnto him, more notoriously may appeare to al mē Page 1291 heere is to be noted by the testification as well of mayster Deny, as also of Sir Henry Neuell, who were there present witnesses of the matter, whose record is this, that king Henry before the time of his sicknes, taking his horse vpon the tarras at Windsore to ride out on hauking, sawe standing before him the Lorde Wrythesley Lord Chancelour with diuers other Counsellours, and amōgst them the Bishop of Winchester. Whereupon he called the Lorde Chancelour and sayd: * Did not I commaund you he shuld come no more amongst you (meaning the Bishop?) Wherunto the Lorde Chauncellour aunswered, that his comming was to bring his Maiestie word of a beneuolence geuen vnto him by the Cleargie. Whereat the King sayd: Ah, let him come hether, and so he did his message, and the King went straight away.

Item, another time the King immediatly after his repaire to London, fell sicke, and caused diuers times hys whole Counsell to come vnto him about his will, and other his graue affaires: * At what time, the Bishop also would come vp with them into the vtter priuie Chamber, and there remayne vntill the Counsell came from the King, and then go downe with them agayne, to the ende (as then was thought) to blind the world withall.

Furthermore, as the King grewe more in sickenes, he considering vpon his will and testament made before at his going ouer to Bulleyn, willed the same to be drawne out againe with leauing out and excluding the Byshop of Winchester by name from amongst his Executors. Which being to him no small corsey, and a cutting off of all theyr purposes, * a way was found, that Sir Anthony Browne a principall pillar of Winchesters side, pretending vnto the King, as though by the negligence of the writer the Byshops name had bene left out of the Kings will, kneeled downe to the Kings Maiestie, * lying in his bed, and sayd: My Lord of Winchester I thinke by negligence is left out of your Maiesties wil, who hath done your highnes most paynefull, long, and notable seruice, and one without whome the rest shall not be able to ouercome your greate and weighty affaires committed vnto them.

Hold your peace (quoth the King) I remembred hym well inough, and of good purpose haue left him out. For surely, if he were in my testamēt, and one of you, he would cumber you all, and you should neuer rule him, he is of so troublesome a nature. Mary, quoth the King, I my selfe could vse him, and rule him to all maner of purposes, as seemed good to me, * but so shall you neuer do, and therefore talke no more of him to me in this behalfe. Syr Anthony Browne perceiuing the king somewhat stiffe heerein, gaue place to the Kings words at that time. Howbeit, seeking farther occasion vpō more perswasions put into his head, tooke in hand once againe to moue the King to haue the Byshop one of his Executors. When the King perceyued that this instant sute would not cease: haue you not yet done (quoth the King) to molest me in this matter? If you wil not cease farther to trouble me, by the faith that I owe vnto God, I will surely dispatch thee out of my will also, and therefore let vs heare no more of this matter. All thys Sir Anthony Deny was heard to report to the Archbyshop of Cant. Thom. Cranmer,* of the sayd Archbyshops Secretary who is yet aliue, and witnes to the same.

And thus much touching the end of King Henry, who if he had continued a few moneths longer (all those obites and Masses, whiche appeare in his will made before hee went to Bulleyne notwithstanding) most certayne it is, & to be signified to all posteritie, that his full purpose was to haue repurged the estate of the Church, & to haue gone through with the same,* so that he would not haue left one masse in all England. For the more certayne intelligence whereof, two things I haue to leade me. The one is, the assured report and testimonie of Tho. Cranmer, Archbyshop of Caunterbury, hearing the King declare the same out of his owne mouth, both to himselfe, & to Mounsieur de Annebault Lord Admirall the French Ambassadour, in the moneth of August a little before his death, as aboue may appeare more at large,* page. 1240. The other cause which leadeth me thereunto, is also of equall credite, grouded vpon the declaration of the Kings owne mouth after that time, more neare to his death, vnto Bruno Ambassadour of Iohn Fridericke, Duke of Saxonie. Unto the which Ambassadour of Saxony, the King gaue this aunswere openly, that if the quarrell of the Duke of Saxony were nothing else against the Emperour but for religion,* he should stand to it strongly, and he would take his part, willing him not to doubt nor feare, and so with this aunswere dismissed the Ambassadour vnto the Duke openly in the hearing of these foure sufficient witnesses, the L. Scym•r Earle of Harforde, Lorde Lisley then Admirall, the Earle of Bedford Lorde Priuy Seale, and Lorde Paget. But the secret working of Gods holy prouidence, whyche disposeth all things after his own wisdom and purpose, thought it good rather by taking the King away, to reserue the accomplishmēt of this reformation of his church, to the peaceable time of his sonne Edward, and Elizabeth his daughter, whose handes were yet vndefiled wyth any bloud, and life vnspotted with any violence, or crueltie.

And thus to finish this booke, I thought heere to close vp King Henries raigne. But because a little vacant space of empty paper remayneth behinde needefull to be filled vp, to employ therefore and to replenishe the same wyth some matter or other, I thought to annexe heere vnto one story which hapned in this King Henries raigne. Which albeit it serueth not to the purpose of this our matter now in hand, yet neuerthesse to supply the roome it may stand in some place, either to refreshe the traueiled minde of the Reader wearied with other stories, or else to disclose the detestable impietie of these counterfeite sectes of Monkes and Friers, who vnder the hipocriticall visour of pretensed Religion, haue so long seduced and deceiued the world. Although the deceitfull parts and practises of these fantastical orders be so many, and in all places so notorious, that they are not able to be expressed yet amongst many one you shall heare that chaunced in this Kings dayes in the Citie of Orleance in Fraunce, by the Gray Friers, about the yeare of our Lord. 1534. The story is this.

¶A tragicall story of certayne Friers in Fraunce in the City of Orleance. an. 1534.

THE Maiors wife of the City of Orleance prouided in her will to be buried without any pompe or solemnity.* For when any departeth there, in some places the Belmen are hyred to goe about the City, and in places most frequēted to assemble the people with the sound of the bel, & there to declare the names and y^e titles of those parties deceased, also where and whē they shal be buried,* exhorting the people to pray for them. And when the Coarse is caried forth, the most part of the begging friers go withall to y^e church, with many torches and tapers caried before them, and the more pompe & solemnity is vsed, the more is y^e concourse of people. But this woman (as I said) would haue none of all this geare done for her. Wherefore her husband which loued her well, followed her mind heerein, and gaue vnto these greedy cormorāts the friers, which waiting for their pray (in whose Church she was buried besides her father and her grandfather) sixe crownes for a reward: whereas they gaped for a great deale more. And afterward when he cut downe a wood and solde it, the friers crauing to haue part thereof freely and without money, he denied them, this tooke they wonderfull greeuously, and where as they loued him not before, they deuised now a way to be reuenged, saying that his wife was damned euerlastingly.

The workers of this Tragedy were Colyman, and Steuen of Arras both doctors of Diuinitie: and the first in deede was a Coniurer, and had all his trinkets and furniture concerning such matters, in a readines, and they vsed the matter thus. They set a yong man which was a Nouice aboue ouer the vaute of the Church, and when they came to mumble vp their mattins at midnight after their accustomed maner, he made a wonderfull noyse and shrieking aloft. Then went this Colyman to crossing and coniuring, but the other aboue would not speake. Beeing charged to make a signe to declare if he were a dumme spirite, he russeled and made a noyse agayne, and that was the signe and token.

When they had layd this foundation, they went to certayne of the chiefest in all the Citie, and suche as fauoured them most, and told them what an heauie case was chanced, yet did they not vtter what it was, but entreated them to take the paines to come to their seruice at nighe. When they were come, and the seruice was begon, he that was alofte, made a greate noyse. Being demaunded what he woulde, and what he was, he signified that he might not speake,* then was he commaunded to answeere to their interrogatories by signes and tokens. Now, was there a hole made for the purpose, where by laying to his eare, he might heare and vnderstand what the Coniurer sayd vnto them. There was also a table at hand, and when anye question was asked, he strooke and beate vpon the Table, so that he might be heard beneath. Then first the Coniurer demaunded whether he were any of them that had ben buried there. After that,* reckning vp many of their names in order, whose bodies had bene buried there, at the last he named the Maiors wife. Heere he made a signe that hee was the spirit of that woman. Then he asked whether be were damned, and for what desert or offence? Whether it were for couetousnes, pride, or lechery, or not dooing the Page 1292 works of charitie, or else for this new sproong vp heresie and Lutheranisme? Moreouer, what was the cause that he made suche a noise, and was so vnquiet? Whether it were that the body beeing buried within holy grounde shoulde be digged vp againe and carryed to some other place? To all these things he aunswered by signes in lyke case as he was commaunded: whereby he affirmed, or denyed euery thyng, striking twise or thrise vppon the Table.

When he had thus signified that Luthers heresie was the cause of her damnation,* and that her body must be taken vp, the Friers desired the Citizens that were present, to beare witnes of such things as they had sene and heard, and set their hands to it in writing. But they taking aduisement least they shoulde both offende the Maior, and bring thēselues in trouble, refused to subscribe.

Notwithstanding, the Friers tooke the pixe with the hoste and the Lords body (as they call it) and all their Saints reliques, and caried them to another place, and there they sayd theyr Masses: which they are wont to do by the Popes Lawe, when a Church is suspended, and must be hallowed againe, and when the Bishops Official heard of thys, hee came thether to vnderstand the matter better, and associating to him certayne honest men, he commaunded the Frier to coniure in his presence, and woulde haue appoynted certaine to go vp to the vault, to see if any spirite did there appeare. But Steuen of Arras was sore against it, and exhorted them earnestly that they should not so do, saying that the spirit ought not to be molested. And albeit the Official did earnestly vrge them to coniure before him,* yet could they not bring them to it. In the meane time, the Maior making his frends priue what he would do, went to the King, and informed him of the whole matter. And because the Friers trusting to their immunities and priuileges, refused to come in iudgement, the King chose certaine out of the court of Parliament at Paris, to examine the matter, and gaue them full authoritie so to do. Whereupon they were caried to Paris, and constrayned to make aunswere, but they would confesse nothing. Then they were sent againe to prison, and kept apart one from another: and the Nouice was kept in Fumeus house a Senatour, and being oftentimes examined, he woulde confesse nothing, fearing least he should after be murthered of thē for slaundering theyr order. But when the iudges promised him that he should haue no harme: and should come no more in the Friers handes, he declared to them the whole matter in order, and being brought before the others, he auouched the same. But they, albeit they were conuicted, and in maner taken with the deede, yet refused they theyr iudges, and bragged of their priuiledges: but it was altogether in vayne,* for they were condemned in open iudgement, that they should be caryed againe to Orleance, and committed to prison, and afterwarde brought openly to the Cathedrall Church, and so to the place of punishment where malefactours are executed, and there should make open confession of their wickednes.

But euen at the same tyme chaunced a persecution against the Lutheranes, which was the cause that this sentence, albeit it was too gentle for so great offence, was not put in execution. For, because the name of the Lutheranes was most odious, they feared least the punishment of these men should not haue bene so much thought to be due for their offence,* as done in reproch of the order: and many thought that whatsoever should be done to them, it would be to the Lutheranes a pleasant spectacle, and cause them much to reioice.

This order of the Franciscanes was esteemed of the common people very holy: so that what tyme they were carried out of Paris, certayne women mooued wyth pitie, followed them vnto the gate of the Uniuersitie wyth many teares and sighes.

After they came to Orleance, and were bestowed in seuerall prisons, they began to boast agayne of their liberties and priuiledges, and at length, after long imprisonment, they were discharged and set at libertie without anye further punishmente. Had not these persecutions before mentioned letted the matter, the King had determined, as it was certaynely reported, to plucke downe their house, and make it euen with the ground. Ex Io. Sleid. lib. 9.

But to leaue the memorye of thys Idolatrous generation, not worthy any further to be named, let vs occupy the tyme with some better matter,* in remembring the story of a good and constant Martir of the Lorde before ouerpast, whiche suffered in Kent for the worde of God before Luthers time, about the second yeare of this kings raigne, as heere in story followeth.

John Browne a blessed Martyr of Christ Iesus burned at Ashford by Archbishop Warrham, and Doct. Fisher Bish. of Rochester, about the 2. yeare of king Henry the 8. An. 1511.

I. Browne of Ashford

At Ashford.

Ann. 1511.

The first occasion of the trouble of this I. Brown the blessed seruaunt of God,* was by a certayne Priest: who passing downe to Graues end in the cōmon Barge (where the sayd loh. Brown was amongst diuers other passingers moe) and disdayning y^t hee so saucely shoulde sit so neare vnto him in the Barge (who belyke seemed not muche to passe vppon the Priest) began to swell in stomacke agaynst him. At length bursting forth in his priestly voyce and disdaynefull countenance, hee asked hym in this maner: Doest y^u know (sayd he) who I am? thou sittest to neare me and fittest on my clothes. No sir (sayde the other) I know not what you are. I tell thee (quoth hee) I am a priest. What sir, are you a parson or vicar,* or some ladies chapleine? No (quoth he agayne) I am a soule Priest: I sing for a soule. Doe you so sir (quoth the other?) that is well done, I pray you sir (sayd he) where find you the soule when you go to Masse? I cannot tel thee (sayd the Priest.) I pray you, where doe you leaue it sir when the Masse is done? I cannot tell thee (sayde the priest) Neither can you tell where to find it when you goe to Masse, nor where you leaue it when the Masse is done, howe can you then saue the soule, sayd he? Go thy wayes said the priest, I perceiue thou art an hereticke, and I will be euen with thee.

So at the landing,* the priest taking with him Walter More and W. More two Gentlemen and brethren, rode straightwayes to the archbishop, who thē was Wil. Warham. Wherupon the sayd Iohn Browne, within 3. dayes after, was sēt for by the archbishop. His bringers vp were Chilten of Wye bailly arraut, and one Beare of Wilseborough, with two of the bishops seruantes. Who with certayn other being appoynted for the same, came sodenly into his house vppon him,* the same day when his wife was churched, as hee was bringing in a messe of pottage to the bourd seruing his gestes: and so laying hands vpon hym, set him vpon his owne horse, and binding his feete vnder the horses belly, caryed him away to Canterbury, neither he nor his wife, nor any of his friendes knowing whether he went, nor whether he should, and there continuing the space of 40. dayes, frō Lowsōday, till Friday before Whitsonday through the cruell handling of the sayd Archb. and y^e B. of Rochest. D. Fisher, hee was so piteously intreated,* that his bare feete were set vpon the hote burning coales, to make him deny his fayth, whiche notwithstanding hee would not doe, but paciently abiding y^e payne continued in the Lordes quarrell vnremoueable. At length after al this crueltie susteined his wife yet not knowing where he was become, on Friday before Whitsonday he was sent to Ashford where he dwelt the next day there to be burned.

In the meane time,* as he was brought to the town ouer night, there to be set in the stockes, it happened as God would, that a young mayde of his house comming by and seeing her mayster, ran home and told her mistres.

Then she comming to him, and finding him in y^e stocks appoynted to be burned the next morow,* sat by him all the night long. To whome then he declared the whole story or rather tragedy how he was hādled and how his feet were burned to the bones, that he could not set them vppon the ground, by the two Bishops aforesayde (he thanked God therfore) and all to make me (sayd hee) to deny my Lorde, which I will neuer doe, for if I should deny him sayde he in this world he would deny me hereafter. And therfore I pray thee (sayd he) good Elizabeth, continue as y^u hast begon, & bring vp thy childrē vertuously in the feare of God.

And so the next day which was on Whitson euen, thys godly martyr was burned, where he standing at the stake sayd this prayer holding vp his handes as followeth.

O Lord I yeeld me to thy grace,

Graunt me mercy for my trespase,

Let neuer the fiend my soule chace,

*Lord I will bow and thou shalt beate▪

Let neuer my soule come in hell heate.

Into thy handes I commend my spirit: thou hast redeemed me O Lord of truth.

And so this blessed Martyr ended his life in peace, anno. 1511.

This story the sayd Elizabeth Browne his wife did oft times repeate to Alice her daughter, who dwelling yet in the parish of S. Pulchers, testified the narration heereof vnto me and certayne other, vppon whose credible information I haue recorded the same.*

Furthermore, it is to be noted, that the sayde Iohn Browne bare a fagot seauen yeares before this, in the dayes of King Henry the seauenth. Whose sonne also named Richard Browne for the like cause of Religion, was imprisoned at Caunterbury,* likewise in the latter tyme of Queene Mary, and should haue bene burned with two mo besides himselfe, the next day after the death of Queene Mary, but that by the proclaiming of Queene Elizabeth they escaped.

Amongst other iniunctions and letters of king Henry the eight, written and set forth for reformation of religion, he wrote one letter to Edmund Bonner for abolishing of Images, pilgrimages, shrines, and other monuments of Idolatry. Which letter being before expressed pag. 1229, we should also haue annexed to the same the letter or mandate of Bonner, directed in latin to Richard Cloney hys Somner, appertayning to the due execution therof. Which letter because we haue omitted before the defect thereof, I thought heere in this vacant space to supply. The letter written to Cloney in latin thus beginneth.

Bonnors letter to Cloney, keeper of the Colehouse, for the abolishing of Images.

EDmundus permissione Diuina Lond. Episc. Dilecto nobis in Christo Richardo Cloney literato, Apparitori, nostro generali salut. grat. & benedictionem.* Cum nos 13. die mensi• instantis Octob. circa noctem, literas serenissimi, &c.

The same in English.

FOR asmuch as the 13. day of this present, we haue receyued the letters of our soueraigne Lord, by the grace of God King of England, &c. to vs directed and conteyning in them the commaundement of his Maiestie, by vs to be executed in tenour of words which heere I send vnto you: we therefore willing and desiring according as our duty bindeth vs, to put the same in execution with all diligence possible according to the effect and tenour thereof,* do charge and straightly commaund you by the tenour heereof, in the Kings behalfe, and for the fidelitie whych we haue in you assuredly approued, that you incontinent vpon the receite heereof, do effectually warne all and singular Parsons and Vicars of this Citie of London, and of all our dioces, that they immediately vpon the sight and intimation of these present Articles and interrogatories heere vnder written, do cause diligent and effectuell inquisition thereof to be made, to witte:

Whether there be vsed or continued any superstition, hypocrisie or abuse within any their parishes or Cures, contrary to anye ordinaunce, iniunction, or commaundement geuen or set forth by the Kings Maiestie or by his authoritie.

Item, whether they haue in their Churches, or within theyr parishes, any shrines, couerings of shrines, tables of fayned myracles, pilgrimages, Images and bones resorted and offered vnto and other monuments and things wherewith the people haue bene illuded, or any offering or setting vp of lights, or candles, other then be permitted by the Kings Maiesties Iniunctions, or whether the said Iniunctions be duely obserued and kept in their Parishes or Cures, or else transgressed and broken, and in what part. And further, after the sayd Inquisition thus by them and euery of them respectiuely being made, that you do certifie vs, or our Vicare generall, what is done in the premisses, vpon the euen of Simon and Iude, or thereabout, vnder the perill thereof following. ¶The Ninth Booke containing the Actes and thinges done in the Reigne of King EDWARD the sixt.

[illustration]

NEXT after the death of K. Henry succeded king Edwarde his sonne, being of the age of 9. yeres. He began his raigne the 28. day of Ianuary, and raygned 6. yeares and 8. monethes, and 8. dayes, and deceased, ann. 1553. the 6. day of Iulye.

Of whose excellente vertues & singuler graces wrought in him by the gift of God, although nothing canne be sayd enough to his commendation: yet because the renowned same of such a worthy prince shall not vtterlye passe our story without some gratefull remembraunce, I thought in few wordes to touch some litle portion of his prayse, taken out of great heapes of matter, which might be inferred. For to stand vpon all that might be sayde of him, it would be to long: and yet to say nothing, it were to much vnkinde. If kinges and Princes which haue wisely and vertuously gouerned, haue found in all ages writers to solemnise and celebrate theyr Actes and memory, such as neuer knew them, nor were subiect vnto thē, how much thē are we English men bound not to forget our duety to K. Edward, a prince although but tender in yeres, yet for his sage and mature rypenes in witte and all Princely ornamentes, as I see but few, to whom he may not be equal,* so agayne I see not many, to whom he may not iustly be preferred.

And here to vse the example of Plutarch in comparing kings and rulers, the Latines with the Greekes together if I should seek with whom to match this noble Edward, I finde not with whom to make my match more aptly, thē with good Iosias. For as the one began his raigne at eight yeares of his age, so the other beganne at 9. Neyther were their acts and zelous proceedings in Gods cause much discrepant. For, as milde Iosias pluckt downe the hil altars, Page 1295 cut downe the groues,* and destroyd all monuments of Idolatry in the temple: the like corruptiōs, drosse and deformities of Popish Idolatry crept into the Church of Christ or long time, this Euangelicall Iosias king Edwarde remoued,* & purged the true temple of the Lorde, Iosias restored the true worship of God in Ierusalem, and destroyd the Idolatrous priestes: King Edward in England likewise abolishing Idolatrous Masses and false inuocation, reduced agayne religion to a right sincerity, & more would haue brought to perfection if life and time had aunswered to his godly purpose. And though he killed not: as Iosias did, the idolatrous sacrifices, yet he put them to silēce, and remoued them out of theyr places.

Moreouer, in king Iosias dayes the holy Scripture & booke of Gods word was vtterly neglected and cast aside, whi•h he most graciously repayred & restored agayne. And did not K. Edwarde the like with the selfe same booke of Gods blessed worde, and with other wholesome bookes of Christian doctrine, which before were decayed and extinguished in his fathers dayes by sharpe lawes & seure punishments here in England? Briefly in all poynts and respectes,* betwene him and this our godly king no oddes is to be found but onely in length of time and reign▪ Who if he might haue reached (by the sufferaunce of God) to the continuance of Iosias reigne: proceeding in those beginnings, which in his youth appeared, no doubt but of his Actes, & doings some great perfection woulde haue ensued to thys Church and Realme. But the manifold iniquities of Englishmē deserved another plague, as after fel amongst vs: as in sequele of the story hereafter (God willing) shalbe de'clared.

In the meane time, to proceed in the excellent vertues of this christian yong Iosias (as we haue begon) althogh neither do we know, nor will laysure serue vs to stād vpō a full descriptiō of all his Actes: yet will we (God willing) g•ue a litle taste of the noble nature and princely qualities of this king, wherby the reader may esteme with himselfe what is to be thought of y^e rest of his doinges, though they be not here all expressed.

And first to begin with that whiche is the chiefest property of al other externe things in a prince to be cōsidered, that is, * to be loued of his subiectes: such were the hartes of all English people towarde this King inclined, and so toward him still cōtinued, as neuer came prince in this realme more highly esteemed, more amply magnified, or more dearely & tenderly beloued of all his subiects: but especially of the good & the learned sort, & yet not so much beloued, as also admirable by reason of his rare towardnes & hope both of vertue & learning which in him appeared aboue y^e capacity of his yeares. And as he was intirely of his subiects beloued, * so with no lesse good wil he loued thē again: of nature & disposition meek, and much enclined to clemēcy. He alwayes spared and fauored the life of man: as in a certayne dissertation of his once appeared, had with Maister Cheke in fauoring y^e life of heretickes: in so much that when Ioane Butcher should be burned, all the Councell could not moue him to put to his hand, but were fayne to get Doct. Cranmer to perswade with him, and yet neither could he with much labor induce the king so to do sayyng: what my Lord? will ye haue me to send her quicke to the deuill in her error? so that D. Cranmer himself cōfessed that he had neuer so much to do in all his life, as to cause y^e king to put to his hand, saying that he woulde laye all the charge therof vpon Cranmer before God. There wanted in him no promptnes of wit, grauity of sentence, rypenesse of iudgement. Fauor and loue of religion was in him frō his childhood: Such an organe geuē of God to the Church of England he was, as England had neuer better. Ouer and besides these notable excellencies, * and other great vertues in him: adde moreouer skill & knowledge of tongues & other sciences, whereunto hee seemed rather borne then brought vp.

Moreouer there wanted not in him to this felicitye of wit and dexterity of nature, like happines of institution of good instructors. Neither did there lacke agayne in him any diligence to receiue that, * which they would teach him: in so much that in the midst of all his play and recreatiō, he would alwayes obserue & keep his houre appoynted to his study, vsing the same with much intentiō, till time called him agayne from his booke to pastime. In this his study, & keeping of his houres he did so profit that D. Cranmer the Archbishop then of Canterbury, beholding his to'wardnes, his readines in both tongues, in translating frō Greek to Latine, from Latine to Greek agayne, in declaming w^t his scholefellowes without helpe of his teachers, and that ex tempore, * would weepe for ioy, declaring to D. Coxe his scholemaister, that he would neuer haue thought that to haue bene in him, except he had sene it himselfe.

To recite here his witty sentences, his graue reason• which many times did proceed frō him, and how he would sometimes in a matter discoursed by his coūsell, adde the• vnto of his owne moe reasons & causes touching the 〈◇〉 matter then they themselues had or could deuise, it was 〈◇〉 most incredible in y^r age to see & tedious here to prosecute.

This in him may seme notorious and admirable, that he in these immature yeres, could tell & recite all the po••, hauens and creakes, not within his owne realme only, but also in Scotland, and likewise in Fraūce, what commyng in there was, how the tide serued in euery hauen or creke: moreouer, what burdē & what winde serued the comming into the hauen.

Also of all his iustices, maiestrates, gentlemē that bare any authority within his realme, he knew the names,* their housekeping, their religiō and conuersation what it was. Few sermons or none in his court, especially in the Lord Protectors time, but he would be at them. Agayne, neuer was he present at any commonly, but he would excerpt thē or note them with his owne hand.

Besides and aboue al other notes and examples of his commendatiō, as touching the chiefest poynt which ought most to touch all men, for mainteining, promoting, preferring, embracing, zealing and defending the true cause and quarell of Christes holy gospell, what was his study, hys zealous feruency, his admirable constancy therin, by thys one example folowing, amongst many other, may notably appeare.

In the dayes of this K. Edward the sixt, Carolus the Emperour made request to the sayd king and his counsel to permit Lady Mary (who after succeeded in the crowne) to haue Masse in her house without preiudice of the law.* And the counsell on a time, sitting vpon matters of pollicy hauing that in question, sent Cranmer then Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and Ridley then bishop of Londō, to intreat the king for the same: who comming to his grace alledged theyr reasons and persuasions for the accomplishing therof. So y^e king hearing what they could say, replied his answere again out of the Scriptures, so groundedly, grantly, and fully, that they were enforced to geue place to his re'plication, and graunt the same to be true. Then they, after long debating in this maner with his maiesty, labored politickely in an other sort, and alledged what daungers the denying therof might bring to his grace, what breach of amity of the Emperours part, what troubles, what vnkindnes, & what occasions sondry wayes it would enforce, &c. Unto whom the king aunswered, wylling them to contēt themselues, for he would (he sayd) spend his life and all be had, rather thē to agree & graunt to that he knew certainly to be agaynst the trueth. The which when the Byshoppes heard, notwithstanding they vrged hym still to graūt, and would by no meanes haue his nay. Then y^e good K. seyng theyr importunate sure,* that needes they would haue hys Maiesty consent thereto, in the ende his tender hart bursting out in bitter weeping and sobbing, desired them to be content. Whereat the Bishoppes themselues seeing the kinges zeale and constancy, wept as fast as he, and tooke theyr leaue of his grace: and comming from him, the Arch'bishop tooke mayster Cheke his scholemayster by the hand and sayd: Ah mayster Cheke,* you may be glad all y^e dayes of your life, that you haue such a Scholer, for he hath more Diuinity in his litle finger, then all we haue in all our bodyes. Thus the Ladye Maryes Masse for that time was stayed.

Ouer and besides these heauenly graces and vertues, most chiefly to be required in all faythfull and christen maiestrates which haue gouernaunce of Christes flocke, neyther was he also vnprovided of suche outward giftes and knowledge as appertein to the gouernance of his realme politick. In so much that neither he was in expert or ignoraunt of the exchange and all the circumstaunces of the same touching doinges beyond the sea,* but was as skilfull in the practises therof, and could say as much as the chiefe•• doers in his affaires. Likewise in the enterteining of Embassadors, to whom he would geue aunswere, and that to euery part of theyr oration, to the great wonder of thē that heard, doing that in his tender yeares by himselfe, which many Princes at theyr mature age seldome are wont to do but by other. And as he was a great noter of things y^e perteyned to Princely affayres, so had he a chest seuerallye to himselfe for euery yeare, for the keping of such records and matters, as past and were concluded by the Counsell. Of whom also he woulde require a reason and cause of euery thing that should passe their iudgements.* And of this chest he would euermore keep the key about him. His notes also •e ciphred in Greeke letters, to the ende that those that wayted vpon him, should not read nor know what he had written.

Page 1296He had moreouer great respect to iustice, and to the dispatch of poore mens sute, would appoynt hours & tymes with maister Coxe, then maister of his Requestes, how & by what order they might be sped in their causes without long delayes and attendaūce, and so also debate with him, that theyr matters might be heard and iudged with equity accordingly.

What Hieronimus Cardanus sayth of him cōcerning his knowledge in liberal sciēces, I thought here to expres in his owne words, both in latin and english, so much the rather, because he speaketh of his owne experiment, & vpon the present talke which he had with the king himselfe. The wordes of Cardanus first in latine be these.

Hier. Card. de Genituris.

A Derāt enim illi gratiae. Linguas enim multas adhuc puer cal•eba•: Anglicam natalem, Latinam, Gallicam, non expers (vt audio) Graecae,*Italicae, & hispanicae, & forsan aliarum. Propriā, Gallicam & Latinā exactē tenebat, & ad omnia docilis erat. Non illi dialectica deerat, non naturalis Philosophiae principia, non Musica. Humanitas mortalitatis nostrae imago, grauitas Regiae maiestatis, indoles tāto principe digna. In vniuersum magno miraculo humanarum rerum, tanti i•genij & tantae expectationis puer educabatur. Non haec Rhetoricē exornata veritatem exedunt, sed sunt minora.

Decimum quintum adhuc agebat annum. Interrogabat (Latinē non minus quam ego politē & promptē loquebatur) quid continent libri tui de rerum varietate? hos enim nomini Maiestatis suae dedicaueram. Tum ego Cometarum primum causam diu frustra, quaesitam• in primo capite ostendo. Quae nam inquit ille? Concursum, ego aio, luminis erraticorum syderum. At Rex, quomodo, cum diuersis motibus astra moueantur, nō statim dissipatur aut mouetur eorum motu. At ego, mouetur equidem, sed lōge celefius illis ob diuersitatem aspectus, velut in Cristallo & sole cum iris in pariete relucet. Parua enim mutatio magnam facit loci differentiā. At Rex, & quonam pacto absque subiecto illud fieri potest iridi enim paries subiectū est? Tum ego, velut in lactea 〈◇〉, & luminum reflectione, cum plures candellae propē accensae medium quoddam lucidum & candidum efficiūt. Ita{que} ex vngue Leonem, vt dici solet. Fuit hic in maxima omnium aut bonorum aut eruditorum expectatione ob ingenuitatem atque suauitatem morum. Prius caeperat fauere artibus quam nosceret, & noscere antequam vti posset. Conatus quidam humanae conditionis, quē non solum Anglia, sed orbis ereptum immaturē deflere debet. O quam benē dixerat ille.

Immodicis brevis est aetas & rara senectus.

Specimen virtutis exhibere potuit, non exemplum. Vbi gravit̃s Regia requirebatur, senem vidisses: vt blandus erat & comis, aetatem referebat. Cheli pulsabat, publicis negotijs admouebatur, liberalis animo, atque in his patrem emulabatur. &c. Haec Cardanus.

¶The same in English.

There was in him a towardly disposition & pregnancy apt to all humaine literature: as who being yet a childe had the knowledge of diuers tongues,* first of the english his owne naturall tounge, of y^e latin also & of the french, neither was he ignorant (as I heare) of the greeke, Italian, & spanish tongues, and of other languages peradventure moe. In his owne, in the French & in the Latine tounge singularly perfect, and with the like facility apt to receiue all other. Neither was he ignorant in logike, in the principles of naturall Philosophy, or in Musicke. There was in him lacking neither humanity the Image of our mortality, a Princely grauity and maiesty, nor any kind of towardnes beseming a noble king. Briefly, it might seme a myracle of nature, to behold the excellent wit & forwardnesse that appeared in him being yet but a child. This I speake not rethorically, to amplifie thinges or to make them more then truth is, yea the truth is more then I do vtter.

Being▪ yet but 15. yeares of age he asked of me in Latin (in which tounge he vttered his minde no lesse readely and eloquently thē I could do my selfe) what my books which I had dedicated to him, De varietate rerum, did contayne? I sayd that in the first chapter was shewed the cause of Comets,* or blasing stars, which hath bene long sought for, & yet hitherto scarce fully found. What cause (sayd he) is that: The concourse or meeting (sayd I) of the light of the wandering Planets and Stars. To this the king thus replied agayne: Forsomuch (sayd he) as the motion of the stars kepeth not one course but is diuers and variable by continual alteration, how is it then that the cause of these Comets either doth not quickly vade & vanish, or that the Comet doth not keep one certayne and vniforme course & motion with the sayd Starres and Planets? Whereunto I answered that the Comet hath his course and mouing, but much more swifter then they, because of the diuersity of aspect, as we see in Christall, and in the Sunne when the forme of the Raynbow reboūdeth on the wall.* For a litle mutation maketh a great difference of place. Then sayde y^e king and how can that be, hauing no subiect: For of y^e rainbow the wall is the subiect? Like (sayd I) as in Lactea via, or in reflection of lightes, as where many candles he lighted and set nere together, in the middle they cause a certain bright and white lightsomnes to appeare. &c.

And so by this litle triall a great gesse may be geuen what was in this king. In whome no doubt was a great hope and expectation amongst all good & learned mē, both for the ingenious forwardnes & amiable sweetnes which in his conditions appeared. First he began to loue & fauor liberall arts & sciences, before he knew them, and to know them before he could vse them, whose mortall conditiō and soden decease and decay in those tender & vnripe yeres, not onely England, but all the world hath cause to lament. O how truely is it sayd of the Poet.

Thinges that be exceeding excellent.

Be not commonly long permanent.

A shew or sight onely of excellency he could geue vs: example he could not geue. Where a kingly maiesty required grauity, there you should haue sene him a sage and an olde man, and yet gentle and pleasant also, according as the cōditiō of his age then required. He plaid wel vpō the L•te. He had also to doe in handling of weighty affayres of the Realme: He was liberall and bountifull in hart, & therein he imitated his father. &c.

Ex Hier. Cardano.

Thus after the godly dispositiō and properties of this king briefly in this wise declared, now (God willing) wee will intermeddle something to describe the order & proceedinges which he folowed in his administration & gouerne'ment of both the states, as well politick as especially ecclesiasticke.* Who after the decease of his Father comming to the crowne, because he was of young & tender age, he was committed to 16. gouernors. Amongest whom especiallye the Lord Edward Semer Duke of Somerset his Uncle was assigned and adioyned to him as Protector and ouer seer of him and of the commō wealth,* a man not so highly aduanced for his consanguinity, as also for his noble vertues and especially for his fauour to Gods word, worthye of his vocation and calling. Through the endeuer and industry of which man, first that monstrous Hidra with vj. heades, the sixe Articles I meane (which deuoured vp so many men before) was abolished & taken away. By reasō wherof the counsels and proceedings of Winchester began to decaye, who storming at the same matter, wrote to the Lord Protectour in the cause therof, as by his letters is to be sene.

The holy scriptures he restored to the mother tounge, masses he extinguished and abolished. Furthermore,* after softer beginnings, by litle & litle, greater thinges folowed in the reformation of the Churches. Then suche as before were in banishmēt for the daūger of the truth, were again receiued to theyr cōūtry. To be short, a new face of things began now to appeare, as it were in a stage new players cōming in, the olde being thrust out. For y^e most part y^e Bishops of churthes & diocesses were chaūged. Such as had bene dombe prelates before, were compelled to geue place to other then that would preach and take paynes.

Besides other also out of forreine coutries, mē of learning and notable knowledge were sent for and receiued,* among whome was Peter Martyr, Martine Bucer, and Paulus Phagius. Of whome the first taught at Oxford: the other two professed at Cambridge,* and that w^t no smal commendation of the whol vniuersity. Of the old bishops some were cōmitted to one ward, some to an other Boner Bishop of London was committed to the Marshalsey, & eftsoones for his contempt and misdemeanour deposed frō his bishopricke, as in further processe foloweth to be sene, Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, with Tonsal Bishop of Duresme was cast into the Tower for his disobedience, where he kept his Christmas three yeares together, more worthy of some other place without the Tower, if it hadde pleased god otherwise not to haue mēt a further plague to Page 1297 this Realme by that man.

But these meek and gentle times of king Edward vnder the gouernment of this noble Protector, haue this one commendation proper vnto them, for that among y^e whole number of the popish sort, of whom some priuily did steale out of the realm, many were crafty dissemblers, some were open and manifest aduersaries, yet of all y^t multitude, there was not one man that lost his life. In summe, duryng the whole time of the 6. yeares of this king much tranquility, and as it were a breathing time was graunted to the whole Church of England: So that the rage of persecutiō ceasing and the sword taken out of the aduersaries hand, there was now no daūger to the godly, vnlesse it were one^ly by wealth and prosperity, which many times bringeth more dammage in corrupting mēs minds, then any time of persecution or affliction.

Briefly, during all this time, neither in smithfield, nor any other quarter of this realme, any was heard to suffer for any matter of religion, either Papist or Protestant, eyther for one opiniō or other, except onely two, one an English woman, called Ioan of Kent, and the other a Dutch man, named George, who dyed for certayne Articles not much necessary here to be rehearsed.

Besides these two, there was none els in all king Edwardes raigne,* that dyed in any maner cause of religion, but that one Thom. Dobbe, who in the beginning of this kinges raigne, was apprehended for speaking agaynst the idolatry of the masse and in the same prison died: as in story here ensueth to be sene.

This Thomas Dobbe being a studēt and a maister of Arte in Cambridge, was brought vp in the colledge, called S. Iohns Colledge, and felowe of the same, where he increased in the studye of good letters, among his equals very forward of nature and disposition simple and modest, of zeale toward God feruēt pacient in iniuries,* iniurious to no man, of much like sort & condition, as in Doues which without all bitternes of gal, are more apt to receiue iniury then to worke wrong to any. At length this godly man intending with himselfe, and addicting hys mynde to the Christian state of Matrimony, resorted to a certayn mayden not farre of where he dwelt. For the whiche cause he was greatly molested, and wickedly abused by iij. of that Colledge, whose names were Hutchinson, Pindare, and Tailer, who with theyr malicious handlyng, scornful dealing, opprobries, rebukes, and cōtumelies, so much vexed the vertuous simplicity of y^e man, that they neuer left him, till at length they weryed him out of the Colledge. Who there hauing no rest nor quietnes by reasō of the vnreasonable and virulēt handling of his aduersaries, was compelled to seek some other place wherin to settle himself. Up on the occasion wherof comming vp to Lōdon, it chaūced him to passe through Paules Church, wheras it happned that at the Southside of the Church, at the same tyme there was a Priest at Masse, more busy then wel occupied being at the eleuation as he passed by. The yong man repleat with godly zeale, pitying the ignorance and idolatry of the people, in honoring that so deuoutly which the priest lifted vp, was not able to forbear, but opening his mouth & turning to the people, he exhorted them not to honor the visible bread as God, which neither was God, nor yet ordeined of God to be honored. &c. with such other wordes mo of christian information. For which cause straight way he was apprehended by the Maior, and after accused to the Bishop of Caüterbury, was committed to the Coüter thē in Bredstreete, where he not long continued, but fallyng into a sicknes, how, or wherupon I can not tell, shortly vp on the same chaūged this mortall life. Whose pardō notw^tstanding was obtained of the Lord Protector and shoulde haue bene brought him, if he had cōtinued. And thus much concerning Thomas Dobbe and other.

Ouer and besides, I finde, that in the first yeare of the raygne of King Edward, which was an. 1547. there was one Iohn Hume, seruaunt to Maister Lewnax of Wresell apprehended, accused, and sent vp to the Archbish. of Caüterbury, by the sayd M. Lewnax his Mayster & Margaret Lewnax his mistres, for these Articles.

1 First, for denying the Sacrament (as it was then called of the aultar) to be the reall flesh and bloud of Christ.

2 For saying that he would neuer vale his bonet vnto it, to be burned therefore.

3 For saying that if he shoulde heare Masse, he shoulde be damned,

For this was he sent vp by his maister and mistres aforesayd, with speciall letters vnto the Archbishop, requiring him seuerally to be punished by the law for the same. But because I finde no execution folowing thereupon, I therefore passe ouer this story of him.

These thinges premissed, when this vertuous & godly yong prince (endued as you haue heard with speciall graces from God) was now peaceably stablished in his king^dome, and had a couंसell about him, graue, wise, and zelous in Gods cause, especially his vncle y^e duke of Somerset▪ he then most earnestly likewise desired, as well the aduaunce^ment of the true honor of almighty God, and the planting of his sincere religion: as also the vtter suppressiō and extirpation of all idolatry, superstition, hipocrisy, and other enormities and abuses, throughout his realmes and domiⁿions, & therefore folowing, as is afore expressed, the good example of king Iosias, he determined forthwith to enter into some reformation of Religion in the Church of England.

And forasmuch as at his first entry (notwithstanding his fathers good beginning in abolishing the vsurped power of Antichrist) he yet foūd most of his lawes greatly re^pugning agaynst this his zealous enterprise, he therefore purposed by the aduise of his sayd wise & honorable Counsell, of his owne regall power and authority, somewhat to prosecute his godly purpose, vntill such time as by consent of the whole estate of parliamēt, he might establish a more free, perfect, and vniforme order therin.

Wherupon intending first a generall visitation ouer al the bishopricks within his realm (therby as wel to vnderstād,* as also to redresse the abuses in the same) he chose out certayn wise, learned, discrete, and worshipful personages to be his Commissioners in that behalfe: and so deuiding them into seuerall companies,* assigned vnto them seuerall Diocesses to be visited: appoynting likewise vnto euery company, one or two godly learned preachers, which at euery Session shoulde in theyr preaching, both instruct the people in the true doctrine of the Gospell of Christ, & in all loue and obedience to the same, and also earnestly dehore them from theyr olde superstition and wonted Idolatrye. And that they might be more orderly directed in this their Commission, there were deliuered vnto them certayn Iniunctions & ecclesiasticall orders drawne out by the kings learned counsell, the which they should both enquire of, & also commaund in his maiesties behalfe, to be thenceforth obserued of euery person, to whō they did seuerally appertayne within theyr sondry circuites.

In the which, amongst other things, it was first enioined that all Ecclesiasticall persons should themselues obserue, and cause to be obserued of other,* all such Statutes as were made for the abolishing of the Bishop of Romes vsurped power, and establishing of the kings supreme authority, and that they should euery one foure times in the yeare at the least, in theyr publick sermons declare vnto y^e people, that the one being most arrogātly vsurped against the word of God, was now iustly taken away, and the other (according to y^e very true meaning of the same worde) was of most loyall duety onely to be obeyed of all his graces subiectes.

And agayne, that euery the aforesayd ecclesiastical person (hauing cure) shoulde preach,* or cause to be preached w^t in theyr seuerall cures, one sermon euery quarter of y^e yere. In the which they should sincerely set forth the woordes of God, & exhort the people vnto the workes of fayth & mercy prescribed in the same word,* and not vnto workes deuised by mans fantasy, as going on pilgrimages and other lyke idolatrous superstitions: the which they should also to the vttermost of theyr powers reprove and speak agaynst, declaring that all grace & goodnes ought onely to be soughte for at gods hand (as the alone geuer therof) & not at any other creature: And that they shoulde not onely foorthwyth take down and destroy all such Images as had bene thertofore abused by pilgrimage or offerings within theyr said cures;* but also should not thenceforth suffer any lightes or other idolatrous oblation to be made or set vp before any other image, then was yet suffered in the Church.

Also that euery holy day (hauing no Sermon in theyr Church) they should immediatly after the gospel distinctly read in the Pulpit the Lordes prayer,* the beliefe and the x. commaūdemēts of almighty God in the english tounge;* exhorting the people not only to learn thē theyr selues, but also to teach them to theyr childrē & families, & also should charge all Parentes and gouernors of households to bring vp their youth in some good exercise or occupation wherby they might afterwards serue the common wealth, and not runne, and like vagabondes and idle loyterers, & thereby incur the daunger of the lawes.

And furthermore that the sayd persons (hauing cure) should see the holy Sacramentes of Christ reuerently ministred within theyr cures: & that if any of them (by speciall licence or other cases expressed in the Statutes of thys realme) should be at any time absent from theyr benefices▪ Page 1298 that then they should leaue in theyr rowmes some Godly learned and discreet Curate that were able to instruct the people in all truth and godlines not seking thēselues, but rather the profit of theyr flocke.

And likewise, that they should see prouided and set vp some most conuenient and open place of euery their seuerall Churches, one great Bibe in english, & one book of the Paraphrases of Erasmus vpon the gospels,* both in English, that the people might reuerentlye without any argument or contention, read & heare the same at such times as they listed: and not to be inhibited therfrō by the Parson or Curate, but rather to be the more encouraged and prouoked thereto.

And that the sayd Parsons and Curates should not at any time (but for necessary causes) haunt anye Tauerne or Ale house, neither should spend their time idly in vnlawfull games, but at all theyr conuenient leasures shoulde geue thēselues to the reading or hearing of the holy scriptures.

Moreouer, that in the time of confession euery Lent, they should examine theyr parishners whether they could say the Lordes prayer, the ten commaundementes, and the articles of the Christian fayth: and that if they coulde not, they should then reprove them, declaring further vnto thē that, they ought not to presume to come vnto y^e Lordes table without the true knowledge therof, and earnest desire to fulfill the same.

Also that they shoulde not admitte any man to preache within theyr cures, but suche as were lawefully licensed thereunto:*, and that they hauing at anye tyme before extolled and praysed any Idolatrous Pilgrimage, or other superstition, should now openly recant the same before the people.

*And if there were any open hinderer or disturber of the reading or preaching of the word of God within their parishes, that then they should forthwith detect the same vnto the kinges counsell, or vnto some Iustice of peace to thē next inhabiting.

And further, that learning and knowledge might be y^e better mayntayned, it was also ordeined herein, that euery beneficed persō y^t inought yerely dispend twenty poūdes or vpward (and not resident vpon their cures) should pay towards the reliefe of the poore within theyr parishes euery yeare, the fourty part of theyr fruites and profites: & likewise that euery suche as might dispende one hundreth poundes yearely or more, should for euery hundreth poūd geue a competent exhibition vnto some poore scholer within one of the Uniuersityes of Oxford or Cambridge or els in some other grammer schole of the realme.

And also that euery priest being vnder the degree of a Bachelor of Diuinity should haue of his owne, one newe Testament in English and Latine, with the Paraphrases of Erasmus vpon the same, and should diligētly read and study therupon, and should collect and keep in memory all such comfortable places of the scripture, as do set forth the mercy, benefites, and goodnes of almighty God towards all penitent & beleuing persons, that they might therby cōfort theyr flock in al daūger of death,* dispayre or trouble of conscience: and that therefore euery bishop in theyr visitations should from time to time try and examine them how they had profited in these theyr studies.

And although the Masse was then still by the Law reteyned, yet was it enioyned, that at euery high masse the sayer or singer therof should openly and distinctly read the Gospell and Epistle in English, in the Pulpit or in some other conuenient place that the people mought heare the same.*

And in like place and maner should read euery holy day and Sonday at Mattins one chapter of the new Testament in English, omitting therfore three of theyr 9. Latine Lessons with theyr Responses: and at Euensong like wise immediately after Magnificat, one chapter of the old Testament in stead of theyr wonted Responses and Memories.

Furthermore, because of the vayne contention that often fall among the people for goyng on Procession, it was ordeined that thenceforth the Priests and Clerkes should kneele in the midst of the Church, & there distinctly sing or reade the Letany in English sette forth by the authority of K. Henry the eight: * and that no person should depart the church in the time of reading the Scripture or the Letany, or during the time of any Sermon, without iust and vrgent cause.

Likewise that the people should spend the holydaies in hearing the word of God, in priuate and publick prayers, in knowledging theyr offences vnto God and amendmēt of the same, * in reconciling themselues charitablye to theyr neighbors where displeasure hath bene, in often receiuing the Communion of the body and bloud of Christ, in visiting the poore & sicke, & in all sober and godly conuersatiō: and not in vanity, idlenes, or dronkenes, neither yet in any bodily labor, otherwise then in y^e time of haruest, to saue the frutes of the earth, if necessity so required: and that no curate should admit vnto the receiuing of the holy cōmunion, * any person who had maliciously and opēly contēded with his neighbors, vnlesse the same did first also openlye reconcile himselfe agayne, and remit all rancor and malice whatsoever.

Moreouer it was ordeined that euery Dean, * Archdeacon master of Collegiat Churches or Hospitals, and Prebendaries (being Priest) should himselfe personally preach twise euery yeare at the least, in some such place where hee had iurisdiction and liuing: and that they and all other curates should teach y^e people that as no man of any priuate affection ought maliciously to violate any ceremony in the Church, then not abrogated by y^e kings authority: so likewise they ought not on the other side to vse them superstitiously or idolatrously, * in attributing to them remission of sinnes, driuing away of euill spirits, & other such like dreames & fātasies of men, or els in putting any confidence of saluation or health in thē. And farther that they should vtterly take away and destroy all Shrines and Monumēts of fayned Miracles, Pilgrimages, and other Idolatrous superstition, as well in theyr Churches, as wythin theyr priuate houses.

Also that they should see prouided within their churches a strong and fit chest for the safe keping of y^e peoples beneuolence geuen towards the reliefe of the poore, * and that the sayd Curates should earnestly exhort and moue theyr Parishioners (especially at the making of theyr Testaments) that as they had bene thertofore willing to bestow much of theyr substance vpon vayne superstitious & blind deuotiōs contrary to gods word, so now they would be much more readier to geue som portion therof vnto theyr poore & nedy brethren, knowing the same to be not only commaūded in y^e word of God, but also promised to be rewarded. And for the better reliefe of the poore it was also appoynted that all mony & profits rising vpon Fraternities, guildes, stocks of Churches or geuen to the finding of Idolatrous lights should be cōuerted for that present vnto the same vse. Last of all, for the want of learned Curates & other good preachers, it was enioyned that y^e Curates (hauing no sermō) should euery sōday read vnto the people in their churches one of the homilies which should be shortly set forth for y^e same purpose by the kinges authority: * & that whē any homily or sermō should be preached or read, then the Prime and Houres should be omitted.

There were also diuers other articles in the same Iniunctiōs appoynted for comelines & due order in the churches: as for repaying of Chauncels and Priestes houses, for keeping of a Register booke of weddinges, christenings and burials, for reading of these Iniunctions euery quarter for due paying of tithes for forbidding of any other alteration of seruice in the Church, or fasting dayes, for making of comely Pulpits for the preachers, for auoyding of simony in buying and selling of benefices of the charitable vsing of Priestes, for praying onely vpon the English and Latine primmers set forth by K. Henry the eight for y^e teaching of his grammer in the common scholes.* At last that the Chauntry Priestes should teach yong children, eyther to write and read, or els some other good and profitable exercises: as it doth more fully and amply appeare in the same Iniunctions at large set forth in the 684. page of the fyrste booke of the Actes and Monuments of the church heretofore imprinted.

Besides these generall Iniunctions for the whole estate of the Realme, there were also certayne others particularly appoynted for the Bishops onely, which being deliuered vnto the Commissioners, were likewise by theyr visitations committed vnto the sayd byshops with charge to be inuiolably obserued and kept vpon payne of the kinges Maiesties displeasure: the effect whereof is as in maner foloweth.

First that they should to the vttermost of theyr wit and vnderstanding,* see & cause al and euery singuler the kings Iniunctions theretofore geuen, or after to bee geuen from time to time, in and through our Dioces, duely, faythfully and truely to be kept, abserued and accomplished, and that they should personally preach within theyr Dioces,* euery quarter of a yeare once at y^e least, that is to say once in theyr Cathedrall Churches, and thrise in other seuerall places of theyr Diocesses, wheras they should see it most conueniēt and necessary, except they had a reasonable excuse to the cōtrary. Likewise, that they should not reteine into their seruice or houshold, any chapleyn but such as were learned, or able to preach the word of God, and those they should also cause to exercise the same.

Page 1299 Moreouer, that they should not geue orders to any person, but such as were learned in holy Scripture: neyther should deny thē that were learned in the same, being of honest conuersatiō and liuing. And last, that they should not at any time or place preach or set forth vnto the people any doctrine contrary or repugnant to the effect and entent cōteined and set forth in the kings highnes homelies, neither yet should admitte or geue licence to preach to any within theyr diocesses, but to such as they should know (or at the least assuredly trust) would do the same. And if at any time by hearing, or by report proued, they should perceiue y^e cōtrary, they should then incontinent not onely inhibite that person so offending, but also punish him and reuoke theyr licence.

Nowe during the time that the Commissioners were occupied abroad in theyr circuits about the speddy and diligent execution of these godly & zelous orders and decrees of the king and his counsell, his maiesty (with the aduise of the same) yet still desiring a farther reformation as well in this case of religiō, as also in some others of his Ciuill gouernment, appointed a parliamēt of the three estates of his Realme to be summoned agaynst the 4. day of Nouēber, in the first yeare of his raigne and the yeare of our Lorde. 1547. which continued vnto the 24. day of December then next folowing.* In the which Session, for as much as hys highnes minded the gouernaunce and order of his people to be in perfect vnity & concord in al things, and especially in the true fayth and religion of God, and therewithal also duely wayed the great daunger that his louing Subiects were in for confessing the gospell of Christ, through many and diuers cruell statuts made by sondry his predecessors, against the same (which being stil left in force mought both cause the obstinate to contēn his graces godly procedings, and also the weak to be fearefull of theyr christianlike profession) he therefore caused it among other things by the authority of the same parliament to be enacted,* that all Actes of Parliament & Statutes, touching, mentioning, or in any wise concerning religion or opinions, that is to say (as well y^e statute made in the first yeare of the reigne of king Rich. the second,* and the statute made in the second yeare of the reigne of King Henry the fift, and the statute made in the 25. yeare of the raigne of K. Henry .8. cōcerning punishment and reformation of hereticks and Lollards and euery prouision therein conteined, and the Statutes made for the abolishment of diuersity of opinions in certain Articles concerning Christian religion commōly called the 6. Articles, made in the 31. yeare of the raigne of K. Henry 8. & also the statute made in the Parliamēt begon the 16. day of Ianuary in the 33. yeare of the reigne of the sayd K. Hēry the 8. and after proroged vnto the 21. day of Ianuary in the 24. yeare of his sayd raigne, touching, mentioning, or in any wise concerning bookes of the olde and new Testament in English, & the printing, vttering, selling, geuing, or deliuering of bookes or writings, and reteining of english bookes or writings, and reading preaching, teaching, or expounding the scriptures, or in any wise touching, mētioning or cōcerning any of the sayd matters: And also one other statute made in the 35 yeare of the Raigne of the sayd K. Henry 8. concerning the qualifcation of the Statute of the sixe Articles, and all and euery other act or acts, of parliament concerning doctrine or matters of religion, and al and euery braunch, article, sentence, matter, paines, or forfaytures conteined, mētioned, or in any wise declared many of the same Actes or Statutes) should from thenceforth be vtterly repealed, made voyd, and of none effect.

By occasion wherof, as wel al such his godly subiects as were then still abiding within this Realme, had free liberty publickely to professe the Gospel: as also many learned & zealous preachers (before banished) were now both licensed freely to returne home agayne, & also encouraged boldly and faythfully to trauel in theyr fūction and calling, so that God was much glorified, and the people in many places greatly edified.

Moreouer in the same Session his Maiestye with the Lords spirituall and temporall, and the Commons in the same Parliament assembled, throughly vnderstanding by the iudgement of the best learned, that it was more agreable vnto y^r first institution of the sacrament of the most precious body and bloud of our Sauior Christ, and also more conformable to the common vse and practise both of the Apostles, and of the primatiue Church, by the space of fyue hundreth yeares and more after Christes Ascension, that the sayde holye Sacrament shoulde bee ministred vnto all Christen people vnder both the kindes of bread and wine, then vnder the forme of bread onely, and also that it was more agreable vnto the sayd first institution of Christ and the vsage of the Apostles and primatiue Church, that the people being presēt should receiue the same with the priest then that the priest should receiue it alone: dyd by theyr authority moreouer enacte, that the sayde holy Sacrament should be from thēceforth commonly deliuered and ministred vnto the people throughout the churches of Engl^d and Ireland and other the kinges dominiōs vnder both y^e kindes of bread and of wine,* except necessity otherwise required: and also, that the Priest that should minister the same, should at the least one day before, exhort all persons which should be present, likewise to resort & prepare them'selues to receiue the same. And at y^e day prefixed, after some godly exhortation made by the minister (wherin should be further expressed the benefit and comfort promised to them which worthely receiue this holy Sacrament, & the daunger and indignation of God threatned to them which presume to receiue the same vnworthely, to the end that euery man might try and examine his owne conscience before he should come thereunto) the sayd Minister shoulde not without a lawfull cause denye the same to any person that would deuoutly and humbly desire it: any Law, Statute,* ordinaunce, or custome, contrary therunto in any wise notwithstanding.

After which most godly consent of the parliament, the king being no lesse desirous to haue the forme of administration of the Sacrament truely reduced to the ryght rule of the scriptures and first vse of the primatiue church, then he was to establish the same by the authority of his owne regall lawes appoynted certain of the most graue and best learned Bishops and others of his Realme, to assemble to'gether at his Castle of Windsor, there to argue and entreat vpon this matter, and conclude vpon and set forth one perfect and vniforme order according to the rule and vse afore'sayd.

And in the meane while that the learned were thus occupied about theyr conferences, the Lord Protectour and the rest of the kinges Councell, farther remembring that that time of the yere did then approach, wherein were practised many superstitious abuses and blasphemous ceremonies agaynst the glory of God, and trueth of his word (determining the vtter abolishing thereof) directed theyr letters vnto the godly and reuerend father Thomas Cranmer, then Archbishop of Caunterbury, & Metropolitane of England, requiring him that vpon the receipt thereof he should will euery Bishop within his Prouince, forthwith to geue in charge vnto all the Curates of theyr Diocesses, that neither candles should be any more borne vpō Candlemas day, neither yet ashes vsed in Lent,* nor Palmes vpon palme Sonday.

Whereupon the Archbishop zealously fauouring thee good and Christianlike purpose of the king and his Coūsell,* did immediately in that behalfe write bnto all the rest of the Bishops of that prouince, and amongst them vnto Edmund Boner then Bishop of London. Of whose rebellious and obstinate contumacy, for that we haue hereafter more to say, I thought not to stand long hereupon, but onely by the way somewhat to note his former dissimulation and cloked hipocrisy in that he outwardly at the first consented as well vnto this, as also vnto all other the kinges proceedinges (but whether of feare or of any other subtle fetch, I know not, howbeit most like, rather for one of them or both, then for any true loue.) And therefore receiuing the Archbishops letters as one of them seeming to allow the contentes thereof, he did presently write vnto the Bishop of Westminster, & to others, to whom he was appoynted, requiring them to geue such knowledge therof in theyr diocesses, as thereunto apperteyned: as more plainely appeareth by these his owne letters here inserted which here do folow.

¶A Letter missiue of Edmund Boner sent to the Byshop of Westminster, with the tenour of the Archbishops Letter for abolishing of candles, Ashes, Palmes, and other Ceremonies.

MY very good Lord, after most harty commendations these be to aduertise your good Lordship that my Lord of Canterburyes grace this present 28. day of Ianuary sent vnto me hys letters missiue, cōteing this in effect: * that my Lord Protectours Grace with the aduise of other the kinges maiesties most honorable Counsell, for certayne considerations them mouing, * are fully resolved that no candles shall be borne vpon Candlemas day, nor also from henceforth Ashes or Palmes vsed any longer, requiring me thereupon by his sayd letters, to cause admonitiō and knowledge thereof to be geuen vnto your Lordship and other Byshops with celerity accordingly. In consideration wherof I do send at this presēt these letters vnto your sayd Lordship, that you therupon may geue knowledge & aduertisement therof within your Dioces as appertayneth: Thus committing your good Lordship to almighty God, as wel to fa•e as your good hart Page 1300 can best desire.

Written in hast at my house in London, the said 18 day of Ianuary. 1548.

Your good Lordships to command, Edmund London.

Now about that present tyme credible and certain report was made vnto the Lords of the counsaile, * that great contention and strife did daily arise among the common people in diuers partes of this Realme, for the pullyng downe and takyng away of such Images out of the churches, as had bene idolatrously abused by pilgrimage, offerings, or otherwyse (accordyng to the tenure of one of the Iniunctions geuen by the kyng in his late visitation) some affirmyng that that Image was abused, others that this, and most, that neyther of them both: so that if speedy remedy were not had therein, it might turne to further inconuenience. Wherefore they, by one aduise thinkyng it best (of good experience) for the auoidyng of all discorde and tumult, that all maner Images should be cleane taken out of all Churches, and none suffered to remayne, did thereupon agayne write their letters vnto the Archbishop of Caunterbury, requiring his ready ayde therein: in maner followyng.

Another Letter of the Counsaile sent to the Archbishop of Caunterbury for the abolishing of Images.

AFTER our right harty commendations to your good Lordship where now of late in the Kings Maiesties visitations, among other godly Iniunctions commaunded to be generally obserued thorough all partes of this his highnesse Realme, * one was set forth for the takyng downe of all such Images as had at any tyme bene abused with Pilgrimages, offerings or censings: albeit that this sayd Iniunction hath in many partes of the realme bene quietly obeyed and executed, yet in many other places much stryfe and contention hath risen, and daily riseth, and more and more encreaseth about the execution of the same: some men beyng so superstitious, or rather wilfull, as they would (by theyr good wils) retayne all such Images still, although they haue bene most manifestly abused. And in some places also the Images which by the sayd Iniunctions were taken downe, be now restored and set vp agayne. And almost in euery place is contention for Images, whether they haue bene abused or not. And whiles these men go on both sides contentiously to obtayne theyr myndes, contendyng whether this Image or that Image hath bene offered vnto, kissed, censed, or otherwyse abused, partes haue in some places bene taken, in such sort, as further inconueniēcies be lyke to ensue, if remedy be not found in tyme. Considering therefore, that almost in no place of this realme is any sure quietnes, but where all Images be cleane taken away, and pulled downe alreadye, to the entent that all contention in euery part of the Realme for this matter, may be clearely taken away, and that the liuelye Image of Christ should not contend for the dead Images, which be things not necessary, and without the which the Churches of Christ continued most godly many yeres, we haue thought good to signifie vnto you that his highnesse pleasure, with the aduise & consent of vs the Lord Protector and the rest of the Counsaile, is, that immediatly vpon the sight hereof, with as conuenient diligence as you may, you shall not onely geue order that all the Images remayning in any Church or Chappell within your Diocesse be remoued and taken away, but also by your letters signifie vnto the rest of the bishops within your Prouince, this hys hyghnesse pleasure for the lyke order to be geuen by them, and euery of them within theyr seuerall Diocesse. And in the executiō hereof, we require both you and the rest of the sayd Bishops, to vse such foresight as the same may be quietly done, with as good satisfaction of the people as may be. Thus fare your good Lordship hartely well. From Somerset place, the xi. of Febr. 1541.

When the Archb. had receiued these letters, he forthwith directed his precept vnto Boner B. of London, requiring,* and in the kings maiesties name commaundyng him, that with all speede he should as well geue in charge vnto the rest of the bishops within the prouince of Caunterbury, to looke immediately without delay vnto the diligent and carefull execution of the contents of the sayd letter throughout all places of their Dioces: as also that he himselfe should do the lyke within his owne citie & dioces of London. Whereupon he seming then with like outward consent as before, to allow these doyngs, presently (by vertue of the sayd precept) did send out hys Mandatum as well vnto the rest of the bishops, as also agayne vnto the B, of Westminster, in forme followyng.

¶The Letter of Edmund Boner, sent with the Archbishops Mandate, to the bishop of Westminster for abolishyng of Images.

Datum in aedibus nostris London. vicesimo die Febr. An. Dom. 1548. Et regni dicti illustrissimi domini nostri Regis. Anno secundo.

Now by the tyme that these things were thus determined, the learned men which the kyng had appointed (as ye haue heard before) to assemble together for the true and right maner of administring the Sacramente of the body and bloud of Christ,* accordyng to the rule of the Scriptures of God, and first vsage of the Primatiue Church, after theyr long, learned, wyse, and deliberate aduises, dyd finally conclude and agree vppon one godly and vniforme order of receiuing the same, not much differyng from the maner at this present vsed & authorised within this realme and church of England, commonly called the Communion. Which agreement beyng by them exhibited vnto the kyng, and of hym most gladly accepted, was thereupon publikely imprinted, and by his maiesties Councell perticularly deuised and sent vnto euery bishop of the realme, requiring and commaundyng them by their letters on the kings Maiesties behalfe, that both they in their own persons, should forthwith haue diligent and carefull respect to the due execution thereof, and also should with all diligēce cause the bookes which they then sent them, to be deliuered vnto euery Parson, Uicar, and Curate within their Dioces, that they likewise might well and sufficiently aduise themselues for the better distribution of the sayd communion, according to the tenour of the sayd• booke) agaynst the feast of Easter then next ensuyng, as more fully appeareth by these their letters here followyng.

¶ Letters Missiue from the Counsaile, to the Bishops of the Realme, concernyng the Communion to be ministred in both kyndes.*

AFTER our most hartie commendatiōs to your Lordship, where in the Parliament late holden at Westminster,* it was amongst other things most godly established, that according to the first institution and vse of the primatiue church, the most holy sacrament of the body and bloud of our Sauior Iesus Christ, shuld be distributed to the people vnder the kyndes of bread & wyne (according to the effect whereof, the kinges maiestie mynding, with the aduice and consent of the Lord Protectors grace & the rest of the Counsaile, to haue the sayd Statute well executed in such sort, or lyke as it is agreeable with the word of God, so the same may be also faithfully and reuerently receiued of his most louing subiects, to their comforts and wealth) hath caused sundry of his maiesties most graue and well learned Prelates, and other learned men in the Scriptures, to assemble themselues for this matter: who after long conference together, haue with deliberate aduise, finally agreed vpon such an order to be vsed in all places of the kings maiesties dominions, in the distribution of the sayd most holy sacrament, as may appeare to you by the booke thereof, which we send herewith vnto you. Albeit knowing your Page 1301 Lordships knowledge in the Scriptures, and earnest good will & zeale to the setting forth of all things accordyng to the truth thereof, we be well assured, you will of your owne good will, and vpon respect to your duetie, diligently set forth this most godly order here agreed vpon, and commaunded to be vsed by the authoritie of the kyngs maiestie: yet remembryng the crafty pratise of the deuill, who ceaseth not by his members to worke by al wayes and meanes, the hinderance of all godlines. And consideryng furthermore, that a great number of the Curates of the Realme, eyther for lacke of knowledge can not, or for want of good mynd will not be so redy to set forth the same, as we would wish, and as the importance of the matter, and their owne bounden duties requireth, we haue thought good to pray and require your Lordship, and neuerthelesse in the kings maiesties our most dread Lordes name, to commaund you to haue an earnest diligence and carefull respect both in your owne person, and by all your officers and Ministers, also to cause these bookes to be deliuered to euery Person, Vicar, and Curate within your Diocesse, with such diligence as they may haue sufficient tyme well to instruct and aduise themselves, for the distribution of the most holy Communion, accordyng to the order of this booke, before this Easter tyme, and that they may by your good meanes be well directed to vse such good, gentle, and charitable instruction of their simple and vnlearned parishioners, as may be to all their good satisfactions as much as may be, praying you to consider, that this order is set forth, to the intent there should be in all partes of the Realme, and among all men one vniforme manner quietly vsed. The execution whereof, lyke as it shall stand very much in the diligence of you and others of your vocation: so doe we eftsoones require you to haue a diligent respect thereunto, as ye tender the kings Maiesties pleasure, and will aunswer for the contrary. And thus we bidde your Lordship right hartily farewell. From Westminster the 13. of March. 1548.

By meanes as well of this letter, and the godly order of the learned, as also of the statute and acte of parliament before mentioned, made for the stablishyng thereof all priuate blasphemous Masses were now, by iust authoritie fully abolished throughout this realme of England, and the right vse of the Sacrament of the most precious body & bloud of our sauour Iesus Christ, truly restored in stead of the same. But neuertheles, as at no tyme any thing can be so well done of the godly, but that the wicked will find some meanes subtilly to deface the same: so likewyse at this present through the peruerse obstinacy & dissembling frowardnes of many the inferior priests and ministers of the cathedrall and other churches of this realme,* there did aryse a meruailous schisme and varietie of fashions in celebratyng the common service and administration of the Sacraments,* and other rites and ceremonies of y^e church. For some zealously allowyng the kyngs proceedings, dyd gladly follow the order thereof, and others, though not so willingly admittynge them, did yet dissemblingly and patchingly vse some part of them: but many carelesly cōtemnyng all: would still exercise their old wonted popery.

Wherof the kyng and his Counsell hauyng good intelligence, and fearyng the great inconueniences & daungers that might happen through this diuision, and beyng therewithall loth at the first to vse any great seuerity towards hys subiects, but rather desirous by some quiet and godly order, to bring them to some conformitie, did by theyr prudent aduises againe, appoynt the Archbishop of Caunterbury, with certaine of the best learned and discrete bishops and other learned men, diligently to consider and ponder the premisses: and thereupon hauyng as well an eye and respect vnto the most sincere and pure Christian religion taught by the holy scriptures, as also to the vsages of the primatiue church, to draw and make one conuenient and meete order, rite, and fashion of common prayer, & administration of the Sacraments, to be had and vsed within this his realme of England,* and the dominions of y^e same. Who after most godly and learned conferences, thorough the ayd of the holy Ghost, with one vniforme agreement, did cōclude, set forth, and deliuer vnto the kings highnes, a booke in English intituled: A booke of the common prayer and administration of the Sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church, after the vse of the Church of England. The whith his highnes receiuing with great comfort and quietnesse of mynd, did forthwith exhibite vnto the Lords and Commons of the parliament then assembled at Westminster, about the 4. of Nouember,* in the second yeare of his raigne, and in the yeare of our Lord, 1548. and continuynge vnto the 14. day of March, then next ensuyng.

Whereupon the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the Commons of the sayd Parliament assembled, well, and thoroughly consideryng as well the most godly trauayle of the kings highnes, of the Lord Protector,* and other of his maiesties Counsaile, in gatheryng together the said Archbishop, bishops, and other learned men, as the godly praiers, orders, rites, and ceremonies in the sayd booke mentioned, with the consideratiō of altering those things which were altered, and retainyng those thyngs which were retayned in the same booke: as also the honour of God, and great quietnes, which by the grace of God should ensue vpon that one and vniforme rite, and order in such common prayer, rites, and externe ceremonies to be vsed throughout England, Wales, Calice, and the marches of the same, dyd first geue vnto hys highnesse most lowly and hearty thanks for the same,* and then most humbly prayed hym that it myght be ordeyned and enacted by hys Maiesty wth the assent of the sayd Lords and Commons in that parliament assembled, and by the authoritie of the same, that not only all and singular person and persons that had thertofore offended concernyng the premisses (others then such as were then remainyng in Ward in the Tower of London, or in the Fleete) myght be pardoned thereof, but also that all and singular ministers in any Cathedrall or parish Churches or other places within the Realme of Englād, Wales, Calice, and the Marches of the same, or other the kings dominions, should from and after the feast of Pentecost next commyng, be bounden to say and vse the Mattins, Euensong, celebration of the Lords supper, and administration of ech of the Sacraments,* and all other common and open prayer, in such order & forme as was mentioned in the sayd booke, and none other or otherwise. And albeit that they were so godly and good, that they gaue occasion vnto euery honest and conformable man most willyngly to embrace them, yet least any obstinate persons who willingly would disturbe so godly an order and quiete in this realme, should not go vnpunished, they further requested, that it might be ordeined and enacted by the authoritie aforesayd, that if any maner of Person, Uicar, or other what so euer minister that ought or should say or sing common prayer, mencioned in the sayd booke, or minister the Sacraments, should after the sayd feast of Pentecost then next commyng, refuse to vse the sayd common praier, or to minister the Sacraments in such cathedrall or parish churches, or other places as he shoulde vse or minister the same, in such order & fourme as they were mentioned, & set foorth in the sayd booke: or should vse wilfully & obstinately standyng in the same, any other rite, ceremonie, order, fourme, or maner of masse, openly, or priuily, or Mattinnes, Euensong, administration of the Sacraments, or other open prayer then was mentioned and set foorth in the sayd booke: or should preache, declare, or speake any thyng in the derogation or deprauyng of the sayde booke, or any thyng therein conteyned, or of any parte thereof, and should be thereof lawfully conuicted accordyng to the lawes of this Realme by verdite of twelue men, or by his owne confession, or by the notorious euidence of the fact, should loose and forfayte vnto the Kynges hyghnesse hys heyres & successours, for hys first offence one whole yeres profite of such one of his benefices or spirituall promotiōs as it should please the kings highnes to assigne & appoint and also for the same offence should suffer imprisonmēt by the space of sixe monthes, without bayle or mainprise.* But if any such person, after his first conuiction,* should eftsonē offend agayne, and be thereof in forme aforesayd lawfully cōuicted, then he should for his second offence suffer imprisonment by y^e space of one whol yeaere, & should also be depriued Ipso facto, of all his spirituall promotions for euer, so that it should be lawfull for the patrons & Doners therof to geue the same agayne vnto any other learned man, in like maner as if y^r sayd partie so offending were dead. And if any the sayd person or persons shoulde agayne the thyrd tyme offend, and be thereof in forme aforesayd lawfully cōuicted, then he shuld for the same 3. offence suffer imprisonment during his life. If any such person or persons aforesaid, so offending, had not any benefice or spiritual promotion, y^t then he shoulde for his first offence suffer imprisonment by the space of vi. monthes without bayle or maynprise, and for his second offence, imprisonment during hys life. Which request or rather actuall agreement of y^e lordes and commons of the Parliament beyng once vnderstoode of the kyng, was also soone ratified and confirmed by hys regall consent and authoritie, and therupon the sayd booke of common prayer was presently imprinted, and commāded to be exercised throughout the whole Realme and dominions Page 1302 thereof, accordyng to the tenure and effect of the sayd Statute.

Moreouer, in the same Session of the sayd Parliamēt, it was enacted and established by the authoritie thereof: that for as much as great, horrible, and not to be rehearsed inconueniences had from tyme to tyme risen amongst the priests, ministers, and other officers of the clergy through their compelled chastitie,* and by such lawes as prohibited them the godly and lawfull vse of mariage: that therefore all and euery law and lawes positieue, canons, constitutions and ordinances theretofore made by the authoritie of man onely, which did prohibite or forbid mariage to any ecclesiasticall or spirituall person or persones, of what estate, condition or degree so euer they were, or by what name or names they were called, which by gods law may lawfully marry, in all and euery article, braunche and sentence concernyng onely the prohibition for the mariage of the persons aforesayd, should be vtterly voyd and of none effect. And that all maner of forfeitures, paynes, penalties crimes or actions,* which were in the sayd lawes conteyned, and of the same dyd follow, concernyng the prohibition for the mariage of the sayd Ecclesiastical persons, shuld be thencefoorth also clearely and vtterly voyde, frustrate, and of none effect. By occasion whereof, it was thenceafter ryght lawfull for any Ecclesiasticall person, not hauyng the gift of chastitie, most godly to liue in the pure and holy estate of matrimony, according to the lawes & worde of God.

But if the first Iniunctions, statutes, and decrees of the Prince were of many but slenderly regarded, with much lesse good affection were these (especially the booke of common praier) of diuers now receiued: yea, and that of some of them,* which had alwayes before in outward shew willingly allowed the former doings, as appereth most plainly (amongst others) by Boner the B. of London. Who although by his former letters & other mandates, he seemed hitherto to fauour all the kings proceedings: yet did he at that present (notwithstanding both the first statute for the stablishing of the Communion, and the abolishyng of all priuate masses, and also this Statute of the ratifieng and confirming of the booke of Common prayer) still suffer sundry idolatrous priuate masses of peculiar names (as the Apostles masse, the Lady masse and such lyke) to be dailye solemnly sung within certaine perticular chappels of hys cathedral church of Paules, cloking them with the names of the apostles communion, and our Ladies communion, not once findyng any fault therewith, vntill such tyme as the Lordes of the Counsaile hauyng intelligence thereof, were fayne by their letters to commaund hym to looke better thereunto. And then beyng therewith somewhat pricked forwards (perhaps by feare) he was content to direct hys letters vnto the Deane and Chapter of his cathedrall church of Paules, thereby requesting them forthwith to take such order therein, as the tenure of the Counsailes sayd letters therewithall sent vnto them, did import. Which both two letters I haue, for the more credite, here followyng inserted.

¶A Letter directed from the Kings Counsaile, to Edmund Boner B. of London, for abrogating of priuate Masses, namely, the Apostles Masse, within the church of S. Paule, vsed vnder the name of the Apostles Communion.

After hartly commendations: Hauing very credible notice that within that your cathedral church, there be as yet the Apostles masse, and our Ladies masse, and other masses of such peculiar name, vnder the defence & nomination of our Ladies communion, and the Apostles communion, vsed in priuate chappels and other remote places of the same, and not in the Chauncell, contrary vnto the kings maiesties proceedings, the same beyng for the misuse, displeasing to God, for the place of Paules, in example not tollerable, for the fondnes of the name, a scorne to the reuerence of the communion of the Lords body and bloud: we for the augmentation of gods glory and honour and the consonance of his maiesties lawes, and the auoyding of murmure, haue thought good to will & command you that from henceforth no such masses in this manner be in your church any longer vsed, but that the holy blessed communion according to the acte of Parliament, be ministred at the high aulter of the church, and in no other places of the same, & only at such tyme as your high masses were wont to be vsed, except some number of people desire for their necessary businesse to haue a communion in the mornyng, and yet the same to bee executed in the Chauncell at the high aulter, as it is appoynted in the booke of the publike seruice, without cautele or digression from the common order. And herein you shal not onely satisfie our expectation of your conformitie in all lawfull things, but also auoyd the murmure of sundry that be therewith iustly offended. And so we bid your Lordship hartely farewell. From Richmond, the 24. of Iune, an. 1549.

¶To my right worshipfull friendes, and most louyng good brethren, M. Deane of Paules, with all the Canons, Residentaries, Prebendaries, Subdeanes and Ministers of the same, and euery of them with speede.

Right worshipfull, with most hartly commendations. So it is this Wensday the xxvi. of Iune, goyng to dynner,* I receaued letters from the kynges Counsell by a Pursiuaunt, and the same I doe send now herewith vnto you, to the intent you may peruse them well, and proceede accordyngly: praying you in case all be not present, yet those that be now resident and supplying the places, may in their absence call the company together of the Church, and make declaratiō hereof vnto them: Thus committynge you to God, right well to fare.

Written with speede this xxvi. of Iune, at one of the clocke.

Your louyng brother Ed. London.

Ouer and besides all this, the Lord Protectour, wyth the residue of the kings priue and learned Counsel assemblyng together in the Starre chamber about the same mater, that is, for the aduancement and setting forward of the kings so godly proceedings, called before them all the Iustices of peace, where was vttered vnto them by the Lord Rich, then Lord Chauncellour, an eloquent and learned admonition, the tenor whereof ensueth.

IT hath bene vsed and accustomed before this tyme to call at certayne tymes the Iustices of peace before the Kings Maiesties Counsaile,* to geue vnto them admonition or warnyng, diligently (as is their dutie) to looke to the obseruing of such thyngs as be committed to theyr charges, according to the trust which the Kinges Maiestie hath in them. Howbeit, now at this tyme we call you before vs, not onely of custome, but rather of necessitie. For hearyng daily, and perceiuing of necessitie as we do, the great negligence, and the little heed which is taken and geuen to the obseruyng of the good and wholesome lawes and orders in this realme, wherupon much disorder doth daily ensue, and the kings maiesties proclamations and orders taken by the Counsaile (as we are aduertised) not executed, the people are brought to disobedience, and in a maner all his Maiesties study and ours, in setting a good and most godly stay, to the honour of God, and the quiet of the Realme, is spent in vayne, and come to nothing, The which as we haue great hope and trust, not to be altogether so, yet so much as it is, and so much as it lacketh of keepyng the Realme in a most godly order and stay, we must needes impute and lay the fault thereof in you which are the Iustices of peace in euery Shiere, to whom we are woont to direct our writinges, and to whose trust and charge, the Kings Maiestie hath committed the execution of all hys Proclamations, of hys actes of Parliament, and of hys lawes.

We are informed that many of you are so negligent and so slacke herein, that it doth appeare you do look rather,* as it were, through your fingers, then diligently see to the execution of the sayd lawes and Proclamations. For if you would, according to your duties, to your othe, to the trust which the kinges Maiesty hath in you, geue your diligēce and care toward the execution of the same most godly Sta'tutes and Iniunctions, there should no disobedience, nor disorder, nor euill rule be begon or arise in any part of the realme, but it should by and by be repressed, kept downe, & reformed. But it is feared, and the thing it selfe geueth occasion therto, that diuers of you do not onely not set forth, but rather hinder, so much as lyeth in you, the Kings maiesties procedinges, and are content that there should arise some disobedience, and that mē should repine against godly orders set forth by his maiesty: you do so slackly looke to the execution of the same: So that in some shyres which be further off, it may appeare that the people haue neuer heard of diuers of his maiesty's proclamations, or if they haue heard, you are content to wincke at it & to neglect it, so that it is all one as though it were neuer commaunded. But if you do consider and remember your dueties first to almighty God, and then to the Kings maiestie, the wealth of the whole realme, the safegard of your owne selues: you must needes see that except such orders as the kinges Maiestie Page 1303 hath set, and hereafter shall appoynt, be kept, neither can the realme be defended, if the enemy should inuade, nor in peace it cannot stand: but vpon the contempt of good and wholesome lawes all disorder and inconueniences should come, the people should be wyld and sauage, and no man sure of his owne.

If at any tyme there was occasion and cause to be circūspect and diligent about the same, there was neuer more tyme then now. How we stand in Scotland you know, & that their foreine power maketh great preparation to aide them, and in deed doth come to their ayde: wherof we are surely informed and certified.* Wherfore if there should not be good order and obedience kept in the realme, the realme were lyke vtterly to be destroyed. Neuer forreine power could yet hurt, or in any part preuaile in this realm, but by disobedience and disorder within our selues. That is the way wherwith God will plague vs, if he mynd to punish vs. And so long as we do agree among our selues, and be obedient to our prince, and to his godly orders and laws, we may be sure that God is with vs, & that foreine power shall not preuaile agaynst vs, nor hurt vs.

Wherfore once againe, and stil we must and do lay this charge vpon you that are the better of the shiere, and Iustices of the peace, that with so conuenient speed as you can, you do repayre downe into your Countries, and you shal geue warning to the gentlemen of the shiere which haue not necessarie busines here, that they repaire downe eche man to his countrey,* and there both you and they who be reckoned the stay of euery shiere, to see good order and rule kept: You that your Sessions of gaole deliury and quarter Sessions be well kept, and therein your meetyngs be such, that iustice may be wel and truly ministred, the offenders and malefactors punished according to the lawes of this Realme, without any feare of any man, or that for fauour you should suffer those to escape, which with their euill example might bring other to the like mishap: & that all vagabonds and lewd and light tale tellers and seditious bearers of false newes of the kinges maiestie, or of hys counsaile, or such as will preach without licence, be immediately by you repress and punished.

And if there should chaunce any lewd or light fellowes to make any routes or riotes, or vnlawfull assemblies, any seditious meetings,* vprores, or vprisings in any place by the seditious and diuelish motion of some priuy Traitors, that you and they appease them at the first, and apprehend the first authors and causers thereof, and certifie vs with speed. The lightnes of the rude and ignorant people must be repress and ordered by your grauitie & wisdom. And here you may not (if any such thing chance) dissemble with those such lewd men, and hide your selues, for it shall be required of you if such disorder be, and surely without your ayde and helpe, or your dissembling, such disorder can not be. Nor we do not say that we feare any such thing or that there is any such thing likely to chaunce: but we geue you warning before, least it should chaunce.

We haue to much experience in this realme, what inconuenience commeth of such matters. And though some light persons in their rage do not consider it, yet we doe not doubt but you way it and know it well enough.* And if it should chaunce our enemies (who are mainteyned by other forraigne power, and the bishop of Rome) should sodainly arriue in some place of England, eyther driuen by tempest, or of purpose to do hurt, ye should see such order kept by firing of their Becons, as hath already bene written vnto you by our letters to repulse the same in so good aray as you can, as we do not doubt but you will for the safegard of your countrey, so that the enemy shall haue little ioy of his comming: and for that purpose you shall see diligently that men haue horse, harnesse, and other furniture of weapon ready, according to the Statutes and good orders of the realme, and the kings maiesties commandements. And so for this tyme ye may depart.

What zealous care was in this yong kyng, and in the L. Protector his vncler,* concerning reformatiō of Christes Church and sincere religion, by these Iniunctions, letters precepts, and exhortations, as well to the bishops, as to y^e Iustices of the realme aboue premised, it may right well appeare. Wherby we haue to note, not so much the careful diligence of the king and his learned counsaile: as the lingering slacknes and drawing backe on the other side, of diuers the said Iustices and Lawyers, but especially of Bishops,* and old popish curates, by whose cloyed contempt, wilfull winkyng and stubburne disobedience the booke of common prayer was long after the publishing therof, eyther not knowen at all, or els very irreuerently vsed thoroughout many places of this realme. Which when y^e king by complaint of diuers, perfectly vnderstood, beyng not a little agreued, to see the godly agreement of the learned, the willyng consent of the Parliament, and his graces owne zealous desire to take so small effect among his subiects: decreed presently, with the aduise of his whole Counsaile, agayne to write vnto all the bishops of his realme, for spedy and diligent redresse therin: willing and commanding them therby, that as well they themselues should thenceforth haue a more speciall regard to the due executiō of the premisses, as also that all others within their seuerall precincts and iurisdiction should by their good instructions & willing example, be the more oftener and with better deuotion, moued to vse and frequent the same. As further appeareth by the contents of hys letter here ensuyng.

¶ Another letter directed by the King and hys Counsaile, to Boner Bish. of London, partly rebuking hym of negligence, partly chargyng hym to see to the better setting out of the seruice booke within his Diocesse.

RIght reuerend father in God: right trusty and welbeloued, we greete you well: and where as after great and serious debating and long conference of the bishops, and other graue and well learned men in the holy Scriptures, one vniforme order for common prayers and administration of the Sacramentes, hath bene and is most godly set forth, not only by the common agreement and full assent of the nobilitie and Commons of the late Session of our late Parliament, but also by the lyke assent of the bishops in the same Parliament, and of all others the learned m^e of this our realme in their Synodes and conuocations prouinciall. Like as it was much to our comfort to vnderstand the godly trauaile then diligently & willingly taken for the true openyng of things mentioned in the sayd booke, whereby the true seruice and honour of almighty God, and the right ministration of the Sacraments beyng well and sincerely set forth accordyng to the Scriptures & vse of the primatiue church, much idolatry, vayne superstition, & great and slanderous abuses be taken away: so it is no small occasion of sorow vnto vs, to vnderstand by the complaints of many, that our sayd booke so much traueled for, & also sincerely set forth (as is aforesaid) remayneth in many places of this our realme, eyther not knowen at all, or not vsed, or at the least if it be vsed, very seldome,* and that in such light and irreuerent sort, as the people in many places either haue herd nothing, or if they heare, they neither vnderstand, nor haue that spirituall delectation in the same, that to good christians appertaineth. The fault wherof, lyke as we must of reason impute to you and other of your vocation, called by God thorough our appointment to haue due respect to this and such lyke matters: so consideryng that by these and such like occasions, our louyng subiectes remaⁿe yet still in their old blyndnes, and superstitious errors, and in some places in an irreligious forgetfulnes of God, wherby his wrath may be prouoked vpon vs and them, and remembring with all, that amongst other cures committed to our princely charge, we thinke this the greatest, to see the glory and true seruice of hym maintained & extolled, by whose clemency we knowlege our selues to haue all that we haue, we could not, but by aduise and consent of our deerest vncle Edward duke of Somerset, gouernour of our person, and protector of our realme, dominions, and subiects, and the rest of our priuy counsaile,* admonish you of the premisses. Wherein, as it had bene your office to haue vsed an earnest diligence, and to haue preferred the same in all places within your Diocesse, as the case required: so haue we thought good to pray and require you,* and neuerthesse straightly to charge and commaund you, that from henceforth ye haue an earnest and speciall regard to the reduce of these things, so as the Curates may do their dueties more often and in more reuerent sort, & the people be occasioned by the good aduises and examples of your selfe, your Chauncellor, Archdeacons, and other inferior ministers, to come with oftener and more deuotiō to their sayd common prayers, to geue thanks to God, and to be pertakers of the most holy Communion. Wherein shewyng your selfe diligent, and geuyng good example in your owne person, you shall both discharge your duty to the great pastor, to whom we all haue to accompt, and also do vs good seruice: and on the other side, if we shall hereafter (these our letters and commaundement notwithstanding) haue eftsoones complaint, and finde the lyke faults in your dioces, we shall haue iust cause to impute the fault thereof, and of all that ensue thereof vnto you, and consequently be occasioned therby to see otherwyse to the redresse of these things: wherof we would be sory. And therefore we do eftsoones charge and commaund you vpon your allegiance, to loke well vpon your duety herein, as ye tender our pleasure.

Geuen vnder our signet at our Manor of Richmond, the 23. of Iuly, the 3. yeare of our raigne. 1549.

The B. of London among the rest of the bishops, receiuyng these letters, did (as alwayes tofore) in outward shew willingly accept the same: and therefore immediately Page 1304 (with the sayd letters) directed this his precept vnto the Deane and Chapter of his cathedrall Church of Paules, commanding them to looke to the due accomplishing therof accordingly.

¶A letter of Boner to the Deane and Chapter of Paules.

EDmund by the grace of God, &c. To my welbeloued brethren the Deane and Chapter of the Cathedrall church of S. Paule in London,* and to the other Ministers there and euery of them do send greeting. And where it is so, that of late I haue receyued the sayd soueraigne Lord the kings maiesties letter, of such tenure as is hereunto annexed, and according to my most bounden dutie, am right well willing and desiring, that the said letters should be in all points duely executed and obserued according to the tenure and purport of the same, as apperteineth: these therfore are to require, and also straightly to charge you and euery of you on his maiesties behalfe, &c. that you do admonish and commaund or cause to be admonished or commaunded, all and singuler Persons, Vicars, and Curates of your iurisdiction, to obserue and accomplish the same from time to tyme accordingly: Furthermore requiring and likewise charging you, and euery of you to make certificate herein to me, my Chauncellour or other my officers in this behalfe, with such conuenient celeritie as appertaineth both of your procedings in the execution hereof, and also the persons and names of all such, as from hencefoorth shall be found negligent in doying their duties in the premisses or any of them.

Geuen at my house at Fulham, the 26. of Iuly, in the yere of our lord. 1549.

and in the third yere of our sayd soueraigne Lord the kings Maiesties raigne.

Moreouer, for so much as the king at that instant hearing the muttering of certain rebellion thē stirring (wherof more shall be said the Lord willing hereafter) & also beyng credibly informed by diuers,* that through the euil example, slacknes of preaching and administring the sacraments, and carelesse contempt of Boner B. of London, not onely many of the people within the city of London, & other places of his Diocesse, were very negligent and forgetfull of their duties to God in frequenting the diuine seruice then stablished and set forth by the authority of parliament: but also that diuers other vtterly despising the same,* did in secret places of his Dioces, often frequent the popish masse and other forraigne rites not allowed by the lawes of this realme, he thought it therefore good (hauyng thereby iust cause to suspect his former dissemblyng doublenes) to appoint the L. Protector and the rest of his priuy counsaile to call the sayd B. before them, and accordyng to their wyse and discrete iudgements, to deale with hym for the same.

Wherupon the xj. day of August (an. 1549.) they sent a messenger for him, and vpon his appearaunce, made first declaration of such informations and complaints, as had bene theretofore made against him. And then after sharpe admonitions and reproofes for his euil demeanors in the premisses, they deliuered vnto him from the kyng (for hys better reformation and amendment) certaine priuate Iniunctions to be necessarily followed and obserued of hymselfe.* And where as in the first branch of the said Iniunctions, he was personally assigned to preach at Pauls crosse, the sonday three weekes then next ensuyng (because both the dangerous and fickle estate of the tyme, and also partly his owne suspicious behavior so required) they farther deliuered vnto him in writing such articles to intreat vpō in his Sermon, as they thought then most meete and necessary for the tyme and causes aforesayd. All which Iniunctions and Articles, for the farther manifestation therof, I haue here inserted, as followeth.

Certaine priuate Iniunctions and Articles geuen to Boner by the Counsaile.

FORasmuch as we are aduertised, that amongst other disorders of our subiects,* at this present there be diuers of our citie of London, and other places within your Dioces which beyng very negligent and forgetfull of their duetie to almighty God, of whom all good things are to be looked for, doe assemble themselues very seldome & fewer tymes then they were heretofore accustomed, vnto commō praier and to the holy Communion, beyng now a tyme when it were more needefull with hart and mynde to pray to our heauenly father for his ayd and succour: wherof as we be right sory, so we do vnderstand, that through your euil example and the slacknes of your preaching, and instructing our sayd people to doe their duties, this offence to God is most generally committed: for where heretofore vpon all principall feasts, and such as were called Maius duplex, you your selfe were woont to execute in person, now since the tyme that we by the aduise of our whole Parliament haue set a most godly and deuout order in our Church of England and Ireland, ye haue very seldome or neuer executed vpon such or other dais, to the cōtempt of our procedings & euil example of others: & forasmuch as it is also brought to our knowledge, that diuers as well in London as in other places of your Dioces, do frequent and haunt foraine rites of masses, and suche as be not allowed by the orders of our realme,* & contemneth and forbeareth to praise and laud God, and pray vnto his maiestie after such rites and ceremonies, as in this realme are approued & set out by our authoritie: and further that adultery and fornication is maintained and kept openly and commonly in the sayd citie of London & other places of your Dioces, wherby the wrath of god is prouoked against our people: of the which things, you beyng heretofore admonished,* yet hetherto haue made no redresse, as to the pastorall office, authoritie, & cure of a bishop doth appertaine: We therefore, to whom the supreme cure and charge of this Church doth appertaine, to auoid frō vs the high indignatiō of almightie God, by the aduise of our most entirely beloued Uncle the L. Protector and the rest of our priuy Counsaile, haue thought it no lesse then our most boūden dutie, now at this present, and eftsoones peremptorily to admonish, charge, & warne you, that you do most straightly looke vpon the premisses and see them so reformed, that there may appeare no negligence on your behalfe, vpon such payne as by our lawes Ecclesiasticall and temporall, we may inflict vppon you, vnto deprivation or otherwise, as shall seme to vs for qualitie of y^e offence reasonable. And to the intent you shold the better see to y^e reformation of the sayd abuses, we haue thought good to geue you these Iniunctions following.

1 First, ye shall preach at Paules Crosse in London,* in proper person, the Sonday after the date hereof iij. weeks, and in the same Sermon declare and set forth the Articles hereunto annexed: and ye shall preach hereafter once euery quarter of the yere there, exhorting in your Sermon the people to obedience, prayer, and godly liuyng: and ye shall be present at euery sermon hereafter made at Paules Crosse, if sicknesse or some other reasonable cause doe not let you.

2 Secondly, you your selfe in person shall from hencefoorth euery day which heetofore was accounted in this Church of England, principall feast, or Maius duplex, and at all such tymes as the Bishops of London your predecessours were woont to celebrate and sing high masse, now celebrate and execute the Communion at the hygh aultare in Paules, for the better example of all other, except sickenes do let.

3 Thirdly, ye shall your selfe according to your duetie & the office of a bishop, cal before you all such as do not come vnto and frequent the Common prayer and seruice in the Church, or do not come vnto gods boord, and receyue the Communion at the lest once a yeare, or whosoeuer do frequent or go vnto any other rite or seruice, then is appointed by our booke, either of Mattins, Euensong, or masse in any church, Chappell, or other priuate places within your Dioces, and ye shall see all such offenders conuented before you and punished accordyng vnto the Ecclesiasticall lawes, with seure and strait punishment therfore. Lykewise ye shall see one onely order vsed in your Diocesse according to our sayd booke and none other.

4 Fourthly, ye shall both by your selfe and all your officers vnder you, search out & conuent before you more diligently then heretofore ye haue done (as appertaineth to your office) all adulterers, and see the same punished according to the ecclesiastical lawes, and to the authority geuen you in that behalfe.

5 We haue heard also complaintes, that the Churche of Paules and other Churches of London are of late more neglected, as wel in reparation of the glasse, as other buildings and ordinaunces of the same, then they were heretofore woont, and that diuers and many persons in the citie, of malice denyeth the payment of their due tith to their Curates, wherby the Curates are both iniured and made not so well able and in maner discouraged to do theyr dueties. The which thyng also our will and commaundement is, ye shall diligently looke vnto, and see redressed as appertaineth.

6 And forasmuch as al these complaints be made as most done & committed in London,* to the intent you may looke more earnestly, better and more diligently to the reformation of them, our pleasure is that you shal abide and keepe residence in your house there, as in the citie, sea, and principall place of your Dioces, and none other where for a certaine tyme, vntill you shalbe otherwise licensed by vs.

Page 1305 And thus hauing brought B. Boner home to his own house, there to leaue hym a while to take his ease in hys owne lodging, til we returne to him againe, we wil in the meane tyme make a little intercourse into Cornewall and Deuonshire to discourse some part of the disordered and disloyall doings of those men against their so meeke and excellent a prince,* hauing no cause ministred therunto: yea hauyng cause rather to yeld prayse and thanks to the lord for such a quiet and peaceable prince in his mercy geuē vnto them. But such is the condition of vnquiet natures, that they cannot skill of peace. And where due discretiō lacketh, there lewd disposed persons cannot tel when they be wel, againe some be so crooked and so peruersly geuen, that the more curteously they be intreated, the worse they are: and when by honest diligence they lift not to get their liuyng, by publike disturbance of common weales they thinke to thriue. And so seemed it to fare with this seditious people of Cornewall and Deuonshire, who hauyng so good and vertuous a kyng, that if they should haue sought hym as Diogenes (they say) did seeke for a man with a candle, a meeker and better soueraigne they could not haue found, a crueller they well deserued: yet were they not with him contented, but contrary to al order, reason, nature and loialtie, aduaunced themselues in a rebellious conspiracie against hym, and agaynst his proceedings through the pernicious instigation, first (as it seemeth) of certaine popish priestes, who grudgyng and disdainyng agaynst the Iniunctions and godly order of reformation set forward by the king,* and specially mourning to see their olde popishe Church of Rome to decay, ceased not by all sinister & subtile meanes, first vnder Gods name and the kings, & vnder coulour of religion to perswade the people, then to gather sides and to assemble in companies, to gather Captaines,* and at last to brast out in ranke rebellion. Neither lacked there amongst the lay sort some as seditiously disposed as they to mischiefe and madnesse, as well Gentlemen as other.

Of whom the chiefe Gentlemen Captains were, Humfrey Arundell Esquire, gouernour of the Mount, Iames Rosogan, Iohn Rosogan, Iohn Payne, Thomas Underhil,* Iohn Soleman, William Segar. Of priests which were principall stirrers, and some of them gouernours of the Camps, and after executed, were to the number of 8. whose names were Rob. Bochim, Iohn Tompson, Roger Barret,* Iohn Wolcoke, Wil. Asa, Iames Mourton, Iohn Barow, Rich. Benet, besides a multitude of other popish priests, which to the same faction were adioyned. The number of the whole rebellion, speakyng with y^e lest mounted litle lesse then to the summe of ten thousand stout traitors.

These hearing first of the commotions which began about the same tyme in other parts to broyle, as in Oxfordshire,* Yorkeshire, and especially in Northfolke & Suffolk, began to take therin some courage, hoping that they shold haue well fortified the same with quarell. But afterward perceiuyng how the mischieuous mutterings and enterprises of their conspiracie did sodenly fayle, eyther beyng preuēted by tyme, or repressed by power, or that their cause beyng but onely about pluckyng down of enclosures and enlarging of commons, was deuided from theirs, so that eyther they would not or could not ioine their ayde together, then began they againe to quayle, and their courage to debate. Notwithstanding, for so much as they had gone so far, that they thought there was no shrinking back, they fell to new deuises and inuentions, for the best furtherance of their desperate purposes.

Their first intent was, after they had spoiled their own countrey most miserably, to inuade the Citie of Exceter, & so consequently all other parts of the realme. But first for Exceter they gaped,* the gates whereof twice they burned, but gayned nothing sauynge onely gunshot, whereof they lacked no plenty. Beyng put from Exceter, they fel on spoiiling and robbing, where or whatsoeuer they might catche. At length laying their traitorous heds together, they consulted vpon certain articles to be sent vp.* But herein such diuersitie of heds and wits was amongst them, that for euery kind of braine there was one manner of Article: so y^t neither appeared any consent in their diuersitie, nor yet any constancie in their agreement. Some seemed more tolerable. Other altogether vnreasonable. Some would haue no Iustice. Some would haue no state of gentlemen. The priests euer harped of one string to ring in the Bishop of Rome into England agayne, and to hallow home Cardinall Poole their countrieman.

After much ado and little to the purpose, at last a fewe sory Articles were agreed vpon to be directed vnto the kyng, with the names of certayne set thereunto, the copy whereof here ensueth.

¶The Articles of the Commons of Deuonshire and Cornewall sent to the king, with answer afterward followyng vnto the same.

First,* forasmuch as man except he be borne of water and the holy Ghost, cannot enter into the kingdom of God, and forasmuch as the gates of heauen be not opened without this blessed Sacrament of Baptisme, therefore we will that our Curates shall minister this Sacrament at all tymes of neede, as well in the weeke dayes, as on the holy dayes.*

Item, we will haue our children confirmed of the Bish. whensoever we shal within the Dioces resort vnto him.*

Item, forasmuch as we constantly beleeeue that after the Priest hath spoken the wordes of consecration beyng at Masse, there celebrating and consecrating the same, there is very really the body & bloud of our sauour Iesu Christ God and man,* and that no substance of bread and wine remaineth after, but the very selfe same body that was borne of the virgin Mary, and was geuen vpon the Crosse for our redemption: therfore we wil haue masse celebrated as it hath bene in tymes past, without any man communicatyng with the Priestes, forasmuch as many rudely presuming vnworthily to receiue the same, put no difference betwene the Lordes body and other kind of meat, some saying that it is bread before and after, some saying that it is profitable to no man except he receiue it, with many other abused termes.

Item, we will haue in our churches reseruacion.

Item, we will haue holy bread and holy water in the remembrance of Christes precious body and bloud.*

Item, we will that our Priestes shall sing or say with an audible voyce, Gods seruice in the Quier of the parish churches,* & not Gods seruice to bee set foorth like a Christmasse play.

Item, forasmuch as Priests be men dedicated to God, for ministring and celebrating the blessed sacraments and preachyng of Gods word,* we will that they shal liue chaste without Mariage, as S. Paule dyd, beyng the elect and chosen vessell of God, saying vnto all honest priests, be ye followers of me.

Item, we will that the vj. Articles, which our soueraigne Lord king Henry the 8. set forth in his latter days, shall be vsed and so taken as they were at that tyme.*

Item, we pray God saue king Edward, for we be his, both body and goods.

¶A Message sent by the Kings Maiestie, to certayne of his people assembled in Deuonshire.

Althoug knowledge hath bene geuen to vs & our derest vncle Edward Duke of Somerset,* Gouvernour of our person, and Protector of all our Realmes, dominions and subiects, and to the rest of our priuy Counsaile, of diuers assemblies made by you, which ought of duetie to be our louing subiects, against al order, law, & otherwise thē euer any louing or kind subiectes hath attempted agaynst their natural & liege soueraign lord: yet we haue thought it meete at this very first tyme not to condemne or reiect you as we might iustly do, but to vse you as our subiects,* thinking that y^e deuil hath not that power in you, to make you of naturall borne Englishmen, so sodainly become enemies to your owne natieue countrey, or of our subiects, to make you traitors, or vnder pretence to relieue your selues, to destroy your selues, your wiues, children, lands, houses, and all other commodities of this your lyfe. This we say, we trust that although ye be by ignorance seduced, ye will not be vppon knowledge obstinate. And though some amongst you (as euer there is some cockle amongst good corne) forget God, neglect their prince, esteeme not y^e state of the Realme, but as careles desperate men delite in sedition, tumult, and warres: yet neuertheles the greater part of you will heare the voyce of vs your natural prince and will by wisdom and counsell be warned, and cease your euils in the beginning, whose endes will be euen by almighty gods order, your owne destruction. Wherefore, as to you our subiects by ignorance seduced, we speake & be content •o vse our princely authority like a father to his children for this tyme, to admonish you of your faults, not to punish them, to put you in remembrance of your duties not to auenge your forgetfulness.

First, your disorder to rise in multitudes, to assemble your selues against other our louyng subiectes,* to aray• your selues to the warre, who amongst you al can answer for y^e same to almighty God, charging you to obey vs in al things? Or how can any English good hart aunswer vs, our lawes, and the rest of our very louyng & faithfull subiectes, Page 1306 who in deede •y theyr obedience, make our honor, estate,* and degree.

Ye vse our name in your wrytings, and abuse the same against our self.* What iniury herein do you vs, to cal those which loue vs, to your euill purposes, by the authoritie of our name? God hath made vs your king by his ordinance and prouidence, by our bloud & inheritance, by lawful succession and our coronation: but not to this end, as you vse our name. We are your most natural soueraigne Lord and king, Edward the sixt, to rule you, to preserue you, to saue you from all your outward enemies, to see our lawes wel ministred, euery man to haue his owne, to suppress disordred people, to correct traytors, theeues, pirates, robbers, and such like, yea, to keepe our realmes from foreine princes, from the malice of the Scots, of French men, of the B. of Rome. Thus good subiectes, our name is wrytten, thus it is honored & obeyed, this maiestie it hath by Gods ordinance, not by mans. So y^t of this your offence we can not write to much: And yet doubt not, but this is enough frō a prince to all reasonable people, from a king to al kind harted and louyng subiects, from a puissant king of England, to euery naturall English man.

Your pretences which you say moneth you to do thus, & wherwith ye seeke to excuse this disorder, we assure you, be either al false,* or so vaine, that we doubt not, but after ye shal hereby vnderstand the truth therof, ye wil al with one noyse knowledge your selues ignorantly led, & by error seduced, and if there be any that will not, assure you the same be rāke traitors, enemies of our crowne, seditious people, heretikes, Papistes, or suche as care not what cause they seeke to prouoke an insurrection, so they may doe it, nor in dede can waxe so rich with theyr own labors, & with peace as they can do with spoiles, with warres, with robberies, & such like, yea, with the spoile of your owne goodes, wyth the liuing of your labors, the sweat of your bodies, the food of your owne houtholdes, wiues, children. Suche they be, as for a time vse pleasant perswasions to you, & in the ende will cut your throtes for your owne goodes.

You be borne in hand, that your children, though necessity chance, shal not be christened but vpon the holy dayes. Howe false this is, learne you of vs. Our booke whych we haue set forth by the free consent of our Parliament,* in the English tongue, teacheth you the cōtrary, euen in the first leafe, yea the first side of the first leafe of that parte whyche entreateth of Baptisme. Good subiectes (for to others we speake not) looke and be not deceiued. They whych haue put this false opinion into your eares, they meane not the christening of children, but the destructiō of you our Christened subiects. Be this knowen vnto you, our honor is so much y^t we may not be found faulty of our word.* Proue it, if by our lawes ye may not christē your children vpon necessity euery day or houre in the weeke, then might you be offended: but seeing you may doe it, howe can you beleue them which teach you the contrary? What thinke you they meane in the rest, which moue you to breake your obediēce against vs your king & soueraigne, vpon these so fals tales and perswasions in so euident a matter? Therefore you all which wil knowledge vs your soueraigne Lorde, & which will heare the voyce of vs your naturall king, may easily perceiue how ye be deceiued, and how subtilly traitors and papistes wyth their falsehoode seeke to atchieue and brynge their purpose to passe with your helpe. Euery traitor will be glad to dissemble his treason and feede it secretly, euery papist his Poperie, & nourish it inwardly, and in the ende make you our subiectes partakers of treason and poperie, which in the beginning was pretended a common wealth and holinesse.

And howe are you seduced by them, which put in your heades the blessed sacrament of Christes body, shoulde not differ from other cōmon bread? * If our lawes, proclamations, and statutes be all to the contrary, why shall any priuate man perswade you against them? We doe our selfe in our owne heart, our counsaile in al their profession, our lawes & statutes in al purposes, our good subiects in al theyr doings, most highly esteeme that sacrament, & vse the communion therof to our most comfort. We make so much difference therof from other common bread, that we think no profite of other bread, but to maintaine our bodies. But of this blessed bread we take very foode of our soules to euerlasting life. How thinke you good subiects, shal not we being your prince, your Lord, your king by Gods appoyntment,* wyth truthe more preuaile, then certaine euill persons wyth open falsehoode: Shall any seditious persone perswade you, that the Sacrament is despised, which is by our lawes, by our selfe, by our Counsaile, by all our good subiectes, esteemed, vsed, participated, and daily receiued? If euer yee were seduced, if euer deceiued, if euer traytours were beleued, if euer papistes poysoned good subiects, it is nowe. It is not the Christening of children, not the reuerence of the sacrament, not the health of your soules y^t they shoote at, good subiectes. It is sedition, it is high treason, it is your destruction they seeke, howe craftily, nowe pitiously, how cūningly soeuer they do it. With one rule iudge ye the end, which o^r force must come of your purposes. Almighty God forbiddeth vpon pain of euerlasting damnation, disobediēce to vs your king: and in his place we rule in earth. If we should be slowe, would God erre? If your offence be towards God, thinke you it pardoned without repentance? Is Gods iudgement mutable? Your paine is damnation, your Iudge is incorruptible, your faulte is most euident.

Likewise are yee euill enfourmed in diuers other Articles, as for Confirmation of your children, for the Masse, for the maner of your seruice of Mattens and Euensonge▪ Whatsoeuer is therein ordered, hath ben long debated and consulted by many learned Bishops, Doctours, and other men of great learning, in this realm concluded: in nothing so much labor and time spent of late time, nothing so fully ended.

As for the seruice in the English tongue, hath manifest reasons for it. And yet perchance seemeth to you a newe seruice, and in deede is none other but the olde.* The selfe same woordes in Englishe which were in Latine, sauing a fewe things taken out, so fonde, that it hadde bene a shame to haue heard them in English, as all they can iudge which list to reporte the truthe. The difference is, we meant godly, that you our subiectes should vnderstande in English, being our natural countrey tongue, that which was heretofore spoken in Latine, then seruing onely for them which vnderstoode Latine, and nowe for all you whiche be borne English. How can this with reason offend any reasonable man, that he shall vnderstand what any other sayth, & so to consent with the speaker. If the seruice in the Church was good in Latine, it remaineth good in English, for nothyng is altered, but to speake wyth knowledge that was spoken with ignorance, and to let you vnderstand what is said for you, to the entent you maye further it with your owne deuotion: An alteration to the better, except knowledge be worse then ignorāce. So that who soeuer •ath moued you to mislike this order, can geue you no reason,* nor answeare yours, if ye vnderstoode it.

Wherefore you our subiectes remember, wee speake to you, being ordained your Prince and King by almighty God: if any wise we coulde aduaunce Gods honour, more then we doe, we would doe it: and see that ye become subiectes to Gods ordinances, obeying vs your Prince, and learne of them which haue authoritie to teache you, whiche haue power to rule you, and will execute our iustice, if we be prouoked. Learne not of them, whose fruits be nothing but wilfulnes, disobedience, obstinacie, dissimulation, and destruction of the realme.

For the masse, we assure you, no small studie nor trauell hath bene spent by al the learned Clergy therein,* and to auoyde all contention, it is brought euen to the verye vse as Christ left it, as the apostles vsed it, as holy fathers deliuered it, in dede somewhat altered from y^t the Popes of Rome, for their lucre brought to it. And although ye may hear the contrary of some Popish euil men, yet our maiestie, which for our honour may not be blemished nor stained, assureth you, that they deceiue you, abuse you, and blowe these opinions into your heads, for to finish their owne purposes.

And so likewise iudge you of confirmation of children: and let them answeare you this one question. Thinke they that a child christened,* is damned because it dieth before bishopping? They be confirmed at the time of discretion, to learne that they professed in the lacke therof, by Baptisme: taught in age, that which they receiued in infancie,* and yet no doubt but they be saued by Baptisme, not by confirmation, & made Christes by Christening, and taught howe to continue by Confirmation. Wherefore in the whole, marke good subiects, how our doctrine is founded vpō true learning, and theirs vpon shamelesse errors.

To cōclude, beside our gentle maner of information to you, what soeuer is contained in our booke, either for baptisme, sacrament, Masse, Confirmation, and seruice in the church, is by our parlament established, by the whole clergie agreed, yea by the bishops of the realme deuised, & further, by Gods word confirmed. And how dare ye trust, yea how dare ye geue care, without trembling, to any singuler person, to disallow a Parliament, a subiect to perswade against our maiestie, a man of his single arrogancie, against the determination of the Bishops, and all the clergie, anye inuented argument against the word of God.

But nowe you our subiects, we resort to a greater matter of your blindnes, of your vnkindnes, a great vnnaturalnes, & such an euill, that if we thought it had not begon Page 1307 of ignorance, and continued by persuation of certaine traitors amongst you, which we thinke few in number, but in their doings busie,* we coulde not be perswaded, but to vse our sword, and doe iustice, and as we be ordained by God, that is, to redresse your errors, by auengmēt: but loue and zeale yet ouercommeth our iust anger, but howe long that will be, God knoweth, in whose hand our hart is: and rather for your owne causes, being our Christened subiectes, we would ye were perswaded then vanquished, informed then forced, taught then ouerthrowen, quietly pacified then rigorously persecuted.

*Ye require to haue the statute of the 6. articles reuiued: and knowe ye what ye require? or knowe yee what ease ye haue with the losse of them? They were lawes made, but quickly repented, too bloody they were to be borne of oure people, and yet at the first in deede made of some necessitie. Oh subiects? how are ye trapped by subtile persons? we of pitie, because they were bloody, tooke them away, and you nowe of ignorance will aske them againe. You knowe full well, that they helped vs to extende rigour, and gaue vs cause to draw our sword very often: they were as a whetstone to our sworde, & for your causes we left to vse them. And since our mercie mooued vs to wryte our lawes wyth milke & equitie: how be ye blinded to aske them in bloud?

But leauing this maner of reasoning, and resorting to the truth of our authoritie, we let you witte, the same hath bene adnulled by our parlament,* with great reioyce of our subiects, and not now to be called by subiectes in question. Dare then any of you with the name of a subiecte, stand against an acte of parliament, a lawe of the whole realme? What is our power, if lawes shoulde be thus neglected? Yea, what is your suretie, if lawes be not kept? Assure you most surely, y^t of no earthly thing vnder y^e heauē, make such a reputation, as we doe of this one thyng, to haue our lawe obeyed, and this cause of God which we haue taken in hande, to be thorowly maintained, from the which we will neuer remooue a heares breadth,* nor geue place to any creature liuing, much lesse to any subiecte, but therein will spende our owne royall person, oure crowne, treasure, realme, and all our state: whereof we assure you of our highe honour. For heerein in deede resteth our honoure, heerein standeth our kingdome, heerein doe all kinges knowledge vs a king. And shall any of you dare breathe or thinke against our honor, our kingdome, or crowne?

In the end of thys your request (as we be geuen to vnderstand) ye would haue them stand in force vntill our full age.* To this we thinke, if ye knew what ye spake, ye wold neuer haue vttered y^e motion, nor euer geuen breath to such a thoughte. For what thinke you of our kingdome? Be we of lesse authoritie for our age? Be we not your king nowe, as we shalbe? or shall ye be subiects hereafter, and now are ye not? Haue not we the right we shal haue? If ye woulde suspend and hang our doings in doubt vntill our full age, ye must first know, as a king we haue no differēce of yeres nor time, but as a naturall man and creature of God, wee haue youth, & by his suffrance shall haue age: we are your rightful king, your liege Lord, your king annoynted, your king crowned, the soueraign king of England, not by our age, but by Gods ordinance, not only when we shal be 21. of yeares,* but when we were of 10. yeares. We possesse our crowne, not by yeares, but by the bloud and discente, from our father king Henry the eight. You are our subiects because we be your king, and rule we will, because God hath willed. It is as great a fault in vs, not to rule, as in a subiect not to obey.

If it be considered, they which moue this matter, if they durst vtter them selues, would deny our kingdome. But our good subiects know their prince, and will encrease, not diminish his honor, enlarge, not abate hys power, knowledge, not defer his kingdome to certaine yeares: al is one, to speake against our crowne, and to deny our kingdome, as to require that our lawes may be brokē vnto 21. yeres. Be we not your crowned, anoynted, and established king? wherein then be we of lesse maiestie, of lesse authoritie, or lesse state, then our progenitors kings of this realme? except your vnkindnes, our vnnaturalnes wil diminish our estimation. We haue hitherto, since the death of our father, by the good aduise and counsaile of our deare and entirely beloued vncle, kept our state, maintained our realme, preserued our honour, defended our people from all enemies: we haue hitherto bene feared and drede of our ennemies: yea, of princes, kings, and nations: yea, heerein we be nothing inferiors to any our progenitours (which grace we knowledge to be geuen vs from God) and how els, but by good obedience of our people, good counsaile of our magistrates, due execution of our lawes. By authoritye of oure kingdom, England hitherto hath gained honour, during our raigne, it hath wonne of the enemye, and not lost.

It hath bene maruailed, that we •f so yong yeres haue raigned so nobly, so royally, so quietly.*
And howe chanceth it, that you our subiectes, of that our countrey of Deuonshire, will geue the first occasion to slander this our realme of Englande, to geue courage to the ennemye, to note our Realme of the euil of rebellion, to make it a pray to our old enemies, to diminish our honour, which God hath geuen, our father leaft, our good vncle and Counsaile preserued vnto vs? What greater euill could ye commit, then euen now when our forraine enemye in Scotland and vpon the sea seeketh to inuade vs, to arise in thys manner againste our lawe, to prouoke our wrath, to aske our vengeance, and to geue vs an occasion to spende that force vpon you, whyche we meant to bestow vpon our enemies, to beginne to slay you with that sworde which we drewe forth agaynste the Scots and other enemies: to make a conquest of our owne people, whych otherwise shoulde haue bene of the whole Realme of Scotland?

Thus •arre yee see we haue descended from oure highe maiestie for loue, to consider you in your base and simple ignorance, and haue bene cōtent to send you an instruction like a fatherly Prince, who of iustice might haue sent you your destructiō like a king to rebels, & now let you know, that as you see our mercy abūdant, so if ye prouoke vs further, wee sweare to you by the liuing God, by whome wee raigne, ye shal fele the power of y^e same God in our sword: which how mighty it is, no subiect knoweth, how puissant it is, no priuate man can iudge, how mortall it is, no English heart dare thinke. But surely surely, as your Lord and Prince, your onely king and maister, we say to you, repent your selues, & take our mercy without delay, or els we wil forth with extend our princely power, & execute our sharpe sword against you, as against very Infidels and Turkes, and rather aduenture our owne roial person, state and power, then the same shall not be executed.

And if you wil prooue the example of our mercy, learne of certaine which lately did arise, pretending some grief•s, and yet acknowledging their offēces, haue not only receiued most humbly their pardon, but feele also by our order, to whom al publike order only pertaineth, redresse deuised for their griefs. In the end we admonish you of your dueties to God, whom ye shal answere in the day of the Lord, and of your dueties toward vs, whom ye shal answere by our order, & take our mercy whilest God so enclineth vs, least when yee shall be constrained to aske, wee shall be too much hardened in heart to graūt it you: and where ye shall nowe heare of mercy, mercy and life, ye shall then heare of iustice, iustice and death.

Geuen at Richmond, the 8. day of Iuly, the third yeare of our raigne.

Besides the Articles of these Deuonshire men aboue mētioned, the sayd rebels sent vp also not long after a supplication to the king,* wherunto answere again was made by the kings learned Counsaile, which here to make short, leisure serueth not to rehearse.

Ouer and besides, to behold the malitious working of those popish Priests, to kindle more the sparke of sedition in the peoples hearts, what brutes and rumours did they raise vp against the king and his Counsaile, makinge the vulgare multitude to beleeeue, that they should be made to pay first for their sheepe,* then for their geese and pigges also, and suche other thinges like: and what soeuer they had in store, or should put in their mouths, they must fine therfore to the king? Of all which matter neuer a worde was eyther thought or meant. But this seemed matter fitte for such priests whereby to set the Prince and hys subiects together by the eares.

Against this seditious company of rebels was apoynted and sent by the king and his counsaile, Syr Iohn Russel knight, Lord priuy Seale, as Lieutenant general of the kings armie, of whome chiefly depended the charge and achiuaunce of that voyage in the West partes. To hym also were adioyned as in parte of ordinary counsaile in those affaires vnder him, syr William Harbert, syr Iohn Pawlet, Syr Hugh Pawlet, Syr Thom. Specke, wyth the Lorde Gray, and other besides.*

Thus the sayde Lorde priuie Seale accompanied wyth the Lord Gray, aduauncing his power against the rebels, although in number of soldiers not equally furnished like to the other, yet through the gracious assistaunce of the Lordes helpe fighting in his cause, and geuing the aduenture against the enemye, about the latter end of Iuly. Anno 1549. gaue them the repulse. Who notwithstanding recouering them selues againe wyth suche stomackes as they had, encountred the seconde time with the foresayde Lorde priuie Seale, about the beginning of August following, of whom, through the Lords mighty power, they with their whole cause of false religion were vtterly vanquished and Page 1308 ouerthrowen.

In the which victorie a great woorke of Gods mightye power vndoubtedly did appeare. For althoughe the number of the rebels did surmounte in great quantitie, the power and strength of the Lorde priuie Seale, and theyr stomackes were so fiercely set vpon al desperate aduentures, and though the power of Sir W. Harbert (being the same time at Bristow) was not yet presently come, which shuld haue ioyned with the Lorde priuie Seale: yet all thys notwithstanding, the goodnes of the Lorde so wrought on the kings behalfe, more then any industry of man (which in al respects in handling that matter was very raw and farre behinde) that the victorie fell to the kings parte, vnder the valiant guiding of the aforesayd L. priuie Seale: so that the popishe rebels not onely lost the fiede,* but a great parte of them also lost their liues, lying there slain miserably in the chase to the compasse of 2. miles space. Where also were taken and apprehended the chieftaines and ringleaders of that mischieuous daunce: wherof the principal were Humfrey Arundel, Berry, Thomas Underhil, Iohn Soleman, W. Segar,* Tempson, and Barret two Priestes, Henrye Bray and Henrye Lee, two Maiors, wyth diuers other mo aboue specified: al which accordingly afterwarde were executed.

These rebels to make their part more sure by the helpe and presence of their consecrated God and maker,* brought with them into the battaile the Pixe vnder his Canapie, and in steed of an aultar, where he was hanging before, set him now riding in a Carte. Neither was there lacking masses, crosses, banners, candlesticks, with holy breade also, and holy water plentie, to defend them from deuils and all aduersarye power, whyche in the ende neyther coulde helpe theyr frends, nor yet could saue them selues from the handes of theyr ennemies, but eftsoones both the consecrated God and al the trumperie about him, was taken in the carte, and there lay all in the dust, leauinge to them a notable lesson o• better experience howe to put their confidence heereafter in no suche vaine Idolles, but onely in the true liuing God, and immortall maker, to be serued according to hys prescribed worde, and that onely in the faithe of hys sonne, and not after theyr owne dreaming fantasies.

The storie whereof putteth mee also in remembraunce of an other like popish field, (called Muscledborough field) •ought in Scotland the yeare before this, where the Scots likewise encamping them selues against the Lorde Protectour,* and the kynges power sente into Scotlande, did in semblable wise bringe with them to the battaile the consecrated gods of their aultares, wyth Masses, Crosses, banners, and all their Popish stuffe of Idolatrie, hauing great affiaunce, by vertue thereof to haue a great day against the English armie, as in deede to mannes iudgement myghte seeme not vnlike. For the number of the Scottes armye so farre exceeded ours,* and they wer so appoynted with theyr pikes in the first fronte against our horsemen (which gaue the first onset) that our men were faine to recule, not without the losse of diuers Gentlemen. Notwythstanding, the mighty arme of the Lorde so turned the victorie, that the Scottes in the ende with all their Masses, Pixes, and Idolatrous trinkets were put to the woorse. Of whome in that fielde were slayne betweene 13. and 14. thousande, and not passing an hundreth Englishe men.* The cause of thys was the promise of the Scots made before to king Henry, for the marriage of the young Scottish Queene to Kynge Edward, which promise the sayd Scots afterward brake and paide thereafter.

In the whiche victorie this is also to be noted, that the same day and houre when the images were burned openly in London, the Scots were put to flighte in Muscledborough, as is credibly noted in Recordes.

During this hurley burley amongst the popish rebels in Cornwall and Deuonshire, the like commotion at the same time, by suche like popish priestes, as Homes and his felowes, began to gender in the parties of Oxforde & Buckingham, but that was soone appeased by the Lord Gray, who comming downe that waye into Deuonshire, chased the rebelles to their houses. Of whom 200. wer taken, and a dosen of the ringleaders deliuered vnto him, wherof certaine were after executed.

In Northfolke and parties thereabout, all be it the originall of theyr tumultuous sturring was not for the like cause,* yet the obstinate hearts of that vnruely multitude semed no lesse bent vpon mischief, to disturbe publike peace, which was also in the moneth of Iuly, the yere abouesayd. For repression of whych rebellion, first was sent the Lorde Marques of Northampton,* wyth speciall instruction to auoide the fighte, and so by order was appoynted wyth a number of horse to keepe the field and passages, whereby they being stopped from vittaille, might the sooner be brought to acknowledge their follie, and to seeke theyr pardon. Who then following other pollicie, then by order was geuen, came and pinned him selfe wythin the Citie of Norwiche, which afterwarde they were faine to abandone, the rebelles pressing vppon the Citie so on euery side, that at length they obtained the same. Neuerthelesse, in all that conflicte there was but an hundreth on both sides slayne, and otherwise no great <◇> , but onely the losse of the Lord Sheefielde.

Then was sente downe▪ againste them the Earle of Warwike wyth sufficient force and number of souldiours, besides the conuey of 2000. Almaines,* by whome the rude and confused rabble was there ouerthrowne and slaine, to the number, as is supposed at the least of 4000. And in fine, both the Kettes chiefe sturrers and authours of that commotion were taken and put to execution,* and one of them hanged vp in chaines.

Moreouer, besides these inordinate vprores and insurrections aboue mentioned, about the latter ende of the said moneth of Iulye, the same yeaere, which was 1549. an other like sturre or Commotion beganne at Semer, in the Northriding of Yorkeshire,* and continued in the Eastriding of the same, and there ended. The principal doers and raisers vp whereof was one W. Ombler of Easthes•erton yeoman, and Tho. Dale parish clarke of Semer, with one Steuenson of Semer, neighbour to Dale, and nephewe to Ombler.* Which Steuenson was a meane or messenger betwene the said Ombler and Dale, being afore not acquainted together, and dwelling seuen miles one from the other. Who at last by the trauaile of the said Steuenson and their owne euil dispositions inclined to vngratiousnesse & mischief, knowing before one the others mind by secrete conference, were brought to talke together on S. Iames day. An. 1549.

The causes moouing them to raise thys rebellion, were these, first and principallye theyr traiterous heartes grudging at the kings most godly proceedings,* in aduauncinge and refourming the true honour of God, and his religion. An other cause also was, for trusting to a blinde and a fantastickall prophecie, wherewith they were seduced, thinking the same prophecie shoulde shortly come to passe, by hearing the rebellions of Northfolke, of Deuonshire, and other places.

The tenor of which prophisie & purpose, together of the traytors was, that there should no king reigne in Englād the noblemen and gentlemen to be destroyed: and y^e realm to be ruled by 4. gouernors,* to be elected & appointed by y^e commons holding a parlament in cōmotion, to begin at y^e south, and north seas of England. &c. supposing that thys their rebellion in the North, and the other of the Deuonshire men in the west, meeting (as they intended) at one place, to be the meane how to compasse this their trayterous deuilish deuise.

And therefore laying their studyes together, how they mighte finde out more companye to ioyn with them in that detestable purpose, and so set forward to sturre,* thys deuise they framed, to sturre in two places, the one distant seuen myles from the other, and at the first rush to kill and destroy such gentlemen and men of substaunce about them as were fauourers of the kinges proceedinges, or which would resist them. But first of all, for the more speedy raysing of men, they deuised to burne Beacons, and therby to bring the people together, as though it were to defend the Sea coastes, and hauing the ignoraunt people assembled,* then to poure out theyr poyson: first beginning with y^e rudest and poorest sorte suche as they thought were pricked w^t pouertie, and were vnwilling to labour, and therefore the more ready to followe the spoyle of rich mens goodes, blowing into their heades, that Gods seruice was layd aside, and newe inuentions neither good nor godly put in place, and so feeding them with fayre promises,* to reduce into the Church agayne their olde ignoraunce and Idolatry, thought by that meanes soonest to allure them to rage & rŭne with them in this commotion. And furthermore to the entent they would geue the more terrour to the gentlemen at their first rising, least they shoulde be resisted, they deuised that some should be murdered in Churches, some in theyr houses, some in seruing the king in commission, & other as they might be caught, and to pick quarrels to thē by alteration of seruice on the holy dayes. And thus was the platforme cast of their deuice, according as afterward by their confession at their examinations was testified and remayneth in true recorde.

Thus they being together agreed, Omblor and Dale, and other by their secret appoyntment, so laboured the matter in y^e parish of Semer, Wintringeham, & y^e townes about, that they wer enfecte with the poyson of this confederacy, in such sorte, that it was easie to vnderstād wherunto Page 1309 they would encline, if a commotion were begun. The accomplishmēt wherof did shortly folow. For although by the words of one drunken fellow of that conspiracie named Caluered,* at the alehouse in Wintringham, some suspicion of that rebellion beganne to be smelled before by the Lord President and Gentlemen of those parties, and so preuented in that place where y^e rebels thought to begin: yet they gaue not ouer so, but drewe to another place at Semer by the Sea coaste, and there by nighte roade to the Beacon at Staxton, and sette it on fire: and so gathering together a rude route of rascals out of the townes neare about beyng on a sturre, Omblor, Thomas Dale, Barton, and Robert Dale hasted foorthwith with the rebels to maister Whytes house, to take him, who notwithstandinge being on horsebacke, minding to haue escaped theyr handes, Dale, Omblor, and the rest of the rebelles tooke him, and Clopton hys wiues brother,* one Sauage a marchant of Yorke, and one Bery seruaunt to sir Walter Mildmay, which foure without cause or quarel, sauing to fulfil their seditious Prophecie in some part, and to geue a terror to other gentlemen, they cruelly murdered after they had caried them one mile from Semer towards the Wolde, and there after they had stripped them of their clothes and purses, leaft them naked behind them in the plain fields for crowes to feede on, vntill Whites wife, and Sauages wife then at Semer caused them to be buried.

Longe it were and tedious to recite what reuell these Rebelles kept in their raging madnesse, who raunging about the countrey from towne to towne, to enlarge theyr vngratious and rebellious bande, taking those with force whyche were not willing to goe, and leauing in no towne where they came,* any man aboue the age of 16. yeres, so encreased this number, that in shorte time they had gathered three thousande to fauour theyr wicked attempts, and had like to haue gathered moe, had not the Lordes goodnesse through prudent circumspection haue interrupted y^e course of theyr furious beginning.

For firste came the kinges gracious and free pardone, discharging and pardonyng them and the rest of the Rebels of all treasons,* murders, felonies, and other offences done to his Maiestie, before the 21. of August, Anno 1549. Whyche pardone although Omblor contemptuously refused,* persisting still in hys wilfull obstinacie, dissuadyng also the rest from the humble accepting the kinges so louing and liberall pardon, yet notwithstanding wyth some it did good.

To make shorte, it was not long after thys, but Ombler, as he was riding from towne to towne, twelue miles from Hūmanby, to charge all the Constables and inhabitantes where he came, in the kings name to resort to Hunmanby, by the way he was espied, and by the circumspecte diligence of Ihon Word the yonger, James Aslabay, Rafe Twinge, and Thomas Constable Gentlemen, hee was had in chase, and at last by them apprehended, and brought in the night in sure custodie vnto the Citie of Yorke, to answeere to his demerites.

After whome within short time, Thomas Dale, Henrye Barton, the first chiefetaines and ringleaders of the former commotion, with Iohn Dale, Robert Wright, W. Pecocke, Wetherell, & Edin. Buttry, busie sturrers in thys seditiō, as they trauailed from place to place, to draw people to theyr faction, were likewise apprehended, committed to warde,* lawfully conuicted, and lastly executed at Yorke the 21. of Septemb. An. 1549. Ex actis Iudicij publici registro receptis & notatis.

To these pestiferous commotions raised vppe against kyng Edwarde by his owne subiectes in this yeare aforesaide wythin the Realme,* I might also adioyne the busie sturring and raging of the French king, against our yong and innocent Prince, without the Realme. Who hearing of these tumultes and violent insurrections of the kinges subiectes, in diuers and sundrye quarters of the Realme, supposing to take the time for his most aduantage, thought likewise for hys parte not to be vnoccupied. Who after hee had by his ambassadour made open breche with the kinge, immediately after the reuocation of the sayde ambassadour from hence, entending to anoy the king, and make his first inuasion against the Iles of Iersey and Gernsey, thought to haue surprised our shippes and the said Iles with a certaine number of his ships and Galleys. In the which hys assault, he was so hotely saluted by the kinges shippes and the Island, that by the confession of them that sawe it, and by the report wrytten vnto the Lord Protector, the French men at least lost a thousand men, theyr ships and galleis so spoiled, as being forced to return home, they were not able then to set out againe.

*Furthermore, out of Fraunce creadible woorde was broughte to the Lorde Protectoure (whyche yet in letters appeareth) that into one towne in one vessel were brought at least three score Gentlemen to be buried: and also an •hibition special geuen out by the king, not to speake of 〈◇〉 successe in that iourney. Thys was about the beginning of August. 1549.

The like also might be noted of the losses of the sayde French king at Bullenburgh, the eight day of August,* the same yeare, as by the Lord Clintons letters may well appeare: but for spending of time I passe it ouer: What the meaning of the French king was in these voiages,* or how he intended further to procede, I haue not herein to deale. This is certain and euident, that the mighty arme of God mercifully fought for king Edwarde his seruant, to defend and deliuer him from so many harde dangers, so dāgerous and sundrye commotions stirred vp in so many quarters within this Realme, and also without the Realme, and all wythin the compasse of one yeare, and yet the Lorde aboue fighting for his true seruant, dispatched them all, as in storie heere ye haue heard declared, and is no lesse worthy of all posteritie to be noted.

Matter concerning Edmund Boner Bishop of London, with declaration of the Actes and processe entred against him in king Edwardes time.

ANd thus muche hetherto hauing discoursed touching the manifold troubles and tumults raised vp on euery side against king Edward, by his vnkinde and vnnatural subiects, and yet notwithstanding, the gracious goodnesse of the Lorde euer geuing him the victorie: nowe lette vs returne againe to Boner Byshop of London, where we leaft hym before, that is, in hys owne house, where he was by the Counsaile commaunded to remaine, as is aboue signified.

And nowe for so much as we haue to enter into the storie of the sayd Boner, for the better vnderstandinge of the whole order therof, it shalbe requisite to rip vp the matter wyth the circumstaunces and occasions thereof from the first beginning of kinge Edwardes time. Where is to be vnderstanded,* that king Edwarde in the first yere of hys raigne, an. 1547. the first day of September, for the order of hys Uisitation, directed out certaine Commissioners, as sir Anthony Cooke, sir Iohn Godsaulle Knightes, Maister Iohn Godsaulle, Christopher Neunson Doctours of the Lawe, and Iohn Madew Doctour of Diuinitie. Who sitting in Paules church vpon their commission, the day and yere aforesaide, there being presente at the same time Edmund Bishop of London, Iohn Royston, Polidore Uirgil, Peter Uan, and others of the saide cathedrall Church,* after the sermone made, and the Commission being reade, ministred an othe vnto the said B. of London, to renounce and deny the bishop of Rome with his vsurped authority, and to sweare obedience vnto the king, according to the effect and forme of the statute made in the 31. yere of kinge Henry the eight: also that he should present and redresse all and singular such things as were needeful within the sayd Church to be reformed.

Wherupon the said Bishop humbly and instantly desired them that he might see their commissiō,* only for this purpose & intent (as he sayd) that he might the better fulfill & put in execution the things, wherein he was charged by them in their commission. Unto whom the commissioners answearing, said, they wold deliberat more vpon the matter, & so they called the other ministers of the saide Church before them, and ministred the like oth vnto them, as they did to the bishop before.* To whom moreouer there & then certaine interrogatories and articles of inquisition were read by Peter Lillye the publike Notarie. Which done, after their othes taken,* the sayde Commissioners deliuered vnto the Bishop aforesaid certaine Iniunctions as wel in printe as wrytten, and Homilies set foorth by the king. All which things the sayde Bishop receiued vnder the wordes of thys protestation, as followeth.

I Do receiue these Iniunctions and Homilies with this protestation, that I will obserue them,* if they be not contrarye and repugnaunt to Gods lawe, and the statutes and ordinaunce of the Church, and immediately added with an othe, that he neuer reade the sayde Homilies and Iniunctions.

The whyche Protestation being made in manner and fourme aforesaid, the said Edmund Bishop of London instantly desired and required Peter Lilly the register aforesaide, there and then to register and enact the same. And so the sayd Commissioners deliuering the Iniunctions and Homilies to Maister Bellasiere Archdeacon of Colchester, and to Gilberte Bourne Archdeacon of London, Page 1310 Essex, and Middlesexe, and enioyning them in moste effectuous manner, vnder paines therein contained, to put the same in speedy execution, and also reseruing other new iniunctions to be ministred afterward, as wel to the bishop, as to the Archdeacons aforesayd, according as they should see cause. &c. did so continue the visitation til 3. of the clocke the same day in the afternoone.

At the whiche houre and place assigned, the Commissioners being set, and the Canons and Priestes of the sayd Church appearing before them, and being examined vpon vertue of theyr othe, for their doctrine and conuersation of life: first one Iohn Painter, one of the Canons of the said Cathedrall church, there and then openly confessed, that he viciously and carnally had often the company of a certaine married mans wyfe,* whose name he denied to declare. In the which crime diuers other Canons and Priestes of the said church, confessed in like maner, & could not deny them selues to be culpable.

And then after the Commissioners aforesayde had deliuered to Maister Royston Prebendary, and to the proctour of the Deane and of the Chapter of the sayde Cathedrall Church of Sainte Paule, the kinges Iniunctions, and the booke of Homelies, enioyninge them to see the execution thereof, vnder paine therein specified, they proroged theyr sayde visitation vntill seuen of the clocke the next day following.

By this visitation aboue specified, it appeareth, gentle Reader, first howe Boner made his Protestation after the receiuing of the kinges Iniunctions, and also how he after required the same to be put in publike recorde.* Furthermore, thou hast to note the vnchast life and conuersation of these popish votaries and priestes of Paules. Nowe what followed after this protestation of the Bishop made, remayneth further in the sequele of the storye to be declared, wherein first thou shalt vnderstand y^t the said B. shortly after his Protestation, whether for feare or for conscience, repenting himselfe, went vnto the King, where hee submitting himselfe and recantinge his former protestation,* craued pardon of the king for his inordinate demeanor toward his graces Commissioners, in the former visitation. Whych pardone, notwithstanding it was graunted vnto hym by the Kynge, for the acknowledging of hys fault, yet for the euill example of the facte,* it was thoughte good that hee should be committed to the Fleete, as by the tenoure of the Counsailes letter sente to the Commissioners, maye appeare, whych together wyth the fourme also of the Bishoppes protestation and of hys recantation, heere vnder followeth.

To our very louing frendes Syr Anthony Cooke Knight, and the rest of the Commissioners, for the visitation at London,* in haste.

AFTER our heartie commendations: This shalbe to signifie vnto you, that we haue receiued your letters, and in the same enclosed the copie of the protestation made by the Bishop of London, in the time of your visitation at Paules: your wise proceedings wherein and aduertisements from you, wee take in verye thankfull part towardes vs. And because the sayd Bishop which being heere before vs, hath acknowledged his indiscrete demeanour, did at that time at Paules require the Register of your visitation to make recorde and enter of his protestation,* and nowe vppon better cōsideration of his duetie, maketh meanes to haue the same reuoked, as shall appeare vnto you by the true copie of his wrytinge inclosed, the originall whereof remaining wyth vs he hath subscribed: wee pray you to cause the Register to make enter of this his reuocation, accordinge vnto the tenour of thys his said wryting: Further signifyinge vnto you, that in respecte of his offence, and the euill ensample that might thereupon ensue, we haue thought meete to sende him to the prisone of the Fleete,* whether hee hathe bene conueyed by maister Vicechamberlaine. And whereas sundry thinges for the kinges Maiesties seruice doe nowe occurre heere, whyche require the present attendaunce of you Sir Iohn Godsaulle, as well for your office of the Signet, as of the Protonoriship: we pray you, that leauing the execution of the visitation to the rest of your colleagues, you make your repaire hither with conuenient diligence. Thus fare you right hartily well.

The forme of Boners recantation,

WHere as I Edmunde Bishop of London, at suche time as I receiued the kings maiesties Iniunctions and Homilies of my most dreade soueraigne Lorde, at the handes of his highnesse visitours, did vnaduisedly make such protestation, as nowe vpon better consideration of my duetie of obedience, and of the euill ensample that might ensue vnto others thereof, appeareth to mee neither reasonable, nor suche as might well stande with the duetie of an humble subiecte: for so much as the same protestation at my request was then by the Register of that visitation enacted & putte in Recorde, I haue thoughte it my duetie, not onely to declare before your Lordshippes, that I doe now vppon better consideration of my duetie, renounce and reuoke my sayde protestation, but also most humbly beseeche your Lordships, that thys my reuocation of the same may be in likewise putte in the same recordes for a perpetuall memorie of the truth, moste humbly beseeching your good Lordshippes, both to take order that it maye take effect, and also that my former and vnaduised doings may be by your good mediations pardoned of the kings maiestie.

Edmund London.

The Registers of these affaires of Boners,* remaineth in the handes of Peter Lillie, then beinge Register to the foresayd Commissioners.

Thus farre thou haste heard (louing Reader) firste the popish protestation of Boner,* then how he calling himselfe home againe, solemnely recanted the same, requiringe further the sayde his reuocation to be committed to publyke Record, for a perpetual remembraunce. Also how he vpon his humble submission receiued his pardō of the king, and yet for examples sake was commanded to the Flete. Where he neuertheles did not long continue, but accordinge to the effect of the kings pardon afore graūted, was restored both to house and liuing againe: Which was in the first yeare of the king. An. 1547.

After this yee haue heard also in the story aboue, in the second yeare, and a great part of the thirde yere of the king, howe he demeaned hymselfe, although not most forward• in aduauncing the Kinges proceedings, yet in suche sorte, as no great aduantage by any law could be taken againste him, both in swearing his obedience to the king, and in receiuing hys Iniunctions: also in professing hys assent and consent touchinge the state of Religion then: and furthermore in directinge out hys letters, accordynge to the Arch-Bishop of Canterburys Preceptes, to Cloney his Sumner, to the Bishop of Westminster and other Bishoppes, for abolishing of Images, for abrogation of the Masse, for Bibles to be set vpp, and for ministring in both kindes, with such other matters of reformation like: till at length he hearing of the death of the Lorde Admirall the Lorde Protectours brother,* and after that of the sturring and rising of the kinges subiectes in sundrye tumultes agaynst the king, beganne somewhat, as hee durst to drawe backe and slacke his pastoral dilligence, so that in many places of his Dioces, and in London the people not only were negligent in resorting to deuine seruice, but also did frequent and haunt forreine rites of masses and other orders, then in this Realme appoynted,* and hee also himselfe contrary to his wonted maner vpon principal feastes refused in his owne person to execute. Whereupon he being suspected and complayned of, and conuented before y^e kinges Counsaile (as ye heard before) after sharpe admonitions and reproofes, had certayne priuate Iniunctions to hym enioyned.

1. First, that hee shoulde personally preache within three weekes after at Paules crosse.*
2. That according as his predecessours were wont to celebrate Masse, he at such wonted tymes shoulde execute and administer the Communion.
3. That he shoulde call before him and correcte more dilligently such transgressours as absented them selues from the order of seruice and ministration of the Lordes boorde, appoynted then in Churches by the kinges ordinaunce.
4. That he shoulde see more carefully and vigilantly to the punishment of adulterers and fornicators.
5. That he in the meane while shoulde be resident within his owne house,* during the time while he should make his sermon at Paules aboue mentioned, whiche was an. 1549. In the whiche sermon certayne speciall poyntes were prefixed vnto him, whereupon he should intreate, whiche here in order follow, and are these.

Speciall poyntes and articles to be intreated of of Boner Bishop of London, in his Sermon.

2. THat all such as rebell against their prince, get vnto thē damnation, and those y^t resist the higher power, Page 1311 resist the ordinaunces of God, and he that dieth therfore in rebellion, by the woorde of God is vtterly damned, and so looseth bothe bodye and soule. And therefore those Rebelles in Deuonshire and Cornewall, in Northfolke, or els where, who taking vpon them to assemble a power & force against their king and Prince, against y^e lawes and statutes of the Realme, and goe about to subuerte the state and order of the commō wealth, not onely do deserue therfore death, as traytors & rebels, but do accumulate to them selues eternal damnation, euen to be in the burning fire of hell, with Lucifer the father and first authour of pride, disobedience, and rebellion, what pretence so euer they haue, and what Masses or holye water so euer they pretende, or goe about to make among themselues, as Chore, Dathan, and Abiron, for rebellion against Moses, were swallowed downe aliue into hell, although they pretended to sacrifice vnto God.

2 Likewise in the order of the Churche and externe rites and ceremonies of diuine seruice, for so muche as God requireth humility of heart, innocencie of liuing, knowledge of him, charity and loue to our neighbours, and obedience to hys woorde, and to his Ministers and superioure powers, these we must bring to all our prayers, to all our seruice, & this is the sacrifice that Christe requireth, and these be those that make all thynges pleasaunt vnto God. The externe rites and ceremonies be but exercises of our religion, & appointable by superior powers, in chosing wherof we must obey the magistrates: the whyche thinges also we do see euer hath bene and shalbe (as the time and place is) diuers,* and yet al hath pleased God so long as these before spoken inwarde things be there. If any man shall vse the olde rites, and thereby disobey the superior power, the deuotion of his ceremonies is made nought by his disobedience: so that, which els (so longe as y^e lawe did so stand) myghte be good, by pride and disobedience nowe is made noughte: as Saules sacrifice, Chore, Dathan, and Abiron, and Aarons 2. children were. But who that ioyneth to deuotion obedience, hee winneth the garland. For else it is a zeale, sed non secundum scientiam, a wil, desire, zeale, and deuotion,* but not after wisdom, that is a foolishe deuotion which can require no thanks or praise. And yet agayne, where ye obey, yee must haue deuotion, for God requireth the heart more then the outward doings, and therfore who that taketh the Communion, or sayth or heareth the seruice appoynted by the kings maiestie,* must bring deuotion and inward prayer with hym, or els his praier is but vaine, lacking that whyche God requireth, that is, the heart and minde to pray to him.

3 Further, yee shal for example on sonday come seuenth night after the aforesayd date, celebrate the Communion at Paules Church.

4 Ye shal also set foorth in your sermon, that our authoritie of royal power, is (as of truth it is) of no lesse authoritie and force in this our yōg age, then is, or was of any of our predecessors, though the same were much elder, as may appeare by example of Iosias, and other yong kings in scripture: and therfore all our subiectes to be no lesse bound to the obedience of our preceptes, lawes, and statutes, then if we were of 30. or 40. yeares of age.

The deliuey of these Iniunctions & articles vnto the Byshop (with the time of hys appoynted preaching) was soone after knowen abroad amongst the citizens and other the Cōmons within the citie of London,* so that euery man expecteth y^e time therof, wishing to heare the same. Whych being once come, the B. according to the tenour of the Iniunctiōs, publikely preached at the Crosse of Paules, the 1. day of September. Howbeit as hipocrisie neuer lurketh so secretly in the hearts of the wicked, but that at one time or other, God in hys moste righteous iudgemente maketh it open vnto the world: so at this present was the long colored peruerse obstinacie, and infestred hatred of this double faced dissembler, against the kings godly proceedings, most plainly manifested by hys disobedient demeanor in thys his sermon.

*For where as he was only commanded to entreat vpon such speciall poynts as were mentioned in his articles: he yet, both besides the counsailes commaundement, to the withdrawing of the mindes of the common people, in as much as in him lay, from the right and true vnderstāding of the holy Sacrament ministred in the holy Communion then set foorth by the authoritye of the kinges maiestie, (according to the true sence of the holy scripture) did spēd most part of his sermon about the grosse, carnall, and papisticall presence of Christes body and bloud in the sacrament of the aultar, and also contrary therunto, did not onely slenderly touch the rest of his articles, but of a rebellious and wilful carelesnes, did vtterly leaue oute vnspoken the whole laste article, concerning the as effectuall and as lawful authority of the kings highnes during his yong age, as if he were 30. or 40. yeares old: notwithstanding the same (because it was the traiterous opinion of the popishe rebels) was by special commaundement chiefly appoynted hym to entreat vppon.

This contemptuous & disobedient dealing, as it greatly offended most of the kings faithfull and louing subiects there present, so did it muche mislike the mindes,* and was farre from the good expectation, as well of that faithful and godly preacher master Iohn Hooper, afterwards bishop of Worcester & Glocester, and lastly a moste constant martyr for the Gospell of Christe: as also of M. William Latimer, Bacheler of Diuinitie, and therefore they well weying the fulnes of the fact, and their bounden alegeances vnto their Prince, did therupon exhibite vnto the kings highnes vnder both their names, a bill of complaint or denunciation against the sayd bishop in forme folowing.

The denuntiation of Iohn Hooper and William Latimer against Boner, to the kings maiestie, for leauing vndone the poyntes afore mentioned, which he was charged to preache vppon.

IN most humble wise sheweth vnto your Maiestie, William Latimer and Iohn Hooper, that where of late,* as we be certainly infourmed frō your maiestie, by the hande of the right highe and noble Prince Edward Duke of Somerset, Gouernour of your Royal person, and Protectour of al your highnes realmes, dominions and subiects, and the rest of your priuie Counsaile, there was certaine Iniunctions geuen to the Byshop of London that nowe is, with Articles to be insinuated and preached vnto youre subiectes at a certaine daye limitted, the whyche Iniunctions and articles did onely tende to the honour of GOD, and the better instructions of your highnes people, to obedience and hatred of rebellion and mutinie, wherewith of late this your Maiesties Realme hath bene marueilously vexed, to the daunger of your highnes person, and the state of the whole Realme, and there•ore a thinge at thys time most necessary to be taught vnto y^e people, that they myght knowe their duetie vnto your maiestie, and vnto almighty God, and especially to acknowledge your Maiestie in these yeares & age to be a perfect, high, and soueraigne Lord and king, and supreme head, whose lawes, proclamations, and commaundementes we are bounde to obey, as wel as any princes subiects are bounde to obey the lawes, proclamations, and commaundementes of their naturall and soueraigne Lord, notwithstanding that nature hath not yet giuen vnto your person suche age as we trust he shall, nor so many yeares, which we wish to be so many as any Prince euer hadde, the whych yeares doe not make you Kynge or Prince, but the righte of your birthe,* and lawfull succession what soeuer it be, so that we all must as well acknowledge your maiestie to be our Kinge and Prince, at these yeares, as if you were of the age of 30. or 40. yeares, and your lawes and statutes no lesse to be feared & obeyed, thē if your highnes were 50. or 100. yeres olde, (the whyche thing not onely is most certainly true, but also at this time most necessarily to be taught, especially when diuers rebelles haue openly declared, that they woulde not obey your highnesse lawes, nor acknowledge the Statutes made by your Maiestie to be auailable til ye come to the age of 20. yeres) and this not only being so,* but the same thing being commanded by your sayd Maiestie amongst other Iniunctions & Articles geuen in wryting to the sayde Edmund Boner, to be preached in his last sermon, as by the same Iniunctions maye appeare, of the whiche the true copie we haue when neede is to be shewed: yet al this notwithstanding, the said Boner, of what zeale or minde we cannot tell, whether fauoring the opinion of the saide rebels, or contemning your highnesse commaundement declared to him,* hath not only left out to declare the sayd Article, which we most & chiefly expected and looked for, but also in all the rest of his Sermons did not so fully and apertly declare the sayd Iniunctions and Articles as to our iudgement did appeare, they ought to haue bene declared, and was of no lyght grounde looked for, intreating of other farre distant and diuers from the Articles vppon the which he was commaunded to entreat, and such as most should moue and stirre vp the people to disorder and dissension, willingly leauing oute those things which should haue made quiet & obedience. Wherefore not mooued of any malice, grudge, enuie, or euil will to the person of the bishop, but constreined by the loue & zeale which we beare towards your highnes, & of our duty and allegiance to your maiesty, whose honour and sauety with Page 1312 tranquillitie, quietnesse and good gouernaunce of this your Realme, we do most desire, and for y^e discharge of our most bounden duties, to auoyde all the daungers that might ensue of the concealement thereof, we most humbly do denounce and declare the same to your highnes, to the intent that your Maiestie by the aduise aforesayd, may, if it please your highnes, at this our humble denuntiation, call the sayd Byshop to aunswere to the premisses, the which we are ready to auowe and proue, and then your highnes to take further order heerein, as to your Princely wisdomes shall seeme most conuenient: whose long life, and most prosperous gouernement, God almighty long continue, for the which we shall pray during our liues.

The Kings Maiestie hauing thus by the information of these two credible persons, perfect intelligence of the cōtemptuous & peruerse negligence of this Bishop, in not accomplishing his highnes commaundement geuē him by Iniunction, thought it most necessary with all conuenient speede (for the auoiding of farther inconueniences) to loke more seuerely vnto the due punishment of such dangerous rebellious obstinacie, and therfore by the aduise of the Lord Protectour,* and the rest of his honorable Counsaile, immediatly he directed forth his commission vnder his broad Seale, vnto the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Rochester, and to other graue and trusty personages and Counsellors, appointing & authorising all thē, or certain of them, by vertue of the same, to call before them, as well the Bishop of London,* as also the foresaid denouncers, & vpō due examination & prooffe of y^e premisses, or any other matter otherwise to be objected, farther to proceed against him su••arely & de plano, according to law and Iustice, either to suspension, excōmunicatiō, committing to prison, or deprivation (if the qualitie of the offence so required) or otherwise to vse any other censure Ecclesiasticall, which for the better hearing and determining of that cause, myghte to their wisdomes seeme more pertinent, as appeareth more amply by the tenour of the Commission heere ensuing.

The copie of the Kings Commission sent downe vpon the denunciation aforesayd, for the examination of Boner Byshop of London.

EDward the sixt, &c. To the most reuerent father in God Thomas Archbyshop of Canterbury, Metropolitane and Primate of all England,* the right reuerend father in God Nicholas Byshop of Rochester, our trusty and right welbeloued Counsellers Syr William Peter, and Syr Thomas Smith Knightes, our two principall Secretaries, and William Maye Doctour of the Law Ciuile and Deane of Paules, greeting. It is come to our knowledge, that where we by the aduise of our most entirely beloued Vncle Edward Duke of Somerset, gouernour of our person, and Protectour of all our Realmes, dominions and subiects, and the rest of our priuy Counsayle, did giue to the right reuerend father in God Edmund Byshop of London, vpon certayne complaynts before made vnto vs and other great considerations, certayne Iniunctions to be folowed, done, and executed, and in a Sermon appointed to him to preach by vs with certaine articles, and for the more sure knowledge, keeping, and obseruing, did exhibite the same in writing vnto him by the hands of our sayd Vncle, in the fulfilling of our Counsell: all this notwithstanding the said Bishop hath in contempt of vs (as it may appeare) ouerslipped and not obserued certeine of the said things so by vs enioyned, and other so peruersely and negligently done that the things minded of vs to reformation & for a good quiet of our subiects and our whole realme, be conuerted by the wilfull negligence or peruersitie of him, to a great occasion of sclaunder, tumult and grudge amongst our people, as it hath bene denounced to vs in writing by certeine honest and discrete persons & otherwise called. The which things if they be so, we tendring the wealth, quietnes, good order and gouernement of our people, haue not thought conuenient to be let past vnpunished and vnreformed, and therefore by the aduise aforesayd, haue appointed you fiue, foure, or three, vppon whose fidelities, wisdomes, dexterities and circumspections, we haue full confidence, to call before you, as well the denouncers of the sayd faultes, as also the sayd Byshop, and with due examinations and processe, according to the law and Iustice, to heare the said matter and all other matters of what kind, nature, or condition so euer they shall be, that shall be objected against the said Byshop, summarily [& de plano,] or otherwise as to your discretions shall be thought most meete, with full power and authoritie to suspend, excommunicate, commit to prison, or depriue the said Bishop, if the offence shal so appeare to merite, or to vse any other censure Ecclesiasticall, which for the better hearing and determining of the cause, shall be requisite and appertene, any lawe, statute, or acte to the contrary notwithstanding. In witnes wherof, we haue caused these our letters to be made patent.

Witnes our selfe at Westminster the viij. of September, in the third yeare of our reigne.

This commission being sealed with the kinges broad seale,* was by his highnes Counsaile forthwith deliuered at the Court vnto the archb. of Caunterbury, and the rest of the Commissioners mentioned in y^e same, being there al together present. Who vpon the receipt therof determined by vertue of the same, to sit at the archbishops house at Lambeth the Wednesday th^en next ensuing. Which was y^e tenth day of that present month of September, and therefore appoynted the Bishop o^f London to be sommoned to appeare before them as at that time and place. The maner of whose behauiour at his appearaunce, because it both declareth the froward nature and stubborne condition of the person, and also what estimatiō and authoritie he thought the commissioners to be of, I thought not vnmeete fyrst, before I enter into the processe, somewhat to note and describe vnto you.

At his first entry into the place within the Archbishops house at Lambeth,* where the Archbishop and other of the Commissioners sate, he passed forth directly by them wyth his cap vpon his head (making as though hee sawe them not) vntil one plucking him by the sleeue, willed him to do reuerence vnto the Commissioners. Wherat he laughingly turned himselfe, & spake vnto the archb. on this wyse: what my Lord, are you here? By my trouthe I sawe you not. No sayde the Archbishop, you woulde not see. Well (quoth he) you sent for me: haue you anye thinge to say to me? Yea sayd the Commissioners, we haue here authority from the kinges highnes to call you to accompte for your Sermon you made lately at Pauls crosse, for that you did not there publishe vnto the people the article whiche you were commaunded then to preach vpon. At which words the bish. either for that he did not greatly delite to heare of this matter, or els because he would make his friends beleue that hee was called to accompt onely for his opinion in religion (as afterwarde in the sequell of this processe it more playnly appeareth) began to turne his talke vnto other matters, and saide vnto the archbishop.* In good fayth my Lord, I would one thing were had in more reuerence, the• it is? What is it sayd the Archbishop? The blessed masse, •oth he.* You haue written very well of the sacrament: I merueile you doe no more honour it? The Archbishop of Cant. therewith perceiuing his subiltie: and seing his grosse blindnes to commend that which was vtterly contrary to his opinion, sayd vnto him agayne.* If you thinke it wel, it is because you vnderstand it not. The other then adding vnto his former grosse ignoraunce an obstinate impudencie, aunswered:* I thinke I vnderstand it better then you that wrote it. Unto which woordes the Archbishop replied: truely I wil easily make a childe that is but ten yeares old vnderstand therein as much as you: but what is this to the matter?*

Moreouer at what time as they began to enter the Iudicial prosecuting of theyr commission, and had called forth the denouncers to propound such matter as they hadde to object agaynst him, he hearing them speake,* fel to scorning and taunting of them, saying to the one, that he spake lyke a Goose, and to the other, that he spake like a Woodcokke, vtterly denying theyr accusations to be true. Wherupon y^e Archbishop (seeing his peenish malice agaynst the denoũcers) asked him if he would not beleue them, whether hee woulde credite the people there present, and therewithall (because many of them were also at the Bishops Sermon at Paules) he stode vpp and read the article of the kinges authoritie during his young age, saying vnto them,* howe say you my maysters, did my Lord of London preach thys Article? Whereunto they aunswered no, no. At which wordes the Bishop turning himselfe about, deryding sayd: wil you beleue this fond people?

Besides this,* at al his appearings he vsed many irreuerent, vncomely, obstinate and froward wordes and behauiours towards the Commissioners and others (in defacing their authoritie with the termes of pretended Commissioners, pretended witnesses and vniust vnlawfull and pretended proceedinges, with recusation of some, and terming others Dawes, Woodcockes, fooles, and such lyke) which I wil here omitte, for they doe more manifestly appeare in the sequele of the story in the tyme and place, as they happened: Adding yet this much by the way, that although suche stoutnes of hart and will (if it had bene in a cause true and rightfull) might haue perchaunce seemed in some mens iudgement to be somewhat sufferable: yet to say the truth, in what cause so euer it be, being unmoderate as this shall appeare, it beseemed no wise man, and therefore much lesse one of his calling. For if his cause had bene good, why did he not take the wrong patiently and meekly, as the true Canon law of the Gospell doth teach hym? If it were (as it was in deede) naught and wrong, wherto serued so bolde sturdy stoutnesse, but to shewe the impudency Page 1313 of the person and to make the cause worse whiche was bad enough before? But belike he was disposed to declare, if neede were, what he was able to do in the law, in shifting off the matter by subtill delatories, and friuolous cauilling about the lawe. And if that would not helpe, yet with facing and brasing, and railing vpon the denouncers, with furious wordes, and irreuerent behauiour towards the Kings Commissioners, he thought to countenance out the matter before the people, that some thing might seeme yet to be in him, whatsoever was in the cause. For to conclude, for all his craftie cauteles and tergiuersations alledged out of the law, yet neither his cause could be so defended, nor his behauiour so excused, but that hee was therefore both iustly imprisoned, and also in the ende most lawfully depriued: as by the sequele of this processe may well appeare, the manner whereof is as followeth.

¶The first Action or Session agaynst Boner.

*VPon Wednesday the x. day of September in the yere of our Lord 1549. and in the third yeare of the reigne of King Edward the vj. Thomas Cranmer Archbyshop of Canterbury, Metropolitane and Primate of all England, associate with Nicholas Ridley then Bishop of Rochester, sir William Peter Knight, one of the kings two principall Secretaries, and William May Doctour of the Ciuill law and Deane of Paules, by vertue of the Kyngs Commission, sate Iudicially vpon the examination of Edmund Boner Byshop of London, within the Archbishops chamber of presence at his house in Lambeth, before whome there then also personally appeared the sayd Byshop: at whiche time the Commissioners first shewyng forth their Commission, requested sir William Peter that he would openly publish and reade the same. Which done, the Archbishop in the name of the rest, declared vnto the Bishop that a greeuous complaint had bene theretofore made and exhibited against him in writing vnto the kings Maiestie, and his honorable Counsaile, and that therefore his highnes, with their aduise, had committed the examination thereof vnto him and other his Colleges there present, as also vnto sir Thomas Smith Knight, the other of his Maiesties two principall Secretaries though then absent, and therewithall shewed also forth a Bill of complaynt exhibited vnto the King by William Latymer and Iohn Hoper Ministers, which they likewise requested sir William Peter to reade.

These things ended, the Byshop like a subtill Lawyer, hauing most like some secret intelligence before of these matters, (whatsoever he pretended to the contrary) pulled out of his bosome a solemne protestation ready written: which he then exhibited vnto the Commissioners, requesting that the same might be there openly read: the copie whereof is this in tenour and forme as foloweth.

The tenour and forme of Edmund Boner Bishop of London his protestation, exhibited to the Kings Commissioners at hys first appearing.

EDmundus Lond. Episcopus primò & ante omnia protestor quòd per hanc meam comparitionem seu per aliqua per me hic dicta seu dicenda, allegata seu alleganda, proposita seu proponenda, exhibita seu exhibenda, gesta seu gerenda, obiecta seu obijcienda, exercita seu exercenda, facta seu fienda, petita seu petenda, non intendo in vos dominos Iudices praesentes tanquam in iudices mihi in hac parte competentes & idoneos aliquò modo consentire vestram iurisdictionem praesentem in hac parte aliquatenus prorogare, nisi prout ac quatenus de iure ad hoc teneat & astringar rationique consonum videatur: & sub protestatione praedicta & ea semper mihi salua (a qua recedere non intendo, sed eandem in omnibus & singulis deinceps in hoc negotio praetenso per me agendis, pro repetita haberi volo) dico & allego quòd literae commissionales pretensae vobis (vt dicitur) in hac parte directae, seu earum vera & legitima copia nunquam ante hac mihi ostensae aut monstratae fuerunt, nec a me aliquo modo visae, lectae aut cognitae, vel mihi traditae. Itaque contra formam & tenorem earundem, vel contra personas aliquorum vestrum, ea quae de iure ac naturali ratione mihi competunt in hac parte, cum reuerentia (qua decet) obijcere, ac in debita iuris forma proponere non possum in praesenti vt deberem. Quare vt defensio congrua quae nulli hominum deneganda est, mihi reseruetur liquidòque sciam cuiusmodi exceptiones mihi in hac parte competere possint ac debeant, vtque eas suis loco & tempore iuxta iuris exigentiam, pro necessaria defensione mea proponam contra vel pretensas literas commissionales huiusmodi, vel contra personas aliquorum vestrum, quatenus liceat & expediat sub protestatione praedicta, facultatem dictas praetensas litteras commissionales in forma originali inspiciendi, ac earum veram, integram, & fidelem copiam debitè exinde mihi fieri humiliter peto & postulo prout iuris est in hac parte, tenore praesentium: nihilominus •estatum manifestè relinquens, quòd obseruantiam & reuerentiam, ac obedientiam & honorem, ac caetera quaecunque serenissimae Regiae Maiest. Domino meo supremo has literas praetensas vobis (vt dicitur) committenti qualitercunque decet in omnibus & per omnia perpetuò humillimè recogniturus sum, habiturus & praestiturus, & his exceptionibus, & defensionibus legitimis mihi de iure & natura competentibus ad defensionem meam necessariam & legitimam ac non aliter in hac parte vsurus.

This Protestation being read, he requested the Commissioners that he might haue the Bill of complaint deliuered him: which when he had well perused, he sayd that the same was very generall, and so generall, as that hee coulde not directly aunswere thereunto.* Whereunto the Archbyshop aunswered, that the speciall cause of the complaint against him was, for that he had transgressed the Kings commaundement, geuen vnto him by his Counsaile, in that he in his late Sermon made at Paules crosse, did not set forth vnto the people the Kings highnes royall power in his minoritie, according to the tenour of the Article deliuered vnto him by them for that purpose: and for prooffe thereof called forth William Latimer and Iohn Hoper preachers, who before that time had put vp the bill of complaint vnto the King against him.

Upon whome, when the Byshop had earnestly looked, (and well beheld them) he said: as for this Marchant Latimer, I know him very wel, and haue borne with him, & winked at his euill doings a great while, but I haue more to say to him hereafter. But as touching this other Marchaunt Hooper, I haue not seene him before, howbeit I haue heard much of his naughty preaching: and then turning himselfe againe to the Archbyshop (of purpose most like to make his frends thinke that he was not called thether to aunswere his contemptuous disobedience,* but for matters of Religion) sayd vnto him: Ah my Lord, now I see that the cause of my trouble is not for the matter that you pretend against me, but it is for that I did preach and set foorth in my late Sermon, the true presence of the most blessed body and bloud of our Sauour Iesus Christ to be in the Sacrament of the aulter. For,* as for these my accusers, as they be euil, infamed, and notorious criminous persons, so are they manifest and notable heretickes, and seducers of the people, especially touching the Sacrament of the aultar: and most of all this Hooper.

For where in my late Sermon at Paules crosse I preached that in the blessed Sacrament of the aultar,* after the words of consecration, there is the true body and bloud of our Sauour Iesus Christ, the selfesame in substaunce that was hanged and shed vpon the Crosse: he the same day at after noone, hauing a great rabblement with hym of his damnable sect, openly in the Pulpit within my Dioces, did preache erroneously to the people against it:* and maliciously inueying against my Sermon, denied the veritie and presence of Christes true body and bloud to be in the same Sacrament, and also falsely and vntruely interpreted and expounded my words. And specially,* where I preached and affirmed the very true body and bloud of our Sauour Iesus Christ to be in the sayd Sacramente, the selfesame in substance that was hanged and shed vpon the Crosse: he like an Asse (as he is an Asse in deede) falsely chaunged and turned the word that into as, like an Asse, saying that I had sayd, as it hanged, and as it was shed vpon the Crosse.

The Archbyshop heereupon perceauing the Byshops drifte, and hearing hym talke so muche of the presence of Christes body and bloud in the Sacramente,* sayde vnto him: My Lord of London, ye speake much of a presence in the Sacrament: what presence is there, and of what presence do you meane? Wherewith the Byshop being somewhat sturred and moued in mind (as appeared by his collericke countenaunce) spake againe to the Archbishop very earnestly, and sayd: What presence my Lord? I say and beleue that there is the very true presence of the body and bloud of Christ. What beleue you, and how do you beleue my Lord? Upon which words the Archbishop,* because he saw his aunswere darke and subtyll, and minding somewhat to nip the grosse absurditie of the Papists, asked him farther whether he were there, face, nose, mouth, eyes, armes, and lips, with other liniamentes of his bodye? Whereat the Byshop shaking his head, sayd: Oh, I am right sory to heare your grace speake these wordes, and therewith boldly vrged the Archbyshop to shew his mind therein. Who wisely waying the fond presumption of the partie, with the place and occasion of their assembly, refused then so to do, saying: that their being there at that time, was not to dispute of those matters, but to prosecute theyr Page 1314 Commission committed to them by their Prince, and therfore willed him to aunswere them vnto such thinges as were objected against him.

Whereupon vnder his Protestation, he requested to haue a copy both of the Commission,* and also of the denunciation geuen vnto him, with time to aunswere thereunto. Which the Commissioners willingly graunted, assigning him there to appeare agayne before them vpon Friday at eight of the clocke before noone, then next following, and then to aunswere the tenour of the denunciation. And so for that day (he complying somewhat of the shortnes of his time to aunswere) they all departed.

¶The second appearaunce of Boner in the Chappell of Lambeth, before the Archbyshop, and other four Commissioners, the Byshop of Rochester, Secretary Peter, Secretary Smyth, and the Deane of Paules.

Vpon Friday the xiiij. of September aforenamed, foure Commissioners, associated then also with Sir Thomas Smith Knight, the other of the Kings two principal Secretaries,* and ioynt Commissioners with them, sate iudicially in the Archbyshops Chappell within his house at Lambeth. Before whome (according to their former assignement) there and then appeared the Byshop of London. To whome the Archbyshop in the name of the rest, first sayd: My Lord of London, the last time you were before vs, we layde certayne Articles and matter to youre charge touching your disobedience to the Kings Maiesty, and you haue this day to make your aunswere thereunto: wherefore now shew vs what you haue to say for youre defence.

Whereunto the Byshop first asking the Archbyshop if he had all sayd and done, and he againe saying yea, made this answere: My Lord, the last day that I appeared before you, I remember there sate in the Kings Maiesties commission, your Grace, you my Lord of Rochester, you M. Secretary Peter, and you M. Deane of Paules: but now I perceiue there sitteth also M. Secretary Smyth. Who because he sate not at the beginning, nor tooke there the Commission vpon him, ought not so to do: for by the law, they which begin, must continue the commission.

Whereupon the Archbishop first aunswere, that he was no lawyer, and therefore could not certainly shew what the law willeth in that case, but (saith he) if the law be so in deede, surely I take it to be an vnreasonable law.

Well, said the Byshop, there be heere that knoweth the law: and yet I say not this to the intent to stand or sticke much in this point with you, but to tell it you as it were by the way: for I haue heere mine aunswere ready.

Then sayde Maister Secretary Peter to the Byshop: my Lord in good sooth I must say vnto you, that although I haue professed the law, yet by discontinuance and disuse thereof,* and hauing bene occupied a long time in other matters from study of the law, I haue perhaps forgotten what the law will do precisely in this point: but admit the law were so as you say, yet your selfe knoweth my Lord, that thys is our certayne rule in law, Quòd consuetudo est iuris interpret optimus, and I am sure you will not, nor can not deny, but that the custome is commonly in this realme in all iudgements and Commissions vsed to the contrary: and in very deede altogether at the Court, hauing the Com•••ion presented vnto vs, take it vpon vs: and therfore for you to sticke in such trifling matters, you shall rather in my iudgement hurt your selfe and your matter, then otherwise.

Truely Maister Secretary (sayd the Byshop) I haue also of long while bene disused in the study of the law, but hauing occasion (partly by reason of this matter) to turne my bookes, I finde the law to be as I say: and yet (as I sayd) I tell you heereof by the way,* not minding to sticke much with you in that poynt.

At which wordes Maister Secretary Smyth sayd also vnto the Byshop: well my Lord of London, as cunning as you make your selfe in the law, there be here that knoweth the law as well as you: and for my part I haue studied the law to, and I promise you, these be but quiddites and quirkes inuented to delay matters, but our Commission is to proceede summarily,* & de plano, and to cut off such friuolous allegations.

Well (sayd the Bishop againe) looke well on your commission, and you shall finde therein these wordes: to proceede according to the law and Iustice, and I aske both lawe and Iustice at your handes.

Then Maister Secretary Peter willed hym to stand no more thereupon, but to proceede vnto his aunswere. Wherupon he tooke foorth a writing, wherein was contained his aunswere to the denunciation exhibited the day before by Latimer and Hooper, and deliuering it vnto the Archbishop, sayde, that it was of his owne hand writyng, and for lacke of sufficient time written so hastily & coursely, that it could scarsly be read of any other, and therefore he desired to read it himselfe: and so taking it agayne read it openly, the copy whereof here followeth.

The aunswere of the sayd Bishop, made to the denuntiation aforesayd.

I Edmond bishop of London, concerning William Latimer & Iohn Hooper, the pretended denunciators of thys matter here nowe before you, and for aunswere vnto the vnlawfull, vntrue and vncharitable pretended denunciation of them, lately in deede contrarye to iustice and good reason, exhibited here and read before you vnder protestation heretofore made by me and red vnto you, remayning in the actes of this court, to which I referre me, and haue the same here agayne for repeated and rehearsed to all purposes agreeable to the law, do for my necessary defence and helpe alleage and say as followeth.

First I do alledge and say, that the sayd William Latimer and Iohn Hooper,* or either of thē were not nor now are to be admitted in any wise by vertue of this or anye other commission, as denunciators against me their Byshop specially, for that they and either of them haue aswell before the time of this pretended denunciation and also thē and since bene and be vile, and infamed, notorious, criminous persons and also open and manifest notable heretickes, especially concerning the sacramentes of the catholicke Church, and namely concerning the blessed Sacrament of the aulter,* by reason of whiche their heresies they were and be by the order of the sayde Catholicke Church here in this realme of England iustly and duely, excommunicated and accursed, and haue deuided thēselues therby from the vntie and integritie of Christes Catholick church and for such persons they haue bene and are named, reputed and taken, openly notoriously and commōly amongst the catholicke people of this Realme of Englande, and especially of this Citty of London, familiarly haunting and conuersaunt with sacramentaries and openly knowne condemned heretickes and fauorers and Abbettors of the same, and theyr detestable & pestilent doctrine & heresie. 2. Item that the sayde Iohn Hooper amonges other hys poysoned and venemous doctrine, and amonges other his erroneous, detestable, and abhominable errors and heresies taught and spread abroad here within this realme infecting and poysoning the kinges subiectes therewyth hath before the tyme of the sayde pretended denunciation, damnably and detestablie made diuers erroneous, and hereticall bookes, especially one intituled a declaration of Christ and of his offcie, printed (as hee falsly surmiseth) in Zurick by Augustine Friers, where hee in many places, heretically and damnably denyeth the true presence of Christes body in the blessed sacrament of the aulter, and also in effect denyeth the verity of Christes blessed bodye vpon the crosse, calling it Mathematticall and excludyng thereby the true and very substaunce thereof. 3.* Item that the sayd Iohn Hooper doth perseuer and continueth still in his sayd poysoned and wicked venemous doctrine in al poyntes mayntayning and defending the same and euery part therof, all the wayes he can, especially agaynst y^e presence of Christes blessed body in the sacrament of the altar, and his sayde bookes, especially the sayde declaration of Christ and of his office, he doth yet allowe and mayntayn as good and Catholicke, where in deede it is hereticall, wicked and damnable, the contentes of whiche doctrine and bookes so intituled, the sayde Latimer especially touching the heresie agaynst the verity of Christes bodye and his true presence in the sacrament of the aultar hath heard, taught, read, preached, beleueed, holden, mayntayned and kept, and so at this presēt doth yet beleue, hold,* maintayne, and keepe, contrary to the fayth of Christes Catholicke church, and the vnitie of the same obserued amongst all true christen people, incurring thereby heresie excommunication and Scisme to the losse both of their soules and of their beleuers. 4. Item that the sayde Latimer and Hooper, and eyther of them, being of these vile and detestable quallities and consequently by the ordinaunce of the catholick Church of Christ, aswell of this Realme, as also throughout all Christendome, being so excommunicate & cast out thereby, from the sayd Church, are not to this pretended denuntiation, agaynst me theyr Bishop, nor to any iudiciall act to be admitted, ne yet to be accompanied with all, or aunswered vnto, but are by scripture and the order of Christes Catholicke Church here in this Realme vtterly and clearely, to be excluded auoyded, detested, eschewed Page 1315 and abhorred in all maner of wise, of all faithfull and true christen people, fearing God, and desiring the aduancement of the truth. 5. Item, that where the saide Latimer and Hoper in their said pretended denunciation, amongst other things do vntruly deduce, that they haue made their said pretended denunciation not moued of any malice or euill will, but for the good tranquillitie and gouernaunce of this Realme, which as they pretend in their gay and glorious prohome, they would beseeme to haue a great care and sollicitude of, where in very deede, they and suche as they are by sondry wayes, and specially by their corrupt doctrine, and hereticall naughtie preaching and infecting of the Kings Maiesties people, haue disturbed and greatly inquieted the good tranquillitie and gouernance of thys Realme as euidently and notoriously it is well knowne, the truth is that this their saying is euident and playne false, for notorious it is, and lawfully shall be prooued, that the said Hooper conspiring with the said Latimer and other Heretikes of their factions, sect, and damnable opinion, did the first day of September last past, after that I the said Bishop of London had made the sermon at Paules crosse, assemble maliciously, vncharitably and vnlawfully, a great rabblement of such as himselfe is, within my dioces and iurisdiction, and vnder the colour of reading, dyd openly and manifestly rayle and inuay against me the sayd Byshop for my sayd Sermon, not for any suche matter, pretence or cause, as is falsly and vntruly surmised in the said pretended denunciation, but only and chiefly for that I the sayd Byshop, as became a christen man, and especially him that had and hath cure and charge of his flocke, faithfully, and truely to teach them, did taking occasion of the communion not frequented nor reuerenced, but neglected and contemned, confesse and declare my faith and beliefe openly before my audience, touching the blessed Sacrament of the altar ministred in the same Communion, affirming as the catholike Church affirmeth and teacheth. That in the blessed sacrament of the altar, there is the very true bodye of our sauour Christ, the selfesame in substaunce that hanged vpon the crosse, and the very true bloud of our sauour Christ:* the selfesame in substance that was shed vppon the crosse. Against which affirmation and assertion, being Catholike and true, the sayd Iohn Hooper (albeit now colourably and falsely and foolishly pretendeth another matter more plausible in his opinion and iudgement in sondry places of the Citie of London and suburbs of the same) hath since that time maliciously inuayed and taught, learning and teaching his audience heretically (being many in number, and assembling in great routes) to reprooue,* contemne and despise the sayde blessed Sacrament of the aultar, and not to haue a true and faithfull beliefe of it, as hetherto alwayes the catholike Church hath euer had, the sayd William Latimer, and the rabblement of his complices, conspiring and agreeing in points therein, and inducing other to do the same, not making any such pretence at all (as they in their sayd pretended denunciation, do falsely surmise and deduce, but onely and chiefly offended for my said assertion,* and affirmation of the veritie of Christes body and bloud in the sacrament of the altare.

Item, that where the sayd William Latimer and Iohn Hooper in their said pretended denunciation, do further deduce and falsly surmise that I the sayd Bishop of London had deliuered to me from the Kings maiestie, by the hands of the Lorde Protectors grace, and the rest of the Kyngs Maiesties Counsaile certayne Iniunctions with articles to be insinuated and preached to the Kings Maiesties subiects at a certayne day limited, and after such sorte, forme, and manner, as is in the said pretended denunciation surmised vntruly and deduced. It is notorious and euident, as well by the tenour and continue of that writing which was to me the saide Byshop of London deliuered by the handes of Sir Thomas Smith Knight, one of the two principall Secretaries to the Kings Maiestie, as otherwise,* that the said surmise in such sort and fashion as it is deduced and made, is not true in this behalfe, referring me to the tenour of the sayd writing, which neyther was signed with the Kings Maiesties hand, nor sealed with any his Maiesties seale or signet, ne yet subscribed by any of the sayde Counsaile, or deliuered after such sort, as is alleaged and pretended, as more euidently heereafter shall appeare, and sufficiently be proued for my lawfull and necessary defence in this behalfe.

Item, that in case any such Iniunctions with articles, after such forme and fashion, had so bene deliuered vnto me as is surmised and pretended, yet false and vntrue it is, that I the sayd Bishop either left out, or refused to declare the same for any suche cause or causes, falsly and vntruly surmised in the sayd pretended denunciation or else so peruersly and negligently did, as likewise in the sayd pretended denunciation is deduced, whiche thing may well appeare in the discourse of my said Sermon, where in substance and effect, I declared faithfully & truly these points specially following: it is to witte, that all such as rebell a'gainst their prince, get vnto them damnation, and those that refuseth the high power, resisteth the ordinaunce o^r God, and he that dyeth therefore in Rebellion, is by the word of God vtterly damned, and so loseth both body and soule, alleaging for this purpose the xiiij. Chapter of S. Paule to the Romaines, and it at large declaring vnto the audience, furthermore, speaking of the Rebels in Deuonshire, Cornewale, Northfolke, and elsewhere within this Realme, standing in doubt, whether I might put them in the place of those that put trust in themselues and despised all other, or in the place of both, dooing as they dyd forgetting God, not duely considering the Kings Maiestie theyr supreme head, next and immediately vnder God, forgetting theyr wiues, theyr children, theyr kinsfolke, theyr alliance, acquaintance, and frends, yea themselues and theyr natiue Countrey, and most vnnaturally rebelling agaynst their soueraigne Lord and King, whom by Gods lawe they were bound to loue, serue, and faithfully obey, I did to the best of my power to dissuade Rebellion, and exhort the audience vnto true obedience, say, that obedience being thus commaunded, and all rebellion forbiddē vnder paine of eternall damnation, all these Rebels in Cornewal, Deuonshire, Northfolke, or elsewhere, who take vpon them to assemble a power and force against their King and Prince, against the lawes and statutes of the Realme, and went about to subuert the order of the common wealth, did not only deserue therefore death, as Rebels and Traitors, but also did accumulate vnto themselues eternall damnation, euen to be in the burning fyre of hell, with Lucifer the father, and first authour of pride, disobedience and rebellion. And heere I did aske who had induced the said Rebels thus to do, to which I aunswered by another question, demaunding who moued and induced Eue to eate the apple and breake her obedience against Gods commaundement, who moued also and induced Caine to kill his brother Abell, yea who moued Iudas the Apostle to betray his maister Christ, was it not the Diuell? yes truly, and he it is said I, that of his great malice and hatred to man and good order, hath moued and induced these Rebels to this vnnaturall Rebellion agaynst theyr Prince and soueraigne Lord, whereupon I asked what pretenses they had, and answering thereto, said: that amongst other they had Masses and holy water, vppon which I exclaiming against them, said, good Lord: is not this a maruellous thing to palliate, colour, excuse, and maintaine rebellion and inobedience, to pretend masse or holywater, as who saith, that these things had bene instituted and ordeined to defend, mainteine, and excuse rebellion, treason, and inobedience, which I told the audience they could not do. And thereupon I brought four texts of scripture to proue this thing that I said, aleaging the xvj. Chapter of the booke of Nombers, the xv. Chapter of the first booke of Kings, the x. Chapter of Leuit. and the iiij. that my selfe added also the xiiij. of S. Luke, ioined with the v. of the Actes, setting them foorth the best I could, as one not much exercised in preaching, but restrained therefrom. And heere I concluded, that whatsoeuer pretences these rebels had of masses, holy water, or such other, it could not in any wise excuse or defend their rebellion and inobedience, referring my selfe heerein to the indifferent hearers in the sayd audience. And heere pulling out a writing, sent from the Kings Maiesties priuie counsaile vnto me touching the victory against the said rebels, which for breuitie of time, my memory woulde not serue to declare without booke, did rehearse it in writing word by word. In doyng whereof it well appeared, that I did not fauour the opinion of the saide Rebels, nor mainteine their enterprise, but contrariwise did detest them, and all their doings, declaring obedience to be better then sacrifice. And that in disobedience and rebellion nothing could nor did please Almighty God. Further, taking occasion of the proud Pharisey and the humble Publicane ascending into the temple to pray, and noting y^e outward and externe doing of them both, with the successe thereof, I declared to the audience touching the order of the Church, and the externe rites and ceremonies of the deuine seruice, that for as much as God requireth humilitie of hart, innocencie of liuing, knowledge of hym, charitie and loue to our neighbour, and obedience to his word, to his Ministers, and to the superiour powers, we must bring all these things to all our praiers, to all our seruice, and that this is the sacrifice that Christ requireth, and that these be such that make all things pleasaunt to almightie God, further saying: that the externe rites are but exercises of Religion, and appointable Page 1316 by superior powers, and that in the choosing thereof, we must obey the Magistrates, and that we also doo see that those things euer hath bene, and shall be diuers, as the time and place is, and yet all hath pleased God, so long as humilitie or hart, innocencie of liuing, knowing of God, charitie and loue to our neighbour, with obedience to Gods word, Gods Ministers, and superiour powers, ar• concurrent and pre•ent therewith.

Moreouer I then said, that if any man should vse rites, and disobey thereby the superiour powers, the deuotion of hys ceremonie was made euill, by his disobedience. In so much that that which standing the law, might be good, was by pride, disobedience, and rebellion, made euill and vnprofitable, putting examp•e in the fact of Saule, reseruing the fat Sheepe for Sacrifice, and in Chore, Dathan, and Abyron, and also in Nadab and Abbihu, Aarons two children, and in the Galileans, whose blood Pilate did mixe wyth theyr sacrifices. And thereupon I tolde the audience that they must do heerein especially two thyngs, the fyrst they must ioyne to, and wyth theyr deuotion, faythfull obedience, and then they shall winne the garland, and otherwise haue but a zeale. Sed non secundum scientiam, deseruing no thanke or prayse of God, and also they must with and to theyr obedience, ioyne deuotion, knowing that God more doth require and consider the hart, then the outward dooing. And thereupon I exhorted the audience, that when they came to take the Communion, or to heare or say the seruice, appoynted by the Kings Maiestie, they must bring deuotion and inwarde prayer wyth them, for else their prayers shall be but vaine, as wantyng and lacking that thyng, which God requireth, that is, the hart and mind to pray to him. And heerein because I marvelled that the Communion was no more frequented now adayes, and lamenting the vnreuerent comming to it, and vsing of it, fearing that it proceeded of any euill opinion and beliefe touching the Sacrament of the aultar, ministred and distributed at the sayde Communion, and to the intent to make the people haue better opinion of it then they seemed to haue, I did faithfully,* truly, and playnely declare my beliefe of the sayde Sacramente, wherewith the sayde Latimer and Hooper with theyr complices were so muche offended and agree•ed .viiij. Item, that where the sayde Wylliam Latimer and Iohn Hooper, do further in the sayd pretended denunciation, vntruly, and vncharitably, deduce and alleage, that I in my sayde Sermon, did intreate of such thynges, as most shoulde mooue and sturre vp the people to disorder and dissention, it doth euidently and cleerely appeare, that eyther the sayde pretended denunciatours doo take a declaration faythfully made of the obedience of the subiectes, to the Kings Maiestie, the supream and soueraigne Lord, and the great perill and daunger of Rebellion committed by subiectes agaynst theyr King and Princes, and soueraigne Lorde, to be a moouing and sturring vp of people to discorde and dissention: or else that the affirmation and assertion Catholike of the veritie of Christes body and bloud, and in the blessed Sacramente of the Aultare, set forth by me as afore, doth worke suche disorder and dissention: for euidente it is to all those whyche indifferentlye heard my sayde Sermon, that I groundyng my selfe vppon Scripture, and takyng occasion of the Sondag then occurrent, dyd speake specially and earnestly of these two thyngs, without taxing of any man specially by name, or other circumstance, to slaunder them thereby, and I did both set forth the obedience and dutie of all Subiectes, generallye to theyr Kyngs, and speciallye of subiectes of thys Realme, to the Kyngs Maiestie that now is, whose minoritie to all people of thys Realme is more then manifest,* and is euidently also knowne to all the whole world beside. And also dyd then declare the daunger and perill of Rebellion of Subiectes agaynste the hygh powers, and also speciallye of the Rebellion late committed by them of Deuonshyre, Cornewall, Northfolke, and elsewhere, agaynste the Kyngs Maiestie that now is, whyche I woulde not haue doone, except I both had beleueed that all the Kynges Subiectes without exception, were bounde to obey the Kings Maiestie euen as he now is, was, and shall bee, during hys lyfe, whyche our Lorde long preserue to all our comfortes and wealth, and also that the Rebellion of late so committed agaynste hys Maiestie, was damnable, and vtterlye detestable and condemned by Gods Lawe, and heerein I referre mee to the indifferente hearers of thys my Sermon, wyshyng that thys Latymer and Hooper, wyth all the reste of these now Preachers, dyd meane as faythfullye, truly, obedientlye and catholically, as I alwayes haue done towarde the Kyngs maiestie, his honour, authoritie ryall power and suretye of his person and realme, and did not moue, encourage, and stirre the kinges maiesties subiectes to sedition tumulte, and inobedience by their erroneous doctrine and teaching, then I did at any time encourage or stirre any of them in any wise, or geue occasion vnto anye of the same .ix. Item where the sayd William Latimer and Iohn Hooper, do falsly surmise in their pretended denunciation, that it was of no light ground looked for, that I the sayde Byshop of London, should more apertly haue declared y^e Iniunctions and articles aforesayd, and that it did so appeare vnto their iudgementes. I do saye, that their iudgements are corrupted and onely set to sclaunder and pickyng of quarrells in this behalfe being well assured, and so credibly informed that all the worshipfull and honest Catholicke persons of my sayd audience were fully satisfied both as touching obedience to the kings maiestie in his tender age and minoritie,* and also touching the penaltie and great perill of punishmentes for the rebellion so lately committed against his sayd maiestie by the foresaid rebels. And moreouer I do saie that before my Lorde Protector's grace and the rest of the kinges maiesties most honorable counsell then present I made my excuse and alledged many impedimentes, for my not preaching at the crosse, and did not further promise but do the best I coulde, whiche of my fedelitie and conscience I did, not omitting any thyng of purpose or euill will, that might be to the satisfaction of all people both good and bad in euery condition, poynt, specially in this behalfe, collecting and gathering together with all dilligent study, all that might make in my iudgement and opinion, for the better setting forth of the same.

Wherein first he alleaged (or rather shamelesse & slaunderously cauilled) that those his denouncers were vile, infamed and notorious criminous persons,* and also open & manifest heretickes, aswell agaynst the rest of the Sacramentes of the Church, as chiefly agaynst the Sacrament of the aulter: and were for the same by the orders of the Church excommunicated and accursed, and were so taken of all the Catholickes of this realme, and especially Hooper: who besides other his poysoned doctrine and heresy amongst the people,* had also before the tyme of the denunciation, made diuers erroneous and here•icall books agaynst the true presence of Christes body in the sacrament of y^e aulter, & did also continue in y^e same, allowing & maintayning it as good & catholicke which books and doctrine (chiefly agaynst the sacrament of the aulter) W. Latymer had and then likewise did allow, beleue, & teach, to y^e losse of both their owne soules and also their beleuers, & therefore were not now nor ought at anye time to be admytted eyther in this their denunciation agaynst him, or in any other Iudiciall acte: and that rather also, because that although they pretended in their denunciation, y^t they made not the same of any malice or euill will towards him, but for the good tranquillitie and quyet gouernaunce of thys Realme: yet was it notoriously knowne, that aswell the same day at after noone in which he the sayd byshop preached at the Crosse of Paules, as also at sundry other times,* they two conspiring with other of theyr faction, did maliciously and vnlawfull within his Dioces assemble together a great rabblement of such as themselues were, & there vnder the colour of reading, did openly rayle and inuey agaynst hym, nor for any the causes pretended in theyr denunciation, but because hee had in his Sermon declared (as the Catholicke Church taught) that in the Sacrament of the aulter there was the very true bodye and bloude of Christ, the same in substaunce that was hanged and shed vpon the Crosse.

Then after these vayne and friuolous allegations agaynst the denouncers, he commeth and aunswereth to the substaunce of their denunciatiō, and sayth, that where they in the same do falsly surmise that there were deliuered vnto him from the kinges Maiestie by the handes of the lord Protectour and the rest of his highnes Counsaile,* certayne Iniunctions and articles to be published and declared vnto the people at a day limited in the same, theyr information in such sort as it was deduced, was most false & vntrue, for that the articles deliuered vnto hym by Syr Thomas Smith one of the kinges secretaries, were neyther signed with the kinges owne hand, neyther sealed with his highnes seale or signet, nor yet subscribed by anye of his Counsaile. &c.

Where marke, I beseech you, the subtiltie of a disloyall Papist,* who because the articles were not sealed or signed by the king and his Counsaile, would make them therefore not to be of any such force, as that the breach thereof should cause him to incurre the danger of contemptuous disobediēce. But admit they were not signed nor sealed (of which thing by the way in the denunciation there is no mention Page 1317 yea or nay) yet is it manifest by the second Bill of Articles ministred vnto him by the Cōmissioners in the fourth Acte of this processe,* that at such time as he was before y^e Counsell, those Articles were by the commandemēt of the Lord Protectour, openly there read vnto him by one of the Secretaries, and after addition of the Article concerning the Kings lawfull power and authoritie during his yong yeares, were also deliuered vnto hym by the handes of the Lord Protectour, in the presence of y^e rest of the Counsell: who thus receiuing them, promised there faithfully to accomplish all the contentes thereof. After which, they were againe deliuered vnto Secretary Smith, to amend suche things therein as the Lord Protectour and the rest of the Counsaile had there appointed. Which being accordingly done (as the Bishop himselfe at the last receipt thereof confessed, were finally deliuered vnto him by the Secretary: and therefore was this but a poore shift.

Now after this, he maketh a supposition: that in case it were true,* that the Iniunctions were deliuered him according to their information: yet was it vntrue that he did omitte or refuse to declare the same for any such causes as they had alledged against him, and that did wel appeare in the discourse of his Sermon, which tended principally (as he sayd) to the disallowing and condemnation of all rebels, and chiefly of the rebels in Northfolke, Southfolke, Deuonshyre, & Cornwall, or elsewhere within this Realme of England: who forgetting their allegiance and duty vnto their Prince, assigned them by Gods word as their supreme head, their natural loue and care for their countrey, wiues,* children, and kinsfolke, did both deserue death bodily as traytors, & also accumulate vnto themselues damnation of body and soule, eternally with Sathan the father and first mouer of all rebellion and disobedience: and herewithall farther exclaiming against the pretenses of those rebels, who amongst other thyngs pretended the Masse and holywater, with such like, which were neuer ordeined for the purpose, to colour and maintayne rebellion (as he sayd he then proued out of the 16. of Nombers 1. Reg. 15. Leuit. 10. and 4. Luke 13. and Actes 5. in best maner that he could, as one not exercised greatly in preaching, but restrayned therefrom) but hauing humilitie of hart, innocencie of liuing, knowledge of God, loue to our neighbours, with obedience to Gods word, Ministers and superiour powers concurrent with them, they being externall rites and ceremonies of the Church,* were exercises of Religion, and appointable by superiour powers: and yet that, whiche (standing the law) might be good, was by pride and disobedience made euill and vnprofitable.

And heere he farther sayde, because he sawe the people slacke in comming to the Communion and diuine seruice set forth by the kings Maiestie,* and to the entent he would make them haue a better opinion in the Sacrament then hee thought they had, he then faithfully did declare hys beliefe therein. Wherewith his denouncers being offended, they vncharitably and vntruly deduced in their pretensed denunciation, that in his Sermon he did intreate of such things as most should sturre vp vnto dissension & tumult: whereby it appeared vnto him, that his denōucers either tooke his Catholicke assertion of y^e veritie of Christs body and bloud in the Sacrament of the aaltar,* or else hys faythfull declaration made of the obedience of subiects vnto the Kings Maiesty their supreme and soueraigne Lord, with the peril and daunger of rebellion committed against him,* to be the cause of disorder and dissention: for that (saith he) of these two points he chiefly spake, and especially of obedience to the king: whose minoritie was more then manifestly knowen, as well amongst y^e people of this realme, as elsewhere throughout y^e world besides: which he would not haue done, except he had beleued, that both all his subiects were bounden to obey him, euen as he then was and should be during his life, and also that the rebellion of late committed against him, was detestable and condemned by Gods word: and therefore he wished that his two denouncers, with all the rest of the new Preachers, did meane as faithfully, obediently, and Catholickely towards the Kings honour, royall power, and suretie of person, as he did & had not more moued the people to tumultes & disobedience by their erroneous doctrine and teaching, then he had at any time geuen any occasion thereunto.

Then finally he concluded and sayd, that where his denouncers surmise that it was of no light grounde looked for, as it appeared in their iudgemēts, that he should more apertly haue declared the contents of the Iniunctions and Articles then he did, that their iudgementes were in that behalfe corrupted and set to sclaunder and picking of quarels: for he was wel assured and credibly informed, that all his honest and Catholicke audiēce were fully satisfied, both touching their obedience to the Kings Maiesty in his tender age, & also concerning the great penalti• and perill that the late Rebels incurred by their disobedience. And besides that, when he was before the Lord Protectour and the rest of the Counsaile, after he had made his excuse, and alledged many impediments for his not preaching at the Crosse, he did not then further promise, but to do the best he could•: which he hath of his fidelitie and conscience accomplished, not omitting any thing of purpose or euill will, that might satisfie the people in any point concerning the premis•es.

Whilest he was thus reading these answers,* obiecting against his denouncers such causes and quarels as be afore alledged, for which he woulde haue earnestly had the denouncers to be repelled of the Commissioners, the Archbyshop of Caunterbury replyed, that if there were suche a law, he thought it not to be a good or godly law,* but a law of the Byshop of Rome. For said he, if my matter and case be good, what should I care who accuse me, yea, although he were the Diuell of Hell.

No sir, sayd the Byshop of London,* it is the Kings law vsed in the Realme.

Well, my Lorde (sayde the Archbyshop) ye be too full of your law. I would wishe you had lesse knowledge in that lawe, and more knowledge in Gods law, & of your dutie.

Well, aunswered the Byshop againe, seeing your grace falleth to wishing, I can also wishe many things to be in your person.*

Then spake Secretary Peter to the Byshop as touching these denouncers:* we are not so straited in this matter, but that we may proceede against you, either at theyr promotion, or without them at our pleasure.

A Gods name (then sayd Boner) put them by,* and then do as your pleasure shall be, so you do me right, for I aske but right.

Nay, sayde Secretary Smith, you aske you wot not what: you would haue vs folow your mind in these quidities and quirkes:* and all is nothing else but to delay iustice. And you do herein as theeues, murtherers, and traitors, not to haue the truth knowne.

Say you so to me, quoth the Byshop? I thanke you. Well, I could say somewhat to you also, were it not in the place ye be: but let it passe. As for my matter,* I feare it not: it is not so euill as you make it, for I haue your owne handwriting for my discharge, whiche when I shall see time, I shall shew forth.

My hand? quoth the Secretary, Let me see it,* & let it be read openly. So it shal, said the Byshop, when I see tyme.

Then sayd M. Smith: you do vse vs thus to be seene a cunning Lawyer.

In deede quoth the Byshop, I knewe the law, ere you could reade it.

With that Secretary Peter willed the Byshop to proceede in reading of his aunsweres: who so dyd, and when he had finished, Latymer deliuered vp a writing in paper vnto the Archbyshop and the rest of the Commissioners: who then sayd vnto the Byshop of London, heere be certayne Articles which we intend to minister vnto you.

The Byshop therewith sayde, do you minister them of your office, or at the promotion of these men?(poynting to Latimer & Hoper) for I perceauē they gaue thē vnto you.

Nay, sayd Secretary Peter, we will minister them vnto you, ex officio mero, and thereupon tooke an othe of the Byshop de fideliter respondendo.* Who desiring a copie of the Articles, required also a competent time to be geuen vnto him to make aunswere therevnto.

To whom Secretary Peter replied, saying: My Lord, heere be certaine of the Articles touching your owne fact, which you may aunswere vnto forthwith:* as whether you wrote your Sermon or not before you preached it.

Whereunto the Byshop aunswered,* that he wrote it not, but he drewe certaine notes of it.

Then whose counsell (sayd he) and aduise vsed you in making your Sermon?*

To which he also aunswered, that he had therein vsed his own counsell & bookes,* and yet my Chapleins (quoth he) be much suspected for my doings in many things, and sometimes I for theirs, when there is no cause why.

These wordes ended, the Commissioners assigned him Monday the 16. of September then nexte, to appeare before them, and to make his full aunsweres vnto all the Articles ministred vnto him by them this daye: the contentes whereof are as foloweth.

¶The forme and tenour of the Articles ministred vnto the Byshop of London, by the Kyngs Commissioners.

MOnday the xvj. of September, the Archbish. associated with the Bishop of Rochester,* Secretary Smith▪ Page 1318 and Doctor May Deane of Paules, sat iudicially▪ within his Chappill at Lambeth: before whom there and then appeared the Byshop of London according as he was assigned in the last Session; at which time he exhibited vnto the Commissioners in 〈...〉 his answeres vnto the last former Articles.*

But before the same were there read, the Archbyshop sayd vnto him, that his 〈◇〉 a••sweres made y^e 13. of September vnto the denunc•a••••, were very obscure, & therewith also contained much matter▪ of slaunder agaynst Latimer and Hooper, and much vntruth, and therefore they desired there to purge themselues. Whereupon Latimer first obe••ing leaue to speake, sayd, that the Byshop of Londō had most falsely, vntruly, and vncharitably accused him, •aying to his charge many fayned and vntrue matters in his former aunsweres to the denunciation, and such as he should neuer be able to proue. For wherei• his sayd aunswere he alleadged that Hugh Latimer and Iohn Hooper with other heretickes conspiring agaynst him, did the first day of September after the Bishoppes Sermon assemble themselues together vnlawfully against the sayd Bishop, that saying of his was most vntrue.* For neyther that day, nor yet before that day, nor vntill certayne dayes after, he euer knew or spake with Hooper. And as touching hys owne preaching there openly accused by the Byshoppe, he sayd he neuer helde,* taught; or preached any thing concerning the blessed Sacrament, otherwise then he ought to do, nor otherwise then according to the Scriptures, & true Catholicke fayth of Christes Church: and therefore offered▪ himselfe to be tryed by the Archbishop or other suche learned men as it should please the Kings Maiesty, or the said Commissioners to appoynt: and farther to suffer to be hāged, drawne, and quartered, if the Byshoppe coulde iustly proue true the thinges that he had there shamefully layde to his charge. Then M. Hooper vpon like 〈◇〉 obtained, sayd to this effect.

This vngodly man (pointing to the Bishop) hath most vncharitably and vngodly accused me before your grace & this audience, and hath layd to my charge that I am an hereticke. Whereas I take God to recorde, I neuer spake, read, taught, or preached any heresy, but only the most true and pure word of God. And where he sayth I frequēt the company of heretickes, I doe muche maruell of his so saying, for it hath pleased my Lord Protectours Grace, my singuler good Lord and Mayster, and my Ladyes Grace to haue me with them, and I haue preached before them, and much vsed theyr company, with diuers other worshipfull persons, and therefore I suppose this man meaneth them. And farther, where as he sayth that I haue made hereticall bookes agaynst the blessed Sacrament of the body and bloud of Christ, calling it Mathematicall, I perceiue that this man knoweth not what this word Mathematicall there meaneth, and therefore vnderstandeth not my booke: which I take God to my Iudge, I haue made truely and sincerely, and according to his holy word: and by the same his holy worde and Scriptures I am alwayes & shall be ready to submit my selfe to your Graces iudgemēt and the superiour powers to be tryed: with many suche more wordes of like importance.

Which ended, the Archbishop to shorten this matter, asked the bishop how he could proue that Hooper and Latimer assembled together agaynst him the first of September, as he had alleadged, seing they now denyed it, and therfore willed him to aunswere forthwith thereunto.

The Byshop then aunswered that hee woulde duelye proue it,* so that he might be admitted to do it according to lawe, and with that hee pulled out of his slieue certayne bookes, saying: I haue this Uarlets bookes whyche hee made agaynst the blessed sacrament, which you shal heare. Then as he was turning certayne leaues thereof, Hooper beganne agayne to speake,* but the Byshop turning hymselfe towardes him, tauntingly sayd, put vp your pypes, you haue spokē for your part, I wil meddle no more with you, and therewith read a certayn sentence vpon the book. Which done, he sayd: Lo here you may see his opinion, and what it is.

At which wordes the people standing behind, and seeing his vnreuerent and vnsemely demeanor and raylyng,* fell sodenly into great laughing. Whereat the Bishop being moued, and perceiuing not the cause wherfore they did so laugh, turned him towards thē in a great rage saying: ah Woodcockes, woodcockes.

*Then sayd one of the Commissioners, why say you so my Lord mary (quoth he) I may wel cal them Woodcocks that thus will laugh, and know not wherat, nor yet heard what I sayd or read.

Well my Lord of London, sayd the Archbyshop, then I perceiue you would perswade this audience y^t you wer called hither for preaching of your beliefe in the Sacramēt of the aultar, and therefore you lay to these mens charge (meaning Hooper and Latimer) that they haue accused you of that. Howbeit, there is no such thing layd to your charge, and therefore this audience shal heare openly read the denunciation that is put vp agaynst you, to the intent they may the better perceiue your dealing herein. And therewithall he sayd vnto the people: My Lord of Londō would make you beleue that he is called hyther for declaring and preaching his opinion touching the sacrament of the aultar,* but to the intent you may perceiue how he goeth about to deceiue you, you shall heare the denunciation that is layd in agaynst him read vnto you,* and therupō he deliuered the denunciatiō vnto Syr Iohn Mason knight who there read it openly. Which done, the Archbishop said agayne vnto the audience: Loe, here you heare how the bishop of London is called for no such matter as he woulde perswade you.

With this the Bishop being in a raging heate, as one cleane voyd of all humanity,* turned himselfe aboute vnto the people saying: Well, now heare what the Byshop of London sayth for his part. But the Commissioners seing his inordinate contumacy, denyed him to speak any more, saying that he vsed himselfe very disobediently: with moe like wordes.

Notwithstanding he still persisting in his vnreuerent maner of dealing with the Commissioners,* pulled out of his slieue an other booke, and then sayde vnto the Archbyshop: My Lord of Caunterbury, I haue here a note out of your bookes that you made touching the blessed Sacrament, wherein you do affirme the verity of the body and bloud of Christ to be in the sacramēt, and I haue an other booke also of yours of the cōtrary opiniō: which is a maruellous matter.

To which the Archbishop aunswered, that he made no bookes contrary one to another,* and that he would defend his bookes, how be it he thought the Byshop vnderstoode them not: For I promise you, quoth he, I will finde a boy of ten yeares old, that shal be more apt to vnderstand that matter then you my L. of London be.

Thus after much multiplying of like words, the Commissioners thinking not good to spend any more wast time with him, willed him to shewe forth his aunsweres vnto the Articles objected the last day agaynst him. Whereupon he hauing them ready, did read the same openly vnto thē.* Wherein after many woordes of his former Protestation recited, with a maruellous lamentation, to see that one of his vocation, at the malicious denunciation of vile heretickes, should be vsed after such a straunge sort, hauing neuerthelesse done the best he could to declare his obedience vnto the kinges Maiesty for the repressing and discouraging of rebellion and all Rebels, and also for the aduancement of the verity of Christes true body and his presence in the Sacrament of the aultar, for which onely the malicious denouncers with theyr complices had studied to molest and trouble him,* he then commeth to aunswering the Articles and sayth, that to the first, second, and fourth hee hath already in his former aunsweres to the denunciation sufficiently aunswered, and therefore was not bound by law to answere any further.

As to the thyrd and fift he sayd, he began to write hys Sermon, but being soone wery, did onely make certayne notes therof without help of any other, sauing that he shewed them to his Chaplaynes requiring them to put hym in remembraunce therof: amongst the which for the better setting forth of the kinges Maiestyes power and authority in his minority, he had collected aswell out of historyes, as also out of the Scriptures, the names of diuers young kinges, who notwithstanding theyr minority,* were faithfully & obediently honored & reputed for very true & lawfull kinges. As Henry 3. being but 9. yeares olde, Edw. 3. being but 13, yeares, Rich. 2. being but 11. yeares. Henry 6. being not fully one yere, Edw. 5. being but 11. yeres. Hen 8. being but 18. yeares of age. And out of the old Testament, Osias & Achas, who were but 16. yeares olde,* Salomon & Manasses being but 12. yeares, Iosias, Ioachim & Ioas, being but 8. yeres of age whē they entred their raignes. Al which notes w^t many other he had purposed to declare if they had come vnto his memory, as indeed they did not be'cause y^e same was disturbed partly for lacke of vse of preaching, & partly by reasō of a bill y^t was deliuered him frō y^e kings counsell,* to declare the victory then had against the rebels in Northfolke & Deuonshyre, which being of some good length confounded his memory: & partly also for that his book in his Sermon time fell away from him, wherein were diuers of his notes whiche hee had collected for that Page 1319 purpose: So that he could not remember what he would, but yet in generality he perswaded the people to obediēce to the kinges Maiestye, whose minoritye was manifestly knowne to them and all other.

Then as to the 6. he sayd he knew not the rebels opinion,* and therefore could not answere therunto. And as for aunswere to the 7.8.9. and 11. Articles which touched hys pastoral office, he sayd that notwithstanding his manifold and great troubles, aswel by his owne busines and his families sicknes, as also by vncharitable informatiōs made agaynst him, yet he hath not failed to geue order vnto his officers straitly to look vnto such matters, and such as he hath knowne, which were very few or none, he caused to be punished according to the lawes. Al which answeres w^t other, written with his owne hand here vnder folow.

¶The aunsweres of Boner vnto the Articles objected to him by the kinges Commissioners the first time.

I Edmond Byshop of London, vnder protestation heretofore by me made, exhibited and repeated before you, which in all my sayinges and doynge, I entend to haue for repeated & rehearsed agayn to all lawfull effectes and purposes, for my honest and necessary defence with protestation also of the nullity and iniquity of your processe I had made in this behalfe, and likewise of the generality, incerteynety, obscurity, contrariety, repugnaunce, variety, insufficiency, and inuadility of the thinges alleadged and deduced before you,* agaynst me aswell in the commission, and denunciation in diuers partes, as also touching the Articles and Interrogatoryes so ministred vnto me. Lamenting not a little, that one of my vocation, at the malicious denunciation of vyle hereticall and detestable persons, should be vsed after this straūge sort, hauing done the best I coulde to declare myne obedience vnto the Kynges most excellent Maiesty, for the repressing and discouragyng of Rebellion, and Rebellious Persons, and for the aduauncement of the veritye of Christes true body and his presence in the most blessed sacrament of the Aultar, for which onely the malicious denounciatours with theyr complices haue studyed to molest and trouble me. Albeit coulourably they woulde be seene to pretend other causes, especially the good and tranquility of this Realme, which our Lord GOD knoweth they care nothing for, but contrarywise doe lette and impeache the same, corrupting and infecting with theyr poysoned & false doctrine, & teaching the Kings Subiects in this Realme, to the great perill and daunger thereof manye wayes: * doe aunswere vnto certayne pretended Articles and Interogatoryes ministred by you in deede vnto me the sayde Byshoppe the xiiij. daye of September 1540. as foloweth.

To the first Article beginning thus: Fyrst it is reported. &c. and ending thus: to obserue and follow the same. I doe say and for aunswere doe refere me vnto my former answers heretofore, y^t is to wit y^e sayd xiiij. day of September made and exhibited by me before you vnto the sayde pretended denunciation, touching this matter, alleadging with all, that a Reporte of thinges doth not absolutely proue, nor necessary inferre thinges to be in verye deede true after such a sort, fashion, maner and forme, as sometimes they be reported and rehearsed.

To the second beginning thus. Item, whether that you. * &c. and ending thus: as they were put vnto you. I doe aunswere and saye, that this Article doth depend on the first Article, next before, which after such sort, fashion, maner and forme, as it is deduced, was iustly by me in my aunswere made vnto the same, denied, and I therefore now not bounden by the law eftsoones to make other aunswere thereunto.
